I want to say in behalf of these inventors and manufacturers that by our laws we give them a special right to use their invention free of competition for a certain length of time, and we should not reproach them for what we give them by our laws. They have that right until the expiration of their patent. This patent on screws will, as I believe, very soon expire. Now, under our internal revenue laws and tariff bills we have very much increased the price of iron used by these manufacturers, about which they make no complaint; and it takes two pounds of iron to make one pound of screws. Now, as we have not proposed to increase the duties at all upon this article, but have increased the duty upon the articles which enter into the manufacture, and have levied a tax upon the amount of their sales, I do not see that the gentleman's argument meets the case at all.

Mr. MALLORY. I would ask my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means if the action of the House just now in refusing to increase the duty on small bar iron was not a bonus to these monopolies that we are talking about? I understand that these wood screws are made from the small bar iron imported into this country. An effort was made a short time since to increase the duty on that class of iron, but the proposition was voted down. It seems to me that this is giving a sort of bonus to these monopolies.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman had listened to what I said he would have understood that I would have been perfectly willing to increase the duty on small iron if the internal tax had been increased on the same article; but as the internal tax bill did not increase the tax upon this description of iron, I was unwilling to increase the tariff upon it.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. On page 10, line one hundred and eighteen, I move to strike out the word "nine" and insert "six," so that the clause will read:

On old scrap iron, six dollars per ton: Provided, That nothing shall be deemed old iron that has not been in actual use and fit only to be remanufactured.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say merely that this is an article which competes with pig iron, and is worth full as much if not more. It ought not to have a less duty upon it than is levied upon pig iron.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. This is the material out of which the small bar iron is made.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WINFIELD. I move to add at the end of line one hundred and sixty, on page 12, the words "valued at over three dollars per dozen, fifty cents per dozen and forty per cent. ad valorem," so that the clause will read:

On penknives, jackknives, or pocketknives of all kinds, valued at three dollars or less per dozen, fifty cents per dozen, and in addition thereto twenty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over three dollars per dozen, fifty cents per dozen and forty per cent. ad valorem.

It is evidently an omission on the part of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. On lines one hundred and seventy-four and one hundred and seventy-five, on pages 12 and 13, I move to strike out the words "and twenty-five cents;" and I move, also, to strike out, in line one hundred and seventy-six, the word "sixty" and insert "forty" in lieu thereof; so that the clause will read:

On bituminous coal, and shale, one dollar for a ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel; on all other coal, forty cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel.

Mr. Chairman, every one knows that coal has been exceedingly high, almost double what it used to be, and it seems to me that this is very high protection. I trust, therefore, that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. The present tariff on this article is wholly inoperative under the reciprocity treaty, which is eternally thrusting itself before the House, and which cannot be helped until next December. All the coal imported comes in free, or nearly all, and there is no necessity for the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KERNAN. Do they not import coal from Europe?

Mr. MORRILL. Very little.

Mr. KERNAN. I understand that the amount imported is very large.

Mr. STEVENS. Very little coal is imported now from Europe. Most of that imported comes from Nova Scotia.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I propose to add after line twenty, on page 14, the words "on indigo, dye-woods, barilla, and madders, thirty per cent. ad valorem." This is one of the manufacturing interests of the country, and as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has stated that the object of this bill is to sustain the war and derive a revenue, I propose to add several millions of dollars a year to the revenue of the country.

Mr. MORRILL. It is hardly necessary, Mr. Chairman, to make any remarks on that proposition. It comes from a quarter that aims at striking down every manufacturing interest in the country. I trust it will not be adopted.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to state that none of these articles pay at present any duty whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the fourth section by striking out on page 15, lines thirty-four and thirty-five, the words "except while on the sheep."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the same section by striking out in the following line the words "fifty per cent. of" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "double."

The amendment was agreed to.

The proviso, as amended by the last two amendments, reads:

And provided further, That wool which shall be increased in value by being scoured or cleansed shall pay in addition to the duties herein provided double the amount of such duties.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I move to amend the fourth section by striking out, on page 14, lines nine and ten, the word "twelve" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirteen;" so that it will read:

On all wool, unmanufactured, and all hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, unmanufactured, the value whereof at the last port or place from whence exported to the United States shall be 13 cents or less per pound, 3 cents per pound; exceeding 13 cents and not exceeding 24 cents per pound, 6 cents per pound; exceeding 24 cents per pound, 10 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 10 per cent. ad valorem.

I believe that these coarse wools do not come in competition with any wools of native growth; and there is danger that the price of them at the ports of importation may rise above 12 cents. As carpets are manufactured entirely from that description of wools, and as the Government is deriving a large revenue on them under the internal revenue bill, I think that if the price of wool should be raised it would increase the cost of carpets to such an extent as that they would be entirely unsalable, and the Government would lose largely thereby. I therefore hope that the Committee of Ways and Means will not object to the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. The proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut is not a very unreasonable one; but at the same time, as this matter has been fully considered by the Committee of Ways and Means, I hope the amendment will not be adopted, and that no change will be made. As I stated yesterday, never in the history of the country has this description of wool ever cost so much as even 12 cents per pound. I think that, as it stands, both the wool-grower and the manufacturer can have fair profits.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move to amend the fourth section by striking out on page 14, lines nine and ten, the words "twenty-four," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty;" so that it will read:

On all wool, unmanufactured, and all hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, unmanufactured, the value whereof at the last port or place from whence exported to the United States shall be 19 cents or less per pound, 3 cents per pound; exceeding 19 cents and not exceeding 20 cents per pound, 6 cents per pound; exceeding 20 cents per pound, 10 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MORRILL. I trust the amendment will not be adopted.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. BEAMAN and Mr. GARFIELD.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 24, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRINNELL. I now ask the gentleman from Vermont to insert "twenty-two" instead of "twenty-four" in that clause.

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, no.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will not move the amendment, lest the committee should be broken up for want of a quorum.

Mr. MORRILL. It is precisely what the gentleman himself agreed it should be.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend the fifth section by striking out the clause as to carpets. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont to the clause in regard to tapestry and Brussels tapestry carpets. I am informed by some of my constituents who are in that trade that the duty proposed in this bill would be a virtual prohibition of the trade in imported carpets. As the ostensible object of the bill is to provide revenue, there should be only such duties imposed as would tend to increase the revenue, and not tend to prohibit importations. The manufacture of these carpets is confined, in this country, to two houses. One is in the State of Massachusetts. I will not say where the other is. The patent right by which all the Brussels and Brussels tapestry carpets are manufactured is owned in the State of Massachusetts. I may perhaps add in this case that Massachusetts comes decidedly in conflict with her particular admirer, that distinguished Englishman, John Bright, who is also a very large manufacturer of tapestry and Brussels carpets; so that while this duty which the bill proposes will prove a benefit to these gentlemen in Massachusetts, it will prove a great detriment to John Bright in his trade with the merchants and importers of New York.

The honorable gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] I am informed, is as well acquainted with these facts as I am, having had access to the same sources of information. I do not rise, therefore, so much to address the House upon this subject as through the Chair to address the gentleman from Vermont, and to call his attention to it.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from New York, to ask him whether he proposes to strike out this section in order to benefit John Bright?

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, yes; I want to benefit John Bright, of course. He is a good man for this country. I respect John Bright, but I respect the revenue of the Government more than I do John Bright or even these gentlemen in Massachusetts who manufacture these carpets. I desire such a rate of duty as will produce the most revenue, and I shall not ask whom it will benefit.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to say that only two manufacturers in the country make tapestry carpets?

Mr. BROOKS. I believe the whole tapestry carpet manufacturing is in the hands of one man. Mr. E. P. Bigalow holds in his hands the patent right for the manufacture of these carpets exclusively, as I understand.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I can inform the gentleman that there are many other manufacturers of these carpets.

Mr. BROOKS. I speak now of tapestry carpets only.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from New York is slightly mistaken as to the extent of the manufacture of these carpets in this country. There are others interested in this matter besides the gentleman in Massachusetts whom he names. He makes the higher grades. Many others make the lower. In fact, that gentleman does not manufacture the kind of carpets to which he refers at all. The carpets manufactured by the Mr. Bigalow to whom he refers, of Massachusetts, are the velvet tapestry or Brussels carpet, by the Jacquard machine, a very different article from that to which the gentleman from New York refers.

Now, in brief let me say, that the House may understand this question, what the facts are. In the first place, the manufacturers of these carpets are compelled to use a quality of wool not grown to any extent in this country. They are worsted wools, and the wool from which they comb their worsted requires nearly two and a half pounds for a yard of carpet. They will, therefore, under the rate of duty imposed on wool in this bill, pay a duty of fifteen or sixteen cents a yard upon the wool they consume in obtaining the worsted they use. They use also three fourths of a pound of linen yarn, on which we levy a duty of thirty-five per cent. ad valorem, which will add about six cents per yard to the duties they pay to the Government.

Then, in addition to that, they are compelled to pay five per cent. ad valorem upon the value of the goods when manufactured and sold in the shape of internal revenue, making still another addition of from eight to twelve and a half cents per yard which they pay into the Treasury.

Under these circumstances, I believe we do not leave them any better off than they were before the internal revenue tax was imposed upon them, and in view of the tax levied by this bill upon wool, I will simply add what I stated yesterday, that last year we imported carpets to the amount of more than half a million yards. Now, sir, I hope this duty will be imposed, and let those who buy the best of imported carpets pay for them, for they are able to do it.

Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my amendment. Mr. MALLORY. I renew the amendment, and I wish to say that according to the statement just made by the gentleman from Vermont, the taxes imposed upon the materials from which these carpets are made will amount in all to some thirty-five cents per yard. The duty imposed by this bill is eighty cents per yard. But the House will observe this difference between the duties paid by the manufacturer in this country and that imposed upon the manufactured article which is imported: that the duties imposed upon the manufacturer are paid in the currency of the United States, in legal-tender notes; while the duty paid by the importer is to be paid in gold, which, at the rate of two for one, would be equal to a tax of $1 60 per yard.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman will allow me for a moment. All the duty that they pay on linen yarn and all the duty that they pay on wool they have to pay in specie. And I ought to have added to my statement that in combing the wool from which they obtain their worsted, as I am informed, the noils or hair which is taken out has been estimated as entailing a loss of about ten cents more under the present high price of wool.

Mr. MALLORY. That would be the effect if all of these articles were imported; but nothing is paid in gold and silver if they are not imported but purchased in this country.

Mr. MORRILL. Linen yarn is not purchased here.

Mr. MALLORY. Linen is not, but a great deal of the wool is. The case stands thus: the protection furnished to this species of manufacture amounts to $1 60 in the currency of the United States, whereas the tax against which it is proposed to protect it cannot exceed one dollar a yard. So, then, I agree with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] I do not see any good reason why a bounty of $1 60 a yard should be paid to this manufacture to indemnify it for a tax which has been imposed of one dollar per yard. I do not wish to vote to strike out this whole section, but I should like to have the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] modify his amendment. I think that the protection afforded in this case is too high.

Mr. MORRILL. The old duty was fifty-five cents per yard upon the highest quality of carpets, and here, now, we propose to make it fifty-five, seventy, and eighty cents, according to the value. Up to this time the importer has been able to compete with the American manufacturer, and I will say that in my opinion the American manufacturer will have a sharper competition under this tariff than heretofore.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend on page 16, line fifteen, by striking out "fifty-five cents" and inserting in lieu thereof "forty-five cents;" so that it will read:

Provided, That no carpeting, carpets, or rugs of the foregoing description shall pay a duty of less than fifty per cent. ad valorem. On Brussels and tapestry Brussels carpets and carpeting, printed on the warp or otherwise, forty-five cents per square yard. On all treble-ingrain, three-ply, and worsted-chain Venetian carpets and carpeting, forty cents per square yard.

Mr. Chairman, the great object of this bill, we are told, is to create revenue. It is the opinion of carpet dealers that this duty of sixty-five cents per square yard will be the destruction of revenue, and that this species of tapestry carpeting will not be imported.

As I stated before, this whole tapestry carpet business in this country is in the hands of two manufacturers, and the patent right for weaving this carpet is in the hands of another. So, then, three persons have the entire control of the whole manufacture of tapestry carpet in the country. The effect of this bill is, for the protection of these three men, to destroy all revenue from the importation of tapestry carpet. The cost of this tapestry or Brussels carpet in England, of John Bright, is two and sixpence sterling. Under this rate of duty and exchange it is $2 15 and $2 28 for an article which costs in England only sixty cents. In this bill, then, a prohibitory duty is levied, and the whole carpet interest is given to the control of three persons, and only three persons. The object of a tariff bill ought to be, while raising revenue, as much as possible to discourage men who hold monopolies. The duty of forty-five cents per square yard which I propose will admit of the importation of this tapestry carpet, and, as I am informed and believe, a duty of fifty-five cents will act as a prohibition to all importation of that article. These three gentlemen live in Massachusetts. They are ingenious men. They are wealthy, and they have become wealthy by the protection which has been given to them. I do not object to their wealth. I do not object to their protection. I am glad that they have great wealth; they deserve it. But while that is so, do not let us throw the whole tapestry carpet manufacture of the country into the hands of three men by increasing the duty till it amounts to prohibition.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know that our time will be spent very profitably by going into a history of the individuals who are engaged in the manufacture of carpets. But I will say this in behalf of the gentlemen who have made this manufacture their business, that they have not, until a very recent period, made a dollar from the manufacture of carpets. Never until the invention and use of this Jacquard loom did they make a single dollar. So I am informed.

I desire to say further in reference to this matter, that in levying our internal duties, no matter what the price may be abroad, if it is worth here $2 10 or $2 50 per yard, five per cent. is levied upon the price sold for here. Under the circumstances I do not think it necessary to argue this question further.

I will say, however, that the Committee of Ways and Means have taken unusual pains to examine this matter. They have heard representations from all sides, and have not yielded to the pressure brought to bear upon them upon the part of the manufacturers, some of whom demanded a much higher rate than what we have proposed—even to the extent of ten and fifteen cents per yard. I think the committee have proposed the right sum, and I hope it will be sustained by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Upon the amendment I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELDRIDGE and Mr. ORTH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 57.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. On page 16, line eleven, I move to amend by striking out "eighty" and inserting "fifty," so as to make the duty commensurate, in my judgment, with the internal tax imposed upon the materials of which these carpets are composed. If my amendment is adopted the clause will read:

On Wilton, Saxony, and Aubusson, Axminster, pattern velvet, Tournay velvet, and tapestry velvet carpets and carpeting, Brussels carpets wrought by the Jacquard machine, and all medallion or whole carpets, valued at $1 25 or under per square yard, 70 cents per square yard; valued at over $1 25 per square yard, 50 cents per square yard.

Mr. MORRILL. That is less than the present tariff.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line thirty-two, page 17, I move to amend by inserting after the word "twenty" the word "four;" so that the clause will read:

On woollen cloths, woollen shawls, and all manufactures of wool of every description, made wholly or in part of wool, not otherwise provided for, 24 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 35 per cent. ad valorem.

That will make the duty exactly equivalent to the duty on wool.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line forty-two, page 17, I move to amend by inserting after the word "machines" the words "twenty cents per pound, and in addition thereto;" so that the clause will read:

On endless belts or felts for paper, and blanketing for printing machines, 20 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line forty-four, page 17, I move to strike out "twelve" and insert "eighteen;" so that the clause will read:

On flannels, uncolored, valued at 30 cents or less per square yard, 18 cents per pound, and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line forty-seven, page 17, I move to insert after the word "twenty" the word "four;" so that the clause will read:

On flannels valued at above 30 cents per square yard, and on all flannels, colored, printed, or plaided, not otherwise provided for, and flannels composed in part of cotton, 24 cents per pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line fifty, page 17, I move to insert after the word "wool" the words "twenty-four cents per pound, and in addition thereto;" so that the clause will read:

On hats of wool 24 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line fifty-four, page 17, I move to insert after the word "twenty" the word "four;" so that the clause will read:

On woollen and worsted yarn, valued at 50 cents and not over $1 per pound, 20 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 25 per cent. ad valorem; valued at over $1 per pound, 24 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line sixty-two, page 18, I move to insert after the word "twenty" the word "four;" so that the clause will read:

On clothing, ready-made, and wearing apparel of every description, composed wholly or in part of wool, made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, seamstress, or manufacturer, except hosiery, 24 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 40 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line sixty-eight, page 18, I move to insert after the word "twenty," the word "four," and the same amendment in line seventy-three; so that the clause will read:

On blankets of all kinds, made wholly or in part of wool, valued at not exceeding 28 cents per pound, 12 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 20 per cent. ad valorem; valued above 28 cents and not exceeding 40 cents per pound, 24 cents per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem; valued above 40 cents per pound, 20 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem. On Balmorals, and goods of similar description, or used for like purposes, composed of wool, worsted, or any other material, 24 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARD. In line forty-eight, page 17, I move to amend by inserting after the clause in reference to flannels the following:

And provided, That no flannels, whether colored or uncolored, printed or plaided, shall be subject to any higher rate of duty than 40 per cent. ad valorem.

The reason why I move the amendment is this: I think the duty provided is altogether too high. These flannels are used chiefly for soldiers' shirts, and the present duty is 25 per cent. The duty now proposed is 51 per cent. ad valorem in gold, or 96 per cent. in currency, computing gold at 90. It seems to me that an article of that kind used for such purposes ought not to have a prohibitory duty imposed upon it.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the committee will perceive that the additional duty here proposed is not the ninth part of a hair more than the duty imposed upon the wool consumed.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. On page 18, line sixty-nine, I move to insert after the word "twenty" the word "five;" so that it will read:

On blankets of all kinds, made wholly or in part of wool, valued at not exceeding 28 cents per pound, 12 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 20 per cent. ad valorem; valued above 28 cents and not exceeding 40 cents per pound, 20 cents per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem; valued above 40 cents per pound, 25 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. On the same page in line seventy-nine I move to insert after the word "twenty" the word "five;" so as to read as follows:

On all manufactures, not otherwise provided for, and ladies' dress goods, composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, mohair, or goats' hair, gray or uncolored, not exceeding in value the sum of 40 cents per square yard, 4 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 25 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. On the same page and in the continuation of the same clause I move to strike out the word "four" and insert "six," and in line eighty-two: to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty;" so that it will read:

Exceeding in value 40 cents per square yard, 6 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know if the amendments which have been made to the paragraph will do away with the objection which has occurred to my mind in relation to it; but, sir, the paragraph just read is certainly very objectionable.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose an amendment?

Mr. WILSON. I do. In lines eighty-five and eighty-six I move to strike out the words "four cents per square yard" and to insert in lieu thereof "forty-five per cent. ad valorem." As I understand this paragraph, the highest duty is levied upon the lowest class of goods. The gentleman says he is going to remedy that, but as the section now stands the goods which are consumed by the laboring and middle classes are required to pay a higher duty than the goods consumed by the wealthier classes. The gentleman in the previous paragraph has increased the duties upon the class of goods consumed by the laboring and middle classes, so as to make them heavier than the duties imposed on the silks, which are used exclusively by the wealthier classes. I hope there will be some change in this. It seems to me that if we levy duties on silk goods according to the ad valorem principle, we ought to do the same with goods that enter into the consumption of the middle classes of the country. Instead of taxing these goods at from 102½ to 182½ per cent.—adding the premium on gold—the duty should be reduced so that it would not amount to more than 45 or 50 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Iowa in regard to the duties on silk. The Committee of Ways and Means, ever since I have been a member of it, has striven for information that would enable them to have duties imposed on silk goods in a specific form; and until recently we have never had any encouragement or assistance of the importers to accomplish that object. Latterly it has been found by the importers themselves that they cannot compete with foreigners engaged in the same trade, who send out these goods on their own account, or who undervalue them when they are brought into the country. I hope that before this bill becomes a law we shall have obtained sufficient information to enable us to report a specific duty on silks. We shall certainly do so if we can, and then, perhaps, ask the Senate Committee on Finance to incorporate it into the bill.

In relation to the particular goods embraced in this item, I will say that there are immense quantities of them consumed in this country. Imported, as most of them are, from Saxony, the ad valorem duty is merely nominal and produces hardly any revenue. These are goods, many of them, which American manufacturers do not and cannot produce. I have a large number of samples of them at my desk which any gentleman may examine. If we levy a small rate on these goods, as a specific tax, we shall secure some revenue, and shall not increase their cost to any appreciable extent. This duty is proposed to be calculated per square yard. The general width of these goods is about five eighths of a yard. The tax will amount to about two and a half cents per yard. When we reach a higher class of these goods, sold here at from seventy-five cents to a dollar, we shall perhaps obtain three and a half cents per yard on the specific rates and more than that on the ad valorem rates. I do not consider it unreasonable, but a just and fair duty, one which can be collected, and off those fully able to pay it.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Vermont which amendment he intends to propose.

Mr. MORRILL. I propose to increase the rate of four cents per square yard, in line eighty-seven, to six cents.

Mr. WILSON. Then I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move the amendment which I have suggested.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in the direction indicated by the gentleman from Iowa, and to present a few facts to the attention of the committee. The present duty is two cents per square yard, and thirty per cent. ad valorem when the goods cost under forty cents per square yard; on goods costing over forty cents, thirty-five per cent. The proposed duty is four cents per square yard, and thirty per cent. when the cost is under forty cents per square yard, and four cents per square yard and thirty-five per cent. when the cost is over forty cents. Thus, gold at 90, an article costing twopence sterling, or four cents, would, if twenty-three inches wide, pay a duty of—

	Per cent. in gold.	Per cent. in currency.	Present duty in currency.
Costing 3d.	93	177	114 per cent.
" 4d.	70	133	93 "
" 5d.	54	103	87 "
" 6d.	43	82	80 "
" 12d.	40	76	70 "

12d., costing over 40 cents, 44 per cent. in gold, or 84 per cent. in currency, over 66½ per cent.

I merely mention these facts to show the extraordinarily high rates proposed on the articles referred to by the gentleman from Iowa. The duty on these articles should be less than on articles of greater luxury. I therefore hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont will not be adopted, in order that I may renew the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON. I move further to amend the paragraph by striking out, in line eighty-five, "four" and inserting "three;" so as to make the clause read:

On all goods of similar description, if stained, colored, or printed, not exceeding in value the sum of forty cents per square yard, three cents per square yard.

I do that for the purpose of stating to the committee upon information which has been furnished to me, and which I have examined with what care I could, the difference which the Committee of Ways and Means in their report of this bill make between the lower and higher grades of goods.

Now, sir, as the bill was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means the duties upon the different grades of goods comparatively are about as follows, taking them at sterling cost:

Goods costing twopence per yard would pay a duty of 92½ per cent. in gold, which in currency, at the present rate of premium, would amount to about 182½ per cent.

Goods that cost threepence per pound sterling would pay 70 per cent. in gold or 133 per cent. in currency.

The grade of goods costing fourpence per yard sterling would pay a duty of 60 per cent. in gold or 114 per cent. in currency.

The grade costing fivepence per yard pays a duty of 54 per cent. in gold or 102½ per cent. in currency.

The grades costing eightpence sterling per yard pay a duty of 50 per cent. in gold or 95 per cent. in currency.

Those costing ninepence sterling per yard pay a duty of 43 per cent. in gold or 81½ per cent. in currency.

Those costing twelve pence sterling per yard pay a duty of 40 per cent. in gold or 75 per cent. in currency.

Those costing thirteen pence sterling per yard pay a duty of 44 per cent. in gold or 83½ per cent. in currency.

Those which cost eighteen pence in gold pay a duty of 42 per cent. in gold or 80 per cent. in currency.

It will be seen, therefore, that the higher grades of goods used by the wealthier classes pay a much lower comparative rate of duty than the lower grades used by the poorer classes. Unless some amendment such as I have proposed is adopted, the bill will, in respect to these articles at any rate, make a discrimination against the poor and in favor of the rich of nearly one half the rate imposed.

Mr. MORRILL. I recognize the validity of the argument of the gentleman from Iowa. So far as I am concerned, at least, I have always endeavored to provide that the lowest grades of goods should pay the lowest rates of duty. The gentleman, however, will perceive in the preceding paragraph that we have levied a duty of four cents per yard upon these goods when they are gray or uncolored or cost less than forty cents per square yard. We ought of course to retain an equal specific rate of duty on the colored or printed goods.

Then I desire to say further that we have provided, when we come to the ad valorem duties, that the higher-priced goods shall pay a higher rate of duties. Then, how will they stand if the section is allowed to remain as it now is? These higher grades of goods will pay a specific duty amounting to fifty per cent. more than the lowest, and an ad valorem duty of five per cent. more. I think that ought to satisfy my friend from Iowa. If gentlemen, however, will examine the articles these provisions apply to, now before me, I do not believe there will be any objection to the rates of duties we have provided.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment so as to make it 3½ cents per yard instead of 3 cents. I do it for the purpose of answering the argument of the gentleman from Vermont: The gentleman has told us that a higher rate of duty is imposed on the finer articles than on the lower grades; and has called attention to the ad valorem duty imposed. Now, the gentleman had just before called our attention to the fact that in practice these ad valorem duties amounted to very little, inasmuch as they are evaded by the importers; so that it matters not whether they are high or low.

Then, again, the amendment which the gentleman made to the preceding paragraph should be amended to meet the modification I have proposed to the section under consideration, by making the duty 3 cents instead of 4 cents. It does seem to me that there ought to be a discrimination between these lower and higher grades of goods.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, JUNE 6, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 171.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that we have already accomplished the object he seeks to accomplish.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; it is only partially accomplished. I prefer the bill as modified to the section as originally reported, but a change should be further made from four cents to three cents.

I withdraw the amendment to the amendment. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARD. I move the following amendment:

Page 19, line eighty-eight, after the words "ad valorem" add:
Provided, That no higher rate of duty than shall be equal to 40 per cent. ad valorem shall be levied upon any description of ladies' dress goods of whatever materials composed, except silk goods in the piece.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss this amendment, because the discussion already had substantially embraces what I had to say on it. My main object is to get a vote of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. I will not discuss the question; but I will say that the House having already voted down almost the identical proposition, I hope it will be voted down again in this instance.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MALLORY. I call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont to the section which has just been read. It is provided that forty per cent. shall be paid on all oil-cloths other than those mentioned in this paragraph. It then provides thirty cents on all oil-cloths.

Mr. MORRILL. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to it. I move to insert after "fifty cents" the words "or less;" so that it will read:

On oil-cloths for floors, stamped, painted, or printed, valued at 50 cents or less per square yard, 30 per cent. ad valorem; valued at over 50 cents per square yard, and on all other oil-cloth, 40 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARD. I move the following amendment:

Page 21, line fifty-seven, after the words "ad valorem" add:
Provided, That no cotton goods in the piece, of any description, whether bleached, unbleached, printed, colored, or stained, shall pay any higher rate of duty than shall be equal to 40 per cent. ad valorem, the specific and ad valorem duties hereinbefore stated to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in the same direction as those I have already submitted; and whatever may be the action of the committee, I feel it to be my duty to present the amendment, and to explain the effect of the section.

Now, sir, the specific duty of 1½ cents per square yard is raised to 5 cents on low and medium priced unbleached cottons. Thus, on an article costing 2½ pence sterling, or about 5 cents the running yard, the percentage of duty is raised from 16 to 65 in gold, or 123 in currency, being a much higher duty than on expensive dress goods, and amounting to the prohibition of all importations of goods costing less than 5 pence sterling, or about 10 cents.

The increase on low-priced goods is enormous. The higher-priced kinds of colored cottons, costing over 16 cents per square yard, paid under the tariff of 1863 35 per cent. duty, but are by the present project subjected to a duty of from 42 to 50 per cent. in gold, or from 80 to 95 per cent. in currency.

When the cotton cloth is colored or printed, and over 100 but less than 140 threads to the square inch, the duty is raised from 3½ cents per square yard and 10 per cent. ad valorem to 5½ cents a square yard and 15 per cent. ad valorem. On an article costing 3 pence sterling, or about 6 cents, the duty would be equal to 76 per cent. in gold, or 145 per cent. in currency. Under the tariff of 1863 it was 49 per cent. in gold.

I bring these points to the attention of the committee to show that this instead of being a tariff for revenue is a prohibitory tariff. It will cause the tariff to fall off seriously. My amendment will help to cure that defect, and I hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I know that the House will be tired of hearing the same argument over and over again; but when the same proposition comes up, if the argument is a true one it has to be used if anything is proper to be said at all.

Mr. Chairman, under a normal state of things the ordinary manufacture of cottons required no protection in this country. But this Congress has imposed a duty of two cents per pound on all cotton, whether imported or the production of our own country. We have also imposed a duty of five per cent. on manufactured cotton goods. Now on cotton goods brought into the country there is no internal tax; and our whole cotton manufacture would be revolutionized unless we made some change in the tariff. In a fair field our common cotton goods ask no favor. I think that the change proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means is a just one. I do not expect that it will increase the price of fabrics or the revenue to any great extent. Our people who manufactured heretofore will continue to manufacture them—that is, they will not be destroyed by our taxes—and so far as they have been imported they will be imported still. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. On page 20, in the following clause—

On all manufactures of cotton, (except jeans, denims, drillings, bed tickings, gingham, plaids, cottonades, pantaion stuff, and goods of like description,) not bleached, colored, stained, painted, or printed, and not exceeding one hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, and exceeding in weight five ounces per square yard, 5 cents per square yard; if bleached, 5½ cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, 5½ cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 10 per cent. ad valorem—

I move to strike out the words "and in addition thereto ten per cent. ad valorem."

It will be observed that a duty of 5½ cents per square yard, and an additional duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem, is imposed upon the lower quality of cotton manufactures, unbleached and unprinted, the common fabric made use of by the common and poorer class of citizens. This duty exceeds 60 per cent., perhaps reaches 65 per cent., of the original cost of the fabric. Indeed, I am not certain that it does not exceed 100 per cent. These low grades of cotton goods did not cost to exceed 6 or 7 cents a yard before the imposition of the tariff of 1861. Now the duty is made 5 cents per square yard, in addition to a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem. It seems to me that in that we are imposing an unreasonable burden upon the laborers of the country. It will be observed that by the same section the duty imposed upon the higher grade of cotton goods, the more expensive and valuable grades, is only 35 per cent. ad valorem, while certainly, at the lowest estimate, 60 per cent. duty is imposed upon those cheaper fabrics which are in common use by the laboring classes of men throughout the entire country.

If this bill is intended for purposes of revenue, it ought at least to be so framed as not to fall heavily upon the labor of the country; in other words, wealth, and not the labor of the country, ought to pay the taxes. The laborers, the real producers, whose wages have not advanced anything like the advance in the price of commodities, ought not now to be subject to severe and heavy taxation. I am aware that this bill has been framed with a view to its passage. I presume it will be passed; and I presume, whether intended or not, the labor of the country will bear a burden which it never before has borne, and that, too, at a time when it ought to be peculiarly favored. We are inviting from abroad, by a liberal policy, persons from the Old World for the purpose of filling the places of those whom we have sent into the field to fight our battles. A large number of this latter class are made poorer by the result of their service in behalf of the country; and many thousands of them must soon resume their ordinary pursuits of life; and it seems to me exceedingly unwise, inasmuch as it is upon this element of labor that the prosperity of the country now rests, to subject it to a disproportionate amount of taxation. I repeat, the tax should fall upon the wealth of the country, and not upon the labor.

Mr. MORRILL. My friend from Indiana would defeat the very purpose of his argument if his amendment should succeed. It will be observed that we have levied a duty upon unbleached goods at one rate, when they are bleached at another and higher rate, and when they are colored, stained, or printed at the highest specific rate, adding thereto 10 per cent. ad valorem. Now, take goods which cost 5 or 6 cents per yard across the water, and a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem would only amount to one half a cent; but if they cost 20 cents a yard, the 10 per cent. ad valorem would be 2 cents per yard. So if the gentleman's motion should carry the very object he has in view would be defeated. I trust it will not be carried.

Mr. HOLMAN. With that view of the matter, though I do not concur in it, I will withdraw my amendment and move to strike out the words "five cents" where they first occur in the clause which I have read, and insert "three cents." This five cents per square yard would be imposing upon this species of cotton goods just about one half the amount which the article would have cost under the tariff of 1861. These fabrics, I suppose, cost about six cents a yard, and this amendment reduces the amount two cents. Fixing the tax at two or three cents per yard would impose a tax equal to one half the cost prior to the tariff of 1861. It may be true and it is true that upon this lower grade of cotton goods an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. is small, and as the value increases of course the duty increases.

But here is an article that originally costs 6 cents and it is proposed to tax it 5 cents, which would amount to a tax of 50 per cent.; add the ad valorem duty of 10 per cent., and it makes a tax of 60 per cent. upon these cheap fabrics, which constitute the clothing of the laboring classes of the country, while the more valuable cotton fabrics pay only a duty of 5 per cent. This is a discrimination against the laboring classes, and in favor of the wealth of the country.

Mr. MORRILL. I beg the pardon of the House for having to repeat myself so often. If my friend from Indiana had listened to me yesterday, perhaps he would not have made this motion. I do not blame him for not listening, because it is not a very interesting subject; but the gentleman must bear in mind that these cottons have vastly increased in price in consequence of the increase of the price of cotton throughout the world. Cotton goods that even a year ago brought 10 cents a yard now bring from 40 to 45 cents a yard. We levy an internal duty, which, at 5 per cent. ad valorem, amounts to 2 cents and 2 mills a yard on such goods, and we have then levied a duty on the raw cotton of 2 cents per pound, or upon the goods consumed from ½ of a cent to a cent more. I trust the amendment will not prevail.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. On page 24, line twelve, I move to insert before the word "silks" the words "dress and piece;" so that the clause will read:

On all dress and piece silks, ribbons, and silk velvets, or velvets of which silk is the component material of chief value, 60 per cent. ad valorem. On silk vestings, pongs, shawls, scarfs, mantillas, pelerines, handkerchiefs, veils, bouquets, hats, caps, turbans, chemisettes, hose, mitts, aprons, stockings, gloves, suspenders, watch chains, webbing, braids, fringes, galloons, tassels, fringes, lace cords, and trimmings, 60 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend that paragraph by striking out "60 per cent." and inserting "80 per cent.," and I call for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 13, noes 62; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the paragraph by striking out "60 per cent." and inserting "100 per cent." It will be observed that the question is what duty shall be imposed on costly materials, silken goods, silk ribbon, silk velvet, velvets of all kinds, and other articles, which are mere articles of luxury. It is pretended that this is a measure for revenue and not for protection. When we attempt to reduce the duty of 60 or 70 per cent. on the low-priced cotton fabrics, worn by the masses of the people, we could not accomplish it. I know it may be argued with some degree of propriety that in that case we are affording protection to manufacturers of cotton goods in our midst; but here on an article which can bear a very heavy duty, and the duty on which is to be paid by the wealth of the country, there being no interest in this country to protect, gentlemen shrink from imposing a heavy duty. The women of the country have taught a lesson to Congress. They have met together and resolved that they will not buy these foreign fabrics; that while so many of the brave men of the country are sacrificing their lives, and while so many thousands and tens of thousands are suffering under terrible wounds in this fearful war they will not indulge in those luxuries which endanger the very foundations of public credit. And yet when gentlemen from New England come to act upon a tariff bill for revenue, they do not tax the wealth of the country. Labor must bear the burdens, not only of fighting the battles of the country, but of paying the taxes. If there were looms at work all over New England to fabricate these costly shawls and these costly silks, we should hear a different argument before the House; but the gentleman who controls the Committee of Ways and Means, talking about this measure as a war measure, has allowed all those articles which should bear the highest duty to escape with but a slight tax. It ought to be known, and gentlemen do know it, that the extravagant habits that are being adopted through the country are such as that the importation of these expensive goods, no matter how high the rate of duty imposed, will still go on. And yet, according to this bill, while a duty of 60 per cent. is levied on the material composing the poor man's shirt, the lady of wealth and affluence has to pay no higher rate on the costliest silks and velvets in which she is arrayed. The wife of the humble laborer pays the same rate of duty on the poor material she wears as the lady pays who wears a $700 shawl.

Mr. Chairman, when it comes to the question of taxation, I am in favor all the time of the interests of labor, and of imposing the burdens of taxation on the wealth of the country, not upon its industry. By the opposite course you will sap the foundations of prosperity, impair the industry of the country, and create a storm of indignation which it will be difficult to allay.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised, on listening to the eloquence that has burst forth from my friend from Indiana, that he was not awake when this other question of taxing tapestry carpets was before the committee. I noticed then that my friend voted in favor of reducing the tax on these luxurious and costly carpets that are used only by the wealthy classes; and now he comes forward and is very eloquent over a proposition to increase the duty on silk. While we have provided, Mr. Chairman, for a specific duty on certain descriptions of cotton goods, and then on all other descriptions for an ad valorem tax of thirty-five per cent., we have provided in the case of silks, that where they are dress silks, velvets, trimmings, bonnets, silk hosiery, &c.—articles consumed only by the rich—they will pay sixty per cent., a higher rate of duty than has ever been imposed upon them since the foundation of the Government, and on all other descriptions of silk fifty per cent. I think the committee will be satisfied with the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I trust the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is satisfied with his speech, and that the bill will be allowed to remain as it stands.

The question being on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment,

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. GUINNELL and HOLMAN.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 18, noes 80.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded to read the ninth section of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Before proceeding any further I ask, by direction of the Committee of Ways and Means, to be allowed to report to-morrow any other articles that may be recommended for an increased duty, embracing spices, fruits, and chemicals, and that they may be inserted in their appropriate places in the bill. I do not know that any of them will come properly into this section, but I deem it right to ask this permission now.

There being no objection, permission was granted.

Mr. FENTON. I desire to indicate an amendment to which I presume the gentleman who has charge of the bill will make no objection. I move to insert in the seventy-second line after the words "Bohemian glass" the words "black or dark glass, demijohns, carboys, &c."

Mr. MORRILL. I will suggest to my colleague on the committee that his amendment is unnecessary, I think. If he will look to the latter portion of the paragraph he will see that it embraces all glass not otherwise provided for.

Mr. FENTON. I had noticed that, but it struck me there might be some ambiguity as to the class in which these articles should be placed.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that the seventy-sixth line to which he refers does not provide for these articles. It reads, "and all glass bottles or jars filled with sweetmeats not otherwise provided for."

Mr. MORRILL. I refer to the preceding line, "and all manufactures of glass, or of which glass shall be a component material, not otherwise provided for."

Mr. GARFIELD. That may make the amendment of the gentleman from New York unnecessary; but I think it also makes the seventy-sixth line unnecessary.

Mr. FENTON. That is outside my amendment. I believe there is no objection to that.

Mr. STEVENS. None at all.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I hope the amendment will not prevail. There is no necessity for it.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to offer an amendment on the 25th page.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has passed that, and cannot return without general consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend in the tenth section by inserting after the word "zaffre" the words "terra alba;" and by striking out at the end of the paragraph the words "washing crystals, twenty per cent. ad valorem."

The section would then read:

First. On annatto seed, extract of annatto, aniline, crude, barytes, nitrate of, elufstone, carmined indigo, extract of safflower, finishing powder, gold size and patent size, nickel, cobalt, oxyd of cobalt, smalt, zaffre, and terra alba, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. THAYER. I move to strike from the eleventh and twelfth lines of the same paragraph the words "nickel, cobalt, oxyd of cobalt."

Mr. MORRILL. I will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Committee of Ways and Means have had permission to add to this section any articles upon which we may find the duties can be properly increased.

Mr. THAYER. That will not interfere with my amendment, which is to strike out.

Mr. MORRILL. The whole section, however, will be open to amendment, and the gentleman can offer his amendment then.

Mr. THAYER. With that understanding I will withdraw my amendment at this time.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of taking a recess.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. MORRILL. I am not sure but the committee ought to rise if it is proposed to take a recess, as the vote must be taken upon the motion before half past four o'clock.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope I will be permitted to say that I hope there will be no recess to-day. I hope we shall sit until a reasonable hour, and then adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. It is proposed to finish this bill to-morrow.

Mr. MALLORY. We can easily do that without an evening session.

Mr. COFFROTH. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 494) to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 469) extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad of the State of Michigan; and

An act (H. R. No. 426) to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes.

MICHIGAN CANALS AND HARBORS.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill giving consent to an act of the Legislature of Michigan concerning the construction of canals and harbors and the improvement of the same; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, for one week.

PRINTING OF CURRENCY BILL.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the bill to provide a national currency, &c., be printed in pamphlet form, with marginal notes and an index, for the use of the House, and two thousand for the use of the Treasury Department.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House take a recess.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRILL's motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes) the House took a recess until seven and a half o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The House, at half past seven o'clock, resumed its session.

NAVY-YARD AT NEW LONDON, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York in favor of the establishment of a navy-yard at New London, Connecticut; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GRANT OF LANDS TO DAKOTA AND MONTANA.

Mr. JAYNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill making a grant of lands in alternate sections to the Territories of Dakota and Montana to aid in the construction of a railroad in said Territories; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to submit a motion to the House in reference to the Senate joint resolution proposing to the several States an amendment to the Constitution for the abolition of slavery, and that is, that its further consideration be postponed for one week from Monday next, after the morning hour, and that it be then taken up and discussed until not later than four o'clock Tuesday afternoon, when the vote shall be taken; if the discussion be closed sooner, then the vote shall be taken as soon as the discussion is closed.

Mr. PRUYN. This was made the subject of discussion this morning by members on both sides of the House, and I believe it was agreed that Tuesday would be a better day to which to postpone the further consideration of the Senate joint resolution, and then to let the discussion run over to four o'clock Wednesday. If the gentleman from Iowa prefers Monday I do not know that there will be any objection on this side of the House. Some gentlemen have left, however, under the impression that it would be Tuesday.

Mr. WILSON. Members on this side have preferred Monday.

Mr. FINCK. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not press his motion at this time, as this side of the House is very thin.

Mr. WILSON. I thought the proposition I make would meet with general approval from that side of the House.

Mr. PRUYN. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that there was a consultation this morning between members on both sides of the House, and it was agreed that this joint resolution should be postponed to a day certain. Some have left this evening and others will leave in the morning under the impression that it would be postponed to Tuesday and not Monday week.

Mr. FINCK. I do not object if the gentleman will say Tuesday instead of Monday.

Mr. WILSON. I agree to that. My motion is that the joint resolution shall be postponed until Tuesday week after the morning hour, and that the vote shall be taken on Wednesday at four o'clock, and sooner if the discussion be closed sooner.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

WILLIAM SAWYER AND OTHERS.

Mr. THAYER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of the State of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed with the accompanying report, and recommitted to the same committee.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT CHICAGO.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope there will be no objection to some legislation which I desire to propose for the benefit of sick and wounded sailors and soldiers.

There was no objection.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to sell the marine hospital at Chicago, and out of the proceeds to build a hospital on a more eligible site; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The present marine hospital at Chicago is in the heart of the city near the railroad depot, and with two or three sewers running under it, and is altogether in an improper place. It can be sold for a sum of money which will buy a new site and build a better hospital. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 31, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th instant, inclosing a bill to authorize the sale of the marine hospital and grounds at Chicago, with your request for my views thereon.

The marine hospital at Chicago occupies a most unsuitable locality. The depots of the various railroads surround it, and the continual noise is very injurious to the sick seamen in that institution. Two large sewers are also discharged near the premises, rendering the air insalubrious. Other inconveniences attend the present site which are exhibited on the map and diagram lately submitted for your consideration by Mr. Haven, the collector of the customs at that port.

Hollis White, Esq., special agent of the Treasury Department, is familiar with the merits of the project and has been instructed to confer with you on the subject.

I have reason to believe that the property could now be disposed of for a sum amply sufficient to purchase a new site and erect a building without further appropriation by Congress. The bill is herewith returned.

I am, very respectfully,
S. P. CHASE,
Secretary of the Treasury.
Hon. E. B. WASHBURNE, Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the consideration of the bankrupt bill, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I design to occupy but little of the time of the House. The select committee have presented for our consideration a bill which I believe is as perfect as any one we can devise under present circumstances, and which I think is called for by the best interests of the people of this Union.

For the compilation of the bill we are indebted to the industry of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] who illustrated its principles in his remarks yesterday. With a few amendments which have been suggested by members of the House, and which I ask the indulgence of the House to submit upon this occasion, I think the bill will be ready for the action of the House. The gentleman from New York, over the way, [Mr. WARD,] desires to say a few words before the vote is taken, and he undoubtedly will have an opportunity. When that is done I hope the House will proceed to act finally upon the bill. I now submit the amendments which I have to offer. I move to insert in line forty-four, page 16, after the word "attachment," the words "levy or seizure."

Mr. SLOAN. It strikes me that the gentleman's amendment does not remedy the difficulty at which he aims by his amendment. It strikes me that the words inserted there should be "for levy and sale on execution."

Mr. SPALDING. The purport is the same. "Levy or seizure" embraces everything contemplated by the gentleman. I have no objection, however, to adding the words "and sale on execution." I will accept the addition of those words as a modification of my amendment.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, reads as follows:

And the judge of the district court, or, if there be no opposing party, any register of said court, to be designated by the judge, shall forthwith, if he be satisfied that the debts due from the petitioner exceed $250, issue a warrant, to be signed by such judge or register, directed to the marshal of said district, or to one of his deputies, or to some suitable person specially deputized for that purpose, authorizing him forthwith, as messenger, to take possession of all the estate, real and personal, of the debtor, except such as may be by the laws of the State in which such judicial district is situated exempt from attachment, levy, or seizure and sale on execution, and of all his deeds, books of account, and papers, and keep the same safely until the appointment of an assignee.

Mr. SPALDING. On page 41, in line four, I move to insert after the word "creditors" the words "shall then be," and after the word "called" the words "by the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, reads as follows:

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That the like proceedings shall be had at the expiration of the next three months, or earlier, if practicable, and a third meeting of creditors shall then be called by the court, and a final dividend then declared, unless any action at law or suit in equity be pending, or unless some other estate or effects of the debtor afterwards come to the hands of the assignee, in which case the assignee shall, as soon as may be, convert such estate or effects into money, and within two months after the same shall be so converted the same shall be divided in manner aforesaid.

Mr. SPALDING. On page 57, line twenty-two, I move to insert after the word "days" the words "such debtor not having sufficient property to pay his debts in full;" and also in the thirty-fifth line, on the same page, to insert "fraudulently" before the word "stopped."

The amendments were agreed to.

The section, as amended, reads as follows:

That any person residing and owing debts as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, shall depart from the State, District, or Territory of which he is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors, or being absent, shall, with such intent, remain absent; or shall conceal himself to avoid the service of legal process in any action for the recovery of a debt or demand provable under this act; or shall conceal or remove any of his property to avoid its being attached, taken, or sequestered on legal process; or shall make any assignment, gift, sale, conveyance, or transfer of his estate, property, rights, or credits, either within the United States or elsewhere, with intent to delay, defraud, or hinder his creditors, or who has been arrested, or his property seized, attached, levied on, or taken, under or by virtue of mesne process, attachment, or execution, issued out of any court of any State, District, or Territory within which such debtor resides or has property, founded upon a demand in its nature provable against a bankrupt's estate under this act, and for a sum exceeding $100, and such process is remaining in force and not discharged by payment, or in any other manner provided by the law of such State, District, or Territory, applicable thereto, for a period of seven days, such debtor not having sufficient property to pay his debts in full, or has been actually imprisoned for more than seven days in a civil action, founded on contract, for the sum of $100 or upwards; or who, being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall make any payment, gift, grant, sale, conveyance, or transfer of money, or other property, estate, rights, or credits, or give any warrant to confess judgment, or procure or suffer his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors, or to any person or persons who are, or may be, liable for him as indorsers, bail, sureties, or otherwise, or with the intent, by such disposition of his property, to defeat or delay the operation of this act; or who, being a merchant or trader, has fraudulently stopped, or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed.

Mr. SPALDING. On page 19, line sixteen, I move to insert after the word "levy" the words "and sale."

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, reads as follows:

That as soon as said assignee is appointed and qualified, the judge, or, where there is no opposing interest, the register, shall, by an instrument under his hand, assign and convey to the assignee all the estate, real or personal, of the debtor, except such as is exempt from attachment or levy and sale upon execution by the law of the State in which such judicial district is situated, &c.

Mr. SPALDING. Having offered all the amendments I desire, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WARD. I am indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio for the opportunity of making a few remarks. I feel very reluctant, having been so frequently before the House of late, to occupy its time at present, nor would I do so if this were not a subject vitally affecting commercial and manufacturing interests of the city which I have the honor in part to represent. The large cities will be much more affected than the agricultural districts by the passage of a bill of this character; but a just and reasonable settlement of the questions involved must be beneficial to all parties of the community, and I hope this Congress will have the honor of passing a bill that will relieve a large number of well-disposed but insolvent debtors from a bondage so nearly akin to slavery.

I have already during the last session of Congress addressed the House at length on this topic. The members of this honorable body do not often look into the details of statistics on a subject of this kind, and I feel it my duty, not only to this House, but to my constituents, to present briefly some of the main facts to be considered in this connection.

A large number of those who will be relieved by the passage of this act became bankrupt from causes originating in the present war; from causes which they could not foresee and over which they could not possibly exert any control. The indebtedness of the southern to the northern States in 1861 was carefully estimated to be $300,000,000, of which $159,000,000 were due to the city of New York, $24,100,000 to Philadelphia, $19,000,000 to Baltimore, and $7,600,000 to Boston. The practical annihilation of this large amount of assets produced wide-spread, undeserved, and unexpected insolvency in the chief commercial cities of the North. It may be urged as an objection to the passage of this bill that it will release debtors in the southern States. A little reflection will lead us to the conclusion that as the principles of human nature are nearly the same everywhere, northern creditors will, on the restoration of peace receive a larger percentage of their claims against debtors resident in the South, under the mingled operations both of the voluntary and compulsory clauses of this national bill, than if the laws regulating the relations of debtor and creditor are left subject to a system of preferential assignments or whatever other policy may be the choice of State or local governments.

To demonstrate more particularly the immediate effect of the war on the mercantile interests of my constituents I will state the fact that in 1861, after the rebellion began, nine hundred and thirteen mercantile houses in New York became insolvent, whose liabilities in no case were under $50,000, and in some cases amounted to several millions. Out of two hundred and fifty-six solvent dry-goods houses in New York at the beginning of the war only sixteen remained at the end of the same year.

I propose now to call the attention of the House to a few more statistical facts of importance in their bearings on this subject. I derive my information from one of the best and most reliable authorities on this subject.* These statistics refer exclusively to failures of at least $5,000 each, and are as follows:

The city of New York, from its commercial character and the extent of its business, is always, in every monetary crisis, the largest sufferer. No accurate statement of the insolvencies of last year has come under my notice, but the amount of their liabilities is computed to be about $50,000,000. I think it will be readily perceived by the House that the enormous aggregate of indebtedness can never be relieved except by means of a general law including the various States. In the absence of such an act the energies of a large portion of the people are crushed. There are probably twenty or thirty thousand individuals in this country who are now unable to extricate themselves from the evils of insolvency. If they could be discharged by a full and fair surrender of their assets they would again become useful members of the commercial community.

I trust that the House will pass this bill. The subject has been fully discussed before Congress and in the country at different periods, and such a measure as is now proposed has, with scarcely any exception, been universally approved by the leading organs of public opinion throughout all parts of the United States.

During the last Congress no less than from thirty to forty thousand persons petitioned for the passage of a bankrupt law. I am satisfied that its enactment will benefit creditors as well as debtors; for the very moment that the avenue to escape is opened men in failing circumstances will extricate themselves from their embarrassments by surrendering their property for the benefit of their creditors, and thus the creditor, instead of being paid as at present a small percentage of his debt, or frequently none at all, will receive a much larger dividend, as the necessary and direct tendency of the proposed law is to cut off the system of preferential assignments yet permitted by law but prejudicial to the interest of creditors in general and frequently adopted by debtors, because no other means of escape are open to them.

It has been urged as an objection to a general and permanent law of bankruptcy that under the experimental and temporary law of 1841 only a small percentage of dividends was paid to the creditors. To arrive at a just conclusion on this point it is necessary to remember that for a long period before the passage of that law, including the disastrous year of wide-spread insolvency, 1836-37, no national remedy existed for the relief of debtors. In the mean time, for the purpose of maintaining their families, insolvents, having no legal means of restoration to an honorable position were naturally but too frequently induced or driven to resort to indirect methods of concealing some portions of their property which had thus become gradually exhausted, so that when the law was passed there were few assets. A permanent law tends to produce a contrary result, and to prevent the waste of assets, both by its compulsory clauses and by opening out avenues of future and hopeful employment to every debtor who passes through the ordeal with an unblemished reputation.

I regard it as a stigma on the age and country that, after we have abolished imprisonment for debt, and done so much toward enlarging the privileges and rights of debtors, we should not have a bankrupt law.

It is often said that if a man in failing circumstances will give up his property his creditors will release him; but practically it is well known that there is seldom a case in which there is not some creditor who will insist on having his pound of flesh. If nine tenths of a man's creditors are willing to release him on the surrender of his property, the other one tenth should be compelled to acquiesce and not force the debtor to pay them a hundred cents on the dollar, to the injury of the more liberal creditors, and at the risk of forcing the debtor to the adoption of a preferential assignment, or some other arrangement equally injurious to the general interests of his just creditors.

Every member of this House is, or should be, familiar with those principles of legislation which are to be considered in reference to a bankrupt law, an enactment demanded alike on the grounds of expediency, humanity, and justice. The United States alone, among all commercial nations, refuse this measure of relief to the honest but unfortunate debtor and at the same time permit in its stead a system of preferential assignments, unjust to the creditor and demoralizing to the public. I advocate no new and untried theory. Legislation which has existed for several centuries in England, France, and the other leading nations of Europe, where it has been found by experience to attain the object for which it was enacted, compelling the just treatment of creditors and affording relief to honest and unfortunate debtors, is worthy of our most earnest and respectful consideration. It is far more needed in this country, where monetary fluctuations are frequent, unforeseen, and violent, than in the Old World, where the changes of trade are less common and embarrassing. It is in especial accordance with the spirit of our institutions and of our people, who desire the protection of the weak, and that none shall be hopelessly oppressed. In all other respects our laws are lenient to the debtor. But let no one regard this side of the subject alone.

The interests of the creditor are also to be considered. It is proposed to render the estate of the debtor available in payment of his debts before it has been dissipated by bad management or delay, or concealed by fraudulent contrivances. The creditor, as soon as due investigation, just to all parties concerned, can be had, is to receive his share of the bankrupt's estate; and if there has been no profligacy, no culpable carelessness, nor any attempt at fraud on the part of the debtor, he is set free once more to resume his accustomed labors for the benefit of his family and society. This course, while it is more profitable to the creditor and more humane to the debtor than the customs already prevailing, tends also to create and maintain a higher standard of mercantile integrity and honor—a possession of inestimable value to the nation.

The number of debtors who became insolvent in the northern States in 1861, the first year of the war, was, as I have already stated, nearly six thousand, (5,935,) more than double the number of the same class in each of the previous years. These people were the victims of casualties which neither they nor the statesmen and Government of our country were able to foresee. At other times the sudden contraction of paper money and banking facilities, after a long period of expansion and easy credit, has produced unmerited calamities like those by which merchants and others dependent upon the southern trade were overwhelmed in that truly calamitous year. It is our duty to provide for these people a ready and legitimate method of extrication from their difficulties. They have been left—the victims of the war—wounded and disabled on the field of commerce.

I am satisfied that no law which it is in the power of Congress to pass will be more acceptable to the people, or more beneficial to the country, than the one now under consideration. I therefore hope it will be promptly passed. I now move the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his demand for the previous question at this time. I am very desirous of supporting this bill, but I have some amendments which I desire to offer, and which seem to me to be vital to the bill.

Mr. WARD. I am acting under instructions, and do not feel at liberty to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the demand for the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. JENCKES. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that I have a few verbal amendments I wish to offer to the bill.

Mr. WARD. I will yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island, who introduced the bill, of course. I withdraw the demand for the previous question and surrender the floor to him.

Mr. JENCKES. I move on page 16, line forty-five, to insert after the word "papers" the words "relating to the property of the debtor." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. On page 56, line thirteen, I move to strike out the word "his" before the word "property" and to insert in place of it the word "whose."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. In the thirty-seventh line I move to insert before the word "seized" the words "has been."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I should now like to hear the amendments the gentleman from Wisconsin has to propose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. JENCKES. I will.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire only to say that I agree with the gentleman from New York that this bill is one of the most important that has been brought before the House, except those directly connected with the prosecution of the war; but I am surprised that gentlemen should present a bill of this magnitude, a bill of seventy-four printed pages, a bill more sweeping in its character than any that has been introduced into this House, a bill intended to be permanent in its operations, to continue for all time, affecting the interests of every man who owns property in this country, affecting to a greater or less extent every citizen from one end of the land to the other. I say I am surprised that a bill of this character should be introduced, and after two speeches on the general subject, without any consideration of its details, two amendments most vital in their character having been introduced within the last fifteen minutes, and without which I should regard it as a most dangerous measure, should be attempted to be put through under the previous question.

I most sincerely hope that this House will not legislate in so reckless a manner on such a subject. I agree with gentlemen that some such bill is needed; that perhaps this bill—for I have the greatest respect for the legal and statesmanlike ability of the gentleman who drew it up, [Mr. JENCKES]—should be passed. I believe it is very ably drawn; but, sir, the experience and counsel of the hundred and eighty-six gentlemen in this House ought not to be ignored in maturing such a measure. The bill ought to be examined by them, and such amendments as may be suggested considered.

Sir, we have just been told that $300,000,000 were owed by men in the South, now in rebellion, to people in the North at the breaking out of the war; and are we, by one sweeping provision, to wipe out those debts, to ruin hundreds of men in the North in consequence of these men in the South having squandered their property in the cause of the rebellion. I do not think this bill gives us sufficient protection in that direction.

Mr. SPALDING. I should like to ask my colleague if he has ever read this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have.

Mr. SPALDING. I am satisfied the gentleman never has read it, or he would not make the remark he has just made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I decline to yield the floor to a gentleman who implicates my veracity.

Mr. SPALDING. I do implicate it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I hold no further colloquy with the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I regret, I say, the hasty manner in which it is proposed to pass such a measure as this, and however much I may desire to vote for a bill on this subject, and perhaps after proper consideration, I will not vote for it under such circumstances as these. I am in favor of a bankrupt law; I believe that many of our people desire one; but I am not willing to risk the passage of a bill of this gigantic magnitude, affecting, as I have said, the vital interests of all the property in the Republic, with practically no consideration or discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House to another consideration. Does any one claim that this country is in immediate need of a bankrupt law? When has there been a time of more general prosperity in all commercial transactions in the North than the present? Consult your market registers, consult your commercial journals, and where do you see the lists of failures such as we saw in 1857, such as we saw in 1861? I ask whether, in this time of remarkable commercial prosperity, when every energy of the agricultural and manufacturing population is in full and profitable play, when both capital and labor bring quick and bountiful returns, it is wise for us to suggest and predict financial disaster by pressing to its immediate passage, without debate, a sweeping bankrupt bill, a bankrupt bill for the future as well as for the present and the past? I claim that no existing emergency calls for any such haste, when everybody is engaged in business, when capital is plenty, and no man is complaining that he has nothing to do.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] has referred to the history of the bankrupt legislation in England. I call his attention to a fact in that history. In the great war which England carried on for twenty successive years at the close of the last century and the beginning of this, and which was only not greater than our present war, her Parliament did not pass a bankrupt law until three years after the general treaty of peace. The great crises of nations occur in those periods of transition in which they pass from a state of peace to a state of war, and from a state of war to a state of peace. There was a revulsion in 1861 when we were adjusting our affairs from a peace basis to a war basis, and we may look for another revulsion when we again return to a basis of peace.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. WARD. I wish to put the gentleman right. He stated that in England a bankrupt law was passed only after the war. It was not only passed after the war to which he has referred, but centuries before that war. And, sir, it may not be inappropriate here to add that almost from the earliest period of history, and among all nations where laws have prevailed as a system, provision has been made for the relief of the honest and unfortunate debtor. The Jewish dispensation, one of divine authority and commission, provided for the periodical discharge of the debtor from his debts; and the provisions of the Roman law, discharging those unable to pay their debts, were early adopted by the continental nations into their jurisprudence. (Story's Com., vol. 3, chap. 16.) In England for three centuries statutory provisions have existed in the nature of bankrupt laws, the earliest being the statute of 34 Henry VIII, c. 4, (A. D. 1543), and from that period to the present time numerous statutes have been passed, until within the present century, by the acts of 6 George IV and of 1 William IV, the whole have been consolidated into a general bankrupt law, thoroughly digested and systematized, the operation of which has been generally approved as of great utility to that highly commercial nation. I may add that within the last two years England has further modified its bankrupt law, making it broader and more comprehensive.

Mr. GARFIELD. I agree entirely in what the gentleman has said. There was frequent legislation in England at various periods, but it was fragmentary and temporary in its character. It was in 1819, more than three years after the conclusion of the war against Napoleon, that England consolidated and adopted a complete system of bankruptcy. She waited until the war was over.

Mr. JENCKES. Let me make an explanation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have only a word further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island has the right to resume the floor at any time.

Mr. JENCKES. I will ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. The floor having been taken from me, I decline all further colloquy.

Mr. JENCKES. I only wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. If I understand I have the floor, and the gentleman interrupts for a question, I will answer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island has the floor, and has yielded to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENCKES. Has the gentleman from Ohio any amendment to offer to this bill? He declines to answer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not decline to answer if I have the floor; but the floor has been taken from me, and I decline to answer.

Mr. JENCKES. I suppose that the gentleman has no amendment, and that he is opposed to any bankrupt system. This bill was presented early in the session, printed early in February, again printed about the middle of April, five thousand extra copies printed by order of the House, and several thousand out of the House; and it has been thoroughly distributed and discussed throughout the House and the country. I have had a correspondence with both debtors and creditors throughout the United States, and I have received only one or two suggestions from all the people who have written to me on the subject. If the gentleman wants to move an amendment, I am willing to give way for it.

If any member of this House wishes to speak upon this subject I am ready to concede that privilege to him; but I protest against the attempt to thrust aside a bill which has been perfected with as much care as this has been, by mere declamation upon the part of gentlemen who do not care to know anything about it. The country understands it and demands it. Who demands it, says the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in this time of great prosperity? Indeed it is a time of great apparent prosperity, but there are at least one hundred thousand active business men in this country, men of talent, industry, and integrity, who ought to take part in this universal prosperity, but who are fast in the chains of debt and who look to the action of this Congress for relief.

It is for that reason that we press this bill. We heed the cry of these people more than we do of those who enjoy this apparent prosperity, but all of whom see before them a time of trouble soon to be upon them. We are legislating not only for those unfortunate ones but for those who are now floating upon this fair sea, as it were, of prosperity. They know, as well as we know, that their time will come. When there is no panic in the land, no revulsion of business, when we can consider an act like this with calmness and deliberation, then, of all times, is the time to take it up and pass it. Now we are not influenced by persons besieging our doors from recent troubles. We are not to be shaken from our propriety by the cry of this and that class of people throughout the land. We must look at the subject fairly, and legislate not for the present hour or the next hour, but we must lay the basis of a system which shall endure as long as our country shall endure.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I fully concur with the gentleman from Rhode Island in his ideas as to the necessity and advantage of a proper bankrupt bill. Whatever may have been the objection to a bill of this character at a different time, the peculiar condition of our country makes the business success of our citizens dependent, not upon their personal calculations, but upon circumstances entirely beyond their control. The operations of Government, the success of armies, and the whimsical and changing policy of national finances may render futile the best schemes of commercial operations. And when misfortune happens to the citizen, not through his own recklessness, but through the inability of Government to maintain order, or through its unusual demands upon national resources, then I maintain that it is the duty of Government to guard the citizen, so far as it has power, against the effect of the bankruptcy which may follow.

But it is necessary that a bill of this kind should be fully considered. It vests enormous powers in the courts and in individuals, and each line of each section should be carefully weighed. I concede that the committee who reported this bill have given us full time to consider and examine it, but under the idea that it would be taken up and read section by section, and thoroughly discussed in the House, I have not given it that attention which ought to be given to it, before I am called upon to vote on the measure. I have noticed, on a casual glance at it, one or two things to which I will call the attention of the House now.

On page 3, lines eighteen, nineteen, twenty, and twenty-one, there is a provision limiting the time within which action shall be brought. It appears to me that the language used has the double effect first of utterly destroying the effect of State statutes of limitation, and secondly of being retroactive in its effect. It says:

No suit at law or in equity shall, in any case, be maintainable by or against such assignee, or by or against any person claiming an adverse interest, touching the property and rights of property aforesaid, in any court whatsoever, unless the same shall be brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued.

The additional words "for or against the assignee" would limit the effect of the provision to two years from the time the assignee was appointed, and thereby prevent its being retroactive. As it stands the limitation would bar a right of action against property in the hands of the assignee which accrues two years before the appointment of the assignee, instead of being purely prospective, and having the limitation commence from the date of the right accruing to the assignee or against him personally. For instance, a man has been in possession of land for ten years in a State where twenty years are the period of limitation, and then assigns his property: the owner of the legal title, after the assignee is in possession, brings an action to recover that land. By this clause he would be defeated two years from the time "the right of action accrued" would have elapsed. But by adding the words "for or against the assignee" would remove that difficulty by preventing this retroactive effect. It is true courts might not sustain such retroactive legislation, but that is no reason why Congress should enact such laws.

There should also be a further amendment, to the effect that nothing in this section should be construed to repeal or affect the statutes of limitation of the several States as applied to the property or debts or claims within those States.

I would like to have the gentleman from Rhode Island consider these suggestions, and, if they meet his approval, adopt them.

Mr. JENCKES. I do not profess to say, Mr. Speaker, that the phrase in regard to this limitation is the best phrase that could be used; but it is entirely clear to my mind that it does not affect the State limitation as to any rights of action for or against the bankrupt. This is a special limitation with regard to actions by or against the assignee. It is adopted in this act because its language, which has been used in previous acts, has received a judicial construction, removing entirely the objection which the gentleman from Wisconsin makes to it.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman from Rhode Island is mistaken in regard to its legal effect.

Mr. JENCKES. I have the language of the former act before me; and I had it before me when this section was drawn.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I still think the gentleman is mistaken as to the legal effect of it.

Mr. JENCKES. It may be so; but I have known judicial decisions on that very language, taking the view which I have taken of it.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. The point which I make is this: the State act of limitations does not destroy the right; it merely closes the courts to the remedy. This creates a new tribunal, and provides a new limitation. Of course, by this very provision, under the exclusive power vested by the Constitution in Congress as to bankrupt cases, the application of all these State statutes is excluded. Under the Constitution of the United States, an act of Congress passed in pursuance of the power given in relation to bankrupts overrides all State statutes inconsistent with it. At any rate, it can do no harm to have my suggestion adopted.

Mr. JENCKES. I understand that precisely as the gentleman from Wisconsin does.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. There is another objection, but I do not know that it would be, in my mind, of vital importance. Still, I think the language of the third section, on page 5 and line three, is objectionable. It vests in the register appointed by the court the power of making an adjudication of bankruptcy, and makes that adjudication a binding decree on which the right of the assignee to hold the property depends. It appears to me that it is such a judicial power as ought not to be vested in a register. Striking out the words "adjudication of bankruptcy" would remove my objection to that. There is still one further practical objection to this bill; but it likewise is not vital in its character. It is a question of convenience. Provision is made in it for the appointment of additional circuit and district judges whenever they become necessary through the increase of judicial labors created by the bankrupt cases. They would not necessarily, under the bill, be appointed, but it appears to me that the appointment of additional circuit and district judges in each district would be the practical effect of the provision, and that independently of their necessity in fact. I should prefer that the provision were not inserted. Still, I do not deem the objection as one of vital importance.

Mr. JENCKES. There may be three districts where it will be necessary to have additional judges appointed; but there cannot be more than three. They will not be appointed, under the terms of this bill, unless the necessity for the appointment exists. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will examine the bill more closely he will find that neither of his objections is of any force, as he himself admits that they are not vital. As I understand the bill it is not susceptible to his criticism on these points. If any member has an amendment to offer I will yield for the purpose of hearing and considering it.

Mr. PRUYN. In the last clause of the bill, on the 74th page, I suggest to the gentleman that he strike out the word "September" and insert "January," so that the bill shall take effect at that time. It is not supposed, I presume, that this bill shall become a law much before the 1st of July, and it seems to me that sixty days' notice is a very short one for the people of the country to have of a law of this character.

Mr. JENCKES. My object was to allow the bill to go into operation in time for matters under it to be brought before the fall term of the courts. However, if the gentleman will be satisfied with the 1st of October or the 1st of November, I will not object to such an amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. It seems to me that a bill working such radical changes and intended to be so permanent in its character ought to have more than sixty days before going into effect. I hope the gentleman will accept the 1st day of January.

Mr. JENCKES. I am willing to accept the 1st of October if that will satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. PRUYN. I think that is too short a time.

Mr. STROUSE. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to go to business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

GOLD BILL.

The SPEAKER. The first business before the House is the consideration of Senate bill No. 106, prohibiting speculative transactions in gold, silver, or foreign exchange, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOOPER. I desire to call attention to the word "privilege," in the first line of the fifth section, which should read "privileges." I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I have now an amendment which I offer as a substitute for the first section of the bill, and on which I propose to call the previous question.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the first section of the bill, as follows:

That all sales or agreement to sell gold, silver, or foreign exchange are hereby declared null and void, unless the full amount of the purchase money for such gold, silver, or foreign exchange shall be paid at the time of such sale or agreement to sell. And all money paid in partial payment, or as a margin on the sale or agreement to sell gold, silver, or foreign exchange may be reclaimed or recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit either of the person paying such money or of the United States upon the information of any person; and it is hereby made the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States to prosecute such suits in the name of the United States. And one third of the amount recovered shall be paid to the informer, one third to the district attorney prosecuting the case in lieu of all other fees allowed in such cases, and one third to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

That it shall be unlawful to make any contract for the purchase or sale or delivery of any gold coin or bullion to be delivered on any day subsequent to the day of making such contract, or for the payment of any sum, either fixed or contingent, in default of the delivery of any gold coin or bullion, or to make such contract upon any other terms than the actual delivery of such gold coin or bullion, and the payment in full of the agreed price thereof, on the day on which such contract is made, in United States notes or national currency, and not otherwise; or to make any contract for the purchase or sale or delivery of any foreign exchange to be delivered at any time beyond ten days subsequent to the making of such contract; or for the payment of any sum, either fixed or contingent, in default of the delivery of any foreign exchange, or upon any other terms than the actual delivery of such foreign exchange within ten days from the making of such contract, and the immediate payment in full of the agreed price thereof on the day of delivery in United States notes or national currency; or to make any contract whatever for the sale or delivery of any gold coin or bullion of which the person making such contract shall not, at the time of making the same, be in actual possession. And it shall be unlawful to make any loan of money or currency not being in coin to be repaid in coin or bullion, or to make any loan of coin or bullion to be repaid in money or currency other than coin; or to make any other contract containing any stipulation for payment otherwise than in lawful money.

Mr. HOOPER. This section has been very carefully prepared, to obviate any interference with regular legitimate business, and I think will accomplish the purpose for which the bill is intended, to prevent speculative transactions in coin and gold. Now, sir, unless some persons desire to discuss the amendment, I will move the previous question on this section.

Mr. PENDLETON moved that there be a call of the House, and demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 38, nays 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Finck, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Julian, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, McDowell, James K. Morris, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, John H. Rice, Smithers, Strouse, Upson, Ward, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Woodbridge—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ashley, Bailly,

John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Bliss, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Littlejohn, Loan, Marvin, McAllister, McClurg, McIndoe, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Eliza B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, and Wilson—62.

So the House refused to order a call.

Mr. MALLORY moved that the House adjourn, and called for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MALLORY and HOOPER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 27, noes 68.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope, by unanimous consent, this bill will be allowed to remain on the Speaker's table, and that we shall take up the tariff bill.

Mr. FENTON. This bill is to come up as the first business in the morning, I understand.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to that.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. INGERSOLL and EDEN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 45.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at nine o'clock and five minutes) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 4, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

Mr. GRIMES presented resolutions of the levy court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia, in favor of the passage of an act authorizing that court to levy and collect a tax on the assessable property in Washington county outside the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, sufficient to raise the portion of the direct tax imposed by the act of August 5, 1861, chargeable on the county of Washington, and that the tax may be apportioned between the cities and the county according to the assessment made last prior to the passage of that act; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of the levy court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia, in favor of the passage of the bill (S. No. 184) to amend an act entitled "An act to define the powers and duties of the levy court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia, in regard to roads, and for other purposes;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FOOT presented a memorial of citizens of Burlington, Vermont, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented a petition of farmers, wool-growers, and citizens of Rutland county, Vermont, praying that the duty on imported wool may be so increased as to produce the largest revenue and at the same time protect American interests; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of the United States, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 276) to secure to persons in the military and naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented the petition of Jacob Steeg, praying for the payment of alleged arrears of pay for services rendered as band leader of the third regiment Michigan volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Brandt, widow of Frederick Brandt, praying to be reimbursed for loss sustained by the sacking of Lawrence, Kansas, by Quantrell and his band on the 21st of August, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer petitions from 90,062 men and women calling upon Congress to pass an act of immediate emancipation throughout the United States, being from Connecticut, 4,738; Tennessee, 31; Virginia, 205; Rhode Island, 314; Missouri, 845; Pennsylvania, 1,754; New Hampshire, 3,537; Indiana, 2,945; Illinois, 14,766; Iowa, 6,638; Kansas, 500; Maine, 7,089; Minnesota, 1,396; Massachusetts, 3,438; North Carolina, 22; Ohio, 8,686; New York, 13,349; New Jersey, 1,110; Vermont, 4,392; Wisconsin, 8,314; Michigan, 5,892; Nebraska Territory, 101. I ask the reference of these petitions to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. DAVIS. Permit me to make a suggestion to the honorable Senator. Will he have the kindness to write to these petitioners to petition Congress to change the negroes into white people, and then he will have the thing done? [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator understand that that is within their power?

Mr. DAVIS. If they can do it, it is.

The petitions were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 299) authorizing the levy court of Washington county, in the District of Columbia, to levy and collect its portion of the direct tax imposed by the act of Congress of August 5, 1861; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 300) to amend an act to incorporate the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, approved May 17, 1862; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand additional copies of the Army Register be printed for the use of the Senate.

PAYMENT OF OHIO MILITIA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up House bill No. 293. I know there will be no objection to it when it is read, and it ought to be passed at once.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 293) to provide for the payment of the second regiment, third brigade, Ohio volunteer militia, during the time they were mustered into the service of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the second regiment, third brigade, Ohio volunteer militia, mustered into the service of the United States at Cincinnati, on the 4th day of September, 1862, notwithstanding irregularity may have occurred in the manner of their mustering into the service of the United States, shall be paid for the time the officers and men were in the service, respectively, after being so mustered, not, however, to exceed the period of thirty days.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERE MARQUETTE AND FLINT RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 42, extending the time for the completion of the railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint. I will say that the joint resolution has been considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and they have reported it back favorably, with a short amendment to which I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. No. 42) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By its terms the time specified in the fourth section of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1856, entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by that act to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of the road, is to be extended for five years.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was to insert the words "and a railroad from Little Bay de Noquette to Marquette, and thence to Ontonagon" after "road," in line eleven.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A joint resolution (S. No. 51) authorizing the acceptance of a certain testimonial from the Government of Great Britain.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had yesterday approved and signed an act (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed an act (S. No. 218) to repeal the first section of the joint resolution relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service, approved February 24, 1864.

RAILROADS IN MICHIGAN.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 250) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," was concurred in. The amendment was to add the following proviso to the first section of the bill:

Provided further, That the time specified in the fourth section of the act hereby amended for the completion of said railroad shall not be extended.

ARMY NEWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore submitted the following communication from the War Department, which was read to the Senate:

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 4, 10 a. m.

SIR: Dispatches from General Grant's headquarters, dated at three o'clock yesterday afternoon, have just been received.

No operations took place on Thursday.

Yesterday, at half past four o'clock in the morning, General Grant made an attack on the enemy's lines, of which he makes the following report:

"We assaulted at half past four o'clock a. m., driving the enemy within his intrenchments at all points, but without any decisive advantage.

"Our troops now occupy a position close to the enemy—some places within fifty yards—and are remaining.

"Our loss was not severe, nor do I suppose the enemy to have lost heavily.

"We captured over three hundred prisoners, mostly from Breckinridge."

Another later and official report, but not from General Grant, estimates the number of our killed and wounded at about three thousand.

The following officers are among the killed: Colonel Haskell, thirty-sixth Wisconsin; Colonel Porter, eighth New York heavy artillery; Colonel Morris, sixty-sixth New York.

Among the wounded are General R. O. Tyler, seriously, will probably lose a foot; Colonel McMahon, one hundred and sixty-fourth New York; Colonel Byrnes, twenty-eighth Massachusetts, probably mortally; Colonel Brooks, fifty-third Pennsylvania.

Very respectfully, &c.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HON. DANIEL CLARK, President of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 504) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the marine hospital and grounds at Chicago, Illinois, and to purchase a new site and build a new hospital, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RHODA WOLCOTT.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 290) for the relief of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and On motion of Mr. FOSTER, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Messrs. FOSTER, BROWN, and BUCKALEW were appointed.

LAND CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. COLLAMER to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further resolved, That this joint resolution is passed on the condition that before anything is paid to said State under the same, the State shall make provision that whatever sum is deducted from the five per cent. on the sales of public lands in said State in pursuance hereof, shall by said State be replaced for the use of schools in said State.

Mr. HOWE. I beg leave to say in reference to the amendment that I was not prepared to hear it, and I do not understand why it should be offered. The Senator from Vermont clearly concedes what I asserted in the outset, that no liability attaches to the State of Wisconsin for the administration or maladministration of the canal grant other than that which I stated myself, to account for the money received on the sale of those lands. That we have been ready to account for ever since the State government of Wisconsin was organized, that we are still ready to account for. The United States have in their Treasury a large sum of money belonging to the State of Wisconsin, and which was granted to that State, as the Senator from Vermont rightly says, for purposes of education. The United States have held on to that fund down to this time. Why? To compel the State, it now seems, to pay back the fund which she has always been willing to pay back. The Senator does not insist that we ought to be charged for that any more than we are willing to be charged for. He intimates that he would give the right to charge us twenty shillings an acre, but he does not insist upon that amount being paid. Still, what we received, he says, ought to be paid. We are willing to pay it. But he says that before you will take it and pay us the five per cent. fund we must raise the amount that would so be applied out of the five per cent. fund to pay this balance in our hands and make the school fund good. There are just two objections to that.

In the first place, if the theory of the Senator from Vermont is correct, you never appropriated this whole five per cent. fund, which now amounts to about $250,000 in round numbers, to our school fund; you appropriated $250,000, provided we would pay back this balance. That is the theory of the Senator from Vermont, and it is my theory, and the right theory. You appropriated so much of the $250,000, which is now the aggregate of the five per cent. fund, as was not necessary to make us pay the balance of the canal fund, which is about $100,000; so that all you appropriated to the school fund, all that belongs to the school fund of the State of Wisconsin is the difference between the five per cent. fund and the canal fund. But if the whole five per cent. fund belonged to the school fund of that State, I wish the Senate would answer a question. You have held on to the whole school fund of that State down to this time to secure the payment of the $100,000, or whatever it is, which is the balance of the canal fund in our hands. Now, the Senator's proposition says that you will hold on to it still until we raise that $100,000 and put it into the school fund; and why? The Senator says that he speaks in behalf of the cause of education there; he does not want that to suffer. It seems to me that he is taking a very peculiar and extraordinary care of the cause of education in our State when he insists upon holding on to $249,000 or $250,000 of money which belongs to that fund, for fear we shall cheat you out of $100,000. If you settle with us, all we can cheat the school fund of our own State out of is the amount of the canal fund in our hands, which we apply to the payment of the five per cent. fund. That is a wrong, says the Senator. I agree. That he wants to guard against. Very well. But how does he propose to guard against it? By holding on to $250,000 which belongs to that same fund until he sees that that is made good. That may compel us to do it; but I ask if it is treating the State of Wisconsin, or any State, fairly to assume such a guardianship over her. I ask if the imputation is deserved, if it is right to throw out the intimation that the United States must take this supervision of her affairs to prevent her from plundering her own educational fund.

I am very sorry the amendment is offered. I hope the Senate will not agree to it. I do not think it is necessary to cast that reproach upon the State; I do not think she deserves it; and I do not think it is benefiting the cause of education for the United States to retain this fund of $250,000 under the pretense of compelling the State to put $100,000 into the fund.

The question being put on the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 7, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hicks, Johnson, Morgan, Sherman, Sumner, and Wilson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Doolittle, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wiley—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Harding, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. I now offer my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before that amendment can be received, it will be necessary to reconsider the vote concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair will put the question on reconsidering that vote.

The reconsideration was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the following words after "Interior," in line three:

Be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow to the State of Wisconsin five per cent. of the net proceeds derived from the sale of the public lands within the State, as provided in the act of Congress approved August 6, 1846, and shall in the settlement of that account charge the said State the amount of the proceeds.

And inserting in lieu thereof:

Shall, in adjusting the amount due the State of Wisconsin under existing laws as five per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of the public lands within her limits, estimate.

So as to read:

The Secretary of the Department of the Interior shall, in adjusting the amount due the State of Wisconsin under existing laws as five per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of the public lands within her limits, estimate the value of the one hundred and twenty-five thousand four hundred and thirty-two and eighty-two hundredths acres of land granted to the Territory of Wisconsin, &c.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This amendment, proposed by the Senator from Iowa, is mainly one of phraseology, and I care but little about it; but I propose to him to modify his amendment by inserting after the word "estimate" the words "and charge against her;" so as to make the sense very clear that this is to be charged against the State in the adjustment of the account.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not object to the modification. I do not understand that it will practically affect the question in the least, for the State is now charged on the books of the Department at the rate of $2 50 an acre. The phraseology I have used, I think, will be sufficient to change the amount of charge from $2 50 to $1 25 an acre; but I have no objection to the modification; it will certainly make it clear and certain.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With that modification I have no objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I accept the modification. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move further to amend the amendment by striking out in line fourteen the words "valuing the same" after "State."

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is an amendment of phraseology. I see no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move further to amend by striking out all after the word "price" in line seventeen.

The words proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

And shall credit said State with the amount that has been legally and properly applied by said State or Territory toward the cost of selling said land and toward the construction of said canal. And the said Secretary shall also settle and allow to the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company such sums of money as have been properly expended by said company in the survey and location of said canal, in the construction thereof as far as the same has been constructed, together with dams, locks, and slack-water navigation, and in the management and keeping the same in repair; and the same shall be paid to the said canal company out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not exceeding in amount, however, the balance charged against the State of Wisconsin upon the sales of said canal lands, as above required, after deducting the sum allowed said State for money paid by her out of the same fund. The same to be received by said canal company in full payment and satisfaction of all claims of said company against the State of Wisconsin and of the United States on account of said canal land grant, or on account of any action of the Territory or State of Wisconsin or of the United States in relation thereto.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he is hereby, appointed commissioner to adjust the accounts herein provided for, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, and to determine what sum shall be charged to said State of Wisconsin for the lands granted for the construction of said canal; and what sums shall be credited, respectively, to said State and said company for the moneys expended by them in the construction of said locks and canal as herein provided.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not able to read in this amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. This joint resolution as it was reported from the Committee on Claims was very carefully considered, I believe, by every member of that committee, and although it became my duty to report it to the Senate I believe some modification of it was made by almost every member, particularly by the chairman of that committee who now presides over the Senate.

This question of the equities of the canal company as protected in this joint resolution has been considered very frequently. As I stated before, it was considered in the House of Representatives as early as 1842; an elaborate and able report was then made by the present Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] then a member of the House of Representatives, which was concurred in by the House, and the petition of the Territory of Wisconsin to be relieved from this trust was denied expressly upon the ground that the canal company was the beneficiary and that it must be protected in any change of the grant that might be made. The judiciary committee of the Senate of Wisconsin as late as 1860 reviewed this whole subject and arrived at the same conclusions as were presented by the House Committee on Public Lands in 1842, asserting the equities of the canal company very emphatically indeed. The Committee on Claims of the Senate at this session were unanimous on this subject, and after a great deal of consideration decided on the proposition now before the Senate. If the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is agreed to by the Senate I think it destroys this resolution; it puts it in such a shape that it ought not to pass. It was a condition of the grant of the five per cent. fund to Wisconsin that she should adjust these equities. When she asked of Congress to modify the five per cent. grant in 1848, it was made a condition of that modification that the money should not be paid to her except upon an adjustment of the equities due to this canal company. I will not occupy the attention of the Senate longer. I think the question is sufficiently understood. I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be disagreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I want to state in very few words what change the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will make in the resolution as reported by the committee. The resolution as reported by the committee charges the State of Wisconsin just as the Senator's amendment proposes to do; and it credits the State just as the Senator's amendment proposes, except that the committee's resolution allows the State all that she paid over to the company under the direction of the act of Congress which made the grant; the amendment of the Senator refuses to allow to Wisconsin that sum of money, whatever it is. There is one difference.

The resolution reported by the committee proposes to have a settlement between the canal company and this fund before it is disposed of. The canal company claims a part on the whole of the fund; the United States also claims it. The State has no interest in that, and is willing the right owner shall have it. The resolution as reported by the committee proposes to have that settled. The Senator from Iowa by his amendment proposes to have no settlement of it, to leave that open, and let it come back into the Treasury without any provision for settlement.

These are the two changes proposed by the Senator. The State of Wisconsin of course is directly interested in the first proposition of his amendment, which is to withhold from us an allowance for that money which we paid over to the company under the express instructions of the grant. With regard to the second part of the amendment, the State cannot have any interest, so to speak, except that justice be done.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish simply to state that as this case now stands, Wisconsin is charged on the books of the Treasury of the United States for the canal land at $2 50 an acre, being in the aggregate $313,579. The resolution as it will stand if my amendment shall carry will be in effect to credit Wisconsin $156,789, and she will then be charged on account of the canal grant the full amount of $156,789 to be deducted from the accumulated five per cent. fund. This will make it necessary for this Government to pay over to Wisconsin this year about $93,000. If my amendment shall not carry, it will become necessary to pay over during this year a much larger sum to the State, and an indefinite amount to the canal company. The assumption of the debts of this company would be, I fear, a dangerous precedent. Other companies in this and other States employed as agencies in the application of similar grants will not be slow to follow such an example. A company engaged on the improvement of the Des Moines river in Iowa will have as good, I think a better claim. So it will be, I fear, in very many cases of improvement of rivers and the construction of canals and railroads. This company claim that having invested money in this work which proved to be a loss, they have a right to come to the Federal Treasury for the money invested and lost because the Federal Government did not advance enough means to complete the work, although the company itself did not collect and apply the money subscribed by stockholders. This was a private corporation, organized with authority to raise a million of stock; a hundred thousand was subscribed, but on their own showing not over $46,000 was ever paid. The Territory paid in over $30,000 and were able to pay more, but the company was not. The company failed to pay, were unable to pay any more. The Territory of Wisconsin constituted the company's president its agent to go and borrow money on the joint credit of the Territory of Wisconsin and this canal grant, and the credit of the company itself, and he labored month after month in the money markets of the world to borrow money and failed to raise the necessary means. Hence the company was unable to proceed with the work, and it thus failed.

As I remarked yesterday, Wisconsin has as strong a claim on the company to refund to the Territory the amount of money which she paid in and thus lost as the company has to claim of Wisconsin the payment of the money which the company paid in and lost. They made a joint risk, a joint investment, and all lost. The whole was lost. Wisconsin was not bankrupt; she could have paid in some more, but the company could not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend from Iowa will allow me to state that the money that was paid in created a great water-power in the city of Milwaukee, which the company now holds, and which it rents and receives the rents for.

Mr. HARLAN. Does Wisconsin get any of those rents?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not a dime.

Mr. HARLAN. Then the case is stronger against the company than I supposed. All the effects of the joint investment made by the company and the Territory of Wisconsin are in the hands of this company; they are owning it, using it, enjoying it, and have never paid over to Wisconsin a single dollar of the proceeds. They have, however, invested more money, probably, than the work is worth, and because in that joint investment money is lost, they come in and claim of the copartner in the work, the Territory of Wisconsin, to be indemnified for their loss. Who will indemnify Wisconsin? There is nobody to indemnify Wisconsin for her loss if the company do not, unless we do, and I believe that is contemplated by the part of the amendment of the committee which I propose to strike out, and which the Senator from Indiana insists on, that Wisconsin shall be credited for the whole amount of money which she paid in, and that that shall be taken out of the Treasury of the United States. I suppose if two men enter into business, and invest their money jointly, and the business fails, and the capital is all lost, no one of those parties would have the right to claim indemnity from the other. But in this case the committee's amendment provides indemnity for both parties for their mutual and joint losses from the Treasury of the United States!

Mr. HOWE. My friend will allow me to say that we never were in partnership with the canal company. We were simply a trustee holding a fund which you gave us, and part of which we paid over as you told us to do, and part of which we did not. What we paid over we want you to credit us with. What we did not pay over we are willing to turn in this settlement with you. We never had any interest in the canal company, and never could have got any interest in it by any possibility or in any contingency, as I have stated before.

Mr. HARLAN. Wisconsin had an interest in this way, that the grant of lands was made to her.

Mr. HOWE. Upon what evidence is that stated?

Mr. HARLAN. Upon the evidence of the laws of the Territory and the laws of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HARLAN. The grant was made to Wisconsin for the benefit of Wisconsin to build a work within her limits, out of which she was to derive profits as the work proceeded, she to receive stock or a credit in the nature of stock to the full amount of the money to be invested.

Mr. HOWE. That stock could only be held for the benefit of the public. She could not put a dollar into her treasury from the dividends on that stock. Let me set my friend right. The grant was petitioned for by the canal company, not by the Territory. It is true it was granted to the Territory, but, as I said before, it was granted to the Territory for a specific purpose and to be expended by a specific agent, to wit, the canal company. We had no control of it. We could not control the company. We could not regulate its tolls. We could do nothing with it but sell the land and pay over the money, and the State of Wisconsin had a right to own an amount of stock equal to the money paid over, but that stock she was to hold simply to use the dividends in purchasing up the stock of individual owners; and when it was all purchased up, then it was to become public property; never could a dollar go into the treasury of Wisconsin under any circumstances.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not see that the statement of the facts mentioned by the Senator affects the question that I am attempting to elucidate. It is true that the law of Congress making the grant stipulated that after the work should have been completed, and after all the stock should have been purchased with the money derived from the sales of the lands granted and the rents of the work for the benefit of the State, then no higher rates should be charged for transportation along this thoroughfare than sufficient to defray the expenses of keeping it in repair; but for whose benefit? For the benefit of the people of Wisconsin, her own people, her own citizens, the persons for whom her Legislature makes laws; a work entirely within her limits, a work for the benefit of her own people.

It seems to me that the provision requiring light tolls does not affect the question of ownership in the least.

The point that I was attempting to present I may state thus: Wisconsin pays in money—if the Senator prefers it I will say for the Government of the United States—and under the laws of Wisconsin a corporation bind themselves to pay in money for a common purpose; the work proceeds until the corporation fail, are unable to pay in the stock which they subscribe, are unable to raise another dollar in the market. Then Wisconsin, as our trustee, if the Senator prefers it, having money, being able to go on, but ascertaining that the copartner, the corporation, is unable to furnish any more means, suspends further investments, deeming it adverse to her interest to proceed with an insolvent associate, and provides by law for the diversion of the residue of the grant to other uses, which is finally approved by the United States when the insolvent corporation claim damages from the solvent associate. Now, if the Senator prefers to consider the United States, and not Wisconsin, the real party, the point I make is that the United States have the same right, if not a better right, to claim of them indemnity for the money that was put in by them and lost. The work failed; the investment was a loss to both parties. The investment was a mutual risk. The United States invested more than the company did, as I understand, and were able to go on with the work. The corporation put in some money, but exhausted their whole capital, all that was paid in, and were unable to go on, and consequently the work stopped. If either party should be indemnified by the other for what they invested and lost, it is clear to my mind that the corporation is the culpable party. I cannot perceive even a decent pretext for their claim; for the funds, diverted by Wisconsin to other uses, were not the property of the corporation, and never had been. This money was the property of the United States; and if it had not been diverted, and had been invested in the prosecution of the work as contemplated in the grant, it would not have become the property of the corporation, but in that case would become the property of the State of Wisconsin. The only thing which the company could possibly lose by the diversion was their proportion of the joint profits of the investment, had the work been completed and proved remunerative.

But on this point it is clear to my mind that the corporation has no reason to complain, because they were under the same obligation to make continuous advances as a joint partner, and failed to do so; it is said were unable to raise an additional dollar. Their inability to fulfill their part of the undertaking is admitted. Their claim for indemnity for losses grows out of their inability or refusal to fulfill their part of the contract, and the ability of Wisconsin to advance her part of the means necessary to continue the work. The insolvent partner, with all the appearance of injured innocence, claims indemnity from the solvent partner for losses growing out of the suspension of a work on account of his failure! Honesty itself could not be more bold than such brazen-faced impudence! And as Wisconsin, your trustee, if the Senator prefers to consider it in that light, Wisconsin, understanding all the facts and circumstances of the case, has steadily for more than twenty years rejected the claim. Then the parties come to Congress and demand payment from the Treasury of the United States on the false allegation that they were building the work for this Government!

But then the character of the claim, as stated by themselves, is enough to shock the sensibilities of any honest man. I alluded to this yesterday. They do not claim dollar for dollar what they put in only, but, in addition, all the expenses that they incurred in the prosecution of this work, and all the losses that they incurred by investments in lands that failed to be as profitable, on account of the failure of the work, as they otherwise might have been, and all the money that they expended in lobbying the bill through Congress, and footing it all up it amounts to about two hundred and seven thousand dollars.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to ask the Senator if he claims that that is in this joint resolution.

Mr. HARLAN. It is the claim set up by the corporation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator if that is in this joint resolution which I have reported to the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. The resolution reported by the Senator authorizes a commission to be instituted to adjust the claim between that company and the State of Wisconsin, and to pay out of the Treasury of the United States the amount that may thus be found to be due. It does not particularize; they are left to prove up their claim afterwards.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to repudiate any such construction of the joint resolution, and I say that the Senator is not justified in saying that I have advocated an allowance of a claim for lobbying through Congress or anywhere else.

Mr. HARLAN. It is not mentioned in the amendment in so many words, and was not contemplated by the Senator who reported it. But I was speaking of the character of this claim as set forth by the claimants. I have read the printed report of the commissioner appointed under a law of Wisconsin—it is in the hands of one of the Senators from Wisconsin—in which he gives a history of the whole subject; and I was naming the items charged by the company and the aggregate of the figures exhibited by the commissioner as the result of that investigation; and they are as I have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the order of the day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Finance to allow us to dispose of this joint resolution. I suppose the Senator from Iowa is nearly through his argument, as I think he has passed over again the points he occupied yesterday, and we shall then soon come to a vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot possibly agree to that, for I want to have the tax bill disposed of to-day.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Probably in fifteen minutes now this joint resolution may be concluded, whereas if it goes over till Monday the whole argument may then be repeated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see how I can yield with propriety. If I give way the discussion will continue.

Mr. HOWE. We can take the vote now, I understand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the vote can be taken without further discussion, I shall not object; but if there is to be another word said by anybody I must interpose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want just three minutes; I will agree to stop at the end of three minutes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must object to any discussion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will agree to take the vote without debate if the Senator from Iowa will consent.

Mr. HARLAN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the further consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 8?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Indiana must recollect that I have refused uniformly to give way to anything.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the joint resolution.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Morgan, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Wilkinson, and Wilson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Willey—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Lane of Kansas, McDougal, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—16.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the amendment further by striking out all after the word "canal" in the twentieth line.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made the joint resolution cannot be further considered. The order of the day will be resumed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend the one hundred and third section by adding:

The amount paid for transportation to any railroad company or corporation shall be deducted from the amount of gross receipts upon which a duty is to be charged under the provisions of this section.

This section provides for a tax of two and a half per cent. upon the gross receipts of express companies. The preceding section provides for a similar tax upon the receipts of railroad corporations. Unless there is some such provision as this which I now submit inserted in this section there will be a double tax. An express company hires a car from a railroad company, and the railroad company receives compensation for it, and the railroad company pays two and a half per cent. on the receipts from the express company. Unless there is a provision like this, the express company will pay another tax on the gross receipts from its customers to compensate it for the amount it pays to the railroad company. I simply propose to add this provision in order to save double taxation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator if he has any doubt that this whole matter goes into the expenses and is an item in the charges for express business. It is not a question whether the express companies pay it, but it is a separate and distinct business. It is only saying this substantially, that express companies may be taxed on their net receipts, while all other companies are taxed on their gross receipts.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not understand it so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Whatever the express companies pay to the railroad companies is part of the ordinary expense of their business, and if you take that off you only tax them on their net receipts.

Mr. HARRIS. No; they have their employees, their agents, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have some other expenses; but this will take out a large portion of their receipts.

Mr. HARRIS. It would be unjust, it seems to me, to tax an express company the amount paid to a railroad company upon which the railroad company itself pays a tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is simply a part of the expense of the express company, and it is a question whether they should be let off or not on a part of the necessary expense of their business. The amount so paid goes into the computation of their charges, as much as any other expense.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is certainly true; but that does not meet the difficulty which the honorable member from New York supposes to exist, and which seems to me to exist.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are many cases where a double tax is paid. Take the manufacture of boots and shoes: you first tax the leather five per cent., and then you put five per cent. on the manufacture of boots and shoes. Why not deduct the first five per cent. paid?

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that. That is a different article altogether.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So with everything that goes into a store. You may just as well deduct anything else which is an expense of business. It arises from the nature of the business, and is a part of their expenses. As I said before, the amendment is merely making a distinction in their favor, and saying that whereas we charge other companies on the gross receipts, in regard to express companies we will not tax them on gross receipts, but will deduct a very material part of their expenses. They charge it over and count it in their expenses to customers for carrying, and it comes out of those for whom they operate, finally, like other taxes. If it did not it would make a difference.

Mr. JOHNSON. That may or may not be the case. That depends upon the willingness of the community to pay. I mentioned the other evening, and I understood the chairman to consent to the justice of the proposition so far as that particular case was concerned, the case of a line of steamers that go to Philadelphia and New York through the canal. They pay very heavy tolls to the Chesapeake and Delaware, and the Delaware and Raritan canals, and on those tolls you propose to tax them. What I thought was that it was right they should be permitted to deduct from their gross receipts the amount which they are compelled to pay for navigating those canals, and I thought the member agreed to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It struck me there was some force in it when first stated, but on reflection I am not so certain. In this case it is perfectly manifest to me that it is only making a distinction between this kind of business and others, as I stated.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to have some of the Senators who are in favor of this provision explain to me the difference between this case and the case of anything manufactured, for instance out of iron. We tax the iron in the bloom, in the bar, in all its crude forms; and then we tax it again whenever it is manufactured, into any other article. Where is the difference in principle between taxing a railroad company and taxing a subordinate company that has some connection with it by paying the railroad company a sum of money for a privilege it enjoys from the railroad company? Why not charge each party, because each party derives a profit? We charge these men because of the profit that they are supposed to make. I do not know of any property in the whole land so valuable as these express companies, and I know no corporations that can so well afford to pay this amount of tax as these express companies. They have been about me; I have heard them, I have listened to them as patiently as I could. They have besought me to interpose in their behalf as a great many other men have who want to avoid taxation, but I have never heard any substantial argument urged by any one of them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Besides it makes a discrimination between those which go upon railroads and all other expresses. There are many other expresses.

Mr. HARRIS. It has seemed to me that this was so manifestly unjust that the Senate would not hesitate to adopt my proposition. Here is an express company engaged in carrying merchandise, articles for its customers. For the purpose of carrying them it hires from a railroad company a car for transportation. It pays a specific price for that car, and for the money received by the railroad company for the use of that car the Government exacts from that railroad company a duty of two and a half per cent. Now, that the Government should exact that same duty for that same money of the express company seems to be unjust. I cannot see it otherwise. If the Senate think differently I have nothing more to say.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator one question. Suppose I am engaged in a particular business which requires me to travel by railroad, and that is the kind of business I do, and in that way I get a gross income upon which I am taxed; for we are taxed on our gross incomes. The Senator might just as well propose that I should deduct what I paid to the railroad because the railroad pays a tax on their receipts, and if I am taxed it is taxing the same thing twice.

Mr. HARRIS. If such a case were in this bill I should join with the Senator in moving to strike it out. I do not know of any case where a man is taxed on his gross income. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Davis, Doolittle, Foster, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Henderson, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Richardson, Sherman, Wilkinson, and Willey—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Conness, Dixon, Harding, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougal, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—18.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire now to add an amendment at the end of the first paragraph of the preceding section, section one hundred and two. It is an amendment to the amendment which was adopted on my motion a day or two ago. It is to insert after the word "vehicle," in that amendment, these words:

Excepting nevertheless from such gross receipts the amount paid for canal or other tolls and tonnage duties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have that read in connection with the paragraph proposed to be amended, so that we may understand it.

The Secretary read, as follows:

That every person, firm, company, or corporation, owning or possessing, or having the care or management of any railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal-boat, or other vessel, or any stage-coach or other vehicle engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or property for hire, excepting express companies, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or any canal the water of which is used for mining purposes, shall be subject to and pay a duty of 2½ per cent. upon the gross receipts of such railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal-boat or other vessel, or such stage-coach or other vehicle, excepting, nevertheless, from such gross receipts the amount paid for canal or other tolls and tonnage duties.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not understand that. I ask the Senator to explain it.

Mr. HARRIS. It is this: the provision which has been adopted by the Senate charges a duty of 2½ per cent. upon the gross receipts of canal-boats and upon sailing vessels. I propose by this amendment to deduct from the gross receipts on which this duty is to be levied the amount those canal companies have to pay for tolls to the State, and which the vessels have to pay for tonnage duties to the Government; that they shall not be regarded as a part of the gross receipts upon which the duty is to be paid. A canal-boat navigating one of the canals of New York pays a duty to the State. That duty that is paid to the State should not be regarded as part of the gross receipts upon which this tax is to be levied, and where a sailing vessel pays a tonnage duty to the Government that should be deducted from the gross receipts. That is the whole of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to know if it covers the case to which I referred just now. We have steamboat lines that traverse the Chesapeake and Delaware and Raritan canals on their way to Philadelphia and on their way to New York. They pay a toll to the company; but I am not sure that this provision would cover that case.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir, it does.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This amendment shows precisely the extent to which this thing may go when you once begin making exemptions from taxation. We have a law in operation which lays a tonnage duty on all vessels. Foreign vessels pay on each voyage they may make; coasting vessels pay by the year. It is but a small tonnage duty which we thought it best to levy. It passed during the last session or the session before, I do not know which; and at that time we made all the vessels carrying passengers, steamers, pay a duty. We have thought it advisable in the present state of the revenue to go further and lay a duty on freight. The Senator's amendment, however, substantially repeals the tonnage duty; that is to say, you levy the tonnage duty, but you take it out of the freight, reduce it so much.

Now, which amounts to the most in the course of a year, the tonnage duty or the freight, I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think we had better strike out the tonnage duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose the Senator from New York is not prepared to state that. He is legislating in the dark. I say very frankly that so far as my own immediate constituents are concerned, as well as the constituents of the Senator from New York, they will get rid of burdens by this amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I will strike out all relating to the tonnage duty. I had some doubts myself whether to put it in or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that amendment had better be made.

Mr. HARRIS. I will strike out that, leaving in the tolls.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York so modify his amendment?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir. The tonnage duties are very small.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know they are small, but still they pay something.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to this amendment on the same principle that I objected to the other; but as the Senate voted me down on that occasion, I shall not call for a division, because the principle if applicable in the other case is quite as applicable in this.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays upon it. I desire a reconsideration of the other vote, and I hope we shall have it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course if the other amendment prevails, allowing express companies to deduct the amount paid to railroad companies, this ought to prevail also. There is no reason to distinguish between them. If the Senate adhere to the vote taken a moment ago, as a matter of course this amendment ought to be carried in the affirmative; but I assure Senators that if that is done we shall lose all revenue from the large express companies and also the majority of the revenue from transportation companies on canals. Take Adams's Express Company, and I will venture the assertion that two thirds or three fourths of all the expenses paid by them are paid to railroad companies. All the expenses they pay for transporting express goods on railroads would be deducted under the amendment of the Senator from New York, and the balance of their expenses are the mere cost of agents to deliver these little packages at the places of delivery.

Mr. FESSENDEN. More than that; I suggest to my friend there is no knowing what kind of arrangement may be made. They may make any arrangement they see fit.

Mr. SHERMAN. This matter has been carefully considered by the Committee on Finance. They had a conference with the officers of the principal express companies in the United States. They presented this point to us. We considered it carefully and deliberated upon it. I think it would be better to entirely exempt express companies from the operation of your tax, rather than to make this exception. I would rather see all these express companies relieved from taxation than to make an exception which will substantially repeal the tax. The effect would be that all the large express companies which can pay this tax, which are making large profits, would be exempted from taxation. They would report their gross proceeds at say $1,000,000 a year; they would report their payments to railroad companies at $800,000 a year, leaving $200,000, or substantially their net income, to be taxed. That would be the result of it, while you apply a different rule to all stage companies and to all express companies in wagons and those of inferior grade, where the profits are much less.

In order to show the injustice of this proposition, suppose we compare a large stage company with a transportation company on railroads. If the transportation company on railroads deducts the amount paid to railroad companies from the aggregate receipts, all the expenses of the company except the mere payment of the officers and agents at the place of delivery and place of receipt are deducted. Take the case of a stage company. Why should not the stage company deduct the amount they pay for oats and grain to feed their horses? They are indispensably necessary to be paid. Why should they not be allowed to deduct therefrom their gross receipts? There is no reason for not doing so if you allow an express company to deduct what it pays to a railroad company. Both are necessary expenses. You have adopted a principle by which instead of levying a tax on the gross receipts from transportation you levy it on the net receipts, and there is no reason why you should make a deduction in favor of an express company on railroads that you do not make in favor of a transportation company in stage-coaches or any other common carrier.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Ohio, as he understands this subject much better than I do, before he takes his seat.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I voted for that proposition with this understanding, and I want to know whether this is the fact: $100,000 for example are received by the express company; the tax is 2½ per cent. Then they have to pay to the railroad company $50 per hundred, and you tax that in the hands of the railroad company 2½ per cent. I want to know if in transporting the same class of articles that is not a tax of 5 per cent. That is the understanding on which I voted for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. You may say the same of almost any class of business. If you allow the deduction in one case you must allow it in another. Why not allow the stage proprietor, who transports by stage coach, to deduct what is absolutely paid by him to the farmer for grain, &c.? The cases are substantially similar; I see no difference.

Mr. GRIMES. Take the case of the shoe you have on your foot, Mr. President. You pay first a tax when the animal is killed by the farmer; then you pay a tax on the leather in the hands of the tanner; and then a tax when it is in the hands of the carrier; you pay a tax on the leather in the hands of the maker of the shoe; and you pay a tax again on it in the hands of the merchant who sells it. Where is the difference between that and the case of an express company? There are four taxes accumulated on the consumer of the shoe. It is just so in the case of the express company, save and except that we only tax the express company in two cases, whereas in the case of the leather which composes the shoe or boot on the Senator's foot there are five taxes.

Mr. JOHNSON. I may be mistaken, but to my mind there is all the difference in the world between the case supposed by the honorable member from Iowa and the case before us. One thing I suppose we will all admit: that we ought not to attempt to tax more than we have got. There must be a limitation upon the taxing power, and that limitation must be that we can only tax the estate, real and personal, that we have. The taxing power cannot be used so as to add to the subjects of taxation. That would be very clear apparently. If we have one thousand millions of personal property in the United States you cannot by your taxing laws make it two thousand millions of property.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which express companies were exempted a short time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will give way to the Senator from Michigan if he desires to make any remarks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He merely wants to move a reconsideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. He can do that afterwards.

Now, if I am right in what I have said, you are about to tax say $100,000, a portion of the property belonging to the people of the country, twice. If you think proper to tax that $100,000 5 per cent., there can be no objection to that; but you have come to the conclusion that it ought not to be taxed more than 2½ per cent. There is no doubt Congress may levy any amount of tax upon that $100,000 which it thinks is right; but when it has come to the conclusion that it is only right to tax 2½ per cent. upon the $100,000, and then proposes to lay 2½ per cent. on the same $100,000 in somebody else's hand, it does virtually, practically, levy a tax of 5 per cent. upon the $100,000. In the case of the express companies, the amendment which has been adopted, and the vessels included in this particular amendment, receive in the course of their business, say, $1,000,000, and they have to pay out of that $1,000,000, not an uncertain tax, not a tax depending upon the rise and fall in the market of oats or of anything else that may become necessary in the transaction of their business, but they have to pay a specific tax for the purpose of using a canal which you have constructed, or the States have constructed, and which have been authorized to charge against those who use it that specific tax. Those who use the canal make no profit upon that disbursement. They do not charge—it would not be honest to charge as things now are—a profit upon the tolls which they pay on the canal. They charge only a profit upon their own disbursements. They receive from their customers the amount which they pay to the canal; but they receive it merely for the purpose of paying that amount to the canal. It is the money of the latter, not of the former. What they charge in addition for their own services and for the use of their own vehicle is compounded of what their own services and vehicles are worth with the addition of such a sum as is a reasonable profit upon the aggregate amount, but they never charge a profit upon what they pay specifically, which is not theirs, nor received as their own. Every man with whom they deal would know that they do not advance any money to the canal company, that what they pay to the canal company is a certain specific sum paid them for the purpose. They become verily but the paymaster of the customer to the canal company, and upon such amount they charge no profit. On the contrary, if you think proper to impose your 2½ per cent. upon the amount which they pay to the canal company, they will charge a profit, and then it falls upon the customer.

My friend from Iowa illustrates what he supposes to be the principle involved in this amendment by the pair of shoes he has on. He says we charge a tax upon the calf that produces the skin, and we charge a tax upon the skin, and we charge a tax upon the skin after it is tanned and before it goes into the hands of the shoemaker, and when it gets into the hands of the shoemaker we charge a tax upon the shoe. That is all true, but that is not a double tax, in any sense. We charge upon your shoe what your shoe is worth, and your shoe is worth just what may be the worth of all the elements of which the shoe consists, of the skin with which it is made, of all the material which enters into the manufacture of the shoe, and the services of the artisan by whom the shoe is prepared. In the hands of the artisan it is worth so much, because he can get so much for it. Upon the foot of my friend from Iowa it is worth what he gives for it, because he cannot do without it, and he pays a profit to the shoemaker upon the whole expense to which the shoemaker has been subjected in bringing the shoe into existence. But that is not the case with these companies as the law now stands. If you do impose this tax, it will be the case with the customer. They will have to pay for the services rendered by these express companies more than they pay now; and just in proportion as you add to the expenses to which they are subjected now, will more or less interfere with the business of the community.

Mr. GRIMES. The statement of the Senator from Maryland is undoubtedly correct that if we impose this tax these express companies will be compelled to pay more than they are compelled to pay now; but if I understand the theory upon which we are proposing to pass this bill into a law it is this, that we believe the public interests will be subserved by levying a certain amount upon the supposed profits of every branch of trade. Let me illustrate as applicable to this case: we have a railroad running between Washington and Baltimore; upon that railroad runs an express company; that express company owns none of the rolling stock; but it hires of the railroad company the privilege of running one or two cars, which they obtain at a very moderate rate, only paying about 25 per cent. as much, I believe, as is paid for transportation for private individuals. Here is another company that proposes to establish a rival line, not to run by railway, but by horse express. The one uses horse carriages. The carriages are all taxed, and we propose by this bill to increase the taxation upon those carriages. It requires as much capital and as much taxed capital under this bill to establish this horse express that is to be the rival of the railroad express as it requires to be annually expended by the present express company that runs its line over the railroad. I ask my friend from Maryland why he cannot demand of the Senate with as much show of plausibility and reason that there should be no imposition of tax upon the horse express company because their carriages and other attachments are taxed under this bill as that you should exempt the express company that runs over the railroad, the annual expenditures in each case amounting to the same aggregate. Where is the difference in principle? In the one case, in the case of the horse express, there is a gross amount of capital employed, belonging to the company; in the other case there is not any capital employed, but there is a regular annual, monthly, weekly, or daily rent paid, the aggregate of which will amount to as much as the interest and the deterioration of the capital in the other express company.

I should like to know with what show of reason it can be claimed that this kind of express, because, instead of owning the stock with which it carries on its business, it uses the franchise of a corporation and pays a rent for it, should be excepted and all other expresses should not be excepted. Is it because the railroad company is taxed on its franchise a certain amount upon its receipts and the other property owned by the horse express is not taxed? That cannot be the case, because the property of the other company is taxed in some form or other, and taxed quite as heavily as the property of the railroad company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the one hundred and second section in regard to railroads, steamboats, &c., on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 7, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Morgan, Powell, and Sumner—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Conness, Dixon, Doollittle, Harding, Howard, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to reconsider the vote on the previous amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now will be on the adoption of the amendment, which was to add to section one hundred and three the following words:

The amount paid for transportation to any railroad company or corporation shall be deducted from the amount of gross receipts upon which a duty is to be charged under the provisions of this section.

Mr. HARRIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Davis, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Sumner, and Van Winkle—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nesmith, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doollittle, Harding, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilson, and Wright—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. I propose to make one more effort to do justice to the manufacturers of oil-dressed leather. Under the law of 1862 these manufacturers paid a duty of three per cent. As this bill now stands, as they construe it, and I am inclined to think they construe it right, although the chairman of the committee, I believe, thinks otherwise, they will be required to pay a duty of ten per cent. upon their manufacture. It is a duty which has not its equal or parallel in this whole bill. It is undoubtedly wrong, and it is grossly unjust toward this class of manufacturers. I propose now to put the provision in the same shape in which it was put two years ago, and in the same shape in which a dozen other provisions are found in this bill, one of which was offered by the chairman of the committee himself the other day in relation to furs. Take the case of furs. By the bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, manufactures of fur were taxed ten per cent. The committee reported a reduction of that tax to five per cent., and then they have added the proviso which I will read:

Provided, That all manufactured furs on which a duty has been previously assessed and paid before manufacture shall be assessed only on the increased value thereof when so manufactured.

That was the provision in relation to these manufactures of gloves and mittens two years ago. I propose to insert the same provision on page 141, after line three hundred and seventy-three. The clause now reads:

On oil-dressed leather and deer-skins, dressed or smoked, when sold or removed for sale, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

I desire to add this proviso:

Provided, That when leather or skins upon which a duty has previously been assessed and paid shall be manufactured into gloves, mittens, or moccasins, the duty shall only be assessed upon the increased value thereof when so manufactured.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose if the Senator succeeds in that amendment he will strike out the words that were inserted by the Committee on Finance, "when sold or removed for sale."

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to do that.

Mr. TEN EYCK. This matter was up and under discussion in rather another shape a day or two ago. It now assumes a different aspect. The proposition, as it came before the Senate two days ago, involved other interests with which certain persons from whom I have received communications were largely connected. I have had no communication on the subject of these gloves and mittens, and articles manufactured from deer-skins, dressed or smoked, and therefore, so far as the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York is concerned, I am not disposed to make any objection to it; and yet for the life of me I cannot see the reason why there should be any exemption or discrimination made in behalf of the manufacture of gloves and mittens out of deer-skins, dressed or smoked, and the manufacture of harness, shoes, and other articles made out of oil-dressed leather. They are all in the same category.

If this exception from the effect of the tax is to be made in relation to gloves and mittens, I do not see why it should not be made with respect to the manufacture of harness, boots, shoes, cavalry belts, and articles of that description, which employ infinitely a larger amount of capital and infinitely a larger amount of men, and concerns in a far greater degree the industrial pursuits of the country than this simple manufacture of the covering for the hands which is embraced in the Senator's amendment. I should claim in behalf of a very large number of industrious men throughout the length and breadth of this land, if the amendment of the Senator from New York should be adopted, that they should also be recognized. I do not see why the manufacture of gloves and mittens in a local district of this Union should be particularly the object of our care and solicitude, when tens of thousands of hardy, industrious men are laboring day by day in the manufacture of shoes, harness, and everything that is made from leather, and are subject to this duty, and not relieved from the exemption asked for by the Senator from New York.

If it is thought to be judicious, because we have relieved furs from such a duty, I would vote for the amendment of the Senator from New York, provided the Senate with a full knowledge of the effect of that amendment would also vote to amend the bill in the particulars to which I have referred. Then, as I understand, the Senator from New York is willing that the amendment introduced by the committee in this clause which relieves all this class of leather from the duty of five per cent. when sold or removed for sale shall be stricken out. That feature of it ought to be taken out unquestionably; because there can be no reason in the world why Mr. A who manufactures gloves, mittens, harness, shoes, or cavalry belts from leather which he makes himself should only be liable to a duty of five per cent., when Mr. B, who has not capital enough to go into the business of making the leather, tanning the leather, and also manufacturing the article after the leather is tanned, shall be subject to a duty of ten per cent.

With this explanation, it is for the Senate to determine whether they will relieve this particular branch of business alone from the effect of the duty under the amendment as proposed by the Senator from New York, or whether if they make the exemption in that case they will extend it to these other articles of manufacture. All I ask is that these industrial pursuits shall be put upon the same footing, and that all classes of manufactures so far as regards this branch of business shall be equally subject to duties and equally have the benefits which Congress should extend to all men alike. I therefore would oppose the amendment of the Senator from New York on the ground that I have stated.

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose that if this bill provided that the yarn in a cotton factory should be taxed, and then when that yarn was woven into cloth and ready for market it should be taxed again, there would not be a vote in favor of sustaining that proposition. It is impossible for me to discriminate between this case and that. These men import skins, deer-skins and sheep-skins. They pay a duty of fifteen per cent. to the Government upon their importation. They take them to their factory and they work them up. They dress them, oil-dress them, kid-dress them, and make them into an article which when cut up and sewed together makes gloves and mittens. It is all one continued series of proceedings in the same hands, just as much as the manufacture of cotton into yarn and from yarn into clothing. The amendment that I propose is simply this: that you may tax the skins when they are dressed, and then when they are cut into gloves and mittens and moccasins, and made ready for market, you may tax them again upon their increased value, but that you shall have but one tax of five per cent. on the whole.

Now, sir, I happen to know the fact, it is a well-ascertained fact, that more than ninety per cent. of all this business is done in the factories in one county in the interior of New York, and it is this one proceeding. These skins when they are dressed are not an article of commerce at all. There may be a few now and then sold; but generally those are principally used for making the pads in pianos. A little piece as big as a ten cent piece is used for certain purposes in a piano. With that exception, however, they are only used for the manufacture of gloves and mittens. This amendment simply allows those people to pay five per cent. upon their manufacture when it is prepared for commerce, for sale; and that is all there is about it. If you leave the provision as it now is, without the amendment I have proposed, you tax these poor people ten per cent. upon their manufacture, and they cannot stand it.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I do not wish to run this thing down. I think it is generally understood. The articles proposed to be exempted from this tax in the mode proposed are deer-skins dressed or smoked. Now, I imagine that the deer-skins that are used in the manufacture of these gloves and mittens are not imported into this country.

Mr. HARRIS. Nearly all of them are.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I do not know to what extent, but certainly we have a great deal of that raw material in this country; and I imagine we do not import when we have the material of our own exclusively. I do not think we disregard the raw material we have, throw it away, and import similar material. Doubtless we do import some. So it is with regard to oil-dressed leather. That goes into the manufacture of boots, shoes, harness, &c. We manufacture a great deal of leather that comes from the backs of cattle slaughtered in our own country. We also import hides, or did so formerly to a very great extent. The same reasoning which the Senator from New York has used for the purpose of exempting this particular class of business from the operation of this duty applies with equal force to the kind of business to which I have referred. We import leather from South America and other foreign countries which is oil-dressed and goes into the manufacture of harness, shoes, boots, &c.

Mr. HARRIS. Harness is not oil-dressed.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It is oil-dressed afterwards. If it is not so, then the argument goes for nothing. It is common neat leather or cows' leather tanned and curried in a certain way by the use of oil.

Mr. HARRIS. This is oil-dressed leather.

Mr. TEN EYCK. But oil-dressed leather is tanned and curried with the use of oil. Certainly that which goes to make boots and shoes and harness is prepared in that way. If that is so, then the same reason will apply to that class of articles.

I do not mean to take up any more time on this subject. The matter has been discussed more fully and extensively, perhaps, than it ought to have been. If the exception is proper with regard to the pursuit which the Senator from New York has in charge, it is proper with respect to this other branch of business. I can see no difference or distinction between them myself. If his amendment should be adopted will the Senator from New York extend it so as to apply to this whole subject?

Mr. HARRIS. No, sir.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Then I think we ought not to make the exception, but should vote the amendment down.

Mr. CLARK. When the amendment was offered by the Senator from New York the other day in regard to this matter, it was in a very different shape, and I opposed it. I am inclined to support his amendment now in its present shape, and I think I can give a good reason for it, and I think the reason will be of some consideration to the Senator from New Jersey why this exception should be made in this case and not in the case which he mentions of harness. These gloves, mittens, and moccasins come in conflict with a certain other kind of manufacture, and have to compete with them; that is, the leather glove competes with the woolen glove; the leather mitten with the woolen mitten; and the moccasin with the India-rubber and the leather shoe. You only require of the man who makes the woolen glove and the woolen mitten to pay the increased value of the manufacture upon the yarn, and the man who makes the leather glove or leather mitten has hard competition now with the woolen glove and woolen mitten, because that work is done by machinery. I would not impose an unjust burden upon this class of manufactures. I am afraid it would increase the competition in such a way that it would be onerous. You will get the tax upon the leather and then on its increased value when made into moccasins, gloves, or mittens, as I understand it, by the amendment of the Senator from New York, just as you get another tax on the yarn when it is manufactured into woolen gloves or mittens. I do not see any objection to the amendment in that view, because this class of articles comes in competition with another class.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HARRIS. On that I will ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLARK. I think we can carry it without the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question for information. In the instance given by the Senator from New Jersey, and also, I believe, referred to by the Senator from New York, if cotton yarns are purchased and the purchaser weaves them into fabric, what is the tax which the manufacturer of the fabric has to pay? Again, there are iron rods that are purchased in that form, and are manufactured into various other articles. There is an iron bar, for instance, that is rolled for the purpose of making horse-shoes. Suppose a manufacturer purchases these iron rods or these iron bars to manufacture into something else, is there any deduction of duty from the person who manufactures the iron rod or the iron bar into a different article in consequence of its having been subjected to a duty previous to that time?

Mr. CLARK. Upon textile fabrics the increased value is ordinarily assessed over the value of the yarn; but upon iron I do not now remember of any case, though there may be cases, where it is taxed in that way. It does not ordinarily come into competition with any other article. I only desire this tax to be put in this way because these gloves and mittens come in competition with articles on which we do make the same discrimination precisely.

Mr. GRIMES. What manufacture?

Mr. CLARK. That of woolen mittens and gloves. It is provided for in the bill in precisely the same way that we ask in regard to these mittens.

Mr. GRIMES. I believe the Senator said also that the moccasins came in competition with shoes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was a mistake.

Mr. CLARK. They do to a certain extent.

Mr. GRIMES. But we tax the shoes four times before they reach the consumer.

Mr. CLARK. They do come in competition with the leather shoe.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know where moccasins are taxed in the bill except in the sheepskins when first imported.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me call the Senator's attention to this clause on page 141:

On leather of all descriptions, curried or finished, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That all leather previously assessed in the rough and upon which duties have been actually paid shall be assessed on the increased value only when curried and finished.

Mr. HARRIS. There is the same provision in relation to yarn.

Mr. CLARK. I will state for the information of the Senator from Iowa that this leather is manufactured into a peculiar kind of shoes, the top of which is made of this kind of leather and the bottom of ordinary leather; and it comes in direct competition in that way. I am not quite sure whether that would be called a moccasin or not.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Collamer, Fessenden, Grimes, Sherman, and Ten Eyck—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Canille, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Salsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—21.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As that amendment has been adopted, I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment made in committee inserting after the word "smoked," in that clause, the words "when sold or removed for sale." I suppose when we come to vote on concurring in the amendments made in committee, gentlemen will indicate those on which they desire a separate vote; but in this case we can take the vote now.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to amend section one hundred and nine, on page 161, the section relating to banks and banking, not to change the amount of the tax, but to change the time of the payment of the tax so as to have a monthly tax instead of a semi-annual tax. I have prepared some amendments to carry out that idea. In line two I move to strike out the words "one quarter" and to insert the words "one twenty-fourth." I have made quite a number of changes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps the shortest way would be to withdraw the other amendments made in committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can withdraw them, if that is the sense of the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. I want to amend this section also.

Mr. FESSENDEN, (to Mr. SHERMAN.) Have you prepared all the amendments that will be necessary to be made?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; and I can offer them very rapidly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then perhaps you had better go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line two I move to strike out "one quarter" and insert "one twenty-fourth;" in line three to strike out the words "half year" and insert the word "month;" so that it will read, "one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month."

Mr. COWAN. The Senator had better say "two per cent. per annum, payable monthly." That would make it better English.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to conform to the language of the section. In line eleven—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we had better take a vote on one of the amendments first, and settle the question whether the section shall be so altered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; let the question be taken on that amendment in the second and third lines; and if that is agreed to I will not send up the rest to the desk. The only effect of the amendments, as I have stated, is to require a monthly return instead of a semi-annual return and a semi-annual tax.

Mr. COLLAMER. Do they make any difference in the amount of the tax?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not a particle. I assure the Senator he can examine the amendments to his heart's content, and he will find that they do not change the tax which has been agreed upon.

Mr. COLLAMER. I thought they did.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not the slightest.

Mr. COLLAMER. But suppose that to be the case, my objection to it is this: I know that in relation to the banks in New England, and I presume it is so in the West, at certain seasons of the year when money is wanted for the purpose of moving the productions of the country to market in any part of the country, that is the time when the people call for large sums of money from the banks. Now, the great point made against the State banks consists in this, that they inflate the currency and the amount of circulation. In the region of country where I live, for instance, their principal product is wool. Take the period of the shearing, in June, when the time comes for purchasing up the clips of wool. Then application is made to the banks by the people who are going into the business of purchasing this wool to take it to market for the money with which to pay for it; and so you will have out, say in the month of July, after shearing time, in a country bank more than double the amount that you will have at any time between that and the last part of the fall of the year, when they take out the money to take cattle into market. The greater part of it will return in the course of some sixty days.

Now, I apprehend it is sought to obtain monthly returns from the banks, so that persons may take those returns for the months in which they do the largest business, and say that even in three months they inflate the currency double, and they do it every year. I undertake to say that the amount of circulation of every bank in the part of the country where I live from April until July is more than doubled. Then we shall have imputations and arguments without number that they inflate the currency even in three months.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the Senator from Vermont, the only objection he has to requiring these returns is that they will furnish arguments against the State banks.

Mr. COLLAMER. My objection is, the great trouble of making these monthly returns.

Mr. SHERMAN. His principal objection is, that it will furnish arguments against the banks that they inflate the currency. The only effect of the amendment is to require of these banks monthly returns, the same returns that are required of the national banks, so that the public at large and the Secretary of the Treasury shall know precisely the amount of circulation of the State and national banks at the beginning of every month.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You do not require monthly returns of the national banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; they are required to make monthly returns. They pay their tax quarterly, but monthly returns are required from the national banks. If they have much circulation, they pay at the beginning of the month for amount of circulation; if they have but little, they pay but little; so that it is not unjust to the banks at all. It simply enables the officer in the Treasury Department to know at the beginning of every month the whole amount of the currency of the country. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will now read the other amendments together. In line eleven I move to strike out "one quarter" and to insert "one twenty-fourth;" in line twelve to strike out the words "half year" and insert the word "month;"

inline fifteen to strike out the words "April and October of each year" and insert the words "every month;" in line twenty-seven to strike out the words "the said months of April and October" and insert the words "each month;" in line twenty-eight to strike out the words "one quarter" and insert "one twenty-fourth;" in line twenty-nine to strike out "one quarter" and insert "one twenty-fourth;" in line forty-seven to strike out "one half" and insert "one twelfth;" in line forty-eight to strike out the words "half year" and insert the word "month;" in line fifty-one to strike out the words "half year" and insert the word "month;" in line fifty-three to strike out the words "April and October of each year" and restore the words "each and every month" as they were in the bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives; in line sixty-nine to strike out the words "of April and October of each year" and insert the words "in each and every month."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator, if the simple object is to get a return of the circulation, why his object would not be accomplished by simply altering the part of the section which he is now proposing to amend? It reads:

On the average amount of such notes, bills, or other obligations in circulation during the preceding month, or which have been issued, shall remain in circulation; and shall on the first Monday of—

Then leaving in those words "each and every month," as they were originally; so that it will read in this way—

And shall, on the first Monday of each and every month, make and deliver to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, a true and accurate return of the amount of notes, bills, or other obligations so issued, whether in circulation or in its vaults or elsewhere on deposit.

Mr. SHERMAN. In answer to that, my idea is that when the return is transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Everything is paid to the collector, and the original provision in this section, which we altered to every half year, provided for a return to be made every month.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection so that the return is made; but I think we had better let it stand with monthly payments, because it will be no hardship to the banks except the making of the monthly returns.

Mr. COLLAMER. They lose the interest on the amount of the tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. The interest on a tax of one per cent. on their circulation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the whole object can be accomplished in that way by leaving in the clause commencing on line fifty-two:

And shall, on the first Monday of each and every month, make and deliver to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, a true and accurate return of the amount of notes, bills, or other obligations so issued, whether in circulation or in its vaults or elsewhere in possession or on deposit.

And then adding the clause which is found in the sixty-eighth line:

And shall, within ten days from the first of each and every month, pay to such collector the said duty of one per cent. on the average amount, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. That only provides for a return of circulation, and not for a return of deposits and capital invested in United States bonds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will continue with these amendments. In line seventy I move to strike out the word "half" and insert the word "twelfth;" in line eighty-five, to strike out the words "one and one half" and insert "one fourth of one;" and in lines eighty-five and eighty-six, to strike out the words "half year" and insert the word "month." I believe that will make the section all right.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be as well to leave the proviso as it is. It is a sort of penalty. However, I will not interfere with the Senator's amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Secretary to read the section as amended, and the Senator will find that it will levy a tax of one half of one per cent. on deposits, one per cent. on capital in excess of that invested in United States bonds, one half of one per cent. on capital invested in United States bonds, one per cent. on circulation up to ninety per cent. of its capital, and three per cent. on circulation above ninety per cent. That is the effect of it.

The Secretary read the section, as proposed to be amended, as follows:

BANKS AND BANKING.

SEC. 109. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of the deposits of money, subject to payment by check or draft, with any person, bank, association, or corporation engaged in the business of banking, other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of the several acts to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, except savings banks, &c., and a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month, as aforesaid, upon the average amount of capital stock invested in such business beyond the amount invested in United States bonds; and on the first Monday of every month, a true and accurate return of the amount of deposits and of capital as aforesaid shall be made and rendered to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, by all such persons, banks, associations, or corporations, with a declaration annexed thereto, and the oath or affirmation of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, or corporation, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful statement of the amount of capital and deposits as aforesaid; and shall also deliver a copy of said return to the collector of the district, and shall within each month pay to said collector the duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. on the amount of deposits, and of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. on the capital so returned. And for any neglect to make or render such return and payment as aforesaid, every such person, bank, association, or corporation shall be subject to and pay a penalty of $1,000, besides the additions, penalties, and forfeitures in other cases provided; and the amount of deposits and capital shall, in default of the proper return, be estimated by the assessor upon the best information he can obtain, and every such penalty, together with the duties as aforesaid, may be recovered for the use of the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction; and every person and every bank, association, or corporation, other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of the several acts to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, issuing notes, bills, or other obligations, calculated or intended to circulate as money, shall pay a duty of one twelfth of one per cent. each month on the average amount of such notes, bills, or other obligations in circulation during the preceding month, or which, having been issued, shall remain in circulation; and shall, on the first Monday of each and every month, make and deliver to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, a true and accurate return of the amount of notes, bills, or other obligations so issued, whether in circulation or in its vault or elsewhere in possession or on deposit, and shall annex to every such return a declaration, with the oath or affirmation of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, or corporation, in such form and manner as may be directed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful statement of the amount of circulation as aforesaid; and shall deliver a copy of said return to the collector of the district in which said person resides, or in which the said bank, association, or corporation is located; and shall within ten days from the first Monday in each and every month pay to said collector the said duty of one twelfth, half of one per cent. on the average amount of its circulation as aforesaid not including that in vault or on deposit for said bank. And for any neglect to render or make such return and payment as aforesaid, every such person, bank, association, or corporation, shall pay a penalty of 5 per cent. on the amount of notes, bills, or other obligations issued as aforesaid, which amount shall, in default of the proper return, be estimated by the assessor, upon the best information he can obtain; and every such penalty may be recovered for the use of the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That this tax shall not apply to any bank in the process of liquidation: Provided, also, That all banks, associations, corporations, or individuals, issuing notes or bills for circulation as currency, shall be liable to, and pay, the further duty of one fourth of one per cent. in each month, upon the average amount of such currency issued beyond the amount of 90 per cent. of its capital. In the case of banks with branches, the duty herein provided for shall be imposed upon the circulation of each branch, severally, and the amount of capital of each branch shall be considered to be the amount allotted to, or used by, such branch. And the additional duty herein provided for shall be collected and paid at the time and in the manner hereinbefore specified. And so much of an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863, as imposes any tax on banks, their circulation, capital, or deposits, is hereby repealed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those amendments being made, I think the penalties that are named there are too high. They are higher than those named in the other bill. I will move to amend the penalty in the thirty-third line for neglect to render a return, which is here put at $1,000, and which neglect may occur accidentally, by making it the same as that imposed upon the national banks for a similar neglect, $200.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand the amendments offered by the Senator from Ohio to have been made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They have not been made. The question has not been put.

Mr. DAVIS. So I supposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment has been adopted.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose the Senate would like to be informed how those amendments will affect and modify the tax on the banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought I stated that to the Senate as clearly as I could.

Mr. DAVIS. I will make this apology to the Senator, that the colloquy held between him and the Senator from Maine could not be heard by me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will try and make myself heard by the Senate. The bill as it was agreed upon in committee fixes a tax of one half of one per cent. on capital in excess of that invested in United States bonds, one half of one per cent. on all deposits, 1 per cent. on circulation up to 90 per cent. of its capital, and 3 per cent. on all circulation above 90 per cent. of its capital. The amendment that I propose leaves the tax the same in the aggregate, but makes it monthly instead of semi-annual, so as to secure monthly returns of the circulation, capital, and deposits. That is the only effect of the amendment. It is no more burdensome to the banks except so far as making monthly instead of semi-annual returns is concerned.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to make one remark before the vote is taken. I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will not be adopted, and my reason for it is simply this: I understood that the Senate intended to put the national banks and the State banks on a perfect equality; and every vote in the Senate has indicated that that was the intention of the Senate. I desire the Senate to adhere to those votes. The very same percentage is levied upon circulation up to ninety per cent. of their capital upon the State banks and the national banks, the same upon deposits, and the same upon the capital; but the national banks are only required to pay every six months; that is, if they do not pay at the end of the month, all that the Secretary of the Treasury has to do is to retain the interest of the bonds that are on deposit in the Treasury, and the interest, instead of being paid over to the bank, is retained by the Secretary. The payments, therefore, in reality are only made semi-annually by the national banks. They are not compelled to pay, and are under no penalty to pay at the end of each month. If they do not pay, the Secretary of the Treasury merely retains the interest on their bonds. That is my understanding of the bill, and if I state it incorrectly I will be corrected by Senators who are more familiar with it.

This amendment requires the local banks under a very heavy penalty to make the actual payment at the end of each month. That is a discrimination against the local banks. I have no objection to the monthly payments except that it is an absolute discrimination against these banks. If the Senator insists that they shall make monthly reports I have no objection to it, but let them make semi-annual payments. Why compel these banks, under this penalty, to make out a statement twelve times a year, under oath, and to make these payments? Of course it is a great inconvenience to make out these statements and furnish them to the assessors and collectors, and to make these payments. I think in that respect they ought to be left upon an equality with the other banks. It is very well known that I am opposed to that whole banking system, and it is not at all strange that I should desire to see no preference given to that system over this. That is all I desire to say now, and I sincerely hope that the chairman of the Committee on Finance may not consent to this amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not consent to it at all. I have no power to consent to it. It is for the Senate to settle entirely.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very well aware that if the Senator does consent the Senate will adopt it. We know very well that other Senators are like myself. I am controlled ordinarily by his views, and by his opinions on this subject; and though I have desired to offer some amendments to this bill I have refrained from doing so simply because they were against his wishes in regard to the matter. I sincerely hope, however, that the banks may be left just as they are now fixed by this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the strangest thing in the world to me that the Senator from Missouri should continually seek to make a discrimination in favor of these local banks that does not apply to any other person under this bill. We require the manufacturers to make out monthly returns; we require the brewers to make out monthly returns; we require the distillers to make out monthly returns. Everybody, almost, engaged in any business, except the business of making paper money, is required to make out those returns; and why should this discrimination be made in favor of these banks? Why should they not make out their statement and be required to make monthly payments of taxes like any other persons? The reason given in regard to the national banks is obvious. They receive and draw their money only semi-annually from the Treasury of the United States, and this tax will be retained from them semi-annually. I say, when the return is made it is convenient to send in the tax. The idea of making a discrimination in favor of these banks, of revising and redrawing this section merely for the purpose of preserving a uniformity that need not be preserved is absurd. If these State banks would only subject themselves to the restrictions and limitations and qualifications of the national banks that is all we want; but the trouble is they are too strong here to enable us by law to compel them to be subject to the provisions and limitations and restrictions we put upon the national banks. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, the Senator admits by his argument that he is making a discrimination against the local banks. He says it will not do to change this bill. Why, sir, according to the bill as it now stands, they are upon a perfect equality with the national banks. The national banks deposit the Government bonds here, and they are not entitled to the interest—that is the contract they made with the Government—they are not entitled to the interest until the end of six months. Why compel the State banks to prepay to the Government while the national banks can hold their funds there, and pay with the Government securities at the end of six months? Is it not a perfect equality to make all banks pay at the end of six months? That is all I ask.

The Senator seems to insist that I am defending the State banks at the expense of the national banks. Sir, that is very unjust to me. I am attempting to put them on a perfect equality, and it is the Senator that is insisting upon a discrimination, not myself. He admits that the national banks only pay at the end of every six months; but he wishes to compel the State banks by this amendment to pay in advance at the end of every month. I say that that is unjust. All I desire is that they remain just as they are in the bill. I do not propose to make any alterations at all.

The Senator ought to reflect that there is a provision in this bill—I have no idea that we have any power to do any such thing, but it is there—levying a tax of three per cent. on the circulation of the banks over ninety per cent. of their capital stock. I do not believe we have any power to pass any such provision, but it has been done. The majority disagree with me in regard to it, and I am disposed to make no complaint here about it. The State banks are limited now to the very amount that may be issued upon the Government bonds by the national banks, even though they have coin enough in their vaults to redeem every dollar of their circulation. That is the case with the banks in my State, I can assure the Senator, although he said the other day that the banks of my State were not in good repute. I have received since that speech was delivered a report from those banks which I will read:

Report of Banks of Missouri, January 1, 1860.

Notes in circulation outstanding.....	$7,884,885 00
Capital stock.....	9,082,951 11
Coin on hand.....	4,160,912 03

Report January 1, 1864.

Notes outstanding.....	$2,101,852 00
Capital stock.....	10,976,990 29
Coin on hand.....	3,233,685 67

It will be seen that instead of expanding their circulation in the four years between January 1, 1860, to January 1, 1864, the Missouri banks reduced their circulation from $7,884,885 to $2,101,852. The amount of notes retired in this short time is $5,773,033. Hence the charge of deteriorating the currency does not lie against them.

Again, it will be seen that their circulation outstanding at that time was $2,101,852, and that their coin on hand was $3,233,685 67, showing a surplus of largely over one million dollars more than sufficient to redeem their whole circulation.

I therefore object to discriminating against such banks in favor of the wild-cat system proposed in what is known as the national bank system.

I would not object to the amendment, however, if the payments were only made at the end of six months; but the Senator requires the payments to be made at the end of each and every month, and the amendment will compel the payment to be in advance at that time. Inasmuch as the Government will get the whole amount of revenue just as well at the end of each six months, I hope the bill may remain just as it now stands.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I understand exactly the manner in which the amendment is worded. Is it possible to divide it so as to take the question on the obligation to make monthly returns, and then on the obligation to pay their tax at the end of each month? I am in favor of the provision which would compel them to make monthly returns; but from my present understanding I am inclined to vote against the proposition to pay monthly, making a discrimination against the State banks in that particular and in favor of the national banks, as stated by the Senator from Missouri, who pay only half yearly. I ask that the amendment be read.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to strike out the latter words requiring them to pay each month.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator must go to work to reframe the whole section.

Mr. JOHNSON. I can very readily imagine that the country will be benefited by their having at the end of every month information of the state of the State banks. But then to make the State banks pay at the end of each month, while you require the national banks to pay only at the end of six months, is, I think, in the first place, unnecessary. It will produce no good effect. It will impose some loss on the State banks, and do no good to the country; but is particularly objectionable because it will make a distinction in this particular between the one set of banks and the other set of banks. I do not know whether it is possible to avoid the objection that I have to it by a single amendment, or whether it may be necessary to redraft the whole section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) Does the Senator from Maryland move an amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir; I do not. I cannot understand the frame of the amendment sufficiently.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It must be taken as one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment has been adopted; there was no division called for.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That can be reconsidered.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know whether this amendment is not capable of such a division as to allow us to vote on the question of returns separate from the question of the payments monthly. I want to compel the banks to make monthly returns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That can be done by taking the vote on each separate amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It cannot, because they are so mixed up together that it would require a redraft of the whole section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We had better reconsider the vote adopting the amendment requiring monthly payments, if that has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to reconsider it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It had better be reconsidered now, and then take the vote on the whole amendment as one.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved to reconsider the amendment just adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. It will be taken as one vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I presume that is an amendment which is susceptible of division, and that separate votes may be taken on its different branches.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is divisible on the request of any Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for a division.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator that they are so interwoven that they cannot be divided without redrafting the section. It is substantially one proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. All that I ask a separate vote upon is on that branch of the amendment which requires monthly payments by the State banks. I suppose we can vote on that proposition understandingly distinct from all others that are embodied in this multifarious amendment. I should like the Chair to decide what its understanding of the parliamentary law is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is susceptible of division.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is well, perhaps, that the Senate should understand exactly how this matter presented itself before. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives required half-yearly payments of the tax upon deposits, and half-yearly payments of the tax on the capital, but required monthly payments of the tax on circulation.

Mr. JOHNSON. The whole circulation?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes; they provided for half-yearly payments of the tax on deposits and capital, and monthly payments of the tax on circulation, and required monthly returns. We changed the whole section so as to make half-yearly payments on all, thinking it was best to have them all alike. It seems the other House had the same view in regard to the circulation which the Senator from Ohio has. A careful scrutiny of this provision will show that in order to divide the two and put them back again as they stood before, the Senator from Ohio will have to go over it again in the same manner. I do not know that anything more is required really than the payments and returns upon the circulation. The Senator from Ohio understands better than I do what the wish is upon that subject. By going over it again and carefully scrutinizing it, the amendment may be made so as to conform to the original section. For my part I feel disposed and bound by my vote to carry out the instructions which the committee gave me on the subject, to vote for the amendment moved by the committee; but really, sir, I do not see any very great difficulty or objection to making the whole monthly. It does not strike me as attended with any injury one way or the other.

Mr. COLLAMER. The point made is not as to conforming to what the House of Representatives made this bill, but as to conforming to what the national bank bill is. If you take this as the House of Representatives passed it it is the end of all State banks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Missouri referred to a remark I made, that all the object of the committee was to conform the two systems together in that particular. In that, however, I wish to be limited entirely by the amount of the tax. There was no other question considered by the committee, except simply the amount of tax paid, not the time of paying it. That they did not consider of any consequence, though we made these alterations to make it half yearly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was speaking of the tax. It would make the State banks pay more.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Paying monthly would make a difference perhaps; I do not know how much, but very little.

Mr. DAVIS. There is a good deal of conversation in the Chamber among Senators that I do not have the benefit of and do not hear. Of course I cannot be expected to talk or to vote with a view to light that does not reach me. I understand the two matters of difference between the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Ohio to be very simple. The text of the bill, as I understand, requires semi-annual returns both from the State and the national banks, and semi-annual payments of duty. But the compound amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio requires the State banks to make monthly returns. I understand that there is no member of the body who has any objection to that feature of his amendment; at least I have not; but the other feature of his amendment amounts to this, that while it makes no change as to the payments of duty which the national banks are to make, but leaves them to the semi-annual periods, it discriminates in favor of the national banks and against the State banks by requiring the State banks to make monthly payments of duty. I think that is wrong, and I am opposed to it. In the aggregate of the payments of all these duties by all the State banks, it is a very material and a very large amount.

As the Senator from Missouri says, I am opposed to the whole scheme of national banks. I believe it is unconstitutional, impolitic, and in many of its features a direct and flagitious infringement upon the rights of the State banks. Where provisions have been agreed upon by the Senate, as these provisions in relation to the returns and condition of the State banks and the payment of duties were, fixing a uniform rule in relation to both classes of banks, I am against a discrimination now. I have been against making a change of the principle, thus to discriminate in favor of the national banks and against the State banks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DAVIS. I cannot see why a division may not be had upon the different propositions of amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and why a separate and distinct vote may not be taken upon that portion of his proposition which requires monthly payments from the State banks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire a division of the question?

Mr. DAVIS. I do if I can have a division that will produce a separate vote on that proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, the question is susceptible of division.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first branch of the amendment then will be to make the tax one twenty-fourth of one per cent. a month.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want the Senator from Kentucky to see the position in which he has placed himself by calling for a division. I ask the Secretary to read the first amendment.

The Secretary read the first amendment, which was in line two of section one hundred and nine to strike out "one fourth" and insert "one twenty-fourth," and in line three to strike out "half year" and insert "month;" so as to read:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of the deposits, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senate had better take the vote on the whole. They understand the subject. I do not want to take time. Let us take it on the whole together.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall not object to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it be the pleasure of the Senate the question will be taken on the whole amendment unless a division be desired. The question will be taken on the whole amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the call will proceed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Conness, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Wilkinson, and Wilson—15.
NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Powell, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Harding, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Neahm, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now desire separate votes on the various amendments of the committee to this section one hundred and nine, and especially a separate vote on the last amendment of the committee to the section. I have endeavored to correspond with the views of the Senate; but since I cannot do it I desire to present my own, and I ask specially for a separate vote on the amendment to the eighty-fifth line of the section.

Mr. COLLAMER. I some time since moved an amendment to this same section relating to savings banks, but it was passed over at the time, and not finally acted upon. I wish now to present it in a somewhat qualified form, make it perhaps a little more explicit. I move, before the word "and," in line eleven of section one hundred and nine, to insert:

Except savings banks that have no fixed capital, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same for the depositors, exclusively for their benefit, loss, or gain, and who do no other banking business whatever.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am opposed to that amendment, and I think for very good reasons. In the New England States they have what they call savings banks, in which the depositors are paid the profits. A person with $100,000 capital doing a manufacturing business may use a savings bank precisely as an ordinary bank. He may deposit his money there. That money will be loaned for his benefit, and under this narrow exception he will be exempted from taxation.

There is no reason in the world for these exceptions. Every exception made in a tax bill contains an element of injustice. I am opposed to them, I do not care under what color or pretense they are offered. It is true that this may be intended, and it is no doubt designed by the honorable Senator from Vermont, to cover the little accumulations of interest on the deposits of the poor; and if we could make an exception confined to cases of that kind I should be perfectly willing to grant it; but, in my judgment, it may also be made to cover an exception of the deposits of the rich, which would be a groundless exception. There is no justification for it, in my opinion. I might fill up this code of laws—because it is nothing but a digest of the old revenue laws—I might enlarge it to ten times its present volume with exceptions. I might except the herse which carries the poor man to the grave; I might make a thousand exceptions in this bill, just as justifiable as the exception in favor of savings banks. If we make all the exceptions which appear to be just, instead of a tax code we might have a digest of all the laws and pandects; we might write Justinian over again. We cannot provide for all these cases. All these exceptions of particular classes or banks or individuals or sections are wrong, and I for one am opposed to them. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. The other day when this proposition was up, I alluded to it, and since that time I have looked into the question of savings banks a little, and without consuming the time of the Senate I desire simply to refer to some statistics on the subject and to assure the Senator from Vermont that in my opinion a good deal of difficulty may arise under the provision that he now proposes to introduce as an amendment to the bill.

I find that in Rhode Island there are twenty-one savings banks, and on the 1st day of January, 1863, they had thirty-seven thousand seven hundred and seventy-four depositors, with a deposit account in the banks of $9,945,867, making for each depositor $263. I find that Rhode Island at the same time had eighty-eight banks of circulation, and the whole deposit account in all those banks was at that period $5,594,394, making the deposit account in the savings banks nearly double what it was in the banks of issue. Massachusetts had ninety-three savings banks in October, 1862. I have not the returns from Massachusetts later than that time. In those banks there were then two hundred and forty-eight thousand nine hundred creditors as depositors, and their deposits amounted to $50,404,623, making for each depositor an average of $203. To show how this savings bank business has increased in Massachusetts for several years past, I may mention that in 1834 there was an average deposit account in the savings banks of $5 58 cents per head for each inhabitant of Massachusetts; in 1840, $7 88; in 1850, $13 73; in 1855, $24 12; and in 1860 there was an average credit for each individual in Massachusetts in the savings banks of $36 59; and I suppose it has largely increased since, because the deposit account of all the banks has increased since that time, there being more surplus currency. In October, 1862, Massachusetts had one hundred and eighty-three banks of issue, with a deposit account of only $37,471,133. She had $13,000,000 of deposits more in the savings banks than in the banks of circulation.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will allow me I desire to ask him whether he supposes that what are called in the statement to which he refers "deposits in savings banks" is money held in the banks over and above their other funds, as is the case with deposits in banks of discount and deposit where they keep the account of deposits separate from every other account? Does the honorable Senator understand that the savings banks have this amount of deposits which they hold in their vaults over and above their other funds?

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot answer the Senator in one respect. I do not know the character of the savings banks in Massachusetts; but I suppose they are banks without any fixed capital where moneys are received upon deposit and loaned for the use and benefit of the depositors.

Mr. FOSTER. I will inform the Senator that so far as that is concerned, what is there returned as deposits is not money which the bank has in its vaults.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not, but money that has been received from the depositors and loaned out.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly; and not a dollar of it is in the bank. If the savings banks have any money on hand they deposit it in a bank of discount and deposit, and keep an account there. They never have a dollar in their own bank on deposit.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut that upon an examination of the returns of the savings banks in Massachusetts, I find a statement of their profits for a number of years past, the rate per cent. they have made, and the character of their investments. A large portion of this money is invested in United States stocks, and another portion upon notes, and upon bonds and mortgages on real estate. I have a list here showing exactly how this money has been invested, every dollar of it.

Mr. FOSTER. My purpose was to understand whether the Senator understood that this was money on deposit in bank.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not. I understand it is money that has been placed there for the purpose of being loaned for the use and benefit of the depositors. It is used by the directors or the managers of the institution. It is loaned out upon mortgage security or otherwise, the interest collected and paid over to the depositors. In Connecticut I have the report of April 1, 1863. There were forty-nine savings banks in that State then, with one hundred and three thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven depositors, and a deposit account to their credit of $23,446,936, making an average to the credit of each depositor of $227. Connecticut at that time had seventy-five banks of circulation, and those banks only had upon deposit $8,890,237. There was nearly three times as much money on deposit in the savings banks of Connecticut at that time as there was in the banks of issue.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is entirely mistaken, if he will permit me. My word for it, there was not a dollar in one of these savings banks at that time when he says there were $23,000,000; that is, not a dollar of deposits in the way that the gentleman would seem to understand.

Mr. HENDERSON. I mean to say there had been that much money deposited in the banks and loaned out. I do not say that the money was there then subject to the draft of the depositors; but I mean to say that the officers having this matter in charge, who are compelled to make reports on the subject, report as deposited in the savings banks of Connecticut $23,500,000 on the 1st of April, 1863, and in the banks of issue only $8,890,000.

Mr. FOSTER. There were $8,000,000 in the banks of issue and not a dollar in the others.

Mr. HENDERSON. It had been deposited with them and loaned out.

Mr. FOSTER. Then it was not there.

Mr. HENDERSON. The mortgages, bonds, and other securities were there. They held the bonds and securities. I think there is no difference between the Senator and myself. I mean simply to say that that much money had been deposited and loaned out.

Mr. FOSTER. It is just as if the banks of deposit and discount, which the Senator says held $8,000,000, had had previously $20,000,000, and it was all gone. That which was in the savings bank was in the savings bank just as much as that which had been in the banks of discount and issue and had been drawn out.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7, 1864.

NEW SERIES, No. 172.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose there will be no misunderstanding among Senators in regard to this matter. I do not know that I can make myself understood by the Senator from Connecticut. I find that the officers reported in New Hampshire, January 1, 1863, twenty-seven savings banks, with thirty-nine thousand three hundred and fifty-eight depositors, and the deposits were $6,560,308.07. There were fifty-two banks of circulation in New Hampshire January 1, 1863, the date of the report, with only $1,725,866 on deposit—a difference of nearly four to one in favor of the savings banks; that is, four times as much was deposited in the savings banks as in the banks of circulation.

In Vermont, July 1, 1863, the report shows eleven thousand and forty-five depositors, with a deposit account of $1,712,231. At the same time there were forty banks of circulation in that State, with a deposit account of $1,843,153. There were about one hundred thousand dollars more deposited in the banks of circulation than in the savings banks.

In Maine I find eleven thousand eight hundred and thirty-three depositors in savings banks, and the deposits amounted to $2,641,476. At that time, December, 1863, there were sixty-nine banks of circulation; there being in Maine only fifteen savings banks. The deposit account of the banks of circulation was $6,421,005; being more than double as much deposited in banks of circulation as in the savings banks.

In the State of New York I have the report of January 1, 1863. There were seventy-five banks called savings banks, with three hundred and forty-seven thousand one hundred and eighty-four depositors. The deposits in these banks were $76,538,183. New York at that time had three hundred and eight banks of circulation, with a deposit account of $200,824,776. I have not looked through the other States.

In fact, the New England States having a most perfect system of savings banks have provided that these banks shall make reports just as banks of circulation do. In many of the States there is no such supervision and control over these banks, and such supervision and control ought to be had in all the States. The system in New England is perfectly proper and ought to be adopted in each and every State; but it is utterly impossible for me now to ascertain the amounts of money on deposit in the institutions called savings banks, except where the law requires the bank superintendents, bank commissioners, and others to look into this matter and to cause these banks to make reports to him. By examination, it will be found that in the six New England States and the State of New York there is in the savings banks a vast amount of money; in Rhode Island there is within a fraction of $10,000,000; in Massachusetts $50,000,000; in Connecticut $23,000,000; in New Hampshire $6,000,000; in Vermont $1,712,000; in Maine $2,641,000; and in New York $76,000,000.

It strikes me that much of what has been said by the Senator from Ohio is correct, that we shall find not less than three or four hundred million dollars perhaps on deposit in the different States of the Union in the savings banks; and in that way deposits may be made in such institutions and nothing realized under this provision of the bill. I really feel very favorable to the object designed by the Senator from Vermont if we could properly discriminate, but I very much fear that instead of having a limitation upon it such as certainly ought to be imposed, restricting it to a certain amount of deposits so as to confine it to the poorer classes, it will be found that rich individuals will make their large deposits in these banks, and thereby escape any taxation under this provision. I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is very difficult to disabuse any man's mind of the impressions which are worn down into it by what he knows of the state of things around him, and with which he is acquainted from having always lived there. He cannot readily realize the condition of things in other parts of the country with which he has been unacquainted. The Senator from Missouri talks about deposits in banks of circulation, and compares them with deposits in a savings bank. I have endeavored to describe a savings bank in my amendment in such a manner that the description must exclude all other banks. It will be observed that I have described it as a bank whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning them for the depositors, the profit or loss being to the depositors, and not to the bank; and I have also provided that it shall be a bank which has no capital, and which does no other business whatever.

I have two or three times undertaken to describe these banks, but I have never succeeded in getting the attention of anybody who did not understand it before; and now I am asked again what these banks are and how they do their business. They are mere charitable institutions, and really in principle you might as well levy a tax upon the contribution box for the poor of the parish. I will endeavor again to state their character. The returns which the Senator from Missouri has read show to any man who understands the subject that the proportion of money deposited in the savings banks is just about in proportion to the operatives in the factories in the various places. That is the reason why the deposits in Rhode Island and Massachusetts are so much more than in Maine and Vermont. In Vermont we are but slightly a manufacturing people as compared with Massachusetts or Rhode Island. Connecticut is a great deal more so. Maine is but little, perhaps not as much as we, and hence we have comparatively little in the savings banks in proportion to our population.

Now, let me state what a savings bank is. By an act of incorporation there are certain men, called managers or trustees, who take charge of the business. The President of the Senate is one of them in his own city. These trustees do the business for nothing; they receive no compensation. They do it for the cause of humanity. They superintend the business of the bank. They have one officer, called a treasurer, whom they hire and pay for his work. He has an office, and all persons may call if they please and deposit money in the savings bank. He takes their money, and enters it upon the books, and he gives a little book to each depositor in which he enters what the depositor has put in; and when people draw their money out when they want it, they do so by bringing that book and having what they take out charged to them. That book is a muniment between the depositor and the bank. The trustees proceed to loan the money received whenever there is enough received to be worthy of a loan, say fifty, or one hundred, or five hundred dollars. They loan it upon a good note where they know the parties, or upon a mortgage upon real estate. Sometimes they buy State stock or bank stock with the money. Then, with the interest they receive on these securities, they are enabled to pay the expense of the treasurer and divide about five per cent. annually to the depositors; and they give that percentage to every one who has left his money in three months. If they have any more than five per cent. they divide the excess, and if there is a loss in any respect they divide less. The bank, as you call it, really an imaginary thing, is nothing more than what I have now described. I have drawn my amendment in such a shape as to exempt only those savings banks whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning them for the depositors for their loss or gain, and who have no capital, and do no other business whatever. The question is whether that sort of institution ought to be subject to a tax of one half per cent. per annum on its deposits, so called.

I think I have described the savings banks just such as exist all over New England. The Senator from Missouri has told us by reading the figures that there are a great many millions of dollars, more or less, deposited in these savings banks in the different States. What does he conclude from that? He runs a parallel between the deposits in these savings banks and the deposits in the banks of issue. The things are entirely different and distinct. According to his notion, and if this exception be not made, all the money deposited in these savings banks, and which is loaned out, the whole aggregate of these millions, is to be subject to a tax of one half per cent. per annum—not one half per cent. upon the interest which is received, but one half per cent. upon the whole aggregate amount.

Now, take a bank of issue which receives deposits. Do they loan those deposits for the benefit of the depositors? Not at all. They make issues and loans for their own benefit. Whatever they earn they take to themselves and keep to themselves. All that a bank of issue enters on its books as deposits is the money that is put in which they loan out for their own profit, not for the profit of the depositor. This is entirely a different matter.

Now, why should the deposits so called in the savings banks be taxed? Suppose I have some money, say $1,000, and I loan it, do you tax me anything on that loan? Not at all. I know that if I have an income from that and other sources amounting to more than $600, I am subject to pay a tax on my income. But take the plain, straight case, that I have got $1,000, if you will, and I loan it, does the Government get a single cent of tax upon it in any way? None at all. I know that if I have got an income from that or any other source falling within the description of the law, I must pay five per cent. income tax according to this bill; but that is all.

Now, what are you doing with these depositors? A poor boy or a young woman working in a factory at Manchester; if you please, instead of taking care of her own money, goes and says to the honorable President of the Senate, "Mr. Clark, I have got fifty dollars, my earnings for the past few months; I ask you to put this money into your savings bank, and I ask you to divide between me and the other depositors what you make on the money we put in." Some people put in $200 or $300, some $400 or $500, some $50. In some States the average will be $200 or $300, the savings of two or three, or four or five years, put into the savings bank. What do you propose to do here? To levy a tax of one half per cent. not on what the girl gets for interest upon that money, but one half per cent. on the whole of her $50 as a tax. It is not one half per cent. on her income but on the aggregate amount of her capital. You require her to pay twenty-five cents tax on the $3 which she gets, supposing that she gets six per cent., and she cannot get any more, and really will not get more than five per cent., and you require her to pay a quarter of a dollar on the $2.50 which she gets, or ten per cent. To what principle in the bill can you assimilate that? What resemblance has it to anything else in the bill?

But, Mr. President, it is said that perhaps wealthy people may put their money in savings banks, and the Senator from Ohio says that a man with capital carrying on a great manufacturing business may put his money into a savings bank. I can tell the Senator that a man carrying on a great manufactory has very little capital but what he uses himself; he generally has to borrow money. He does not have any money to deposit, or if he has it is not deposited long enough to make anything.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Vermont also mention the circumstance that the money thus deposited is not subject to be taken out on call? It can only be taken out at certain periods of the year.

Mr. COLLAMER. It can only be taken out from three months to three months, generally, on notice. The savings banks do not all have the same regulation on this point. Some of them have a regulation that if you deposit money, you may withdraw it at any time upon giving five days' notice, but if you do it within three months you shall have no interest. Others have a little different regulation, and say that you shall give three months' notice, and take it out at the end of three months from a certain day, because they cannot be attending to it all the time. When the savings banks have any money on hand more than they have invested, they do not keep it in the savings bank, but they put it into the bank of discount and deposit in their neighborhood, and keep an account there. If there is anything on hand not invested it is deposited in that bank on which we have a tax.

But, Mr. President, suppose a wealthy man should put his money into a savings bank, what of it? Does a wealthy man who has money to lend, whether he deposits it or lends it himself, pay anything to the Government? Not at all. He may as well deposit it in a savings bank as keep it. If he keeps it in his own desk he pays nothing on it; but if he puts it in a savings bank the tax on dividends to which that bank is subject will make him pay something. There is another point: if this man of wealth has income he pays upon his income. If he puts his money in a savings bank and receives interest upon it, that interest is part of his income, and you tax it. But you are contriving here to try to get a tax from those who have not $600, and some of whom have not $100. You are trying to levy a tax on them even to a larger amount than you levy on income. Suppose I have an income large enough to be taxed, how much am I taxed? If I have $1,000 invested, I receive $60 interest, and you charge me a tax of 5 per cent. on the $60, which is $3. Here you are putting one half per cent. on the aggregate money on these people who have no $600, or if they have it is part of the income, and can be reached in that way. There is a very broad difference between deposits in banks of discount and deposit and deposits in savings banks which are loaned out for the benefit of the depositors. I hope the Senate will see the propriety of the distinction.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont, if he insists on the amendment, that he limit the amount of deposits. If these deposits are made by very poor persons would it not be better to say:

And except savings banks which, having no fixed capital, confine their business to receiving time deposits and loaning or investing the same for the depositors, and which receive no deposit from any person at one time exceeding in amount $20.

Mr. COLLAMER. A man wants to deposit $100; he can deposit $20 this minute, $20 more in five minutes, and $20 more in ten minutes, and in fifteen minutes $20 more. It is utterly impossible to apply any such limitation. The truth is, that whatever deposits there are, if the depositors get from them more than $600 income, you tax them.

Mr. HENDERSON. My only fear is that the amendment may defeat the whole object of the law, which, if I understand it properly, is to get a tax on parties who have surplus funds that they can afford to deposit in bank. The tax is levied on the deposits in the bank only as a means of getting it out of the individuals who have the surplus funds to deposit, and the object of this bill is to levy a tax on deposits, because the supposition is that parties who have the money to deposit can afford to pay. If this amendment be adopted, unrestrained as it is, unlimited in the amount of deposit, will not savings banks or something of that sort grow up in the country everywhere, and all the surplus capital in the country fall into them?

I have shown that in seven States there are $171,000,000 deposited in savings banks now; and will not these institutions spring up in all the cities, and the deposits be made in them? You do not confine it to a time deposit in this amendment. Why not say a "time deposit" in this amendment? If, as the Senator from Vermont says, it is time deposits only that he intends to provide for, why not say "time deposits," so that no immediate deposit can be affected that is a deposit subject to draft?

Mr. HALE. The Senator speaks of these deposits as being made from the surplus of the depositors. The fact is that it is exactly the other way; it is of their very necessities. The deposits are not made by those who have any surplus, but by those who use these charitable, eleemosynary institutions as a convenient way for keeping the very little they have to live upon. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] proposed a tax on incomes the other day. This is unfair. While you do not tax people who really have income, you tax these people ten per cent. on what they receive, because they never get more than five per cent. Suppose, for instance, a person has in a savings bank $100, and receives $5 interest; of that $5 he has to pay 50 cents in this tax. In other words, the very poorest people on earth out of their poverty are taxed upon what they get from savings banks ten per cent.

The question being taken on Mr. COLLAMER's amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22; nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harris, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Powell, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Davis, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Ramsey, and Sherman—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Cowan, Dixon, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I rise to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in relation to monthly returns was lost. I do it to oblige certain Senators who were not here to vote.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to that amendment of the Senator from Ohio, there is one part of it that I like very much indeed, and that is that these banks shall make return of the amount of their discounts, &c., every month, but I wish an amendment could be framed so as to allow the payment of the taxes to be semi-annually, as on the national banks, and then they would all stand on an equality.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought it was a very small matter, and I have really made a calculation to show the difference to a bank of $100,000 capital, between paying a tax of $83 and some cents a month monthly, and paying six months' tax semi-annually, and it amounts to the insignificant sum of less than $20 a year, and that is the point on which we have been higgling so long. It seems to me it is scarcely worth while to draw over this section, and I say again to Senators that in order to carry out the idea of the Senator from Wisconsin you will have to redraw the section. The Senator from Maine stated correctly that the bill was sent to us on a different basis; the Committee on Finance changed it so as to correspond with their views; and now to change it back again and to draw a distinction between the time of making the return and the time of paying the duty will require a revision of the whole subject, and will open it to further debate and cause the loss of time. As Senators concede that the principal object I wish to accomplish, the making of the monthly returns, is an object that is desirable or at least important, certainly the difference between the monthly payment of this tax and the semi-annual payment is insignificant and scarcely worth troubling ourselves about.

Mr. JOHNSON. That depends on the character of the banks and upon the business they do. It would make a very material difference to the larger banks who do a very heavy business. As I have said to the Senator, rather than not have the monthly returns I shall vote for the amendment in the form in which he has presented it, because I think it all-important to the country that monthly returns should be had. But I do not see that he is right when he says that the monthly returns may not be provided for without providing also for the payment of the tax monthly, without remodeling the whole section. Why is it that at the end of this section which provides now for a semi-annual return and a semi-annual payment, we cannot add a clause saying that each bank shall make monthly return of its capital, its deposits, and its circulation? I do not see any difficulty about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator does not see any difficulty, I wish he would do it. The thing cannot be accomplished in the way gentlemen want it without redrawing the section.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator speaks of course with more knowledge than I have of the language of this section. What I understand the section to have been originally is that it imposed on the banks the obligation to make semi-annual returns and semi-annual payments; that is all.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will find on reading the section that he is not correct. The House framed the bill on the basis that a portion of this tax, the tax on deposits and capital, should be paid semi-annually and returns made semi-annually, while the tax on circulation was to be paid monthly and returned monthly. It was a complex thing. I will state that if the committee of conference can sit down and take this section up in detail and examine it, and they think proper to make this variation, they can do it readily. It can be done there much more readily in a committee of conference than in the Senate. If I had brought in a new section on banks and banking redrawn to carry out the Senator's idea, it would have to be printed, and would take a great deal more trouble. The whole subject will be left open to a committee of conference, and they will then be able to carry out the idea. The difference between the Senate and the House of Representatives is radical. The House impose a tax of three per cent. on all circulation. The conferees will probably have to agree on some intermediate plan. I do not know how.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I have a small amendment to propose. On page 144, line four hundred and forty of section ninety-three, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "five," so as to read:

On all diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, and all other jewelry, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

I offer this amendment at the instance of a number of respectable firms engaged in the manufacture of jewelry, who very succinctly state why they think this alteration ought to be made. They state that these firms in the fifth collection district of New Jersey manufacture more than one third of all the jewelry in the northern States, as appears by the returns to the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. They ask for this amendment on the ground that they believe more revenue will accrue to the Government by reducing it to five per cent. than suffering it to stand at ten per cent., as it now is in the bill. They think it will be a restriction upon the trade to impose a duty of ten per cent., and there will be less made, and less revenue accruing to the country. I understand that the bill, as it was originally introduced in the House of Representatives, was in that way. That is about the amount that is to be levied on articles of manufacture generally. Some are less. It was altered, I believe, in the other House, and comes here in that shape. My object simply is to request the Senate to consider this matter, and to lay before them the reasons which have been assigned in the letter which has been sent to me.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. On the 172d page, I move to strike out all after the word "annum" in line thirteen of section one hundred and sixteen to the word "dollars" in line twenty-six. The words which I move to strike out are:

And there shall also be deducted the income derived from dividends on shares in the capital stock of any corporation or joint stock company, and the interest on any bonds or other evidences of indebtedness of any corporation or joint stock company, which shall have been assessed and the tax paid by said corporations or joint stock companies, as hereinafter provided; also the amount paid by any person for the rent of the homestead used or occupied by himself or his family.

I have not offered the amendment because I am opposed to a portion of the principle embodied in this clause, or because I suppose it will remain stricken out as a part of the law whenever the bill shall be passed into a law, but to give the committee of conference an opportunity to perfect the clause which I think they will not otherwise have an opportunity of doing with the amendments which have already been made to it.

It will be observed that this section provides that there shall be a deduction from every individual's income of the amount that he has received from corporation stocks of whatever description he may own, whether bank, telegraph, railroad, or anything else. The reason is because the man who owns the stock pays this amount not by himself but through another, through the agency of the corporation of which he is a member. If I have an income of \$100,000 under this bill derivable from stocks of various descriptions, I virtually pay through the agency of these corporations 5 per cent. on that amount. The Senator from Vermont, who is my neighbor, gets an income also of \$100,000, but he receives his from iron or coal mines, or from manufactures, or from commerce; and if he will turn to the 171st page he will observe that he must pay  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on his income; upon all over \$10,000 he must pay  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; whereas I, owning my property entirely in the stock of corporations, through those corporations pay 5 per cent. only. That is inequitable; that operates to the disadvantage of commerce and manufactures and of the owners of real estate in our cities whose incomes are derivable from property, who ought not to be compelled to pay any more than men who own property in stocks.

It is said that this can be regulated by some rule to be established by the Commissioner. I am unwilling to agree to any bill that has to be amended by a Commissioner or a Secretary of the Treasury or any other public officer when my attention is called to a provision of this kind and it is susceptible of being perfected in the Senate. Then I have a great many doubts whether we can authorize any change of the absolute law of Congress on the subject. I propose, therefore, to strike out this clause in order to enable the committee of conference, when the bill shall be referred to a committee of conference, to perfect this matter and put it on the right basis, so that parties who are deriving an income from stocks or from any other species of property shall stand upon a perfect equality.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the words will not be stricken out. That would present the bill in a most anomalous and ridiculous condition. The bill would simply stand then, as it goes out of the Senate, that a man shall have his 5 per cent. deducted in the first place from the income on his shares by the bank, or other corporation in which he holds shares, and then that he shall pay 5 per cent. again on the same income. That is the way it would stand. For the credit of the Senate I do not want to have the bill go out in that shape.

I have no sort of doubt about how the thing will operate. We confer on the Commissioner of Internal Revenue power to make rules and regulations for the collection of this income tax, and to call upon everybody for a return of what his income is. All a man has to do is to make a return of his sources of income, and that is the way in which it is done, specifying this source, that source, and the other. Then they estimate it upon that. If any item has been deducted once, there is an end of it. I was obliged to return a statement of what I had received as my salary here; I shall be obliged to do it again; but I shall not be charged with 5 per cent. on it, because the law provides that it shall be deducted before the salary is paid over to me. If it appears from my return of the whole of my income that it is more than \$10,000, I am charged with  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on the excess over \$10,000.

The thing is simple in its operation if the Commissioner does his duty. If you take it for granted that he will not do his duty, there is an end of it; but if the Senator desires to amend it, he should fix something that is an amendment. I am not prepared at a moment's warning to do it. The gentleman proposes an amendment to strike out a part of the bill, because he thinks it wants to be redrawn and something else provided. My capacity does not go as far as that; but if the Senator wishes that the committee of conference shall consider it, they are perfectly able to consider it on the amendments that have been made. We have struck out two very important parts of the bill there and inserted others, and on those the committee of conference can, if they think it necessary, make a provision that will answer the purpose. It stands just as well now for that purpose as it would with the whole clause struck out.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to have some indication as to what the sense of the Senate is upon this subject, whether it is deemed necessary or not to make an amendment. As I understand it, the Senator admits that my criticism is correct.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I admit that if the Commissioner does not do what he has a perfect right to do, and what he will undoubtedly do if he understands the bill, a consequence of that sort may follow, but the same sort of consequence may follow in five hundred other places in the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator admits that there would be this inequality between the incomes derived from stocks and the incomes derived from mines, manufactures, commerce, or real estate, unless it was made up by some sort of management on the part of the Commissioner. If he will make any intelligible statement of the mode in which the Commissioner is going to do this, the intelligence of my brother Senators is much greater than mine, but I confess I do not comprehend it. I insist that the Commissioner has not got any such authority. The bill says absolutely what shall be deducted and what shall not be deducted. It says that the taxation, if the income exceeds \$10,000, shall be  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Has the Commissioner a right to vary that? I understand not. It then says that on the income derived from stocks a man shall not be compelled to pay anything if the company whose stock he holds has paid the tax. Has the Commissioner or the Secretary of the Treasury any right to add to or deduct from that? I apprehend not. The proposition I have submitted here may be ridiculous, but I submit that it is not quite as ridiculous as the proposition which I propose to amend; and I submit to the judgment of the Senate on that point.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to have a vote at some time upon the proviso to section seven on page 7. I do not know but that it was attended to when I was not present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Vermont that that whole section was stricken out and an amendment inserted.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let the new draft be read that we may see how it stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment made to that section will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may divide the respective States and Territories of the United States, and the District of Columbia, into convenient collection districts, and may alter such districts as the public interests may require, and may include any of said States and Territories, and the District of Columbia, in one district; but the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Senators and Representatives to which such State shall be entitled in the present Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. The substance of the proviso to which I have referred is there. It seems to me a little difficult to execute this proviso consistently with the present law. By the existing law the districts were not to be greater in number than the number of Representatives in the last Congress; but it further provided that if any State should have a greater number of Representatives under the new apportionment, the number of districts might be equal to that number of Representatives. It made no provision, however, for States which would lose under the apportionment, but it gave them a number of districts equal to the number of Representatives in the last Congress. Some of the States have lost in the apportionment. The present bill provides that the number of districts shall not exceed the number of Senators and Representatives in this Congress. I am not prepared to say that there may not be States which have lost more Representatives by the apportionment than the provision of this bill, including their Senators, would make up to them. I am not prepared to say exactly how that stands; but I fear that under this provision, which is that the whole number of districts shall not exceed the Senators and Representatives in the present Congress, you may have to destroy some of the districts which are now in existence, which, I take it, is hardly intended. According to my present view I do not want the number of districts increased in my State at any rate; and yet if this provision be adopted there may be ground to apprehend that result. The State is conveniently divided; and I take it other States are conveniently divided into collection districts according to the number of their congressional districts. Because there may be some few States that want more districts on account of the extent of their geographical limits, it is hardly worth while on that account to make a provision that may disturb the districts in all the States.

When any provision is made by which any State can have more men in office there is no peace and no quiet in that State until the appointments are made. For instance, in the little State in which I live, where we have three districts, well enough, convenient enough, the moment a provision like this is passed people will see that any State may have a number of districts equal to the number of its Senators and Representatives, and the effect will be that the moment we reach home we shall be beset at once. People will say to us, "Why not let us have two more collectors and two more assessors and their deputies; other States are going to have them under this law; will you not let the State of Vermont have them; are you not going to help your friends; shall we not have more money spent here by it; will there not be $40,000 more paid out by the United States for collectors and assessors and their deputies, and so on?" We cannot live under that importunity, we shall have no peace. I do not want any such importunities; I do not want to give any occasion for them. I do not think there is anything in the necessities of the State that requires that we should be thus troubled or that the Government should be in any way, or that we should be put to the expense of having such a number of new officers to be paid. I wish, therefore, to have this provision struck out and let the matter stand as the law now is. I take it that provision of the law has not been repealed, or at any rate we can save it from the repealing clause in this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I fear the result would be to abolish districts in New York.

Mr. COLLAMER. Not at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Commissioner is apprehensive of that. The districts in New York have been decreased by the present apportionment. There are not as many Representatives in this Congress from New York as there were in the last.

Mr. COLLAMER. The previous law was that the number of districts should not be greater than the number of Representatives in the last Congress, except that those States whose representation was increased by the apportionment of 1860 might have districts according to the increased number of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. New York has not gained, it has lost, by the apportionment. The districts there were made according to the number of Representatives in the last Congress. The provision in the bill as it came from the other House was that each State should be entitled to the same number of districts that it has Representatives in the present Congress; and the representation in the present Congress is not just what it was in the last.

Mr. COLLAMER. The existing law provides for the number of districts; and I take it that whatever number of districts was made under that law stands now unless you pass a clause repealing that portion of the law. The existing law is:

"Provided, That the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which such State shall be entitled in the present Congress."

That was the last Congress—

"excepting such States as are entitled to an increased representation in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, in which States the number of districts shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which the State shall be so entitled."

If that law as it stands is not superseded by any new law the State of New York will have the number to which she was entitled under the then apportionment, and we shall not have to unmake any district. If you let that law stand as it is New York will not be deprived of any district. My proposition is to leave the existing law as it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator's proposition was to strike out this proviso.

Mr. COLLAMER. And leave the old law to stand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But by another section of this bill that law is repealed with certain exceptions.

Mr. COLLAMER. We can put this provision among those exceptions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But the Senator's proposition was simply to strike out the proviso; and doing that simply has the effect to leave no law upon this particular subject. If it was a part of his idea to adopt the old law in this respect, he did not suggest it by way of amendment. The statement of the Commissioner was on the supposition that the old law was to be repealed, and this bill to be adopted in lieu of it; and what he said was perfectly true, that the effect of leaving it in that way would be to dispense with one district in New York. If the Senator proposes to provide for that case, I have no objection to his amendment; for surely I do not want to increase the number of districts. I have the same objection to that that he has, though I do not anticipate any such difficulty as he supposes. I do not think we shall be teased into making new offices for our friends contrary to the public interest; and I am sure that the last man to do anything of that sort would be my friend from Vermont.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. McDUGALL addressed the Chair.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the motion is put, if the Senator from Missouri—

Mr. HENDERSON. I withdraw the motion temporarily.

Mr. SUMNER. I was going to ask that this bill, with all the amendments, be printed for the use of the Senate, that we may find it on our tables on Monday. It seems to me that we have arrived at such a stage now that in order to act advantageously and definitively upon it, we ought to see the bill with the amendments.

Several Senators. It cannot be done.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill can be printed I have no doubt; at any rate an attempt can be made to print it.

Mr. CONNESS. It would not be very profitable to make an attempt at printing and fail. I would like to ask the Senator from Maine whether there are not a number of amendments not yet acted upon in the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. None of the amendments made in committee have been acted on. The idea was simply this, and I think it was a very correct one in a bill of this kind, that the Senate, in committee, having made a great many amendments, if any Senator desired a separate vote on any one that had been adopted in committee, he might have it, and after that process had been gone through with, then the amendments should be adopted in a body.

Mr. CONNESS. That vote has not been reached yet.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has not been reached because Senators have not got through presenting amendments.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I do not see the propriety of printing the bill now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now that I am up I will say that I am very anxious to get through the bill to-night, unless gentlemen are disposed—

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask the floor on a question of business belonging to the day, not for general discussion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that I am entitled to the floor at the present time.

Mr. McDUGALL. Certainly, if the Chair says so. I sought the floor some time since.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The process is a very simple one. Ordinarily, when we have bills of any size, we call upon Senators to except or request a separate vote upon any particular amendment, and the rest of them are adopted in a body. In this case I thought it would be more fair to the Senate, instead of following the usual course, as Senators might not recollect precisely the amendments on which they might wish to have a separate vote, to leave all the amendments open and allow Senators to go through and move for a separate vote on such as they desired to have voted on, and when that was gone through with to adopt the rest in a body. It was only reversing the usual process, and affording Senators a better opportunity on a bill of this description.

Mr. McDUGALL. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I have sought to make a particular amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am desirous of affording the Senator an opportunity. I do not want to push the bill too persistently, but to leave it open a sufficient length of time until every Senator is satisfied that he has made his motion upon every point upon which he desires to make it.

When that is through, then adopt the amendments. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have given, I believe, every clause a careful attention from the beginning to the end of the bill; so have the other members of the committee; and I think the bill stands in a very good shape at the present time, and there is no need of our losing two or three days, as we must if we adopt his suggestion. It would take the clerks a couple of days, I presume, with hard work to prepare the bill to send it to the printer in the first place, and it would take two more certainly to print it, and we should gain nothing then in my judgment. I hope, therefore, that any motion of that sort will not be adopted.

But one thing more. I am very desirous of closing the bill to-night. If we are ever to get through with this session and do the business, we had better come to the conclusion that we will finish it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask the chairman of the committee to allow me to move an amendment which I desire to make, as it will not be possible for me to be here this evening. I believe with the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly the Senator will have a chance in a moment, if he will wait until I get through, as I have told him once or twice before.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to say that I know some Senators have engagements for this evening, supposing that there would be no night session on Saturday night, it not being usual. I think we can have an understanding that on Monday we shall sit this bill out and have a night session if necessary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We ought not to require any understanding to sit it out; and at this period of the session I do not think that one day, and the importance of one day to the revenue of the country, (which, as the Senator knows, is probably half a million dollars,) should yield to the mere fact that some Senators have engagements for this evening. I do not think it any argument at all. I should like to go through with the bill and close it, and in my judgment the sooner we do it the better. If Senators will exercise a little forbearance on the subject, and believe that after all they may not know with so very great exactness that a thing is positively wrong, and that what is wrong may be amended by the committee of conference when they come to consultation, and look at the whole bill from beginning to end, we shall get it through a great deal sooner than otherwise. I propose to sit right on now.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the Senator will not insist on anything of that sort. I am aware that there are a great many amendments yet to be offered, and the Senator says he is perfectly willing to give every member an opportunity. I have none myself, but I know there are several amendments to be offered that will take a good deal of time. And I desire to suggest another fact to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that there are some Senators in doubt as to the true state of the bill at the present time, and if they have an opportunity between now and Monday morning to examine it, it is my opinion that we shall save time. I see no probability of getting through with it to-night. They really do not know the character of the amendments, and in offering amendments they do not know exactly how to word them. Either print the bill or give them an opportunity between now and Monday morning to examine it, so that they can so shape their amendments as to take but little time in the Senate, and with that view I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. McDUGALL. I appeal to the Senator from Missouri—

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot withdraw the motion.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and fourteen voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to debate the question.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not going to debate it. I have no objection to the question being taken on this bill on Monday, and that it be sat out on Monday; but I want to offer some amendments, and I want to say something upon the bill, and it is impossible to get through with it to-night.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Dixon, Harding, Hicks, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wright—12.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. McDUGALL. I move on page—

Mr. COLLAMER. I believe I had a motion pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator did not indicate what he desired stricken out. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. COLLAMER. If I understand it aright, the seventh section was stricken out and another one put in the place of it; and which other one has the same proviso in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not any proviso in it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand the great and essential difference between this section and the other consists in the difference between "but" and "provided." This one has the word "but" and the other has the word "provided." Is that what the Chair means?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair means that there is no proviso in it, and he desires the Senator to indicate the words which he wishes to have stricken out. If the Clerk has got it, the Clerk is entirely satisfied. The words which the Clerk understands are to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is moved to strike out the following words in section seven:

But the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Senators and Representatives to which such State shall be entitled in the present Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire the existing law to remain on that subject, and I was aware and said that I did not know the manner in which the repeal of different sections and the reservation of different sections from repeal was prepared and presented by the Presiding Officer. I could not see exactly how that stood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, the Chair will state to the Senator from Vermont that he can move to strike out these words, and to insert here the words of the former law.

Mr. COLLAMER. If that will effect my purpose, I move, then, to strike out the words which have been read, and insert in lieu thereof the proviso in the former act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be read.

Mr. COLLAMER. That will not answer, because it was drawn up in the last Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can alter it and make it read "the Thirty-Seventh Congress" instead of "the present Congress." The words which the Senator desires to have inserted will be read from the desk, so that the Senate may understand it.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Provided, That the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which such State was entitled in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, except in such States as are entitled to an increased representation in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, in which States the number of districts shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which any such State may be so entitled: And provided further, That in the State of California the President may establish a number of districts not exceeding the number of Senators and Representatives to which said State was entitled in the Thirty-Seventh Congress.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am willing to stay here to an anything like reasonable time to let this bill go through, but I am well satisfied that it cannot probably pass to-night, and therefore I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sure we all see that it is very important to have this bill passed at the earliest possible day, and I suppose it can be understood generally by the Senate that the bill will be acted on finally in the course of Monday. While I was in the Senate before—I do not know what has been the practice since—these understandings were frequently entered into and were always complied with. I do not know whether it would be proper to make the motion formally, but I shall vote for the motion to adjourn, as far as I am concerned, with a determination to bring the bill to a final vote in the course of Monday.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I renew the motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Although no debate is allowed on a question of adjournment—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I withdraw the motion, if the Senator desires to make any remarks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say simply that I have no motive to push gentlemen, as I think they will give me credit for, for I have sat here as patiently as I think any other member of the Senate would have been able to sit during the number of days, eleven days, that we have been debating this bill, a large part of it in the evening. I deem it of very great importance that we should finish this bill speedily if we are to pass it at all; and my great objection to adjourning is that Senators are very apt when they begin a day to think there is plenty of time before them, and to discuss every question at very considerable length, even after it is very well understood by all who are disposed to understand it. I have no confidence that if we adjourn over to Monday we shall finish it on Monday. I think it will be just as likely then to last all next week as it was on Monday last to keep on through this week, from the disposition to discuss and rediscuss, to open and reopen, to reconsider every question that has been passed upon by the Senate several times, and on which the opinion of the Senate has been definitely and distinctly expressed over and over again. If that is to be done over and over again in separate and new shape on these matters which are so interesting, the Senate can see just as well as I can that there is no such thing as getting to the end of it. Of course it is of no more consequence to me than to every other Senator.

Mr. McDUGALL. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that so far as I am concerned I will enter into no pledge of getting through with it on Monday. If I think it proper for me to discuss the bill in all its details, I will take such time as may be involved in that discussion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no doubt of that, and I think it very likely that disposition may be general; I cannot tell precisely; but if Senators are disposed to aid in passing the bill instead of aiding in protracting the session by protracting discussion, we must come to a conclusion soon; otherwise we must go on to such time as Senators determine. For my part, I have only to say that while I have tried very sedulously to get through in some sort of season, still affording ample opportunity for all discussion on the subject, I have rather come to the conclusion that I may as well cease all my efforts in that direction and let the bill float according to the disposition of Senators for the future.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not desire that the Senator from Maine or any other Senator shall suppose that I have made an unreasonable motion. In my view of this matter this bill is a very lengthy one in the first place; the amendments proposed to the House bill by the Committee of Finance were very lengthy, many of them, and very numerous. They were printed however, and we could master them; we could know something about them; but I think the course of the Committee on Finance has been very proper, no question about it; but an extraordinary one. The bill has now as I should judge, as near as I can guess, one fourth of matter that has been brought into it by the Committee on Finance since the report of that committee, which has not been printed, which we can only know about by having heard it read. We scarcely understand it sometimes then. Surely the Senator will admit that the Committee on Finance in introducing new amendments during this week has occupied more of the time of the Senate than all other Senators put together. If the rest of us ask a reasonable time to know something about the changes that the committee has made in this bill certainly it will not be regarded as unreasonable, and therefore I renew my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 4, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LAWS OF UTAH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the laws of the Territory of Utah; which were referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH OCCUPATION OF MEXICO.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs relative to the correspondence between this country and France, referred to that committee a few days ago, not with a view to its consideration, but merely to have it printed and recommended to the committee to await its regular order.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw his objection. I do not contemplate gaining any advantage, but only to have the report printed for the use of the House when it comes up to be considered when the committee is regularly called for reports.

Mr. BROOMALL. I cannot withdraw my objection.

WARREN W. GREEN.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back Senate bill No. 217, for the relief of Warren W. Green, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Warren W. Green the sum of $47 79, being for his services on the Fort Kearney and Honey Lake wagon road in the year 1857.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That one thousand extra copies of the report of the Postmaster General, and appendix, be printed for the use of the Post Office Department.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON. Will the type for this report have to be reset?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I do not know.

Mr. WILSON. As chairman of the Committee on Printing I think the gentleman ought to have informed himself, so that he could inform the House.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. A. W. CLARK demanded tellers on the adoption of the resolution.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. A. W. CLARK and CRAVENS were appointed.

The resolution was adopted; the tellers having reported—ayes 68, noes 25.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1863.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That there be printed, by the Superintendent of Public Printing, one hundred and fifty thousand extra copies of the annual report for 1863 of the Commissioner of Agriculture, with the accompanying documents, for the use of the present House, and thirty thousand extra copies for distribution by that Department, with the engravings interspersed throughout the volumes in their proper places; and that five hundred copies shall be printed for the use of said Department on fifty-six pound paper.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question, so that I may move an amendment.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I move to reduce the number of copies to be distributed by the Department of Agriculture to ten thousand.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan, demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 40.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IDAHO.

Mr. CRAVENS. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Territories House bill No. 486, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho."

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate has passed, without amendment, an act (H. R. No. 455) to punish and prevent the counterfeiting of coin of the United States.

Also, an act (H. R. No. 293) to provide for the payment of the third regiment, third brigade, Ohio volunteer militia, during the time they were mustered into the service of the United States.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy the attention of the House but a few moments. I regret to detain the House by a matter personal to myself, and there is nothing I so much deprecate as a difficulty between members, and especially between members of so small a family as that of the delegation upon this floor from Ohio. However, from what occurred here last evening, I deem it a duty to myself and to truth to make a personal explanation.

It may have been observed that I displayed unusual earnestness and perhaps some heat in my remarks on the bankrupt bill last evening; and in order to set myself right before the House in regard to the whole matter I wish to have read a letter which will in part explain the reason of my earnestness. In the first place, I ask the Clerk to read a slip which was inclosed in the letter to which I refer, and which will serve as a part of the history of the transaction. The slip is an advertisement cut from one of the leading dailies of the city of Cleveland a short time after my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] moved the appointment for the select committee on bankruptcy.

The Clerk read the slip, which was as follows:

"BANKRUPT LAW.—Persons who are desirous that a bankrupt law should pass the present session of Congress, and are willing to aid in the matter, will confer a favor by addressing W. C., Post Office, Cleveland, Ohio, when further information will be given."

"CLEVELAND, January 22, 1864."

Mr. GARFIELD. It appears that an insolvent debtor, seeing the advertisement, addressed a letter to "W. C." asking for further information, and the letter I now desire to have read is in response.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

ASHLAND, OHIO, January 27, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Your letter to W. C. was forwarded to me here. Although I do business in Cleveland, my family live here. There has been formed a General Bankrupt Association, headquarters in New York. I have been appointed by the association to correspond, &c., in Ohio; and am devoting my time to it free of charge. The executive committee is now in Washington looking to the matter; they find it necessary to secure the influence of influential persons to aid in the matter. They require about three or four thousand dollars at once to pay expenses, &c., at Washington. Men are generally paying from five to twenty dollars for this object. Also, I inclose you a blank note to be filled up payable only if the law is passed. It will require $20,000. The notes are filled up from fifty to five hundred dollars. Now if you will aid in the matter fill up the note and inclose to me with such an amount of money as you can, and send it to me here as soon as possible.

I am well known in Cleveland. You can ask most any one about me. Will see you personally when next in the city; but the matter engrosses all my attention at present. The secretary writes me everything looks encouraging, and with the means, they will put the law through. We must aid in the matter and push it through this session. Please reply at once.

Yours, in haste,

P. S.—My business place in the spring and summer is at 31 Superior street.

A. F. WHITMAN, Esq.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the Clerk now read the printed blank which accompanied the letter? The Clerk read, as follows:

Thirty days after the passage of a general bankrupt law by Congress I promise to pay to the order of the treasurer of the National Bankrupt Association the sum of _____ dollars, payable at _____.

Mr. GARFIELD. That letter and its inclosure were in answer to the queries of the gentleman to whom it was addressed. He is a resident of Cleveland; and though I am not personally acquainted with him, he sent the letter to me as a member of this House, with an indorsement which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the indorsement, as follows:

CLEVELAND, Ohio, January 31, 1864.

DEAR SIR: A man of your discernment will comprehend at once my opinion of this document. If it is just that such a law be passed, and it really be needed, are we poor insolvents obliged to lobby and pay law-makers to do us justice? Thousands and maybe millions of good honest men are in the same fix as your humble servant—the effect of the panic of 1857. Must we always remain under the harrow? I, for one, am not able to buy justice. Let it be done, and given freely.

Respectfully,

General GARFIELD.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I received that communication in the early part of February, a short time after the committee was appointed upon the motion of my colleague from the Cleveland district, [Mr. SPALDING.] I laid the letter away, intending—in consequence of the imputation it contained that Congress was being manipulated by outside parties—to give the bill a careful consideration when it came up, and do what I could to guard its provisions against fraud. I have therefore given it a more careful study than any other one with which I have not been connected as a committee-man, and I had intended to speak on the whole subject, but the great pressure of duties in connection with the Treasury Department investigation prevented me.

When I came into the House last evening and found that the bill, on which but one speech had been made, and that one in its favor, was about to be put through under the pressure of the previous question, I called upon a member of the committee and suggested several amendments in the details of the bill, which I requested to have considered and adopted, or I could not vote for the bill at all. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] told me that the amendments should be made as suggested. I believe they were made. I heard at least one of them introduced and adopted last evening.

Under all the circumstances, with this gross imputation hanging over the House of Representatives, I felt very earnestly indeed the necessity of postponing the matter, and therefore asked leave to speak, and did speak earnestly. When taken off my feet by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES]—

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman certainly does not mean that I took him off the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I correct myself. When I understood myself to be taken off the floor by the gentleman from Rhode Island, I felt that it was an unfair interference with the freedom of debate upon that subject. But, understanding from himself and from the Speaker what he did and intended to do, I am satisfied I was incorrect in my impression of his action, and that he did nothing of which I had a right to complain, nothing of which I now complain; and here, in the presence of the House, I ask his pardon for having spoken severely in reference to what I thought an interference with my rights.

So much for that: I now refer to the other branch of the matter. I also said in the course of my remarks that I feared if this bill passed, the southern confederacy, which was $300,000,000 in debt to northern men, would reap a very large share of the benefit of it. I said it because I then believed, as I now believe, that the bill does not adequately provide that the estates of rebels in arms shall not escape the operations of the law. I made no personal reference whatever; I assailed no gentleman; I called no man's honor in question. My colleague from the Cleveland district [Mr. SPALDING] rose and asked if I had read the bill. I answered him, I believe, in courteous language and manner, that I had read it, and immediately on my statement to that effect he said in his place in the House, and it has gone on the record, that he did not believe I had read it; in other words, that he believed I had lied, in the presence of my peers in this House. I felt, under such circumstances, that it would not be becoming my self-respect or the respect I owe to the House to continue a colloquy with any gentleman who had thus impeached my veracity, and I said so.

It pains me very much that a gentleman of venerable age, who was in full maturity of life when I was a child, and whom I have respected since my childhood, should have taken occasion here in his place to use language so uncalled for, so ungenerous, so unjust to me, and disgraceful to himself. I have borne with the ill-nature and bad blood of that gentleman, as many others in this House have, out of respect to his years; but no impunity of age shall shield him or any man from my denunciation who is so lacking in the proprieties of this place as to be guilty of such parliamentary and personal indecency as the House has witnessed on his part. I had hoped that before this time he would have acknowledged to me the impropriety and unjustifiableness of his conduct and apologized for the insult. But he has not seen fit to take that course. I leave him to his own reflections, and his conduct to the judgment of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

No objection was made.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, without intimating an opinion in regard to the policy of throwing these sensational papers before the House and the country, I desire to say that I have never at any moment, in any place, or under any circumstances, had any knowledge of this combination or which the gentleman speaks in regard to the passage of a bankrupt law through this House. I knew nothing of that publication in the city of Cleveland, or of the correspondence produced here, and I think I do not know the person whose name has been mentioned here. I am entirely ignorant of that whole matter. No person from Cleveland, from New York, or from any quarter, has approached me from the commencement to the ending of this whole matter with anything in the shape of a promise of money, influence, or anything else to induce my action on this bankrupt bill. I say this, and I challenge the universal world to produce any evidence to the contrary. My own conscience acquits me of everything of the sort.

And now, in regard to any harsh or uncourteous treatment of my colleague, I have only to say that my colleague appeared in the House last evening exhibiting an unusual degree of temper, and when I ventured to ask him the question civilly whether he had read the bankrupt bill introduced into this House by the select committee, in order to know whether he had seen the prohibition against the benefits of that bill accruing to persons in rebellion against the Government, the gentleman answered me that he had read it. Well now, sir, without much reflection, I ventured to express a doubt whether he had read it. I said to the gentleman in the presence of the House that I doubted it. Well, sir, the gentleman took that doubt as an imputation upon his veracity. He gave it a wrong construction. The inference should have been not against the gentleman's veracity but against his competency to read and understand the bill. [Laughter.] I say, sir, that it was a mark of respect to the gentleman's intelligence, and I wish him to understand it in that sense. I never had any occasion to impugn the gentleman's veracity and I have not wished to do it. But I wish to declare here now that if the gentleman had read the bill carefully and still came to the conclusion which he stated here I cannot respect his intelligence; and it was out of the respect which I have always entertained for his intelligence that I made the statement which I did. That is all I have to say.

Mr. JENCKES. I understand that this matter is not regularly before the House, but that any discussion that is to take place must be by unanimous consent. I desire to say a word in explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JENCKES. I confess that I have been very much astonished to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] rise here and read anonymous extracts from newspapers and letters which are equally anonymous so far as this House is concerned—for the gentleman from Ohio does not pretend to vouch for their genuineness—in order to impeach the integrity of some one in the House. The particular direction at which it is pointed is not indicated.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to say that I did not impeach the integrity of any one.

Mr. JENCKES. Then I cannot imagine for what purpose the extract and letter were read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I read them simply for the reason that I desired to inform the House of the evidence I had in my possession of the existence of this money corporation outside of the House, with the view and design of getting this bill through the House. I was very careful not to impugn the motions of any gentleman here, and I did not do it.

Mr. JENCKES. Then the gentleman has read or caused to be read papers which are a slander upon the whole House.

Who in the House or in the country believes that any member of this select committee or of the House, who is profoundly convinced of the wisdom of a bankruptcy law, has ever sat upon a committee or reported a bill to the House or advocated a bill in the House under any "thirty days" influences or any other influences, unworthy or corrupt in their nature? Sir, it is simply giving encouragement to the horde of lobbyists who throng our doors, and whom we are continually thrusting behind us, and I am very sorry the gentleman from Ohio has seen fit in this or any way even to recognize their existence.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will do me the justice to say that I did not read an anonymous communication. The names are all appended.

Mr. JENCKES. I did not understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that he knew any gentleman whose name appears.

Mr. GARFIELD. The one who wrote me the letter is a prominent banker in the State of Ohio. And let me remark as a somewhat singular circumstance that the rich bankers and merchant-princes of New York are very desirous of the passage of this bill.

Mr. JENCKES. It seems the gentleman referred to is not.

Mr. GARFIELD. He is, and is an agent to procure its passage.

Mr. JENCKES. I did not so understand the letter.

Mr. GARFIELD. The letter itself is from the banker. The comment upon the letter from this agent is by the insolvent debtor who desired to avail himself of the benefit of the law, but objected to having to pay for it.

Mr. JENCKES. Still I do not learn the object of the gentleman from Ohio in introducing this correspondence here. It is a slander upon some one if not true, and if the facts are true some one should be arraigned. If they are not true, and the name of no member is indicated, then it is a slander on the whole House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to repeat that I introduced these communications simply for the purpose of placing the House in possession of the information I had in my possession in reference to the existence of a money association having for its object the influencing of the passage of this bill.

Mr. JENCKES. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope that hereafter the gentleman from Ohio will be very careful in investigating the correspondence which he presents to this House, for this is not the first time he has arraigned persons out of the House, at least, here, upon correspondence which on investigation would not stand the test of investigation.

Now, I challenge him, and I challenge the country and the world, to show one single instance, to produce one single individual, who has ever had communication with this committee of this House in reference to this law, except for the public good, without regard to private interests. If such a man lives, let the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] produce him.

Mr. Speaker, one word further on this matter of personal explanation. The gentleman from Ohio has said that last evening he was instigated by this correspondence to make the remarks that he did. I submitted to him then, and I submit to him now, that if he wishes in this age of the world to come before the American Congress, the Legislature of a civilized nation, and undertake to argue that a bankrupt law is not politic, I am willing to meet him. I want to hear such an argument from a man who claims to be a statesman. If the House will set apart a day for those to be heard who oppose this bill on principle, there are those who will meet them; but, sir, I will not yield any time, not an hour or a minute, for those who get off mere declamation, or make opposition to the measure, based upon newspaper paragraphs or anonymous correspondence. When the bill is up regularly I shall have something further to say.

WAR NEWS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter of the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, June 4, 10 a. m.

Sir: Dispatches from General Grant's headquarters, dated three o'clock yesterday afternoon, have been received. No operations took place on Thursday. Yesterday morning at half past four o'clock General Grant made an assault on the enemy's lines, of which he makes the following report:

"We assaulted at half past four this morning, driving the enemy within his intrenchments at all points, but without gaining any decisive advantage. Our troops now occupy a position close to the enemy, some places within fifty yards, and are remaining. Our loss was not severe, nor do I suppose the enemy to have lost heavily. We captured over three hundred prisoners, mostly from Breckinridge."

Another later official report (not from General Grant) estimates the number of our killed and wounded at about three thousand.

The following officers are among the killed: Colonel Haskell, thirty-sixth Wisconsin; Colonel Porter, eighth New York heavy artillery; Colonel Morris, sixty-sixth New York.

Among the wounded are General R. O. Tyler, seriously; will probably lose a foot. Colonel McMahon, one hundred and sixty-fourth New York; Colonel Byrnes, twenty-eighth Massachusetts, probably mortally. Colonel Brooks, fifty-third Pennsylvania.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. SMITH. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask my colleague whether this adjournment is not for the purpose of permitting gentlemen on the other side to attend the Baltimore convention which meets early next week?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 90.

So the motion was disagreed to.

GOLD BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tariff bill.

Mr. HOOPER. Is not the gold bill the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. It was, but the motion to go into committee takes precedence. If the previous question had been called on the gold bill last evening it would have been first to be considered.

BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. ELIOT. If there be no objection, I will make a statement. This day, after the morning hour, was set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Commerce. It is very evident that the whole of this day will be consumed with the tariff bill, and I therefore ask the House to postpone the reports from the Committee on Commerce to the third day after the day on which the tariff bill may be disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. The two days after the tariff bill shall have been disposed of have already been assigned, and the case of Knox vs. Blair has been postponed for one week. I hope the House will not assign away further time next week so as to cut out the case of Knox vs. Blair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not insist on his objection to the proposition of my colleague on the Committee on Commerce. There is one bill which that committee has to report to prevent smuggling, that will not take an hour to pass.

The SPEAKER. The question of privilege from the Committee of Elections would not override the designation of a day by the House as a special order, although it would override the reports of committees in the morning hour.

Mr. DAWES. I know that, and have therefore called attention to the facts; but, as I understand that the Committee on Commerce will not occupy more than an hour or two, I will not object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object if the day does not fall on Friday, as I want that day to be devoted to the consideration of the Private Calendar. With that understanding I do not object to the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. ELIOT. I agree to that understanding also. There being no further objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The question then recurred on Mr. MORRILL's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of

THE TARIFF BILL.

The Clerk read, as follows:

On acetate or pyrolignite of ammonia, 70 cents per pound; of baryta, 40 cents per pound; of copper, iron, strontia, and zinc, 50 cents per pound; of lead, 30 cents per pound; of magnesia and soda, 50 cents per pound.

Mr. MORRILL moved to strike out the word "copper," and to strike out "thirty" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I move to amend the eleventh section by adding, in the seventeenth line, 29th page, the following items:

Benzoic acid, 30 cents per ounce; balsam copaiva, $3 per pound; aloes, 30 cents per pound; asafetida, 60 cents per pound; tonqua beans, $1 per pound.

Mr. BROOKS. I should like to have some explanation of the amendment.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. The items have been submitted to members of the Committee of Ways and Means, and, I understand, have met with their approval.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee of Ways and Means does not profess to know much about this matter; but as the gentleman from New York seems to be a competent judge, we are willing to leave it to him and the Committee of the Whole to be disposed of as may appear proper.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I have offered the amendment at this point that the items of the same character may come in in alphabetical order. I have informed myself fully on the point, and am satisfied that the amount of the duty proposed in the amendment shall be imposed. It will be for the benefit of the Government and will work no injury to any one.

Mr. BROOKS. The first reason given by the gentleman is that his amendment is in alphabetical order. I think he is in error in that, because it begins with benzoic acid, before it gets to aloes or balsam. In the next place I wish to state that unless there be some formal explanation of it, or some investigation, I am loth to assent to amendments so suddenly prepared. On the other side of the House they only allow one honorable gentleman to make a tariff—and that is the honorable gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] On this side of the House we follow their lead. Unless the honorable gentleman from Vermont rallies his side of the House—"up, boys, and vote"—for these particular items, we on this side are loth to go for it. I am opposed to this large tax on aloes and asafetida and other drugs, without any report or examination and without any statistics in regard to the imports, and without elaborate discussion.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to amend the eleventh section, page 29, line twenty-one, by increasing $6 to $12, so as to make the paragraph read, "on brimstone crude, $12 per ton."

Mr. THAYER. I hope the committee will not adopt that amendment. The article on which the gentleman recommends this very great advance of duty is the foundation of all the chemical industry of this country. The duty heretofore has been $3 per ton. It is proposed in the bill to advance that to $6—doubling the former duty—and it is proposed by the amendment now offered to increase that to $12, quadrupling the present duty. This duty is not, of course, for protection, for the article is not produced in this country. It will fall very heavily upon those engaged in chemical manufactures. There are in my district a large number of persons interested in that branch of industry. We must remember also that all manufacturers have been subjected by the recent internal revenue law to an advance of 2 per cent. on the gross amount of their sales. Besides, sir, there is not proposed in this bill any counterpoise to the immense tax proposed to be laid on brimstone, in the shape of duties on articles into the manufacture of which that article enters. I hope the committee will not quadruple the present duty. I had intended to move an amendment reducing the duty on brimstone from $6 to $3 per ton. I believe, from information which I have received from gentlemen engaged in chemical manufactures, of which this article constitutes the basis, that the present duty is as large, coupled with the additional taxation imposed by the revenue bill, as should be imposed upon it. I believe that the doubling of it, as proposed in the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, would be laying an unequal burden on that branch of industry; and the proposition to quadruple it would, in my opinion, be a gross injustice. I hope, therefore, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont will be rejected.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say a few words in support of the amendment, and to acquaint my friend from Pennsylvania with the reason for it. I think he cannot be fully acquainted with the matter, or his action would be the reverse of what it now is.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be necessary for the gentleman to propose an amendment to the amendment, as debate is exhausted.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend the amendment by making the duty on brimstone two cents per pound. According to the latest commercial statistics about forty million pounds of brimstone are annually imported into this country. It is also used in the manufacture of powder, but not by any means to the largest extent. Only twelve per cent. of the ingredients of powder is brimstone. Eight pounds of powder contain about one pound of brimstone. It is also used in the manufacture of the oil of vitriol, of which large amounts are manufactured. I have taken pains to inquire of one of the manufacturers of vitriol, who, by the way, happens to be a member of this House, and he told me that a tax of three cents a pound upon crude brimstone would affect the price of the oil of vitriol to the amount of one cent per pound only.

But I must be short, as my health will not permit me to speak at length. Let me therefore say in brief that the investigations I have made and the information I have received from parties interested and disinterested lead me to the conclusion that no duty you can impose upon an imported article will be felt so lightly by the consuming interests of the country as the proposed duty upon brimstone. And although I have said two cents per pound, I really believe the article will bear it better than many articles in the bill will bear the rates you have put upon them.

The protection to manufactures we have made most emphatic. We have almost lost sight in this bill, in some respects, of the consumers. It does not lie in the mouth of the manufacturer to come here and say that a tax like this does injustice to them. Let us raise our revenue as far as possible from those things consumed by individual consumers in small amounts, instead of putting it where the consumption is large and the tax largely felt. It is upon that principle that I advocate this amendment.

I say now that the recommendation of the committee, in my judgment, is too small. I, however, stand by the action of the committee at this time. A duty of 1 cent per pound, amounting to $20 a ton, would not have an appreciable effect upon the price of articles manufactured out of the article of brimstone. I hope no change will be made in the way of reduction; if any is made it should be in the way of increase. I say again that manufacturers are largely protected and fully cared for, and they consume very small quantities of those articles which we have largely protected.

Mr. MORRILL. This is perhaps the only article in which my immediate constituents or townsmen are directly interested. In my own town there is an immense quantity of sulphate of iron, which, if this duty should be put upon brimstone, would be of incalculable value. I was willing, before the action of the Committee of Ways and Means, that it should not have a protection beyond the extent of $6 per ton. I think my friend from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] is somewhat mistaken as to the extent to which this article is used in various chemicals. If the duty should be raised even as high as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, and much more if raised to the extent proposed by the gentleman's amendment, it would raise very much the price of many articles now manufactured by our chemists, so much so that it would be impossible hereafter to produce them. At the present moment the United States are very large consumers of brimstone, as it enters largely into the composition of gunpowder. It also enters into the business of manufacturers in various ways. The first draft of the bill doubles the duty and the amendment offered in behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means quadruples it.

I will not discuss the matter further, but leave it to the committee to decide.

Mr. KASSON. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont, by striking out "twelve" and inserting "three." I must be allowed, sir, to say that the gentleman from Iowa, when he talks about protecting manufacturers, and in the same breath advocates such a burden upon one of the most important of those interests as that which he has just proposed, falls into a great inconsistency. Let him tell us what other articles are taxed as he proposes by his amendment to tax this article—at the rate of one hundred per cent. Before he sat down I believe he said he would advocate a duty of one cent a pound, which would be a tax of two hundred per cent. Now, sir, is that a scale of duties which has heretofore been applied by Congress to raw materials not produced in this country, entering largely into the industry of the country, and not in the list of luxuries?

The gentleman's last proposition is to lay a duty of two hundred per cent. upon an article not produced in this country, which forms the basis of all the chemical industry of the country, and that when there is not in the bill a single counterpoise, or a single correlative advantage in favor of the manufacturers of the articles into which brimstone enters as a constituent.

Sir, the injustice as well as the folly of such a proposition as that, it seems to me, must be self-evident. I do not know why the House should go out of its way to impose an unusual and unequal tax upon this branch of industry—a tax which will be a heavier burden upon it than any which has been laid upon any other manufacturing interest. I do not see, sir, why any particular discrimination should be made against the manufacturers of chemicals in adjusting this tariff. If the House adopts a rate of duty on this article proportioned to the other rates of duty imposed upon foreign raw materials used by manufacturers, it will be a rate with which this interest will be perfectly satisfied, and with which I think everybody should be satisfied. I see no reason why an exception to the ordinary rate which is adopted should be made against this interest of the manufacturers of chemicals.

Mr. Chairman, in looking over the provisions of this bill I am obliged to say that I have felt some surprise at some of its features, and I have been equally surprised at some of its omissions. I observe, for instance, that there is no tax imposed anywhere on soda in any of its shapes; and yet in this very bill there is a prohibitory duty imposed upon glass and soap—articles in the manufacture of which soda is principally used. Is the Government entitled to no compensation for the prohibition of glass and soap, in the shape of a small duty on soda?

Mr. MORRILL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. We have not increased the duties very much on glass, and on some articles of glass there is no increase at all.

Mr. THAYER. It is increased nearly fifty per cent.

Mr. MORRILL. The glass manufacturers in the gentleman's neighborhood are claiming that we are going to ruin them, because they have not sufficient protection.

Mr. THAYER. I am not aware that there are many glass manufacturers in my district.

Mr. MORRILL. There are in New Jersey.

Mr. THAYER. I would say to the gentleman that I do not live in the State of New Jersey, and if I did I would not ask for what is unjust; but gentlemen from that State can speak for its interests. I am informed, by gentlemen in whose knowledge upon this subject I have great confidence, that a small duty on soda in its various forms would add to the revenue $1,000,000. Yet the Committee of Ways and Means have put a prohibitory duty on glass and soap, and have not put a cent of duty on soda into their new bill. But, nevertheless, they wish to discriminate against one of the great interests of the country by putting on a duty of $12 per ton on brimstone, where the duty has heretofore been but $3; and if the House should adopt the idea of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] who speaks of protecting manufacturers, they would put on it a duty of 200 per cent.

I will not take up the time of the committee further; but it seems to me, sir, that both of these propositions are unjust. I feel that they are unjust to a large industrial interest of a portion of my constituents. I trust, therefore, that the committee will adopt the amendment which I have proposed; but if they do not agree to that, I hope they will vote down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont, and leave the duty as it was originally reported in the bill.

Mr. KASSON. A single word in reply to the gentleman. The price of this article in the market is now about $70 per ton; and this is only a tax of 20 per cent. ad valorem. In regard to the article of soda, to which the gentleman refers, I think he is right in saying that a tax ought to be imposed upon it.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment.

Mr. FENTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. THAYER and FENTON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. On page 29 I move to insert after line twenty-two the following:

On castor beans or seeds, 60 cents per bushel of fifty pounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move to insert the following:

On cassia, 25 cents per pound; on ground cassia, 6 cents per pound; on cinnamon, 40 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I move to increase the duty on chicory from 5 cents to 10 cents per pound. I believe it is imported for the express purpose of adulterating coffee, and I can see no reason why it should be admitted at the same rate of duty as coffee. I hope we shall not encourage the use or growth of it. I look forward to the day as not being far distant when we shall be able to import coffee duty free; and I do not want to commence the practice of adulterating coffee, which is so universally practiced in every part of the world. It is almost impossible in England to get a cup of good coffee. Half or two thirds of what is used as coffee is chicory. I have drank some of it there myself and know something about it. I hope Congress will do nothing to encourage the adulteration of coffee, a drink which has become so general; and I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I believe the almost universal testimony is that chicory is at least a harmless article. Some contend that it is even healthful; and many contend that it improves the flavor of coffee. That is a question of taste upon which I give no opinion. I know it is generally used for that purpose, as well as to cheapen the article. If we leave the duty as it is proposed we shall have a large amount of revenue; and I think the duty recommended is sufficient protection for the dandelion roots of Michigan or of my own State.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to amend by inserting after line twenty-four "on pepper, allspice, ginger, cloves, and all other spices, a duty of 25 cents per pound." I have looked over this bill and I find no additional duty on spices recommended.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that the Committee of Ways and Means intend to offer in the proper place, an amendment which will cover spices.

Mr. DRIGGS. If the gentleman will offer such an amendment to come in at the proper place I have no objection. I see no reason why these articles should be exempted from additional duty.

Mr. MORRILL. I will do so.

Mr. DRIGGS. I withdraw my amendment on the promise of the gentleman from Vermont to introduce an additional clause covering the duty on spices.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend, by inserting after line thirty, page 29, "fusil oil, or amylic alcohol, $2 per gallon."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend, by inserting after line twenty-four, page 29, "on cloves, 40 cents per pound."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend, by inserting after line twenty-two, page 29, the following: On bristles, 15 cents per pound; on hogs' hair, 1 cent per pound; on isle or Tampico fiber, 1 cent per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend, by inserting after the last amendment, "on brushes of all kinds 40 per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend, by inserting, on line thirty-four, page 30, after the word "red" the words "and litharge;" so as to make the paragraph read:

On lead, white or red, and litharge, dry or ground in oil, 3 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by inserting after line forty-two, page 30, "on nutmegs, 75 cents per pound; mace, 50 cents per pound."

Mr. HOOPER. I hope the amendments increasing the duties on spices will not be adopted. The quantity of these articles imported is not very large except of pepper and pimento; and it seems to me that such extravagant duties must lead to an increased trade with the Canadas; that our supply of these articles will come in across the Canada line; with the proposed increase of duty they will be so large in value and so small in bulk that great inducement is held out for smuggling them. The cost of mace is about 23 cents per pound, and of nutmegs about 30 cents; the addition of this duty will make the price of these articles about $1 per pound. So heavy a duty upon them will only encourage a smuggling trade with the Canadas, and will not increase the revenues of the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend in line forty-four, page 30, by inserting after the word "gallon" the words "castor oil, $1 per gallon."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line forty-five, same page, I move to amend so as to make "onanthic ether" read "anathic ether."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the forty-sixth line of the same section by adding the following:

Peanuts, or ground beans, 4 cents per pound; shelled, 6 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by inserting the following, to come in before line forty-seven, same section:

On pimento, black, white, red, or cayenne pepper, 20 cents per pound; on ground pimento, or pepper of all kinds, 25 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to insert after line forty-two the words "on nitrate of lead, 30 per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to insert in line fifty-one, page 30, "on santoline, $2 50 per pound."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. In line forty-seven, page 30, I notice a duty of ten cents per gallon on crude petroleum and coal illuminating oil. Now I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont whether any tax at all is imposed by the internal revenue bill on these crude oils.

Mr. MORRILL. None at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. The effect of the bill, then, in this respect is to prohibit the importation of this article, which is produced to a very large extent in the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia. Inasmuch as the oil merely boils out of the earth and is produced so cheaply, I take it for granted that a duty of ten cents per gallon would prove entirely prohibitory upon any importation of the raw material. And as this oil is used by all classes of people of this country in the production of light, and it is an article of prime necessity, particularly in view of the fact that the price of petroleum is rapidly increasing, it seems to me unwise that we should fix a duty upon this raw material.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that no remarks are in order unless he moves an amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out from the bill as follows:

On petroleum and coal illuminating oil, crude, 10 cents per gallon.

Now, sir, here is a provision imposing a duty of 30 cents per gallon on refined coal oil, which of course is absolutely prohibitory. When the oil is obtained at so little cost and is easily refined, it is beyond doubt impossible ever to import a gallon with a duty of 30 cents per gallon, and the duty of 10 cents on the crude oil will also prove prohibitory; so that as far as this article is concerned it destroys the argument that this bill is a bill for revenue, for you cannot obtain revenue to the extent of one cent so far as coal oil is concerned. In behalf of the interest of the great mass of the people of the country, therefore, I object to this duty upon crude illuminating coal oil.

I desire to say, also, in the same connection, that this is an article which is exported from this country to a very large extent; so that if this duty is to be levied a drawback must be provided for. It does seem to me that the peculiar interests of Pennsylvania are sufficiently protected by this bill, and in respect to these articles of domestic production which are obtained so cheaply, and the price to the consumer of which is so rapidly rising, we are not called on in this manner to increase the fortunes of the men who have made them, not in regular business transactions, but from their fortunate discoveries of oil.

Mr. MORRILL. I presume the gentleman from Indiana is not yet satisfied with the reciprocity treaty, and wants to give the Canadas a little further advantage. I do not expect, Mr. Chairman, that the Government will derive much revenue from the importation of this article, whatever may be the rates of duty. So far as I am concerned, I do not object to reducing the duty to 5 cents a gallon, nor do I care particularly if the duty is excluded altogether. The kind of coal oil produced in Canada is a much inferior article to that which is produced in this country; it makes a much poorer light, has a more offensive odor, and cannot come into competition with American petroleum to any considerable extent, with or without duty. But gentlemen must recollect that this article can be produced from Nova Scotia coal, and that it can be brought in here in any quantity. I take it for granted, therefore, that there should be some duty placed upon it, and I hope that some duty will be imposed upon it.

Mr. A. MYERS. I move to make it "15 cents." The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Hol-

MAN] says that the price of petroleum is going up rapidly. Very likely that is true. If that be true it is important we should have some tariff on that which may come in from other countries, although it may be as bad smelling as that from Canada. The pretty high price may induce that garlicky stuff to come over and offend the nostrils of our loyal people, and I think that there should be some tariff on this article. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] has hit the nail on the head. In the British provinces they have coal lands and they can manufacture oil at a low rate. For these reasons I think that the duty is not a cent too high. I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to strike out "10," and insert "5."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL moved to insert the following:

On salt in sacks, barrels, or other packages, 25 cents per hundred pounds.

On salt in bulk, 20 cents per hundred pounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

1. On annatto seed, extract of annatto, aniline, crude barites, nitrate of, clifstone, carmined, indigo, extract of safflower, finishing powder, gold size and patent size, nickel, cobalt, oxyd of cobalt, smalt, and zaffre, 20 per cent. ad valorem; terra alba and washing crystals, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MORRILL moved to insert after the word "indigo" these words, "crude pica."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

2. On alumen, asbestos, asphaltum, crocus colocottra, bone or ivory drop black, murexide, rose red, ultramarine, Indian red, and Spanish brown, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MORRILL moved to insert after the words "crocus colocottra" the words "blue or Roman vitriol, sulphate of copper."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THAYER. I move to strike out the words "nickel, cobalt, oxyd of cobalt" in the preceding paragraph, and to add the words "on nickel, cobalt, and oxyd of cobalt, 50 per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. Chairman, the business of manufacturing nickel, cobalt, and oxyd of cobalt, is entirely a new one in this country. Until recently these metals have not been produced in this country at all. Latterly, however, and before the passage of the law repealing the nickel coinage, manufacturers in my State in some localities had entered very largely into the business of extracting nickel from the ore, a difficult, nice, and expensive process; and having invested in that business a pretty large sum of money, I think that they ought to be encouraged. The manufacture will be broken up unless this duty is imposed, for then every pound of these articles will be imported from abroad. I hope that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, no such duties are proposed on any other article in this bill. It is particularly objectionable so far as nickel is concerned. Nickel has heretofore only borne a duty of 10 per cent. It is largely used in the manufacture of German silver and argentane, and if the amendment be adopted it will be destructive of that manufacture. I hope that the House will not make the duty so high in this instance.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the amendment so as to make it 51 per cent., and I do so for the purpose of saying a word. I hope that the duty on nickel will be increased. By doing away with the nickel coin these nickel miners have lost their chief customer, and unless this interest is protected these nickel mines will fail. I hope, therefore, that my colleague's amendment will be adopted. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. If this nickel manufacture could be sustained under a duty of 10 per cent. with the United States as a customer, I think it can be sustained with 20 per cent. duty without the United States as a customer. Although I voted against the change in the ingredients of the smaller coin of the country, I am not willing to vote this as a compensation, because we do not use nickel any longer in our coinage. I think it would be extravagant, and I trust we shall not vote for it. There is but one establishment in this country, so far as I am informed, that produces this article, and while I am willing to do ample justice to that establishment, I think that to increase the duty beyond twice what it is now would be going a little too far.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WARD. I move to amend on page 31, line sixty, by reducing the duty on oxyd of zinc, dry or ground in oil, from 2½ cents per pound to 1 cent. My reasons are that the duty proposed by the bill is 57 per cent. ad valorem, an increase of nearly 300 per cent. over that levied under the bill for 1861. This would make the price of the oxyd of zinc 11.34 cents per pound in the present currency, while the current price or quotation of the day for American zinc is from 6½ to 7½ cents. The Belgian zinc will therefore, at a duty of 25 per cent., be 70 per cent. higher than the American. Therefore there will be no injurious competition, and a revenue will be derived from this source. But if the proposed duty of 2½ cents be imposed, no importation will exist, and of course there will be no revenue to the Government. My impression is that this rate is entirely too high, and that there is danger it will amount to a prohibition. I have moved to reduce it to 1 cent per pound, but I would accept 1½ cent.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will say 2 cents, perhaps that will be a sufficient duty.

Mr. WARD. I will modify my amendment and make it 2 cents.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to insert after line sixty, page 31, the following:

On articles not otherwise provided for, made of gold, silver, German silver, or platinum, or of which either of those metals shall be a component part, 40 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to insert after the last amendment, "on watches, gold or silver, 25 per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman suppose that valuable gold watches will stand so high a duty? Who is going to buy such watches in New York when he can buy them so much cheaper just across the line?

Mr. MORRILL. I know the wonderful facilities there are for smuggling these articles, and the great temptation. I doubt very much whether we can obtain any more revenue from them at this rate than we do under a duty of 20 per cent., which is the present rate. But it was the vote of the committee that we should raise it. We shall collect 5 per cent. internal duties of American manufacturers of watches, and it is theoretically fair to increase the tariff to that extent.

Mr. BROOKS. I am sure it will not yield any more revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to insert after the last amendment the following:

On wood pencils filled with lead or other materials, 50 cents per gross, and in addition thereto 25 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend section twelve by striking out of line three the word "50" and inserting "75" in lieu thereof, so as to make the duty on the articles mentioned in that section 75 per cent.

On a division, no quorum voting.

Mr. PRICE withdrew the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend on page 31, in line seven, by striking out "artificial flowers" and inserting "artificial and ornamental feathers and flowers, or parts thereof," so as to bring all those articles into the list of articles paying 50 per cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to amend by inserting after the word "ginger," in line nine of section twelve, the words "crude, ground," so as to subject ginger in that state to the same tax that we impose upon preserved or pickled ginger.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose the gentleman's object is to obtain more revenue from the article; but by his amendment we should not get half as much as we now get.

Mr. DRIGGS. Then I understand the duty on this crude and ground ginger is not changed at all.

Mr. MORRILL. If this bill is passed there will remain a specific duty on it under existing laws, though not maintained in the present bill.

Mr. DRIGGS. I thought as we were raising additional duties on spices we ought not to forget that article, but under the gentleman's statement I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to insert on page 32, after the word "statuary," in line twenty-nine, the words "brocatella, sienna, and verde antique," and to insert in line thirty, after the word "foot," the words "and in addition thereto 25 per cent. ad valorem;" so that the clause will read:

On marble, white statuary; brocatella, sienna, and verde antique, in block, rough or squared, $1 25 per cubic foot, and in addition thereto 25 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In line thirty-two I move to strike out "75" and insert "50;" so that the clause will read:

On veined marble and marble of all other descriptions, not otherwise provided for, in block, rough or squared, 50 cents per cubic foot, and in addition thereto 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. GOOCH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont his reason for increasing the duty upon marble to the extent proposed by the amendment which he now proposes?

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts asks that question for the purpose of basing an argument upon it, and not because he is ignorant of the purpose.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask the question in good faith.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course, I understand that. The main object is to increase the revenue. Under an ad valorem system the importation of marble, although it sells here for from one to four dollars per cubic foot, I am informed it can be invoiced at any price the importers may please, and if the duty is an ad valorem one they will pay comparatively nothing; and I will say to the gentleman that the various interests engaged in this business are entirely satisfied with this proposition of the committee, both those who import and those who have quarries. This will certainly secure to the Government, on the marble imported of this character, 50 cents per cubic foot, and a small ad valorem duty. I am informed that marble is invoiced at 64 cents a square foot which sells here at a very much higher price.

Mr. GOOCH. I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, and I intend to move to reduce the duty still farther. By the last act, that of 1863, the duty on the better qualities of marble was 75 cents per cubic foot, and upon marble of all descriptions, not otherwise provided for, 40 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not opposing my amendment but arguing in favor of it; that is, of a reduction.

Mr. GOOCH. I am opposed to the amendment in the form in which it is. I am opposed to the House changing the rate from 75 cents to 50 cents, because I think another and different change should be made. I am, therefore, opposed to it; and I move, as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out all after the word "squared," in the thirty-second line, down to the word "thereto," and to insert in lieu thereof "80 per cent.;" so as to make the duty 80 per cent. ad valorem.

I think this is a proposition which should satisfy everybody. We propose now to double the amount of duty on marble, and that I think should satisfy those who are engaged in the marble interest in this country. I believe that the duty in the form in which it is proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means will virtually be prohibition and will not give us any revenue at all from marble. As the bill was originally reported, the tax was from a hundred and forty to a hundred and fifty per cent. on the value of the article, and was designed, it seems to me, to prohibit the importation of marble instead of being designed to regulate it and give us a revenue from it, and it was for that reason that I asked the gentleman from Vermont the reason why this duty was proposed.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I certainly hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will not prevail. There is no member on the floor of the House whose constituency is so deeply interested in this question as myself. Almost all the marble of the country, certainly all the fine marble, so far as I know, is quarried within my district. It is known, or should be known, to members of this House, that the Italian marble quarries are owned by importers, that the cost of labor amounts to but a mere trifle in that country, and that the freight is very low, as the marble is brought in ships from the Mediterranean in ballast.

My wish was—and I should have deemed it just to the Government, and a wise measure, as far as revenue is concerned—to have raised the specific duty to 75 cents, and 20 per cent. ad valorem in addition thereto. But a good deal of feeling existed in regard to the matter; and after the report of the committee came in, providing for those rates, the representatives of the importers of Italian marble came here, and, on consultation held between that interest and the interest which I represent, they came to the conclusion that the amendment, as proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, would be satisfactory to all parties. The gentlemen representing the quarried marble interest would be perfectly willing to have 100 or 125 per cent. ad valorem duty imposed, because the article is invoiced at just such price as they see fit to invoice it at, as they are the owners of the quarries. It has been invoiced at 64 cents a cubic foot. Should it become necessary, under an ad valorem duty, it could just as well be invoiced at 40 cents. The importers know this, and have sought to retain an ad valorem rather than a specific duty, to which the representatives of the marble interests of this country most seriously object.

For the sake of giving a due and proper protection to the marble interest of this country, to these importers of foreign marble, the representatives of both interests got together and agreed upon the rates reported by the gentleman from Vermont in his amendment; that is, a specific duty of 50 cents per cubic foot instead of 75 cents. The importers say that under that duty their business can still be carried on. The representatives of the marble interest in this country, though not entirely satisfied with that, came to the conclusion not to object to that, and signified their views to the member of the Committee of Ways and Means, my colleague, [Mr. MORRILL.] In accordance with that agreement made by these two interests, fully and fairly represented, it was concluded that both interests would accept the 50 cents duty as provided in the amendment offered by my colleague. While I do not think it is enough, while I do not think it protects the labor of the country, the cost of which has increased within the last three years nearly if not quite 75 per cent., yet I am willing, under all the circumstances, to go for the amendment as proposed by my colleague, and I hope it will be agreed to. In my judgment it is not too high a duty, but is rather too small. Had I my own way I certainly would propose the duty as first proposed, 75 instead of 50 cents per cubic foot. But I am bound in honor to agree to the rate of 50 cents, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GOOCH. I move to amend the amendment so as to make it 40 instead of 50 cents per cubic foot.

Mr. Chairman, I do not understand this matter precisely as it is understood by the gentleman from Vermont who spoke last. I do not understand that the marble manufacturers of this country are satisfied to accept this provision as it is now proposed to amend it by the Committee of Ways and Means. I understand that the question which was submitted to them was whether they would have 50 cents or 75 cents per foot, and of course they would take 50 cents rather than 75.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say a word in explanation.

Mr. GOOCH. I will if it does not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. GOOCH. Then I cannot yield. I apprehend that very few parties who are affected by this change have been here. I have heard of only two or three who have been here at all in connection with this matter, and the proposition before them was simply between 50 and 75 cents per foot. But I understand from men who have not been here at all that they are opposed to this legislation. They cannot understand why a duty of 144 per cent. should be imposed upon the article of marble, when it is in conflict with the general principles which have been observed in the imposition of duties upon other articles. They are at a loss to see why this particular article should be selected and made to pay a duty of 144 per cent., as the clause in the original bill provided.

The committee now propose to strike out 75 and insert 50 cents per foot, leaving a duty of more than 100 per cent. on the article of marble.

Now, sir, it seems to me that there must have been some other object in view in the framing of this bill than merely the raising of revenue. I can understand very well why the gentleman before me [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] is in favor of the highest duty named. He states his reason very frankly—if no marble was imported the value of Vermont marble would be increased and the interests of his constituents would be promoted. That is true, but should we increase the revenue of the Government by it? The very argument shows that it is not revenue but protection that was sought in framing this bill. I protest against a protection of over 100 per cent. on the article of marble although it may be beneficial to the State of Vermont or any other State in this Union.

It is true, as the gentleman says, that the invoices of this marble are at the rate of 65 cents per cubic foot, but nobody objects that that is not a fair price. The gentleman says that it may as well be invoiced at 40 cents per cubic foot. It has not been done, it has been invoiced at 65 cents, which is conceded to be a fair price; and it will continue to be invoiced at the same price. If my amendment is adopted, and the ad valorem system continued, I think the 80 per cent. I have proposed is quite sufficient.

But, sir, the change which this bill proposes to make from ad valorem to specific duty will work a considerable disadvantage to the Government. If specific duties are adopted instead of ad valorem, the labor of the Government will be increased, and the expenses of the importer, in determining the amount of duty to be paid.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is clearly one of the provisions of this bill where the House should not follow the Committee of Ways and Means, but that we should bring down the rate of duty to some fair standard of increase, especially when we consider that while the committee have been thus anxious to increase the duty on the raw material, they have left a duty of only 50 per cent. upon manufactured marble.

Mr. MORRILL. I am a little surprised at the extreme earnestness of my friend from Massachusetts. I should rather hear from some gentleman coming from a marble district in that State. It is perfectly evident that the gentleman from the Malden district, which produces no marble, has been, I will not say crammed, but has received his information from some one who represents an interest, perhaps, within his own district, but not the interest of his State. Now, sir, I am not here to ask for protection upon this article; I am here merely for the purpose of having justice done between the marble quarry men, the marble manufacturers, and the Government. Under our system it is evident that this material in the rough block is not subjected to anything like the tax it ought to be, and that it cannot be done. When the article in this country sells at $4 a foot, is it not perfectly obvious to every man in this House that it cannot be fairly valued if it is introduced as costing only 64 cents? Let me inform you what the process is on the part of these gentlemen who do not happen to own a quarry in Italy. I give the facts as they have been reported to me, whether true or not I do not know. They go there, I am credibly informed, and around these quarries find hundreds and hundreds of blocks of refuse marble valued at nothing. The owners would be glad to have them removed, and ask nothing. The purchaser will buy five hundred of these blocks, never intending to remove but one hundred, and comes here with an invoice of those blocks at the designated average price of the five hundred, and real purchasers at bona fide prices find labor so cheap in Italy and freight by water so low that marble can be landed on our shores at very considerable prices.

Now, the gentlemen who are conducting this very business admit with the rate we propose that they can continue their business—that it is not prohibition—so that the Government will not only receive what it did before, but a very largely increased revenue. The whole amount is not large, to be sure; but there will be a positive increase of revenue if this be adopted.

I will also add that these gentlemen were perfectly willing to have an ad valorem duty of 100 per cent. put on this article. Why? Simply because they can have the first valuation at so low a price that they would pay less than under the moderate specific proposed. Under the circumstances it is clear if we want to obtain revenue at the proper rate we must fix some specific duty. The rate proposed by my amendment I do not think is too high, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. ODELL. I want to say a word.

Mr. GOOCH. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ODELL. I renew the amendment. On page 32 I move to strike out "75 cents per cubic foot" and to insert "40 cents."

I think, Mr. Chairman, that that is as high a rate of duty as should be placed upon that article. And I want to say to both the gentlemen from Vermont that I think they have unnecessarily reflected upon the merchants who are engaged in the importation of these marbles. I happen to know those men, and they would scorn what it is intimated they would do. They are governed in the importation of marble by the very same laws that govern the importation of all other articles.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. ODELL. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman has seen this gentleman and conversed with him. Did he not inform the gentleman from New York that he was satisfied with the duty now proposed by the committee?

Mr. ODELL. I will answer the gentleman. The gentleman representing the importing marble interest informed me that he had made an arrangement with the gentleman from Vermont, together with a gentleman who seemed to be here in the marble quarry interest of this country.

Mr. MORRILL. Also from New York.

Mr. ODELL. Yes, sir. I object myself to any tariff which may be made in that style; I object to any arrangement made in this Hall with members on the floor and members of the Senate, as this gentleman assured me that he had made an arrangement. I have my own judgment about this matter, and not the judgment of the gentleman from New York referred to by the gentleman from Vermont.

This bill makes an advance of 60 cents on the present tariff; the gentleman said to me that he had made such an arrangement; but it was the best that he could do. Thinking he could do no better he has left the city and gone home.

Mr. MORRILL. There were several gentlemen here representing the marble interest, all from New York. They represented different interests. I told them if they would agree on what was a fair and proper reduction of the rates in the printed bill, provided it was such an agreement as would secure the Government increased revenue, I would be willing to support it.

Mr. ODELL. I have no doubt the gentleman speaks truly; but I object to the arrangement. I repeat it, I object to an arrangement by which the lobby outside decide upon what we members of Congress shall do in fixing the rate of duty upon the articles which are in this tariff bill, even though the gentleman representing Vermont upon this floor may agree to it.

Now, this article costs 60, 65, and sometimes as high as 70 cents a foot, and those invoices are just as honest and just as true as any presented at the New York or any other custom-house in the country, and they are guarded against fraud in just the same way, the Government being protected against fraud by its consular certificates; and I think it unfair for the gentleman from Vermont to get up on this floor and impugn the honesty and integrity of the merchants engaged in this Italian trade.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say one word in reply. I do not impugn the integrity of these men. I was very favorably impressed with their appearance. My impeachment is of the ad valorem system as a whole. It seems we cannot suit gentlemen here. Some find fault because the Committee of Ways and Means do not consult outsiders. When we do consult them we are then found fault with.

Mr. ODELL. My remark in regard to the impeachment of the integrity of these gentlemen connected with this trade had reference to the statement made by the gentleman's colleague and his own, when he said these men would invoice this marble at just what they chose, and that they were willing to pay an ad valorem duty even as high as 100 per cent.

Mr. MORRILL. What I said in reference to 100 per cent. is true, nevertheless.

Mr. ODELL. That may be true, and my proposition is to make them pay 100 per cent.

Mr. MORRILL. Does the gentleman believe that if this marble were fairly invoiced any party would be willing to pay 100 per cent. upon its value?

Mr. ODELL. I do believe it, but I do not believe they are willing to pay 160 per cent.

The amendment of Mr. ODELL to the amendment of Mr. MORRILL was not agreed to.

The amendment offered by Mr. MORRILL was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. Gooch was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend, on page 33, in line forty-two, by striking out the words "on palm-leaf fans, 2 cents." In calling the attention of the committee to this subject, I will say that I had a statement, taken from the Journal of Commerce, of New York, which I believe was reliable, and which stated that the stock on hand amounts to about five years' consumption; that there were about fifteen thousand cases on hand, when the annual consumption is probably about three thousand. The only effect of putting on the high tariff, amounting to three or four hundred per cent., will be to prevent all importations for some years to come, and the tax will inure to the benefit of a few persons who hold this stock; whereas a lower rate of duty might leave a chance for some revenue by allowing importations. I call the attention of the committee to these statements, and if they are true I hope they will act upon them.

Mr. STEVENS. I think, if we intend to lay any tax, 2 cents is low enough. If there is a stock on hand for five years no more will be imported at any rate, and if they do import them, 2 cents per fan on a hot day is not too much.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out, by adding thereto the words "on and after January, 1866." The price of these fans in China is less than a cent, something like three quarters of a cent. It is one of those little things which the speculators have found and wholly monopolized. Under some influence or other the subject has been introduced to the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means, and they have imposed upon this little article of palm-leaf fans, worth three quarters of a cent, a duty of 2 cents. If you do that these speculators will have the control of the market for three or four years, and have all the profits.

Let me suggest to the committee that the greatest liability they are under to be imposed upon, is from outside men who have the control of little articles, and who come here, after the monopoly is acquired, and demand a high duty upon the importation of those articles.

It is the "whisky-on-hand" story over again, applied in this case to palm-leaf fans. If gentlemen want to foil speculators they had better adopt my amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. It is utterly impossible for the Committee of Ways and Means to suit all sides of this House. If we did not levy a heavy duty on spices, then gentlemen would go abroad to the people and say, "Here are articles of luxury which you have not taxed; you have increased the taxes upon the necessities of life but not upon the luxuries."

In relation to spices, while for one I thought that the rates were sufficiently high, as they exist under our present laws, other gentlemen did not think so. Inquiries came to the Committee of Ways and Means from all sides of the House to know whether we were not going to raise the duty on spices.

I have no doubt that there are many gentlemen in New York, or at least some, who have large stocks of these articles on hand; perhaps enough to supply the country for a year or two; but we must begin to levy duties at some time. I do not understand that either the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Iowa complains that this tax is going to increase the price of these articles unnecessarily high or to such rates that they will not still be freely purchased.

I presume there are parties in New York who have large quantities of these articles on hand; but I will tell my friend from New York that gentlemen outside of the Committee of Ways and Means are sometimes liable to be imposed upon by parties who have these same articles now on shipboard coming here under fresh invoices and upon which they might not make under the new rate of the tariff a ready and profitable sale. I do not say that the gentleman from New York has seen any such persons, but it is as fair to assume that such is the fact as it is to assume that gentlemen who have been before the Committee of Ways and Means have stock on hand.

For myself I care nothing at all about this article, whether it is included in this bill or not. I can see no particular harm in excluding it altogether.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on Mr. KASSON's amendment to strike out the whole clause, it was put, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. On page 33, line fifty-three, I move to strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof "ten," so that the clause will read: "On pens, metallic, ten cents per gross, and in addition thereto 25 per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont to the fourteenth section of the bill, which provides that—

On the entry of any vessel or of any goods, wares, or merchandise, the decision of the collector of customs at the port of importation and entry, as to the rate and amount of duties to be paid on the tonnage of such vessel or on such goods, wares, or merchandise, and the dutiable costs and charges thereon, shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, master, commander, or consignee of such vessel in the case of duties levied on tonnage, or the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of the merchandise, in the case of duties levied on goods, wares, or merchandise, or the cost and charges thereon, shall, within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, give notice in writing to the collector on each entry, if dissatisfied with his decision, setting forth therein, distinctly and specifically, the grounds of his objection thereto, &c.

Is it intended by the use of the words "on each entry" in the sixteenth line that the notice shall be indorsed on the entry made in the custom-house, or is it merely intended that notice shall be given to the collector?

Mr. MORRILL. It is merely intended that notice in writing shall be given to the collector at the time of the entry of the goods.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I move to strike out the words "on each entry." I offer that amendment because I think that all that should be required is that notice shall be given to the collector. If the gentleman is at all familiar with custom-house operations—and I have no doubt he has had more experience in such matters than I have—he must know that these entries pass through the hands of innumerable clerks, and that it is almost impossible under any circumstances to keep track of them.

Mr. ODELL. I would ask the gentleman from Vermont if the term "on each entry" applies to each entry made of goods?

Mr. MORRILL. That is all. It merely applies to the entry of goods.

Mr. LE BLOND. All I desire is that the notice shall simply be given to the collector, and that an individual shall not be required to hunt up his entry and indorse the notice on that.

Mr. MORRILL. That is just what the section means now.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask leave of the committee to go back to lines forty-four and forty-five of section eleven on page 30, for the purpose of offering an amendment in relation to the duty on oil of cloves.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe it is necessary that we should go back. We have raised the duty on cloves very largely, and the duty on oil of cloves ought also to be raised.

Mr. LE BLOND. I must object, because I have not yet done with this fourteenth section.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

He withdrew his amendment, and I thought he was through with the section.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move to amend the fourth section by striking out the words "ninety days" where they occur in the twenty-fourth and also in the twenty-eighth lines, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one year," so that the clause will read:

And such vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, on costs and charges, shall be liable to duty, accordingly, any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding, unless suit shall be brought within one year after the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury on such appeal for any duties which shall have been paid before the date of such decision on such vessel, or on such goods, wares, or merchandise, or costs, or charges, or within one year after the payment of duties paid after the decision of the Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment for these reasons: a great many of these cases are brought into the district courts of the United States; and if the time be limited to ninety days that only multiplies these cases. If the time be extended to one year, then when the party brings his suit he must embrace all the causes of suit he has on hand up to that time. This will be a benefit to the Government; for the Government receives the duties at the time the entries are made, and retains the money till the suit is decided. Therefore the Government will not suffer by this, while it does suffer from a multiplicity of suits, which this would to some extent prevent.

I have also another amendment which I propose to offer, and which, if adopted, will I think save the Government a considerable amount of money. Gentlemen will recollect that but a few days ago there were some one hundred and forty cases decided in the district court of the United States in New York, growing out of this very state of things; whereas if the time for commencing suit had been extended to one year there would have been a less number of suits, and the Government would have had to pay a less amount of costs; for all these cases were decided against the United States. I think that the longer the time for commencing suits is extended the less number of cases will be brought, which will be to the interest of the Government.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I am quite satisfied that the gentleman from Ohio has not carefully considered this section, for it is designed by the law officers here and in New York to remedy the very evil of which he complains. It is to prevent the accumulation of suits against the United States until the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury can be adopted. It does not bar any man, who may consider himself aggrieved by having to pay a wrong amount of duties, from commencing a suit; but he must commence it within a certain time. It will not allow, as heretofore, a long period to elapse before suits come up for decision. I think that if the gentleman will read the section carefully he will find it does remedy the very evils which he proposes to remedy. It is certainly so designed; and the section is introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means on consultation, as I said, with the law officers of the Treasury Department, and with the officers of customs in New York.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Chairman, my sole object is to consolidate these cases, instead of having them divided up. I will make a brief statement to the committee in regard to the manner in which these cases are carried on in New York. I noticed, as I said before, that last week or the week before, there had been one hundred and forty cases disposed of in a single day in the district court of the United States in New York. They all went on a decision which had been made by the district court of the United States as far back as 1856. Yet, as the law now stands, the decision of the district court must receive the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury before the collector can act upon that decision.

The Secretary of the Treasury believed that the district court of the United States had erred in the decision made in 1856. In consequence of his judgment on that question he declined giving any instruction to the collector of New York. The result is that the collector has continued to exact the duties from importers; and they have paid the amount under protest, and then instituted suits. The court is burdened with that class of cases. [Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the section as follows:

Provided, That when adjudication has been had in any of the district courts of the United States upon any questions arising under the provisions of this act or of any act of which this is an amendment, the collectors of the several ports shall be governed by said decision, and no instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury shall be necessary for said collectors to be governed thereby.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, that will never do, because that would be an intermediate non prius decision. I think the law had better be left as it is.

Mr. LE BLOND. I thought I had the floor. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LE BLOND. I supposed I had the floor. Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment in good faith; I did it for the purpose of compelling either the Secretary of the Treasury or the collectors of ports to prosecute some of these cases to a final hearing, and establish a precedent in the matter. Now, as I was saying before, a large class of cases have gone up, and decisions have been made. The Secretary of the Treasury differs with the courts in their construction of the law, and declines to give any instruction to collectors to follow the decisions made, and the effect is that these cases come into court day after day upon the same question, are carried to the same judge, passed upon by the same judge, and decided in each instance against the United States. Now, sir, I undertake to say, and I think it can be well authenticated, that the United States pay in the city of New York alone every year over one hundred thousand dollars' costs upon these very questions which have been so often adjudicated upon in the district courts of the United States, and yet the Secretary of the Treasury declines or refuses to comply with these decisions, and neglects to have any of them carried up for final adjudication in the Supreme Court of the United States.

In every one of these cases, one hundred and forty of which were passed upon last week in the city of New York, the Government pays the district attorney thirty dollars, and whenever he argues a case he receives an additional sum from the Government. And so the Government continues to pay the cost in those cases notwithstanding the adjudication upon them. I think this bill ought to pass, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. GANSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the construction of his amendment might cut off the right of appeal altogether from the district court to a superior court. I presume that is not his intention, and therefore suggest to him that the language of his amendment had better be modified.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not think the amendment will have that effect. I will, however, add to it "unless, where the decision is against the United States, an appeal is taken from that decision."

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me suggest that the same difficulty would still occur unless there is added something to this effect: "unless the decision is reversed upon appeal."

Mr. LE BLOND. I will accept that modification.

The amendment, as modified, was read, as follows:

Provided, That when adjudication has been had in any of the district courts of the United States upon any questions arising under the provisions of this act, or of any act of which this is an amendment, the collectors of the several ports shall be governed by said decision, and no instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury shall be necessary for collectors to be governed thereby, unless reversed on appeal.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "unless reversed on appeal" and inserting "unless an appeal be taken from said decision and prosecuted."

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent to go back to section eleven, page 30, lines forty-four and forty-five, to strike out the words "one dollar and fifty cents" and insert in lieu thereof "six dollars," so that it will make the duty on cloves six dollars per pound.

There being no objection, the amendment was received.

Mr. KELLEY. The amendment is to restore the relation that has existed heretofore between cloves and the oil of cloves. The oil of cloves is as fifteen to one upon the raw material. The duty heretofore has been ten cents upon the oil of cloves; we have made it forty cents. The object of this amendment, therefore, is simply a restoration of the old relation of duty between cloves and the oil of cloves.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEY. I move to amend in line five of section eighteen by inserting after the word "except" the words "linsed, hides, and skins."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, and merchandise which may be in the public stores on the day and year aforesaid shall be subjected to no other duty upon the entry thereof than if the same were imported respectively after that day.

Mr. MORRILL moved, after the words "public stores" to insert the words "or bonded warehouses."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL moved to add to the section the following:

And so much of the act of August 6, 1846, as requires the sale of fire-crackers deposited in bonded warehouses is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not agree to this section, and I want a vote of the House on it. I move to strike out the whole section and insert the following in lieu thereof:

That all goods, wares, and merchandise which may be in the public stores or bonded warehouses, or bonded for transportation, on the day this act takes effect shall, when entered for home consumption, pay the duty under which they were imported.

Mr. Chairman, we have already passed a joint resolution by which those were relieved who took out goods before the passage of the resolution imposing 50 per cent. of duty additional, and paid the new duty of 50 per cent. on them. We relieved them and allowed them to pay the duty which existed when the goods were imported; and we provided that the duty should be refunded to them, so far as it exceeded the old law. Now it seems strange that the principle cannot work both ways. We know when they were taken from the bonded warehouses they should pay the duties on them when they were imported; and I think as soon as this law is passed there ought to be precisely the same rule, or else the Government will lose revenue at both ends. If they have been imported within sixty days let them pay the same duty as if they had entered into consumption at once.

I know that it will be said that the joint resolution increasing the duties 50 per cent. additional was temporary. We know that it was necessary. We know that the merchants hastened their goods in so as to get rid of the additional duties. I know that during the week before that law passed $8,000,000 of goods were imported into New York alone, a larger amount than ever before in one week; and that escaped the 50 per cent. additional duty. If put into the bonded warehouses, although imported under that law, we will let them out under this provision. We will reverse the principle on which we have refunded to them the 50 per cent. additional duty if in the warehouse before the joint resolution was passed. It seems to me that this is all wrong. Hence, I say let those in the bonded warehouses, when entered for consumption, pay precisely the duty as when imported, and neither higher nor lower when this goes into effect.

Mr. WILSON. Does the gentleman propose to have goods imported prior to the passage of the joint resolution pay duties which were in force prior to that time?

Mr. STEVENS. That we have already decided by a joint resolution which we have sent to the other House.

Mr. WILSON. I think that that was an erroneous action on the part of the House. A great many members were deceived as to its effect.

Mr. STEVENS. We will make it still worse by this provision in the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think so.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I think that we ought to exercise common justice toward the commerce of the country. Now, as I understand it, in all previous legislation it has been the practice of Congress in all cases to allow the merchant to take his option. If we decreased or diminished the duties, then they were allowed to come in under the lower and latest tariff; and if we increased the duties, they were allowed to take them out under the rates levied before the new tariff went into operation. There will be sufficient notice on the part of gentlemen—importers can take out merchandise before the 1st of July where rates are increased—and we shall not gain anything by sharp practice on the merchants of the country. If they can make anything by taking them out before the 1st of July they will do it. The joint resolution which we passed was passed for merely a temporary purpose—passed until we could prepare this more mature bill. If we obtain what we shall obtain under this matured plan, is it not all that Congress should ask? I think it is.

Then, again, let me say that under the operation of this proposition there might be three or four different rates of duty under which goods in bond would be taken from the custom-house. They might be taken from the custom-house under the rates of duty which prevailed before the joint resolution passed, and they might be taken out under the rates of the joint resolution, or under the present tariff. And let me say further that a very incongruous state of things would result out of the fact that the joint resolution which we last passed explanatory of the previous resolution had not passed the Senate, and may not.

Under the circumstances I trust the House will allow this to pass in its usual and common form.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. Let me show the position in which the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would place on importer. In the importation of nitrate of silver we have to send out our orders six months ahead. The man who had a cargo arrived before the passage of the joint resolution paid a tariff of 1 cent a pound upon it. I had a cargo which arrived day before yesterday, and I have to pay, under the joint resolution,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  cent a pound. Now if the gentleman's amendment prevails, the man who brings in a cargo in July will have to pay only 1 cent a pound. If you will impose an increased duty of 50 per cent. and keep it there, I will have no objection. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment offered by Mr. STEVENS was not agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend section nineteen by inserting after the word "thereof" the words "for consumption;" so that it will read:

That all goods, wares, and merchandise which may be in the public stores on the day and year aforesaid shall be subjected to no other duty upon the entry thereof for consumption than if the same were imported respectively after that day.

Mr. PENDLETON. They may be entered for other things than for consumption. They may be entered for transportation and reshipment.

Mr. HOOPER. Then there is no duty paid. Mr. PENDLETON: But when they are entered for consumption afterwards there is a duty to be paid. I object to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and propose that the same rule shall be applied, no matter for what purpose the goods may be entered.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman misunderstands the purpose of the amendment. The original entry of goods is for warehousing; then there is another entry for exportation, and of course there is no duty payable. The section does not apply to that, but only applies to the entry for consumption, and therefore I wish to designate that entry.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would rather the section should stand as it is.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. There is one little amendment we have passed somewhat hastily, and which I believe is wrong. By unanimous consent I will go back to page 30, where we inserted nitrate of lead, and imposed a duty upon it of 30 per cent. ad valorem. All agree that that is too low, and we propose to change it to  $3\frac{1}{2}$  cents a pound.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If it can be done without raising any discussion I will not object to going back.

Mr. STEVENS. It will not consume any time. I move to amend by striking out "30 per cent. ad valorem," and inserting " $3\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON. I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 11 to supply an omission in line one hundred and forty-five. It is to insert after "dollar," the words "and fifty cents," so that the clause will read:

On all handsaws not over twenty-four inches in length, 75 cents per dozen; and in addition thereto 30 per cent. ad valorem; over twenty-four inches in length, $1 50 per dozen, and in addition thereto 30 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, objected.

Mr. KASSON. I move to insert after section twenty the following as a new section:

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That during a period of one year from the passage of this act there may be imported into the United States, free of duty, any machinery designed for and adapted to the manufacture of woven fabrics from the fiber of flax or hemp, including all the preliminary processes required thereof; also, all machines for plowing, operated by steam power, and imported for the use or at the request of any State or county agricultural society organized in pursuance of the laws of either of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, with the permission of the committee, that there have been applications made in behalf, I think, of the State Agricultural Society of New York, and from one or two other sources, for leave to introduce one such plowing machine, operated by steam, for the purpose of experiment and of testing its capacity for use in this country. These machines have been invented in England and have been used to some extent in Egypt and on the delta of the Nile. I need not call the attention of gentlemen from the West to the peculiar adaptation of the soil of the western States to the use of these machines, if they are practical ones; nor, on the other hand, to the very great necessity that exists in the West, where labor has become so scarce in consequence of the large contribution of men to the war, for the introduction of such machines to save labor.

I offer my amendment, so far as relates to that, to enable gentlemen who, in the interest of an agricultural society, or at the inspiration of such a society, may be willing to stake the original cost of one of these machines, which amounts to several thousand dollars, on his faith in the experiment, to do so without the added expense of the tariff duty upon it.

As to the other branch of the subject I desire to say this: certain gentlemen from Illinois have been investigating the capacity of machines in use in England and other parts of Europe to manufacture the fiber of flax and hemp into a material that will be a substitute for gunnybags and other things of that kind. As a new branch of industry I think the least that the United States ought to do is to say to those gentlemen who are willing to engage in this enterprise that they will be permitted for a year to introduce such machinery as is adapted for that purpose free of duty. This machinery for the manufacture of the fiber of flax and hemp is not made anywhere in the United States, and under our present tariff we have only the right to import free of duty the molds for the purpose of illustrating the character of the machinery. Gentlemen say that that is inadequate, and that they must have the machinery itself to put up, and try and see whether they can develop this new industry.

I ask members who think it important to stimulate the agricultural interests of the country to agree to this amendment, and allow this machinery to be introduced free of duty; permit any one who is willing to stake his money on such enterprises to do so, as it will be for the benefit of the country.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will be agreed to. I know that in my own State—

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is not opposing the amendment. I propose to do so; and then the gentleman from New York can offer an amendment to it, and speak on that.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this system of allowing special favors. If we allow this privilege to one State or to one individual, we must allow it to all others. Under the present tariff patterns of all machines used in Europe can be imported into this country free of duty, whether the patterns be made of wood or of metal. That, I think, is sufficient. Let them import the patterns and manufacture the machines here. I understand that a New York company has been got up to manufacture these very machines. Let them import the patterns and manufacture them here. The idea that this country is to be flooded with these machines free of duty, each of which is to cost about $20,000, is contrary to all the principles of the tariff which we have adopted, either for revenue or for protection. It is not at all necessary when every pattern of the latest and most improved kind of these machines can come in free of duty. It looks to me absurd to ask that the manufactured article shall be brought in free of duty, instead of its being manufactured here. I trust that no modification of the law in that respect will be made.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I propose to amend the amendment by limiting the number to ten for each State. I can state from my own knowledge that under the operation of the tariff regulations that have existed heretofore not a solitary establishment for the manufacture of duck and linen goods exists in the country to-day. Our entire Navy is supplied with these goods from abroad, for the reason that the home establishments, under the operation of the tariff, have been broken down and no longer exist. I know gentlemen in my own State who have investigated this subject, and who have sent agents abroad for the purpose of examining the best machinery in use with a view to bring it here, and who are making an effort to re-establish the manufacture of that particular kind of goods, but in the present state of this interest it is necessary that we should encourage these gentlemen, who are willing to embark their money and have the enterprise to send agents abroad for the purpose of introducing improved machinery here.

Mr. ARNOLD. I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Griswold,] and I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson.] The proposition of the gentleman from Iowa will not lessen the revenue of the country, and it is of great importance, and especially to the Northwest, that the manufacturers of flax shall be encouraged. There is a very large quantity of it grown in that section for the purpose of seed; but the fiber is lost in consequence of there being no establishments suited to its manufacture. It is very important, therefore, to that interest that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa should prevail, in order that the large quantity of flax raised for the purpose of seed may not be lost to the country, but that this branch of manufacture may be fostered and encouraged. The encouragement proposed is a very slight one. It is simply that for a single year the machinery necessary to induce this kind of manufacture shall be permitted to be imported duty free.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Under the existing law all models of machinery can be imported duty free. I would ask my colleague what objection he has to having the models imported and letting the mechanics at Chicago have the job of manufacturing the machinery.

Mr. ARNOLD. I will tell my colleague what is the objection. If those gentlemen who are disposed to embark in this enterprise are permitted for one year to import the necessary machinery duty free, and this branch of manufacture can be successfully established, then there will spring up not only the business of manufacturing flax, but also the business of manufacturing this machinery. But in order to accomplish that result we must hold out some encouragement in the beginning to these manufacturers, because this is an experiment in which men will not embark unless they receive some aid from the Government, and this certainly is a very slight encouragement, as they are only to be permitted to import this machinery duty free for one year. I trust that the amendment of my friend from Iowa will prevail.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to accept as a substitute for the latter clause of his amendment the following:

Steam agricultural machinery and implements may be imported free from duty for one year from the passage of this act.

Mr. Chairman, it is a very slight boon that benevolent men ask of the Government, that they shall have the privilege, for the benefit of the agricultural interests of the country, of trying this experiment for one year.

The objection raised to the amendment is that models can be imported and our own mechanics can construct the machinery. Gentlemen who make that objection should bear in mind that there is as great a scarcity of mechanical labor now as there is of agricultural labor. We have not mechanics who are at liberty to construct these machines. The labor is not in the country. It is known to every man that we are at this time encouraging the importation of laborers, and yet the moment a proposition is made to permit the importation of this machinery duty free for a short space of time, we are met with the objection that the machines can be constructed here.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless this privilege is extended, I venture to say that during the next year there will not be a single machine, operated by steam, introduced into this country. Now is the time of all others to introduce, if practicable, such machinery into use in this country. The Secretary of the Treasury favors this measure. His letter to the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject is in the House now, as I understand, favoring this very proposition.

I hope the amendment will be adopted, and that any individual under the auspices of an agricultural society who chooses to invest his money will be encouraged.

It is much better for the Government to contribute a small amount from its revenue to introduce these labor-saving machines than to expend it in importing the laborers to supply its place. It is said that we may import the models of these machines and manufacture them ourselves. That is impossible. The experiment has been tried, and it has proved a failure. Our mechanics will doubtless improve upon the machines sent from Europe, when they have those machines here in actual operation. I am informed that the experiment has already been tried of introducing the models of these machines from Europe for the purpose of constructing machines, and that it has failed. But, sir, let the machines themselves be introduced, and, if successful, our mechanics will then construct them afterwards.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the amendment of the gentleman last up will not prevail, but that the amendment as originally offered will be adopted. I think it is very highly important that the machinery which has been alluded to for the manufacture of flax and hemp should be imported and the experiment of its practicability tried; and it is certainly important that the steam agricultural machinery now in its infancy should be imported duty free for at least one year. It is nothing more than the people of the United States have the right to expect from their Government. If they were to ask the Government to introduce the steam plows at its own expense and distribute them among the agricultural societies at the West, it would not be an unreasonable request, for the purpose of testing the usefulness of applying such machinery to the cultivation of our immense fields in the West. Camels were introduced into the country some years ago by the Government for the purpose of testing their usefulness for transportation over the deserts which lie on the route to the Pacific, resembling in many respects the African deserts where the camel is used with so much success. And I see no reason why steam plows should not also be introduced by the Government to see whether they may not be rendered available in the cultivation of the immense prairies of the West.

The gentleman intimates that all this machinery may be constructed by the mechanics of this country, and that we need not bring it from abroad. I apprehend that will not be done. No mechanic or business man will be found investing his money rashly in the construction at large expense of new machinery before he is satisfied that when constructed it can be sold by him in the country. If this amendment be adopted, however, it may not be twelve months before we shall be able to witness the operation of the steam plow in breaking up the virgin soil of the West.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate upon this amendment.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania first to allow a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to be read upon this subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 17, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from Mr. E. Cornell, of Ithaca, New York, soliciting the coöperation of the Government to the extent of being allowed to import one entire set of the different models of steam agricultural machinery from England free of duty.

Mr. Cornell writes: "The great scarcity of agricultural labor, caused by the heavy demand of the Government for men to fill the ranks of our Army, has led to an organized movement in the State of New York for the introduction of steam in the cultivation of farms."

The obvious importance of this enterprise commends it to the favor of Congress, and may, perhaps, warrant the free admission of steam agricultural implements for a limited period, under the same general principle which is now recognized in the free admission of articles for the use of the United States.

The whole matter is respectfully submitted for your consideration.

I am, very respectfully,
S. F. CHASE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. THADDEUS STEVENS, Chairman Committee of Ways and Means, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the committee rise, for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. FENTON. I think there will be no more debate.

Mr. STEVENS. If there is not, I will, of course, withdraw the motion.

The question was stated on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I will accept that as a substitute for the latter portion of my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "steam." There is no reason why this discrimination should be made in favor of large capitalists engaged in farming and against the small capitalists; and the whole of this thing is in favor of large capitalists. There is no good reason why this should be so. I live in a country where there is no steam machinery used in agriculture. This may be important to the regions where men have a thousand acres each under cultivation. My constituents are small farmers and do not need this machinery. They have to pay duty on the agricultural implements which they use, which I think ought to come in duty free.

Mr. KASSON. I hope that the gentleman from Indiana will not press his amendment to the amendment. And, sir, our own manufacturers of agricultural implements not only can supply but do supply the entire demand cheaper than we can import them. That is not a practical benefit to agriculture; this is; and instead of being opposed by those who fear that a like profit will be taken from some of the manufacturers of machinery it ought generally to be supported, for if successful it will set every shop in the country at work in order to supply the machines here at home.

If this be adopted the result will be that only three or four machines will be imported, as it takes time to get the order out and the machinery imported. I hope the amendment will be allowed to stand as it is.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on Mr. KASSON's amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 42.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move to adopt the following as an additional section:

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That whenever goods, wares, and merchandise shall be entered in bond, and the owner shall desire to transfer such goods, wares, and merchandise to another port of entry in bond, he may appear before the collector of the port to which the same are to be transferred, and may prove the value and produce invoices of the goods so imported, and give the bond in the same manner as by provision of law he is now required to prove value and give bond to the collector of the original port of entry; and he shall, thereupon, be entitled to have his goods, wares, and merchandise forwarded in bond to the port of destination in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. Chairman, the object of that amendment is to relieve merchants who are not upon the seaboard from some of the inconveniences of being forced to appear before the collector of the original port to enter and make these proofs.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I move this as the last amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, to come in at the end of the last section:

And provided further, That the duties on all goods, wares, and merchandise imported from foreign countries not provided for by this act, shall be and remain as they were according to existing laws prior to the 29th of April, 1864.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration and particularly House bill No. 494, to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 293) to provide for the payment of the second regiment, third brigade, Ohio volunteer militia during the time they were mustered into the service of the United States; and

An act (H. R. No. 455) to punish and prevent the counterfeiting of coin of the United States.

TARIFF BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. MORRILL. On page 25, lines nine and ten, I move, in the following paragraph, to strike out the words "and stoneware above the capacity of ten gallons;"

On all brown earthenware and common stoneware, gas retorts, stoneware not ornamented, and stoneware above the capacity of ten gallons, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

And I call for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendments were agreed to en masse, with the exception of the following, on which separate votes were asked.

The first amendment upon which a separate vote was asked was to insert after the word "except," on page 37, in line five of section eighteen, the words "linseed, hides, and skins and."

Mr. DAWSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Dawson and Mr. FRANK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 18, noes 75.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote was requested was the following, as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That during a period of one year from the passage of this act, there may be imported into the United States, free of duty, any machinery designed for and adapted to the manufacture of woven fabrics from the fiber of flax or hemp, including all the preliminary processes required therefor; and that steam agricultural machinery and implements may be imported free of duty for one year from the passage of this act.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 68, nays 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnold, Ashley, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Driggs, Edgerton, Eldridge, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Rollins, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Thayer, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Williams, Wilson, and Woodbridge—42.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. SWEAT stated that upon all tariff questions he was paired with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. WILLIAMS stated that Mr. BROOMALL was paired with Mr. CHANLER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, stated that Mr. CRESWELL was absent on account of sickness, and that Mr. WEBSTER was paired upon this bill with Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland.

Mr. HOLMAN stated that Mr. ENGLISH was detained from the House by sickness in his family.

Mr. BLAINE stated that Mr. PIERCE had been detained from the House for three days past by illness.

Mr. ANCONA stated that his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, had gone home sick, and had paired with Mr. ANDERSON; also that Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, was paired off.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Blow, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. MOORHEAD stated that Mr. McALLISTER, who would have voted for the bill, was paired off with some gentleman on the other side of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, stated that Mr. BOUTWELL was paired off with Mr. MIDDLETON.

Mr. ODELL stated that Mr. STEELE, of New York, was called home in consequence of sickness.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I have paired off with Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I had forgotten the fact, and if I have given any vote which will change the result I ask to have it withdrawn.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PRUYN. I ask leave of absence for one week.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

Mr. HALE. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. McALLISTER, for one week.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask leave of absence for myself from Wednesday next, on account of sickness in my family.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

Mr. BOYD. I ask leave of absence for five days.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

And then, on motion of Mr. FENTON, (at twenty minutes past five o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned till Monday.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 6, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of Saturday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see that any one is listening to the reading of the Journal, and I therefore move that it be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The further reading will be dispensed with, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented seventeen memorials of citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of men and women of Candia, New Hampshire, praying for the abolition of slavery and such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also presented a memorial of commanders and lieutenant commanders in the United States Navy praying for an increase of the grades of captain and commander in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Paul, Minnesota, remonstrating against action at the present session of Congress terminating the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Great Britain, and praying that the whole subject be referred to an international commission; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of the United States praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 276) to secure to persons in the military and naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER presented seven petitions of men and women of the United States, praying for the abolition of slavery and such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union, which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 277) making a grant of lands to the Territories of Dakota and Idaho, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said Territories, to connect with the railroad system of Minnesota, have directed me to report it without amendment, and with a recommendation that the further consideration thereof be postponed to the next session of Congress, on the ground that the committee has not sufficient information in respect to the localities and the geography of that country to make a report in favor of the bill at this time.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 240) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department; and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1865; reported it with amendments.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a memorial of O. C. Nielson, reported a bill (S. No. 301) for the sale of a lot of land in Iowa, in the Fort Crawford reservation; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand additional copies of the Army Register for the use of the Senate, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, and it was agreed to.

PRINTING OF NATIONAL CURRENCY BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the currency act be printed for the use of the Comptroller of the Currency.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate any information that may have been recently received in regard to the condition of the African slave trade, and measures for its suppression in the island of Cuba.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 494) to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes; and

A bill (No. 511) to provide for the more speedy punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 293) to provide for the payment of the second regiment, third brigade, Ohio volunteer militia during the time they were mustered into the service of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 455) to punish and prevent the counterfeiting of coin of the United States.

LAND CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up, with a view to dispose of it if possible, Senate joint resolution No. 8.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the Senate with the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I notice that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] is absent, and I think he had an amendment that he desired to offer or was about to offer when this resolution went over on Saturday. I hope, therefore, it will be passed over for the present.

Mr. HENDRICKS. He did offer his amendment. He had several amendments which were offered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He rose to offer an amendment when the resolution went over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand he rose to offer another amendment when it went over. As we dispensed with the reading of the Journal this morning, we commenced business a little sooner than ordinary, and I suppose he will be in presently. I do not wish to delay it myself. Let it lie over for a few minutes until he comes in, and then I will make no objection to it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I had not observed that he was not present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over for the present.

SHIP CANAL IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. CARLILE. If the Senator from Indiana is not ready to proceed with that resolution, I will move to take up the bill (S. No. 211) granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public land to aid in the construction of a ship canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan in said State.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to grant to the State of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding the State in constructing and completing the canal, two hundred thousand acres of public lands, to be selected in subdivisions, agreeably to the United States surveys by an agent or agents to be appointed by the Governor of the State, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from any lands lying east of the eighty-ninth meridian of longitude and north of the forty-fourth parallel of latitude, within the State of Wisconsin, and the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan, subject to private entry. The lands thus granted are to be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of the State for the purposes mentioned, and no other, and the canal is to be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the vessels of the Government engaged in the public service, or upon vessels employed by the Government in the transportation of any property or troops of the United States. If the canal is not commenced within three and completed within ten years the State of Wisconsin is to be bound to pay to the United States the amount which may be received upon the sale of any part of the lands by the State, not less than $1 25 per acre, the title to the purchasers under the State remaining valid.

The Legislature of the State is to cause to be kept an accurate account of the sales and net proceeds of the lands granted, and of all expenditures in the construction, repairs, and operating of the canal, and of its earnings, and return a statement of them annually to the Secretary of the Interior; and whenever the State shall be fully reimbursed for all advances made for the construction, repairs, and operating of the canal, with legal interest on all advances until the reimbursement of the same, or upon payment by the United States of any balance of such advances over such receipts from the lands and canal, with such interest, the State is to be allowed to tax for the use of the canal only such tolls as shall be sufficient to pay all necessary expenses for the care, charge, and repairs of the same. Before it shall be competent for the State to dispose of any of the lands to be selected the route of the canal is to be established, and a plat or plats thereof to be filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; but the canal is to be at least one hundred feet wide, with a depth of water of fifteen feet.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line five, to strike out the word "two" and insert "one," so that it will read:

That there be, and is hereby, granted to the said State of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding said State in constructing and completing said canal, one hundred thousand acres of public lands, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line nine, after the word "lying" to strike out the following words:

East of the eighty-ninth meridian of longitude and north of the forty-fourth parallel of latitude, within the State of Wisconsin, and the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan, subject to private entry.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Within sixty miles of the western terminus of said canal, subject to private entry: Provided, That all lands to which the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached, and lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, as also mineral lands, be, and they are hereby, excepted from the grant herein made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GRIMES. I observe that this bill embodies what I understand to be a new principle in granting the public lands; and I merely rise to inquire of the Committee on Public Lands whether they are prepared to recommend that Congress shall adopt as the settled policy in the future the principle upon which I think this bill is based. Heretofore it has been the rule, if I am not mistaken, that lands have always been granted in alternate sections, the reserved sections being invariably increased in value in consequence of the grant to the State or Territory or company, and thus the Federal Government has not been the loser pecuniarily by the grant. This bill, I observe, allows the State to take the lands to be granted in a solid body anywhere beyond a certain parallel of latitude. Thus they can take up one hundred thousand acres of land and retain it entirely exempt from taxation or settlement, or occupation of any kind, and much to the detriment, it seems to me, of the public interests. It is unlike any bill that I have known that has passed Congress.

Mr. HARLAN. My colleague is right in the statement of the fact and principle involved in this bill. There are no reservations made of alternate sections. It is intended that the State may select any public lands within a limit of sixty miles to an amount not exceeding one hundred thousand acres, to aid in constructing this work. The reason the committee authorized the report of the bill with that amendment, reducing the amount of land granted, was because of their conviction of the great importance of the work itself. They believed that the work was of sufficient consequence to justify the Government in making a direct appropriation from the Treasury, but they were not willing at this time in the condition of the country to recommend an appropriation of the money. Hence they agreed to report a bill making a direct appropriation of lands instead of money. It is on a new principle. There are no reservations made, and the Government will derive no advantage from the "construction of the work in the increased value to other lands that may be retained adjacent to the work." It is due to the Senate that that fact should be stated. The principle that controlled the committee was this: they thought the work was of sufficient importance to justify a direct appropriation of the money from the Treasury. They believe that this will make one of the best harbors on the lake, and that it ought to be improved for the purpose of protecting our commerce. With this statement I leave it to the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is due also to the Senate to state that it is not entirely without precedent. In the grant of lands to create the Sault St. Marie canal the same principle was adopted. This bill follows that. It was a grant of so many acres of land to be selected within a certain region of country to aid in the construction of the Sault St. Marie canal, which connected Lake Superior with Lake Huron and Lake Michigan. This bill, therefore, is not altogether without precedent.

The honorable Senator from Iowa has hardly stated the importance of the opening of this point as a harbor on the west coast of Lake Michigan in as strong language as the facts will bear. It is a long distance between the harbor of Sheboygan, the only one that is open to vessels in a storm, and Death's Door upon the north, the entrance of Green bay, one hundred and fifty miles probably; and on that coast shipwrecks sometimes take place. The opening of this canal of only a mile and a half will connect the deep waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, and will shorten the navigation for all vessels that desire to go to Green bay when they are on the way to Chicago probably one hundred and fifty miles on the round trip.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

LAND CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN—AGAIN.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] is now in his seat, and I hope the resolution called up by the Senator from Indiana a short time since will now resume its place and be taken up for consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Indiana will consent, as that resolution will probably occupy the morning hour, to allow me to call up the bill in relation to the College Rancho in California, which was under consideration the other day and which will not now excite any discussion, as we are agreed upon it, and let it be passed. It will only occupy a moment. With his consent I will make the motion to take up that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw his motion?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will say to my honorable friend from California that I do not know that this resolution is to be discussed any more than it has been discussed; we are ready to vote as I understand it.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will be the case. I have no objection to its being taken up if that is so.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HARLAN. I moved on last Saturday to amend the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole by striking out all of the amendment after the word "canal" in the twentieth line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be necessary for the Senator to reconsider the vote ordering the resolution to be read a third time.

Mr. HARLAN. I offered that amendment at the moment the special order was called up on last Saturday, so that I think the question was not put upon it at the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may not be aware of the fact that the resolution has been up this morning and been ordered to a third reading when the Senator was out of his seat.

Mr. HARLAN. Then I move a reconsideration of the vote ordering the resolution to be read a third time.

Mr. HOWE. I do not wish to take any advantage, but really I suppose the Senator is not authorized to move a reconsideration of that vote, as he was not present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was present, and I will make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now make the motion to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "canal" in the twentieth line to the end of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another vote that will have to be reconsidered first, and that is on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole as amended. That will be regarded as reconsidered by unanimous consent, if there be no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. I now move to strike out all of the amendment after the word "canal," in the twentieth line, in the following words:

And the said Secretary shall also settle and allow to the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company such sums of money as have been properly expended by said company in the survey and location of said canal, in the construction thereof as far as the same has been constructed, together with dams, locks, and slack-water navigation, and in the management and keeping the same in repair; and the same shall be paid to the said canal company out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not exceeding in amount, however, the balance charged against the State of Wisconsin upon the sales of said canal lands, as above required, after deducting the sum allowed said State for money paid by her out of the same fund. The same to be received by said canal company in full payment and satisfaction of all claims of said company against the State of Wisconsin and of the United States on account of said canal land grant, or on account of any action of the Territory or State of Wisconsin, or of the United States, in relation thereto.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, appointed commissioner to adjust the accounts herein provided for, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, and to determine what sum shall be charged to said State of Wisconsin for the lands granted for the construction of said canal; and what sums shall be credited, respectively, to said State and said company for the moneys expended by them in the construction of said locks and canal as herein provided.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to have an explanation of the effect of that amendment before voting upon it. I do not know that I understand it. I hope that the Senator from Iowa, or some other Senator, will explain the effect of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not wish to take up time in discussing it, but I will simply say this to my friend from Iowa: originally those of us who have represented the State of Wisconsin have made the same claim which the Senator from Iowa now makes in our behalf; that is to say, that it belonged to us to settle with our incorporated companies and did not belong to Congress; yet, from the fact that the committees of the House of Representatives and the committees of the Senate have always reported that we stood in the position of a trustee for the benefit of this company, holding these lands, and that we were so related to them that it was necessary that Congress should make some provision or some kind of settlement with the company, we have felt ourselves constrained to yield to the judgment of the committees and have consented that this settlement should take place in this way. I shall, therefore, be constrained to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Iowa because I want this thing to come to an end; it is nearly twenty years old, and unless we accede to what the committee report we shall never get an end to this thing and never have it settled and Wisconsin will be out of her five per cent. fund.

Mr. POMEROY. I will say in addition to what the Senator from Wisconsin has said that the committee have had the matter in charge for two years. We made a report upon it last year, but the committee were not unanimous, and we did not press it to the vote. This year the same subject was before the committee and we have agreed finally, unanimously, to this report, and I think the bill ought to pass as the committee have reported it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The committee were not unanimous. I understand the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, to object to it.

Mr. POMEROY. This resolution was reported from the Committee on Claims and not from the Committee on Public Lands. I never knew that the Committee on Public Lands had anything to do with it.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think this amendment

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 173.

ought to prevail. The Committee on Claims considered this matter very carefully, not only this year, but they have considered it for several years, and they have always refused to allow the State of Wisconsin to have her five per cent. until this company were finally settled with. The committee desire to adjust the whole matter. They are further aware that unless it is adjusted in this way this company must always be the losers. They were drawn into an investment of their money in this enterprise by the understanding with them on the part of the Territory of Wisconsin that it was to be carried forward and to be made effectual. By the withdrawal of the proceeds of the land from the purposes of the grant, this company were left entirely without the benefit that they expected from the canal after expending their money; and now the committee think it would be a hardship, when the Territory was acting as trustee for that company and held these funds and withdrew them from the purposes of the grant, to allow the Territory, or what is now the State, of Wisconsin to have her five per cent. of the public money for schools, which has been retained, without a settlement with that company. She was the trustee in some sort for the company as well as for the Government; and the question now is, in my judgment, whether we will allow her to have her settlement and have her five per cent. fund and leave that company to hunt the State of Wisconsin, but never to receive what they ought to have had. In my judgment, it is very much better, if anything be done, that the whole matter be settled now and settled satisfactorily by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, if it can be done. The committee were willing if this matter could be settled up with all three parties, the Government, the State of Wisconsin, and the canal company, to let the settlement be made in this way.

I hope, therefore, the resolution will not be amended as now proposed by the Senator from Iowa. I certainly should feel bound to vote against it if it was. I doubt very much whether the State of Wisconsin has not been more to blame than the canal company, if anybody has been to blame. It is said that the scheme was impracticable. I think it was impracticable; but if it was impracticable, that is no reason why the canal company should lose its investment. It was a corporation within that State; and, it is said, they did not pay in their funds. They had no funds to pay in. When the Territory of Wisconsin withdrew the land grant they could not command the funds to carry it on. It was impossible; it was without their control. I am imputing no blame to the State of Wisconsin; I am imputing no blame to the canal company; I am merely showing, if I can, why the company should be settled with, and why the work was not carried on. I think this amendment should not be made.

Mr. WILKINSON. I think this amendment ought to be adopted. The simple question, as I understand it, is this: the Government of the United States owes the State of Wisconsin about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The original resolution proposes to pay that sum, which has lain in the Treasury of the United States for a great many years, to the State of Wisconsin, upon one condition, that there shall be deducted therefrom about one hundred thousand dollars, which Wisconsin had received for certain land, which land was appropriated to this canal company, and which money Wisconsin had appropriated to her own use. The balance of the money, being about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, by the report of the Committee on Claims, is either to be paid to the canal company in Wisconsin or to lie in the Treasury of the United States. I am opposed to saddling upon the State of Wisconsin in this resolution the unliquidated claims of this canal company. I do not think it is fair that a defunct, bankrupt company should come in, when Wisconsin asks to be paid her percentage upon the sales of the public lands, and undertake to saddle this unliquidated claim upon this resolution. The portion of the amendment of the committee which is now proposed to be stricken out does not provide that Wisconsin shall pay anything over to this company, but it provides that the money which would otherwise be left in the Treasury of the United States shall be paid over to this company, as I understand it. Am I not right?

Mr. HARLAN. It will come out of the five per cent. fund.

Mr. WILKINSON. A portion of this five per cent. fund is to be kept back from the amount which would have been due to the State of Wisconsin had she not received this land. It is proposed further, in addition to settling with the State of Wisconsin and paying over to her what is justly and equitably due, after deducting all reasonable offsets, that out of what is left of this sum we shall establish a commission to adjudicate the claims and interests of this company. I do not believe it is right. I do not believe this system of legislation is right. I do not believe it is fair for us to incorporate into a resolution of this nature, which ought to be a plain and simple settlement of the accounts of Wisconsin, the interest and claims of a defunct company in that State, and attempt to saddle it upon this resolution. If there is anything due to this company why cannot they bring in their independent bill and let the Committee on Claims report upon it? And if they say it is right I will vote for it. So far as the State of Wisconsin is concerned, her account can be settled very easily. It is known how much land she received; it is known just how much money she paid to this company; and charging her with the balance and taking it out of the $250,000, or thereabouts, which was due to the State of Wisconsin settles the whole thing, so far as the State is concerned, very easily.

It is said that here is a just and honest claim of the State, but this company, as I understand it, like the dog in the manger, says to the State: "You shall not have this money unless we can saddle our claim on the resolution, and let your good bill carry our bad one through Congress." I do not like such legislation.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Minnesota mistakes this matter very much, I think. If he will look a little into the history of the transaction he will find that there was a provision passed by Congress that the State of Wisconsin should be entitled to her five per cent. when she had settled with the canal company. Congress imposed it upon the State of Wisconsin that she should settle with the canal company.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator is in error.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand the law to be so.

Mr. CLARK. That is the way I interpret the law, and the way the law has been held for some time, for the State of Wisconsin has been continually coming to ask to be settled with without reference to the canal company, and Congress has said, "No, we will hold you to settle with the canal company." They have failed to do it. They now come and ask to be settled with; but, instead of holding them to settle with the canal company, we propose that Congress shall retain the money which would belong to them and settle with the company themselves; in that way the thing may be settled. That is the way I understand the matter, and I think it is the fair interpretation of it. It is saddling no debt upon the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. WILKINSON. I understand that.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator says he understands that. He said a moment ago that if the canal company would come to the Committee on Claims and present their claim and they should report in favor of it, he would vote to pay it. This resolution provides that the claim shall be ascertained, and, after the State of Wisconsin is fairly settled with, they agree to take what they are entitled to, not exceeding the fund, and the committee are inclined to say that they ought to have it, and that the thing had better be adjusted at the same time. As I understand it, it is saddling nobody with any debt, taking no money from anybody, but giving to the company their fair expenditure, what they have fairly put into this fund.

I think the Senator from Iowa was very— I was about to say, unjust; I will not say that, because he is never unjust—I think perhaps he was a little hard in his talk about lobbying a claim through, and that the United States was called upon to pay it. Nobody contends or pretends, that I am aware, that such is the case. I do not believe the commissioner or anybody else would allow that. It was urged in the committee that we should allow the interest. The committee did not think it best to do it, but thought the whole matter might be fairly adjusted in this way. It is very true, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] stated, the public might be deprived of the benefit of the school fund which the State of Wisconsin would otherwise have, but that will result from the previous legislation. I have no objection that Wisconsin should be held to keep that school fund good, not the least; but I think it is important that this whole matter should be adjusted.

Mr. HARLAN. I have been greatly surprised that I should differ from the Senator from New Hampshire on a subject of this kind, for I know how very clear his perceptions are, how careful he is in the examination of subjects, and I know how just he is, but I think he does misapprehend the facts and the law in this case. If I understand it correctly, he has misstated it this morning.

Wisconsin became entitled to the five per cent. on the entire proceeds of the sales of the public lands, not by virtue of the law admitting her into the Union, but under a law enacted in 1841, providing for the distribution of the sales of the public land, and granting preemption rights. After the enactment of that law each of the new States thence afterwards to be admitted into the Union became entitled to this five per cent., and also to five hundred thousand acres of the public lands to be selected by the new States. The law to which the Senator has referred is a law authorizing Wisconsin to divert this fund from the original purpose to a new purpose. In ceding to the State to make this diversion from internal purposes to the support of schools the Government imposed the condition that the State of Wisconsin should pay the obligations of the Territory of Wisconsin arising under this canal grant. That is the true state of the case. Wisconsin would have been entitled to this five per cent. and to the five hundred thousand acres of public lands under the law of 1841.

Mr. CLARK. I hold the law in my hand, and by the act of May 29, 1848, for the admission of Wisconsin into the Union, it was provided:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the first, second, fourth, and fifth resolutions adopted by said convention, and appended to said constitution; and the acts of Congress referred to in the said resolutions are hereby amended so that the lands granted by the provisions of the several acts referred to in the said first and fourth resolutions, and the proceeds of said lands, and the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the public lands therein mentioned, shall be held and disposed of by said State in the manner and for the purposes recommended by said convention.

Provided, That the liabilities incurred by the territorial government of Wisconsin under the act entitled "An act to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river," hereinafter referred to, shall be paid and discharged by the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly; that is as I understood it, Mr. President. There is no new grant in that law, none whatever. It refers to the original laws under which the State would have been entitled to this five per cent. and to the five hundred thousand acres of land. There is no new grant; but Wisconsin in her application to become a State of the Union asks leave to divert that fund from works of internal improvement to school purposes, and in permitting this diversion Congress says, "You may make this diversion, provided you will pay the liabilities of the Territory of Wisconsin originating under a law appropriating land for canal purposes." Wisconsin then derives nothing from that law whatever. She agrees to fulfill the obligations of the Territory, and the only obligation pertinent for examination here to-day, as it seems to me, is her obligation to pay the United States $2 50 an acre for that land, provided the canal should not be completed in ten years. It has been thus understood from that time to the present, and she has been charged with the whole of that land at that rate from that time to this.

The case then stands thus: Wisconsin has a right to five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands. She has received the whole of this in money as it fell due up to 1851, and since then in credits which have been entered on the books of the Treasury of the United States; so that she has received up to this time the whole of that five per cent., either in money or in credits on the books of the Department. But she has received since then her 500,000 acres of land, and had received before that 138,000 acres of land, which was diminished by 13,000, I think, which was added to and became a part of the 500,000 acres, leaving an excess appropriated to Wisconsin of 125,000 acres of land more than the other new States received. She has received in money and in credits the whole of the five per cent.; she has received in land 625,000 acres, 125,000 acres of land more than enough to make her equal with the other new landed States in this respect. For that excess of 125,000 acres she has been charged at the Treasury Department at the rate of $2 50 an acre.

What I seek to do is to so modify that charge as to hold her responsible for this excess of one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres of land at the rate of $1 25 an acre, not that she will be entitled to this under the law technically, but as she sold the land for $1 25 an acre, as it is said, and I think truly, it would seem to me to be wrong to hold her responsible for the $2 50 an acre for this excess. It would be unjust to Wisconsin. If we charge her that amount she would not then be equal to the other new States in this respect; she will have been charged too much. But if you charge her $1 25 an acre only she will stand on an equal footing with the other new States. If the amendment I suggested on Saturday should prevail this will be settled in that way, putting her on an equal footing with the other States, giving her the whole of her five per cent. and the whole of her five hundred thousand acres of land.

But the Committee on Claims propose to modify this, first, by giving Wisconsin an additional credit. You charge her with one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres of land at $1 25 an acre, and then credit her with "the amount that has been legally and properly applied by said State or Territory towards the cost of selling said land, and towards the construction of said canal." If that remains in the amendment of the committee you will have given Wisconsin that much in excess of the other new States. But then the committee proposes, in the next place, to take out of the treasury of Wisconsin indirectly, to take out of her school fund, to diminish her five per cent. the whole amount that may have been applied to this work by a corporation existing in Wisconsin, to take the money provided for by Congress in 1841 and granted to all the new States, which the most of them have since diverted for the support of schools, to take it away from the school fund and turn it over to this rotten corporation; and they do this on what ground? Because they say it is probable that Wisconsin will not pay that company. Why do they mistrust Wisconsin? Why do they suppose that the State of Wisconsin will not pay that claim if it is a just claim? Do they suppose that the people of Wisconsin are an unjust community; that the Legislature of Wisconsin cannot be trusted to settle claims between their own corporations and the State itself? There is no other pretext alleged here on this floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me, I will answer his question on that particular point by stating to him that the State of Wisconsin pleaded the statute of limitations by her Governor.

Mr. HARLAN. But that would not control the Legislature. I suppose the statute of limitations in Wisconsin is a creature of the Legislature itself. The Legislature that enacted that statute of limitations can modify or repeal it; so that the answer of the Senator goes for naught.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to make one remark in regard to the answer of the Senator from Indiana. I do not know upon what authority he asserts that the State of Wisconsin pleads the statute of limitations. I do not know that she has ever done it. I do not know that she has ever been impleaded in this cause or by this company. I know that by her constitution her courts are open to the suits of her citizens and of all the citizens who can sue in any of the courts of the United States, and this company has not commenced a suit against her; and therefore the State has had no opportunity to plead the statute of limitations.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state to the Senator that an act of the Legislature of Wisconsin in the extra session of 1862 provided to ascertain and settle the liabilities of the State toward this company, and provided to do it through arbitrators; but the Governor and officers of the State required as a term of submission to the arbitrators that it should be provided for that the statute of limitations should be a defense. That is the mode in which it was pleaded.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the facts to be a little different from what the Senator alleges: that the commissioners who were authorized to submit this to arbitration a year or two since were required to waive the statute of limitations and declined to do so.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not perceive that the settlement of that question between the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Indiana can weigh anything the one way or the other in this controversy. If the Legislature of Wisconsin has enacted a certain statute of limitations, the same Legislature can repeal it, modify it, or relax it by special law in relation to this particular case.

So the question returns, why do you want to take the money out of the Treasury of the United States due to Wisconsin as a part of her school fund and turn it over to this company? There can be no other reason assigned only that the company distrust the honesty or the justice of the State of Wisconsin; the one or the other. If they believe their claim to be a good one, then they mistrust the honesty of Wisconsin. If they believe their claim to be a rotten and bad one, as I do, then they distrust the honesty and integrity of the Legislature of Wisconsin.

The Senators from that State take the same view that I do, but they will vote for the report of the committee against their better judgment, because these men are lobbying around Congress, and have induced the members who have reported this resolution from time to time to believe or they do believe that the resolution ought not to pass without payment to this company. Because this impression exists, not because either of the Senators from Wisconsin believes it, but because other Senators have acquired that opinion in some way, therefore they will waive their own judgments and permit this unjust claim to be paid, which is of over twenty years' standing, for the sake of receiving on their part what little may yet be remaining after the payment of that claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday, the tax bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to postpone the special order in order that we may proceed with and close this subject.

Mr. GRIMES. The understanding was that we should take up the tax bill and sit it out to-day; but if we are going to occupy another hour or two with this business, I do not pledge myself to sit here through the night in order to get through with the tax bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I think a vote may be taken very soon. The Senator from Iowa has spent three mornings upon this resolution, and I presume he has not got much more to say, and we can take the vote when he has concluded.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have a few remarks to make.

The motion was not agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue for the support of the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. COLLAMER to the seventh section of the bill, line fifteen, by striking out the words:

But the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Senators and Representatives to which such State shall be entitled in the present Congress.

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which such State was entitled in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, except in such States as are entitled to an increased representation in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, in which States the number of districts shall not exceed the number of Representatives to which any such State may be so entitled: And provided further, That in the State of California the President may establish a number of districts not exceeding the number of Senators and Representatives to which said State is entitled in the Thirty-Seventh Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have examined with some care the seventh section as it now stands, and I think, consistently with the order which has been taken in relation to this bill in reference to these amendments which were offered by the honorable member from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] and were adopted, the much better way of effecting my object will be to strike out the seventh section as it now stands and insert in place of it what I send to the Chair. The object of my motion is instead of making new districts to preserve the old law, and for that purpose I offer this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to strike out the amendment which was adopted and in lieu of the seventh section to insert what will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the second section of an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, shall remain and continue in full force.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there nothing in any other portion of this bill inconsistent with that section?

Mr. COLLAMER. I believe not.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the Senate amendment in section one hundred and fifty-seven, on page 207, by adding the following:

Unless subsequently duly stamped, which may be done by the holder or other person interested therein if the proper party refuses or is unable so to do: Provided, The same shall be invalid and of no effect between the parties thereto and in the hands of any person or persons with notice, although subsequently stamped, when made, signed, or issued without being duly stamped, with the intent on the part of the parties thereto to evade the provisions of this act.

I desire the amendment to come in immediately after the amendment originally proposed by the Committee on Finance, and before the amendment which was adopted on the motion of the Senator from Vermont. The effect of this amendment will be to provide that an instrument, when made and not stamped, may be subsequently stamped by the parties interested in it, and that it shall be good after being thus subsequently stamped; provided, however, that if the parties to the instrument at the time of the making thereof have failed or neglected to put a stamp upon it with a view to defraud the revenue, then it shall not be valid in their hands or in the hands of a holder with notice.

Mr. JOHNSON. How is the holder to know that?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have provided in the amendment that "the same shall be invalid and of no effect between the parties thereto and in the hands of any person or persons with notice, although subsequently stamped, when made, signed or issued without being duly stamped, with the intent on the part of the parties thereto to evade the provisions of this act."

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know that I understand the amendment very clearly, but, as it strikes me, it will in a great measure defeat the provision.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Entirely.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is not one case in one hundred where testimony of the intent could be found. I speak from some experience under a stamp act which we had in Maryland for several years. Papers were very seldom stamped as long as they remained in the hands of the original parties. Each party would agree that the stamp should not be put upon it until there was a contest, and then they put a stamp on, and as those contests arose very rarely, there was not a stamp put upon a great many, perhaps a majority, of the notes that were issued. It strikes me, and I submit it to the Senator, that if he wishes to derive a revenue from stamps, he will in a great measure defeat the object by the amendment he proposes. There is no hardship in it, because every man who takes a note or any other instrument required to be stamped under this law knows when he receives it that it is not stamped.

The objection met by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont rests upon entirely a different ground. In the record of a deed or of any other instrument of writing which the law requires to transmit property, real or personal, it is very difficult in point of fact to record the stamping; and, independent of that, it would be necessary to go through a whole line of title in order to ascertain whether there was not some link in the chain of title which was deficient because of the omission to put on a stamp. That does not apply to such a case as is provided for in the amendment of my friend from Indiana. With the view I take of it, therefore, I should be disposed to vote against the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire the attention of Senators to this amendment, for I think it is really a very important one. The Senate Committee on Finance amended the bill of the House. The bill of the House rested on the policy of the old law that the instrument lacking a stamp should not thereby be made void, but that the parties should subject themselves to a penalty. That I believe was the policy of the last legislation of this sort.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not understand that the instrument was declared void before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Always.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then the proposition of the House was that the Government should be secured by the penalties that should be imposed on the parties making an instrument without a stamp. The Senate proposes to declare all instruments executed with or without a fraudulent intent to be absolutely null and void if they lack the stamp. I am not willing to vote for that proposition. I think that it is unnecessarily disturbing contracts that were good between the parties, made in good faith, without a sufficient return to the Government for such injury done to trade and commerce. The Senator from Maine, in answer to the amendment as I proposed it the other day, said that so few cases would come before the courts that the evil would not be met, and therefore I have now provided in this amendment that if parties make a contract requiring a stamp and leave the stamp off for the purpose of defrauding the revenue such a contract shall be void forever as between the parties making it and in the hands of persons taking it with notice of such fraudulent intent. But suppose that an instrument has been made with the intent as between the parties to defraud the revenue and subsequently the parties put a stamp upon it, and that stamp is defaced, giving the date of the defacement of the stamp the same with the date of the instrument. There is nothing upon that instrument to show that it is void, and yet if I purchase the instrument in the course of trade, void in fact at the time, but fair and right upon its face, it is invalid by the provision introduced into this bill by the Finance Committee. I do not think it ought to be so. I think it is enough to say that the parties who make an instrument, the parties who receive the money upon an instrument that is not stamped shall be liable to punishment if they do it with a view to defraud the revenue, and enough further to say that as to all parties to such instrument if the stamp is omitted with a view to defraud the revenue it shall not be curable, but that persons omitting the stamp without any fraudulent intent by inadvertence may correct that by putting the stamp upon it, but if they intended to leave it off to defraud the revenue they shall be denied that privilege. It seems to me this sufficiently protects the revenue and at the same time protects innocent and honest parties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to say a few words in reply to the Senator, but before doing so I ask that the Senate will excuse me from serving on the committee of conference on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I was in hopes that I should find time to attend to it, but the tariff bill has now come before us, and we shall have to take that up in the Committee on Finance immediately, and I do not see that I shall be able to give my personal attention to the settling of the legislative appropriation bill. I therefore ask to be excused.

The request was granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN to fill the vacancy.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see that this amendment of the honorable Senator from Indiana places the matter one whit better than his former amendment, which was rejected by the Senate. I regard this as a mere question whether the stamp duties shall be good for something or good for nothing. In the first place the provision with reference to a fraudulent intent amounts to nothing. In the infinite majority of cases the question never comes before a court at all. It is precisely as I stated with regard to the other amendment, it avoids none of that difficulty. In the next place, where it comes before the courts, in the few cases in which it would come, how would it be possible to prove the fraudulent intent? These are mere words that amount to nothing. The fraudulent intent rests entirely between the parties, and it is not likely they would "poach" on each other; and it leaves the whole thing, therefore, perfectly inoperative. I hope the Senate will adhere to its vote on this subject, because I am well convinced that upon it depends many millions of revenue which we cannot afford to lose.

This tremulousness and fear that we shall do some harm to somebody that is careless about obeying the provisions of the law may be a very praiseworthy feeling, but it is costly to the Government. The fact is, citizens must accustom themselves to know what the law is and must obey it. The Senator from Maryland has stated what the effect was in Maryland while they had a stamp act there. It will be precisely the same here. No harm has come, while a great deal of good has arisen, from this provision in the former bill. As I before stated, we have already extended the time, we have made good everything up to the present time, and, if necessary, we can make it good again if there is any danger arising out of it; and it is much better to do that than it is to just inform the whole country that all they have to do is to omit putting on a stamp, if both the parties agree, and if the case comes into court they can put it on there. The result will be that in almost every case it may be that people will pay no attention to the stamp law, and if they go into court it will be utterly impossible to prove any fraudulent intent, and we shall get comparatively nothing from our stamp law.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call the attention of the committee to line one hundred and sixty-two of schedule B on page 223, where a stamp for passage tickets is required. I understand that it was the intention of the committee of the House of Representatives to have the tax for steerage passengers at 50 cents, and for other passengers $1 or more, according to the price of passage. I learn that the price of passage for steerage passengers from Liverpool to New York has been raised to $35. The point is whether the $30 mentioned here should not be raised to $35, if it is the intention of the Finance Committee to have it apply to steerage passengers. That is my question. I do not propose to make any motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator thinks that would be the effect of it he can move to insert "five" after "thirty," and I will not object to it.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I make that motion. On page 223, line one hundred and sixty-two of schedule B, I move to insert "$35" instead of "$30."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The same amendment must be made in the next line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I now propose the amendment which was offered the other evening, laid over, and printed, to insert at the end of section one hundred and twenty-four:

But no tax shall be imposed or collected from any hospital duly incorporated for the relief of the sick: Provided, The sick and disabled soldiers in the service of the United States, or those who have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be entitled to participate in the benefits of such institution gratuitously: And provided further, That such institution shall have first procured from the Secretary of the Treasury a certificate showing that it comes within the intent and meaning of this act, and is justly entitled to such exemption.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have my friend give some reason for that.

Mr. MORGAN. There is to be a large hospital established in the city of New York, established under the will of Mr. James H. Roosevelt, a copy of which will I have, in which he provides, among other things:

"All the rest and residue of my personal estate, including all lapsed legacies, together with all my estate not heretofore well and effectually disposed of, I give in trust to the several and successive presidents ex officio for the time being of the respective managing boards of those five certain incorporations in the city of New York known as The Society of the New York Hospital, The College of Physicians and Surgeons in the city of New York, The New York Eye Infirmary, The Demilt Dispensary, and The New York Institution for the Blind, and to my friends the Hon. James I. Roosevelt, Edwin Clark, Esq., John M. Knox, Esq., and Adrian H. Muller, Esq., all of said city, and to the survivors or survivor of them, for the establishment in the city of New York of a hospital for the reception and relief of sick and diseased persons, and for its permanent endowment."

This amendment is offered by me at the instance of the managers of this hospital, and it is to apply particularly to it; but, as the Senate will see, I have made it general in its operation, to apply to any hospital where the sick and disabled soldiers in the service of the United States, or those who have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be entitled to participate in the benefits of the institution gratuitously. We have not thus far, Mr. President, done very much for the soldiers after they have returned disabled. We do a good deal for them before they go; we pay them large bounties; but we do very little for them after they return. Some steps have been taken, but it has not been decided positively whether what is to be done for them shall be done by the General Government or by the States, especially in regard to providing hospitals for those that are permanently disabled; I mean those who have, perhaps, lost both arms, or both legs, or both eyes, and can do nothing.

Until something is done, it has seemed to me proper to make this amendment to this bill to encourage the establishment of such institutions. In relation to this will, we shall realize money on it, because Mr. Roosevelt is dead, and his will will be carried out. The amount is about a million dollars. The trustees applied to the Legislature of New York, and the Legislature at once granted an act of incorporation. I may say that in case the Legislature of New York did not grant the act of incorporation, another provision was made in his will, which I shall read:

"I direct my trustees promptly to apply to the Legislature of this State for proper acts to incorporate, secure, and perpetuate said hospital."

"And should such Legislature for two years next after my decease (provided the youngest of my said individual trustees living at my said decease, and my said nephew, or either of them, shall so long live) refuse or neglect to grant a liberal charter for the safe organization, conduct, and perpetuity of such hospital establishment, in accordance with the provisions of my will, I, in that event, direct my trustees, from time to time, to pay over the above bequests that may come into their possession under my will to the Government of the United States of America, trusting that Congress will pass such law or laws in respect thereof as will effect, in substance, as near as may be, the general objects I have in view. But, to prevent legal difficulties in this case, I declare my wishes so expressed to be not an imperative trust, but a mere recommendation to the Government, having full confidence that Congress will do whatever justice and right may require."

The Legislature of New York did, however, pass the law, and Congress has nothing further to do with it. It would be a little severe, they would regard it so, to have a tax imposed; and it has seemed to me to be very proper to encourage others to found similar institutions by exempting them from taxation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are many cases in which it seems to be a little hard, to use that expression, to exact revenue; but the same reasoning that applies to this institution would apply to all eleemosynary institutions which have capital invested; and yet, if we undertake to make distinctions in connection with revenue, there is no knowing where we shall stop. We have had several bills before us to exempt from taxation in certain cases where, perhaps, there was no very good reason, except that we deemed it improper to make exceptions.

There is no danger that the tax imposed would prevent any man from carrying out any good will that he might have toward founding an institution or aiding in the support of an institution already founded. The considerations that induce him to do it are such as would not in any sense be affected by the fact that his money thus invested did, like all other money vested in the same way, aid in supporting the Government; and I see no reason why money thus invested should not so aid. It is all for the benefit of the people, and the personal benefit to be attained to the people is to provide them with a good Government and to support that Government.

The committee on thinking this matter over came to the conclusion that to begin to make exceptions would lead to infinite confusion; the amount would be very large in the end; every effort would be made to bring cases within the principle, if we tried to adopt a principle in reference to it, and we thought it would be entirely unsafe. We therefore objected to introducing anything of this kind into the general bill providing for the raising of revenue.

I hope that the amendment will not be adopted. I will not quarrel with my friend for suggesting it, because it is very proper for him to suggest it for the consideration of the Senate. But the best reflection which I have been able to give it, and which others of the committee were able to give it, led us to the conclusion that it would be entirely unsafe to begin a system of exemptions anywhere, and that it is best to leave all the property of the country to the operation of the general law.

The amendment was rejected—ayes eight, noes not counted.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out on the 134th page, in line one hundred and eighty-one of section ninety-three, the word "five," and insert "ten;" so as to read:

On screws, commonly called wood screws, a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem.

The House of Representatives made this duty 10 percent. We have stricken "10" out in committee and substituted "5." I am satisfied that we had better let it stand as the House passed it. It is well known that this business is done mainly by one company, that the company has made immense sums of money. Everybody that ever looked at or heard of the company almost has grown rich. [Laughter.] It was said, it will be remembered, when we framed the tariff here a few years ago, that this company had particular favors; and now if this is stricken out I am inclined to think the same idea will go out; in fact it has already. Therefore I move to strike out "5" and substitute "10."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that it makes any sort of difference whether you fix the tax at 5 per cent. or 10 per cent., so far as the company are concerned; they will add it to the price of the screws. That is just the amount of it. We have got to put on, of course, a sufficient protection for the tariff. Whatever duty we put here, we must put a corresponding duty in the tariff bill in order to meet the burden put upon them. This company feel, as I am told, and I have no doubt it is true, that provided that is done they do not care whether you put on 5, 10, 15, or 20 per cent. It is all the same to them, because the consumers pay it; it comes out of those who buy and those who use, and not out of the company. It will not affect their profit one way or the other. It was intimated to the committee that the duty of 10 per cent. was unusually high, that it was making a distinction between this and most other articles, and that it was really higher than the system ought to be, and the committee changed it with a view to have a conference with the other House on the subject. If we adopt 10 per cent. the matter is fixed and concluded, and there is nothing further to be said about it.

If my friend from Massachusetts is perfectly satisfied on the examination he has given the subject that it is better to say 10 per cent., be it so. I confess that I am not satisfied in regard to it, and I really do not care what the Senate do with it. My own opinion was that it was better to leave the matter open for a little further discussion. Perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island can give us a little further information.

Mr. ANTHONY. These gentlemen who have committed the great offense of getting rich are my constituents. I do not know what reason there is why a duty of 10 per cent. should be put upon their production when a duty of 5 per cent. is put on other manufactures. I do not know of any reason. It is true the business has been very profitable; but it is not remarkably profitable to all the men who now own the property; for although to the original stockholders it has been exceedingly remunerative, much the largest portion of the property is in the hands of men who have bought it at a price corresponding to its profits; and a man is no more likely to make a good investment by buying the stock at the price at which it rules than he is in buying stock in any other manufacturing property.

The reason that they have a monopoly of the business is because they make a better article and sell it at a cheaper price than anybody else can. They have no other monopoly except that which their patent gives them. If a man invents a machine which is valuable the Government of the United States guarantees to him fourteen years' exclusive right to use it. This company have invented, or have purchased of those who did invent, the machinery for the manufacture of screws. The price of the article is much less than it was when they commenced business, and it is a great deal better. The English article has been driven out of the market entirely, and cannot compete with the production here, if it is untaxed, unless by the use of the machinery which was invented by this company, or which they purchased of the inventor.

I hope they will be allowed to stand on precisely the same footing with all other manufacturers. This company pays to the Government now a tax of nearly two hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. For income?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, besides the income tax, a tax of nearly two hundred thousand dollars a year made up of the duty on the iron they import, for a part of their product must be made from imported iron, and the excise duty. Altogether, I think, they pay between one hundred and eighty and two hundred thousand dollars. I do not know of any reason why they should be singled out for a higher duty than other producers. One of the largest customers of this company is the Government. I think the Government at one time—so I have been informed—took nearly one half their entire product, so that the Government, on what it consumes, will merely collect a revenue, and then pay it back again, for the company must put the additional tax upon the article and cover the expense of collecting it.

Mr. GRIMES. That is a very extraordinary statement which the Senator from Rhode Island has just made. It may be true, but it astonishes me that the Government takes one half of all the screws that are being made by this company. I cannot conceive what on earth the Government does with them. Nobody else manufactures any.

Mr. ANTHONY. For all the arms the Government uses they make the screws.

Mr. GRIMES. But there is not a house in the whole land that has not more or less screws in it. There is not a piece of machinery hardly that has not got more or less screws in it. The Government I should not suppose could use 5 per cent. of the amount that is manufactured by this company. The Senator insists upon it that this company ought not to be singled out and any distinction made in regard to it from any other company; that is to say that we ought not to impose any larger amount of tax upon this company than upon any other. The truth is that we have regulated the tax already in other instances; we charge upon some 2½ per cent., upon others 5.

Mr. ANTHONY. Five per cent. is the highest on anything else.

Mr. GRIMES. We have regulated it, put some low and some high, because the article to be manufactured would stand the imposition of tax, and that is the reason, I suppose, that my friend from Massachusetts has proposed to increase this taxation from 5 to 10 per cent. There is no other article manufactured in America, except it be whisky and tobacco, that will stand a high rate of taxation so well as this article of screws. This company that manufactures them—and it is the only manufactory there is in the land—is the most odious monopoly there is on the continent. It has made fortune after fortune, and I believe that $1 of actual original paid in cash represents to-day about $100. Whenever an effort has been made to establish another screw company in opposition to them, they have always had the means to crush it down, so that they have the entire control of the market on this continent, or at any rate in the United States.

Here is one company that alone manufactures screws. Through the agency of a single assessor and collector we can levy 10 per cent. upon them, and derive perhaps three times as much as we are deriving now, or have during the past year received into our Treasury from this tax. The amount that we shall receive will not actually come off them, as the Senator from Maine says; it will really come out of the people of the country generally, but it will be very evenly distributed through the country; and I know nothing that a large tax could be imposed upon more easily and more safely and more justly than upon screws, unless, as I said before, it be upon tobacco and whisky. I might with as much propriety protest against the levying of a tax upon the whisky and tobacco produced in Iowa, over and above 10 per cent., as the Senator from Rhode Island can protest against the imposition of more than 5 per cent. upon these screws. My constituents pay much more of the amount than the Senator's.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was in error in stating the amount of tax paid by this company. The amount of excise tax is about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, and the duties, in gold, about seventy-five thousand dollars more; and those duties will be increased, I suppose, under the tariff bill. I hope that if these gentlemen are to be taxed, they need not be held up to public odium also. The Senator from Iowa calls them an odious monopoly. What is there odious about it? They have invented a machine which has cheapened and improved an article of universal consumption. They make a better article; they sell it at a cheaper price than the country ever paid before; and because they have made money out of it honestly, by the use of the patents, which are protected by the Government, as all other patents are, and by the use of their mechanical skill and their capital, the Senator says they are an odious monopoly; they have crushed everybody else. How have they crushed everybody else? By no other means than by selling the article cheaper than anybody else could. That is all the crushing they have done. There have been, I believe, some twenty attempts to manufacture screws in this country, and all but this and one other, I think, have failed, not through any agency of this company, but because they had not the skill or they had not the capital to stand the first loss, or they had not the processes, the machinery.

Mr. GRIMES. Because they had not the capital.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well. Is it a crime to manufacture screws?

Mr. GRIMES. I will tell the Senator what I have understood to be the process adopted by this company, as he has raised the issue. It is a company of vast capital. It has a large stock of the manufactured article on hand. Whenever another company has made an attempt to manufacture the same species of article, it floods the market with the surplus it has already on hand as screws, and thus cuts out from any opportunity to sell, the rival company that is seeking to force itself into existence.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator makes this charge and will tell what company has ever been treated in that way, I will endeavor to answer. I think he has been entirely misinformed. These gentlemen are as respectable as any man's constituents, and I believe the only way in which they have crushed out other companies is by fair and honest competition, and that they never have reduced their price below a fair profit.

Mr. DAVIS. Will it be in order to move to amend the amendment that has been proposed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it will not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I only ask that this manufacture shall be put on the same basis as all others. It is a very profitable business, and I am willing it should pay the highest tax that any manufacture of the kind pays. Whisky and tobacco are of course exceptional articles, but I am willing it shall pay the highest tax that any article that enters into general consumption for useful purposes can stand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kentucky that if a motion were made to concur in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, in another view of the case, it would then be in order to amend the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I cannot conceive why the Senator from Rhode Island opposes the increased duty on this article because it is produced in his State. It is not consumed in his State, if produced there. The people of California will pay the 10 per cent. tax if it is imposed; the people of the West and the people of the East that use the article will pay it. I apprehend that the State of Rhode Island, while they make more of this article, use less than perhaps any other State in the Union. The reason for imposing this increased tax, I think, is a very good one. The peculiarity of the question is this: that this company have, by a patent process, produced an article that has superseded all others in use. They produce what is known by mechanics as the gimlet-pointed screw; none other is used or has been used since they have been produced, or to any great extent. No aperture has to be made when it is inserted in a piece of wood; it makes the aperture as it is turned into it; and the saving of labor in thus inserting it in any mechanical article of production is so great that the percentage added, if you add 10 per cent., will be as nothing to the consumption. The manufacturers do not pay this tax. There is not a single reason why this article should not bear the tax. If the object is to get money, and the object in getting money by taxation is to diffuse the burden and make it as light as possible by making it universal, or nearly universal, you cannot adopt a better means of doing that than by increasing the tax on these wood screws, so called. I happen to know something about them, and I cannot conceive that there is any reason in the Senator's objection to this increase of tax because the article is produced in his State. I regard the invention, simply in its character, as one of the greatest that has ever been made in America, and I think the company that is producing the article, or those who are its inventors, are entitled to great consideration; but they have become immensely wealthy, and that is all right, by the use of their invention. The community has been benefited, and the Government can now be benefited by adding a small percentage to an article of almost universal use and consumption. The consumers will pay this tax. The Senator from Rhode Island should not object simply because the screws are made in Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can pardon the Senator from California for not comprehending why I do not wish an interest in my State to be taxed 10 per cent., for I was utterly unable to comprehend why he would not consent to have an interest in his State taxed 1 per cent.; and as I could not understand his reason, I shall excuse him for not understanding mine. But I hope, Mr. President, that men will not be punished because by the use of their mechanical skill, their ingenuity, their capital, they have saved money and have become rich. I hope men will not be punished for benefiting the community. I am perfectly willing that this article shall be taxed. The manufacture is very profitable, although not nearly as profitable as Senators think, because the stock in the hands of many of the present owners cost its full value. I may be mistaken—I would not like to say positively—but I do not believe the stock divides more than 10 or 12 per cent. on the capital invested in it at present prices, and much of it has passed at those prices. I do not know accurately the value of the stock or the dividend; I never owned a dollar of it. I am willing that my constituents should bear their share of taxation.

Mr. GRIMES. How much money does the stock now represent?

Mr. ANTHONY. I cannot tell. A million or more.

Mr. COWAN. How much have they saved the nation by cheapening screws?

Mr. ANTHONY. They have saved the nation by cheapening screws half of what the screws cost.

Mr. CONNESS. When I was up I stated that I was at a loss to know a good reason for the opposition of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island to the proposed increase of tax, because the article was manufactured in his State. He responds to me, as he doubtless thinks very clearly and very smartly, by saying that he is not astonished when I cannot perceive a reason for taxing an interest in my State 1 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, permit me to say to the honorable Senator that it is not worthy of his general acumen if he cannot see the difference between levying any amount of tax if it were 40 per cent. upon screws, and 1 per cent. upon the article of gold. The argument is contained in one sentence, namely, that the usages and laws of the civilized world have established the value of gold and silver, and no tax that you can impose upon it will enhance or increase its value. Therefore the tax, whatever it is, is paid by the possessor of the gold and silver. All you have got to do to take all the gold and silver that any man has is to multiply your tax a given number of times, and you get it all, for each time that you tax it you take a part of it away. That is the fact in regard to gold, and I am sorry the Senator cannot perceive it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Perhaps I could if there was a mine of gold in our State. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, there is too much of this kind of legislation here, and too much of this kind of opinion. The honorable Senator replies to me by saying that perhaps he could if they had a mine of gold and silver in his State. I honor the State of Rhode Island for its productions, and its people for their intelligence and their industry, and I have no motive that goes to taxing any product because it is a product of that State. But the logic of this case is against the Senator. The 5 per cent. or 10 per cent. that is added to the price of these screws, as I before said, is paid by me when I buy a paper of them for consumption, paid by every mechanic in America; nay, it is paid abroad, because they are exported very largely, nothing being produced in the world equal to them. Now, I cannot see any similarity in the two cases, and I am sorry that the perceptions of the Senator were not equal to my own simple perceptions on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the honorable chairman whether there is a tax of 10 per cent. on any other manufacture except this?

Mr. FESSENDEN. There was one on one article, but that we reduced to 5 per cent. I do not remember the article now.

Mr. GRIMES. We put thirty-five cents on tobacco manufactured in the Senator's own State of Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know you did. I was about to say that if there is not a tax of this amount on manufactures of the same description—I mean mechanical manufactures—I should be unwilling to discriminate. There is no ground to discriminate, because people have grown rich.

Mr. SHERMAN, and others. Jewelry.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Jewelry has been reduced to 5 per cent. on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. TEN Eyck], I think.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts who proposed this amendment to make the tax on this particular manufacture 10 per cent., that perhaps if he would go a little further and make it 10 per cent. on all manufactures he would raise about as much money as we want. I think he intimated the other day that he was willing to increase the tax on manufactures generally; and certainly in regard to manufacturers; who are now doing remarkably well and making money, there is just as much reason for taxing them 10 per cent. as there is for taxing this particular manufacture 10 per cent.

I think it will be found perhaps in the end that the anticipation of revenue from the bill, as it stands, will be disappointed; it will not produce as much as we want. The estimate, I understand, is about two hundred and forty or two hundred and fifty millions. That estimate will be realized, and perhaps more than realized, if the tax upon those manufactures which are known to be prosperous, the woolen manufactures, and others of that description, should be increased to 10 per cent. It seems to be admitted by the chairman that unless the tax is carried to a great extent—and the admission is no doubt correct—there will be no loss in point of fact to the manufacturer, because he will charge the additional cost to which he is subjected by the tax to his customer; and if that is true of the manufacturer of screws, it will be equally true of the manufacturer of other commodities which the public want, and which they must have. We want the money; no doubt about that. We shall want all the money we can get that can be derived from a system of taxation which may not go to the extent of depressing manufactures or causing the whole loss to fall on the manufacturers. If the honorable member, therefore, proposes to follow up his amendment by an amendment of the same description on other profitable manufactures, I should vote with him; but I cannot agree to take this alone and leave the others to stand at 5 per cent. or less.

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the Senator from Maryland that the reason why I made this motion was that I thought this company, that has the monopoly of this manufacture in the country, could well afford to pay a tax of 10 per cent., that the article was one of general and universal consumption, and it was a good subject upon which to raise the tax imposed by the House of Representatives, 10 per cent. I understand that the members from Rhode Island in the House of Representatives were very well satisfied with this as it stood. I thought this article stood very much like whisky or tobacco, and could afford to pay a higher tax than the average of other manufactures. Therefore I propose to put this at 10 per cent. I am willing to increase the duties on manufactures generally; at any rate I would be willing to vote to raise them to 7 per cent., and I am inclined to think I shall make that motion before we are through. In fact I have two or three small amendments that I propose to move, with a view of adding to the revenue, but I certainly hope this amendment will be adopted, and that the others will, and I think we can add from seventy-five to one hundred million dollars.

Mr. COLLAMER. If I understand it aright this clause stood 10 per cent. in the House bill. We have never altered it.

Mr. WILSON. The committee altered it.

Mr. COLLAMER. We have never accepted the report. Let a separate vote be called upon it.

Mr. WILSON. Very well, and therefore I drop it now.

Mr. FESSENDEN, (to Mr. WILSON.) Call for a separate vote now.

Mr. WILSON. Very well. I call for a separate vote on concurring in the Senate in the amendment made in committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate, in Committee of the Whole, adopted the amendment of the Committee on Finance to reduce this tax from 10 to 5 per cent. We are now in the Senate, and the question is whether the Senate will concur with the Committee of the Whole. That is the mode in which I want this question put. There is a difference between this and manufactures generally, as it is very easy to show. It may be very proper to increase the tax here, but it does not follow that it would be proper elsewhere. I have no particular opinion about it. If the Senate determine to fix it at 10 per cent., so be it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. I call for a separate vote now on the question of concurring in this amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, will the Senate concur in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, striking out "10" and inserting "5 per cent." as the rate of duty on wood screws?

The question was put, and it was declared that the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that vote was not understood, the form of the motion having been changed. I ask for a division. I think Senators voted under a misunderstanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Cowan, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Howard, McDougall, Morgan, Van Winkle, and Wiley—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Cardie, Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Foot, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson, Pomerooy, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Sautsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wright—18.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to add as an additional section to the bill the following:

And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a stamp duty of 10 cents on every bill of sale of goods, wares, or merchandise of any kind or description, exceeding in amount $10 and not exceeding in amount $100; and one fourth of one per cent. on all sums exceeding $100; and any person or persons who shall make, sign, or issue, or who shall cause to be made, signed, or issued, any bill of sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, or shall accept or pay, or cause to be accepted or paid, any such bill of sale without the same being duly stamped, or having thereupon an adhesive stamp for denoting the duty chargeable thereon, with the intent to evade the provisions of this act, shall for every such offense forfeit the sum of $200, and such bill of sale shall be invalid and of no effect.

I intend to occupy but a few moments, as I am anxious to get this bill through, but I am still more anxious to have it go through in a form by which the required revenue can be raised. This proposition is, I think, a very simple one. It provides that on all bills of sale exceeding $10 and up to $100 there shall be a stamp of ten cents; on all bills of sale over $100 a stamp of one quarter of one per cent.; and that, I think, will give us somewhere from fifteen to twenty-five million dollars revenue, and I do not think there will be the least difficulty in the world in enforcing it any more than there is in enforcing the stamp on bank checks. I am told that the easiest part of the existing law to administer is the stamp part of it. By law there are eighty-three stamps; seventy-eight of those stamps are now in use; and it is said that there is no difficulty in carrying out that part of the law. There can be none in putting the stamps on bills of sale, if you make a bill of sale an illegal document without a stamp, any more than there is in putting a stamp on a bank check or any other document. No man will settle a bill illegally to save a few cents or a few dollars. It will not require an additional man in the country to administer it, it will add nothing to the clerical force employed. I wish to quote from a letter written by Dr. James W. Stone, dated on the 9th of January, 1863, in which he says in regard to stamps:

"In my judgment the stamp sections of the act not only work to much better advantage than the other sections, but it will be no inconsiderable benefit to the Government if the stamp duties could be substituted in many if not in all instances for the other method of collecting the internal revenue: first, on account of simplicity of operation; second, on account of self-execution, the illegality of the unstamped instrument rendering suits to enforce the use of stamps needless; third, on account of the ante-payment of taxes, the stamps being purchased, in many cases, months if not years before they are used; fourth, from the surty against fraud or collusion between the numberless officers in different parts of the country, and those disposed to defraud the Government when payment is made without stamps; and lastly, from the great diminution of expense in the collection of the revenue."

I am told by collectors and by assessors that it will take not a single man more to execute the law than now; it requires no cost, no expense, except to provide the stamps, to send them out, and to sell them. There will be no more difficulty in enforcing the law in that respect than in the enforcement of the use of stamps upon any other instrument; the main strength of the position being in declaring the unstamped document itself illegal and of no effect.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the amendment would be evaded constantly. There will be no bills of sale. Goods pass from hand to hand with bills of parcel, or they pass without any writing; and where that is the case there would be no stamp required by the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I am told by business men, some of them dealing to the extent of millions, that there would not be one case in a hundred of any amount where the bill of sale would not be made and stamped, because nobody will risk property on any other arrangement. On little small matters it may be different, and I have exempted all transactions under ten dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member does not understand me. What I meant to say was that in the way the amendment is drafted the stamp would not be required unless there was a bill of sale; and therefore if there is no bill of sale the contract could not be declared void. If he proposed to make it more comprehensive than it would be by applying it merely to cases of bills of sale he might apply it to bills of parcel, and that would include a variety of cases that would be excluded if the amendment stands as it is proposed by the honorable member. If I understand it, I think the amendment would be construed to mean that the stamp is required only where the sale in question is evidenced by a bill of sale, which, as I say, will not be and need not be, for the purpose of making the contract a valid one, done once in a thousand times.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is the old proposition in a new shape, a tax on sales. We have had it before the Senate during the last two years some half dozen times, and always to no effect. I have neither the strength nor the disposition to argue these things over and over and over and over again. I have stated what is true, that a tax upon sales, whether you put it on the sale itself, or whether you put it on in the shape of a stamp upon every bill of parcel, is new in any country. It never has been adopted, and, as it has been deliberately considered by the committees of both Houses at three sessions of Congress and rejected, I should not suppose there was the slightest probability of its passing now. I know that some gentlemen have the same opinions with the Senator from Massachusetts. They talk with outside gentlemen who have not considered the whole subject, I think, and who state only the argument on one side. I really hope the Senate will not adopt it.

Mr. McDUGALL. The chairman of the Committee on Finance has said that the proposition to tax sales has been considered deliberately at three sessions of Congress. I take the liberty of saying, notwithstanding the observation of the Senator, that it has not been deliberately considered at any session of Congress. I remember well that three eminent gentlemen from Massachusetts came here pending the discussion on the first tax bill, and I have not seen an abler delegation come from any part of the country. They were sent as a deputation from the Boston Board of Trade. They were heard for fifteen minutes by the Committee on Finance of this body. Perhaps that was consideration for so grave a question! I remember well that as against the bill from the House of Representatives before the Committee on Finance two years ago, the idea of raising our revenue from a tax on sales was best approved by a majority of the committee. I remember well that at the solicitation of the chairman of the Committee on Finance I consented that he might report the House bill as amended in the Committee on Finance. I consented, otherwise he would not have had an opportunity to report it. When the House bill was reported by the chairman, not by the concurrence of a majority but by the acquiescence of a majority, it was understood that the then Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. Simmons) could present his views, and that I, having presented a bill embodying the principle of the tax on sales, should present my proposition before the Senate. When we did so the chairman of the Committee on Finance claimed that his bill was a report of the Committee on Finance; and the views of the Senator from Rhode Island and the views that I designed to embody as representing the advice of the Board of Trade of Boston, the Chamber of Commerce of New York, the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, and the Chambers of Commerce of Cincinnati and Chicago and all the principal cities, all concurring in the same views, were ignored and not allowed a hearing on this floor. Therefore it has not been considered.

I believed then that the advice they gave in regard to the manner of raising revenue was the best advice, and I believe it still. There was not one of those three members of the committee of the Boston Board of Trade who would not have honored the floor of this Senate; and their views were indorsed by all the organized commercial bodies of the United States. I am very glad to see the proposition brought forward again. It is a tax more easily and more justly levied, and will do more to aid the revenues of the Federal Government and secure us money to carry on the war than any of your mere stampacts. This is now taking the form of a stamp tax, as it was not as I proposed it then; but still it will bring us more money even than those subjects of taxation that have been made the basis of the revenue bill. I, by way of vindicating a sound policy as against a most immature one that was organized without reference to the lessons we had learned from abroad, favor this as a better system, better considered, more economical, and producing greater results; and I shall therefore vote with the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to call the attention of Senators for a moment to an extract from a letter from a gentleman of Philadelphia; and I must say that I think the gentleman whose letter I am about to read understands this whole subject of taxation exceedingly well. He says:

"This immense source of revenue in England?"—

That is, stamps on bills of sale—

"where every bill, large and small, is stamped, has been ignored with us. Now, that the wants of the Treasury can be no longer smothered, it is well to place taxation upon some sources of revenue, of which bills of sale can be made, I repeat, a very large one. Many of the objects upon which stamp taxes have been imposed can be successfully passed from hand to hand, evading the stamp duty. A bill of sale is not one of these."

It is certain that it will cost the Government nothing for additional officers. If we sell one million, two million, five, ten, or twenty-five million stamps, and they are used, we gain so much. Therefore I hope we shall try it. There is no harm in trying it. It is simply a stamp tax on bills of sale, and if there are no bills of sale made we shall get nothing, and nobody is harmed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The very distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia who writes that letter does not know anything about the subject, and he is like a good many other gentlemen who sit quietly at home and think they understand the whole revenue system. A letter from them is conclusive on the subject when they look only at a single thing, and they and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts give no credit whatever to the many men who have studied this subject, and looked at it all they could for hours and days and weeks, and tried to come to a just conclusion with all the light they could get from books and from the hundreds of letters, not from one distinguished gentleman but from a great many distinguished gentlemen; and therefore I think more importance is given really to the suggestion than ought to be, because it takes for granted that the committees have had no suggestion made to them, though they have been in the receipt of bushels of suggestions on all these questions.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senator from Maine to explain the difference—I do not precisely understand it—between this proposition and the tax on all receipts in England. I understand this is a tax on every receipted bill there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a tax in this bill on receipts.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is not this a tax on receipts?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Substantially. If the Senator will allow me a moment I will explain, and I will continue to stand here and explain these things over and over again as long as my physical strength holds out, day after day until this time next year, if Senators insist on trying these questions so many times. We put a tax upon bills of sale of ships. Wherever, in order to make a sale valid there must be evidence of it in writing registered or recorded, you can reach it, because the document must so exist; and it is so with regard to ships. It is not so that I am aware of with any other article of personal property, because personal property passes by delivery. A man comes to me and buys a horse, or any other article, no matter what; I pass the thing over to him and he pays me my money, and there is the end of it; or if I give him credit on my books, when he comes and pays me the money I balance my books and there is the end of it. You cannot oblige a man to make a bill of sale; he does not need it; the thing is past.

Delivery is as good as any writing. Therefore it is useless to attempt to put a tax on papers that the law does not require, because anybody disposed to avoid it will simply say, "Here is my money, give me the goods, and that is the end of it." But people want a receipt for money paid. That is a thing that is important, and a tax, as I said before, is put upon receipts for money. The committee did not like the wording of that clause exactly, and they struck it out for the purpose of having it more deliberately considered in a committee of conference as they supposed it would be. If I supposed it would not be considered in the committee of conference I would non-concur in what was done by our committee in that respect and restore the tax on receipts to where it stood in the bill. I am inclined to think we can get considerable money out of it, because a receipt for money a man will have when it is due. That is as far as we can go, unless you pass a law compelling every man when he makes a sale to give a bill of sale or a bill of parcel, and that, I think, we are hardly prepared to do. If you pass it, you cannot enforce it, that I can perceive, and it would be useless.

To meet what the distinguished gentleman who writes the letter to my friend means to cover, and all he can cover, is merely to put a tax upon receipts, and that will amount to something, because the necessity of having a receipt will control the question of the stamp; but it is not so in regard to mere common sales of property which pass by delivery. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts as it stands would simply have the effect of saying to a man, "If you choose not to be content with delivery, and require a bill of sale, you must pay ten cents or twenty cents, or whatever it may be; but if you are satisfied to get possession of your goods when you pay the money, you save it." That will be the result. It will amount to just nothing. It has some sound to it, but really in my judgment no sense.

Let me say to my friend that if he intends to carry this system out, it needs a great many provisions. The bill which was introduced by the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. McDougall,] some two years ago, was a bill of some sixty or seventy sections, and all of them necessary to carry out any such system of stamps. That was predicated, if I recollect aright, on a system of stamps. But if you required stamp duties on all things of that kind, I will say to Senators it was conceded then that you would need, and that bill provided for, an infinity of officers to carry it out. You must have them, because it covers every shop of whatever description it may be throughout the whole country, and it would involve and would require a force and a system peculiar to and belonging to itself. That is the conclusion to which we came.

My honorable friend from California has gone over the history of two years ago on this subject, and charged me before the Senate with having reported a bill here from the Committee on Finance—a tax bill—without leave of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON. With the acquiescence of the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With the acquiescence of the committee, but that they never exactly approved it. That is the idea. That is true to a certain extent. Some gentlemen approved one part and some approved another part; but all, even the Senator from California, consented that I should report the bill from the Committee on Finance, and I reported it. The Senator from Rhode Island, who was then a member, (Mr. Simmons,) had his system. He introduced it. It was not accepted by the Senate. He supported it at length, and he was voted down, and the report of the committee was accepted.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did the Senator from California propose his amendment?

Mr. McDUGALL. Allow me to ask the Senator from Maine a question. Did not the committee decline to authorize you to report the bill until I had acquiesced, and did I not cast the vote in committee authorizing you to report it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot say but that that was so. I remember that the Senator from California was very kind and accommodating.

Mr. McDUGALL. Was it not on the distinct understanding that the Senator from Rhode Island and myself might bring our propositions before the Senate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unquestionably. Every member had that right.

Mr. McDUGALL. My vote in committee gave the majority.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Everybody was willing that I should report the bill, even the Senator from California; but they entered a caveat that they should offer their own amendments, which was agreed to.

Mr. McDUGALL. I beg the Senator's pardon. Many were not willing at the start to let the bill be reported, but it was on my acquiescence. I had my bill printed before the committee, and the committee found fault with me afterwards, I may say to the Senate, that I had myself given the consent of the committee to the report made by the chairman.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They did not say anything to me about that. The Senator from California came in here; he offered his proposition; he took his day. He argued it, I think, for two or three hours.

Mr. McDUGALL. About an hour and a half.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He made a long speech on the subject, and he finally took a vote, and he got his own vote and one other honorable gentleman's who said he would not leave the Senator to vote alone. That was the result of it, as many of the Senate will recollect. I recollect it very distinctly. The Senator will certainly remember that when I came to reply and wind up the argument on the subject, he made a special request to me that I should not comment on his bill, because he only got a single vote for it, to which I acceded.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think the Senator's recollection is wrong.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot be mistaken about that, and finally the Senator used an argument to me that he was going to vote for my bill, and therefore I might save myself the trouble of replying, and he did so vote.

Mr. McDUGALL. There is another mistake. I had voted against the Senator's bill, and the Senator appealed to me that it was a necessary measure and that the bill must pass, and therefore I yielded and changed my vote from what it was in the first instance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It got every vote in the Senate except one or two. I did not need the Senator's vote at all. What I said to the Senator was, "You promised if I would not comment on your bill to vote for this one, and therefore I claim your promise," and the Senator performed it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not remember that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do most distinctly. That was the whole matter. There was no feeling about it. The bill introduced here, the bill that the committee acceded, if you please, to my reporting—

Mr. McDUGALL. Will the Senator allow me to say one thing, as this controversy has been brought in by myself? I remember that during that discussion, after the understanding that I have stated in committee, I had the honor of sitting in the chair which the President fills, and a controversy grew up between the Senator from Rhode Island and the chairman of the committee, in which, at that time, he ignored what I understood to be the understanding in committee. I left the chair for my place on the floor, and I will say now that the reason why I found it useless to even undertake to argue in extenso the measure I introduced was that the Senator insisted upon his position as chairman of the Committee on Finance, and did not allow either the Senator from Rhode Island or myself to have a fair hearing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see how it was in my power to prevent it.

Mr. McDUGALL. The chairman of the Committee on Finance is potential.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is true that after a full discussion by the Senator from Rhode Island of his propositions, arguing them at length as much as he pleased, and some reply made by myself, the Senate voted him down; and as I said before, when the Senator from California took his turn and argued his measure at length, I did not reply, and the Senate voted him down. That is the whole story about it.

Mr. McDUGALL. The conclusion was waived by me after advancing my opinions.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say to the chairman of the committee that in anything I say here on any proposition I make, I have certainly no disposition to undervalue the services of the chairman of the committee or of the Committee on Finance, or to compare my own knowledge on the subject of this bill to theirs. I have certainly some convictions in regard to this matter of taxation; I have reflected somewhat upon this bill and read it with some degree of care, and listened to all that has been said upon the subject. I moved this amendment because I thought it would give us some revenue, which we so much need at this time. I think we ought certainly to do all that we can to increase the income of the Government. The condition of the country we all know; it is understood by us all, and we have some experience in our own history in regard to these matters. During the Revolution there were a class of men who advised raising money to pay bills; another class thought they would issue paper money. We got through the Revolution and we repudiated two hundred and fourteen millions of paper money. We paid our foreign debt, our debt to our soldiers, our debt to the States, amounting to about eighty millions, and repudiated two hundred and fourteen millions. Let our paper money run down; let our debt be overwhelming, and we shall have as soon as the war is over a party of repudiation here. We had better pay all we can now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to ask the Senator how he provides for the case of sales where no bill of sale is given.

Mr. WILSON. This amendment applies to bills of sale given for goods, wares, and merchandise, and nothing else.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a voluntary tax. If there is no receipt, there is no tax.

Mr. WILSON. I take it merchants and business men will go on with this tax precisely as they do now, and that men will not once in a hundred times buy goods where they do not take a receipt.

Mr. GRIMES. But they can do it.

Mr. WILSON. There is a possibility of it.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no penalty.

Mr. GRIMES. All a man has to do is to have the books balanced, and receive the goods, and there is the end of it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I propose another amendment, with a view of increasing the revenue. In section one hundred and fifteen, lines twelve and thirteen, page 171, I move to strike out the word "ten" in each of those lines and insert "two," so that if the amendment should carry, the provision will be that all incomes under $600 will be exempted from taxation; and on all incomes from $600 to $2,000, 5 per cent. is to be paid; and on all over $2,000, 7½ per cent. I do it for two reasons: first, I think it will increase the revenue from incomes very largely, because we shall get 7½ per cent. from $2,000 to $10,000, where we get only 5 per cent. under the bill as it stands. In the next place, men of wealth think they ought not to be discriminated against because they have got a large sum of money. Perhaps some persons over $10,000, and there are a great number in the country, would feel that they might lower their taxes enough, or try to make up the difference. But if we tax all persons that have an income over $2,000 7½ per cent. it will reach so large a class in the community, so many men who are able to pay, that I think there will be no objection to this form in which the bill will have been placed, and we shall certainly add a great deal to the revenues of the Government.

I move to strike out "ten" and insert "two," so that all persons who have an income over $2,000 shall pay the income tax of 7½ per cent., and from $600 to $2,000 pay 5 per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply say that I think that is too much of a tax on such small incomes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Say $5,000.

Mr. WILSON. Well, I will say $5,000 on the suggestion. I move to strike out "ten" and insert "five," so as to put a tax of 7½ per cent. on incomes over $5,000.

The question being put, there were on a division—yeas 14, nays 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON. I call for the yeas and nays. We have a quorum about the building.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. Is this amendment susceptible of being amended so as to make all over $15,000 pay 10 per cent.?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That cannot be done now. After this amendment is made you can have a vote on the amendment below.

Mr. GRIMES. I am perfectly content to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, if we should carry out the system of gradation and let the big fellows who get from $25,000 up to $100,000 a year pay a proportionate rate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Connors, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, McDougall, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, and Wilder—18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Cowan, Fessenden, Foot, Henderson, Howe, Powell, Richardson, Van Winkle, and Wiley—11.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Buckalew, Dixon, Foster, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Salisbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move now that the Senate do not concur in the amendment made by the Senate in Committee of the Whole on page 171, by which the committee agreed to strike out the words:

And not exceeding $25,000; and a duty of 10 per cent. on the excess over $25,000.

The committee struck out the provision of the House bill that all persons who had an income over \$25,000 should pay 10 per cent. We have established now the rule that all over \$5,000 shall pay  $\frac{7}{8}$  per cent. Now I propose to continue this gradation and make all those who receive over \$20,000 pay 10 per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not say over $10,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. On the excess, not on the whole?

Mr. GRIMES. It is all on the excess.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Say $15,000.

Mr. GRIMES. I hear on all sides the proposition that I shall say all over $15,000, 10 per cent., and some say $10,000, and others $20,000. I will strike the balance and say $15,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly a tax of that sort will never affect me, but I should like to know on what principle a larger tax is imposed on an increased income. It seems to me that perfect justice requires that the same tax shall be levied on the same amount of property anywhere. I suppose that a duty of that sort will not affect the incomes in the West much; but I do not see exactly the justice of imposing a tax so heavy upon incomes, even though they be elsewhere than in my particular section of the country, unless it be imposed on other incomes. We exempt $600; that is for the poor man; and beyond that it seems to me that incomes ought to bear the same rate. I do not see the justice of such legislation.

Mr. GRIMES. As to the practice, we have established that already by a very decisive vote of the Senate. As to the principle on which it is based, I will refer the Senator from Missouri to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] and the array of authorities which he read to us the other day from Say and other political economists, showing us that this was the principle on which all income taxes ought to be assessed, and it is not for me to controvert the authorities which the Senator from Massachusetts exhibited here in the Senate to so great an extent, and it seems that they have made such an impression on the minds of Senators that we have reversed the decision that we made at that time, and have decided exactly to the contrary to-day. Now, I propose to carry that principle out to a little greater extent, and cause these men who have large fortunes and derive therefrom large incomes to pay a little amount, only  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., in addition to the rate paid by the small men who exhaust nearly all of this income in the support of their families. If there is any class of men that the distinction ought to be made in favor of and not against it is the very class of men we have discriminated against, and now we reach a class of men who have a surplus over and above the money that is necessary to meet their family expenses, and it is that class that I propose to reach and tax by the amendment that I propose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I humbly hope it will be fixed some way or other to-day, because if we do not fix it now, to-morrow it will be fixed some other way, and gentlemen will want to argue it over again, and it will be so every day in the week. Let us have it somehow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "fifteen" in the following clause:

And not exceeding $25,000; and a duty of 10 per cent. on the excess over $25,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The other amount at present is out of the bill, and those words that have been stricken out in committee have got to be restored before they can be amended. The first question will be on concurring in striking out those words.

Mr. GRIMES. I propose my amendment as a separate part of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If those words are in the bill you can make the amendment; but at present you cannot make the amendment as long as they are out of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, and that is open to amendment in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. CONNESS. As I understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance, if the Senate vote "ay" upon the proposition of the committee, then the Senator from Iowa will move to strike out the words adopted, and insert those he proposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those words are now out of the bill by a vote of the Senate. The question is on concurring with the committee in striking out those words. Those, therefore, who want them stricken out will vote "ay;" those who, like the Senator from Iowa, do not want them stricken out will vote "no."

Mr. SUMNER. Before the question is put on concurring with the committee, those words are open to amendment as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. SUMNER. And therefore the motion of the Senator from Iowa is in order to amend that proposition, and then the next question would be on concurring with what has been done in committee with that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment made in committee can be amended before the question on concurrence is taken. The Chair may be wrong, but that is the decision the Chair makes. The first question will be on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, to amend the amendment made in committee, by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "fifteen."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made in committee, striking out the whole clause, as it has been amended.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. GRIMES. In the same clause, line sixteen, I move the same amendment, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen" before the word "thousand," in order to make it conform to the amendment just adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The other amendments necessary to make the sentence complete will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. McDUGALL. On page 140, line three hundred and forty-six, I move to strike out the word "five" and to insert the word "two;" so that the clause will read:

On quicksilver produced from the ore, a duty of 2 per cent. ad valorem.

I do not care to discuss this amendment. I believe it is understood very well by the Senate. The tax as it stands in the bill is a tax on the gross proceeds, and would amount to a duty on the net proceeds of something like 15 or 18 per cent. I believe there is no objection to the amendment. Two per cent. ad valorem will make a duty on the net proceeds of about 6 or 8 per cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask a separate vote upon the amendment proposed by the committee on page 73, section sixty-three, line four. I understand that the Senate in committee have inserted there "twenty-five cents," making the tax upon beer $1 25 a barrel. From all I understand of the subject I think a tax of one dollar is quite enough. I ask for a separate vote upon that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to insert the words "and twenty-five cents" after the word "dollar," in line four of section seventy-three; so that it will read:

That there shall be paid on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors, by whatever name such liquors may be called, a duty of $1 25 for each and every barrel, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really hope the Senate will concur with the committee in that amendment. I think it is very desirable to leave the question open for the consideration of the committee of conference. There is no disposition whatever on the part of anybody to put this tax beyond what it ought to be; but if we adopt it as it came from the House of Representatives there is an end of it, and we cannot vary it, however we may see fit to vary the tax on whisky, and therefore we shall have it in precisely its present shape, and can neither raise nor reduce it. We do not know exactly what the result will be on consideration; but as there is really no disposition anywhere to put this tax beyond what the article can bear, I think it would be very much safer to leave it to a committee of conference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot think it possible that the House of Representatives will, without investigating the amendments made to this bill by the Senate, just pass a vote to disagree to the amendments, and appoint a committee of conference. I have been told by a member of the House that that would not probably be the case. I do not believe it is a very good system of legislation, and I would not vote for such a system if I were a member of the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the only system of legislation possible on a bill of this size, if you want to get through it in any time.

Mr. CONNESS. It will be remembered by the Senator from Indiana that this is a pretty vexed question. It involves the question of taxing the stock on hand. The Senate has adhered to their position upon that proposition very tenaciously; the House of Representatives have been equally tenacious, or nearly so; and I think the entire question had better be left open and left to the committee of conference. I think it would be subject to better adjustment there. I hope that course will be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, will the Senate concur in the amendment made in committee? The amendment made in committee was to insert "25 cents" instead of "50 cents" after the word "dollar."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not want the vote just in that shape, because that would be even more objectionable. I move to strike out both "50" and "25 cents."

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senate do not agree to the first question, to concur in the amendment made in committee, the question would then return on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What I want is the provision of the House bill on this subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly; but it will require two votes. I hope it will remain as it is.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope the Senator from Indiana will withdraw his amendment. I am with him in reducing the tax to $1; but I do not want the committee of conference, if it shall be raised on this bill, instructed by a vote of the Senate, if we shall decline to change it, to adhere to a tax of $1 25 or $1 50, or any higher sum than $1.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that if we stand by the tax of $1, then the Senate concurs with the House, and there is no question of disagreement between the two bodies. If it is the pleasure of the Senate that this tax should be $1, which I think from all the information I have is as high as it ought to be taxed, then there is no disagreement, and the bill is concluded in respect to this subject.

Mr. GRIMES. I think $1 is as high as it ought to be taxed, and I think it is higher in proportion than whisky is taxed by the bill; but I would rather leave it to the committee of conference, I believe, than, not knowing what the sentiment of the Senate might be, to allow a vote to be taken with the risk of an adverse vote being given which might be regarded by any future committee of conference on the subject as a sort of instruction on the part of the Senate to stick to $1 25 rather than to $1 a barrel.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not represent this interest in any large degree, and do not feel authorized to control it, and as Senators who agree with me in opinion about it think it had better be left in this shape, of course I will yield my judgment to theirs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire a separate vote on the amendment of the committee inserting the proviso to section one hundred and nine, on page 164. I do not intend to discuss it, but this is a discrimination against State banks which I do not think ought to find its way into this bill. If you tax State banks, I think it ought to be the same tax throughout. In some of the States, Indiana among others, the security is so ample, because of the mutual responsibility of the branch imposed by the Legislature in chartering the State banks, that the banks may with safety to the bill-holders issue more than the amount of their capital stock. The State Bank of Indiana has proved to be a very safe bank through a period of thirty years. It has proved to be a very safe bank up to this time. It has furnished a great deal of currency, beyond 90 per cent. of its capital, with which the people were well content. Their issues do not now exceed 90 per cent. as I understand; but still as the State in the charter has said that they might issue more than that, I do not think Congress ought to tax a privilege which the State has given to a bank more than the other issues of State banks, and of the national banks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee regarded this provision as absolutely essential to prevent an improper inflation of the currency. It is only a tax on the excess of circulation over 90 per cent. of their capital. The national banks are expressly confined to a circulation equal to 90 per cent. of their capital. We do not undertake to prevent the issue of any amount over that by the State banks, but we provide that if they do they shall pay this tax; so that it will be giving a great advantage to the State banks over the national banks if we do not put this tax on their circulation over 90 per cent. I will say to the Senator also, that while there may be some good banks in the country, there are apt to be some very poor ones, and it will not do to omit a provision useful in itself because it may affect some who will not abuse the privilege. I hope the Senate will adhere to its action on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. It is on concurring in the Senate in the amendment made as in committee. The committee inserted a proviso to this section, and the question now is whether the Senate will concur in the amendment made in committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those who are for retaining the provision will vote "yea," and those who wish to strike it out will vote "nay."

The Secretary read the amendment, which was on page 164, section one hundred and nine, line eighty-two, after the word "liquidation" to insert the following proviso:

Provided, also, That all banks, associations, corporations, or individuals, issuing notes or bills for circulation as currency, shall be liable to pay the further duty of one fourth of one per cent. in each month upon the average amount of such currency issued beyond the amount of 90 per cent. of its capital. In the case of banks with branches, the duty herein provided for shall be imposed upon the circulation of each branch, severally, and the amount of capital of each branch shall be considered to be the amount allotted to or used by such branch. And the additional duty herein provided for shall be collected and paid at the time and in the manner hereinbefore specified. And so much of an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863, as imposes any tax of banks, their circulation, capital, or deposits, other than is herein provided, is hereby repealed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Johnson, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Carlile, Collamer, Davis, Foot, Henderson, Hendricks, McDougall, Powell, and Ten Eyck—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Baskalew, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wade, and Wright—17.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to test the sense of the Senate upon the subject of the tax on manufactures, without occupying any time upon it, because it has already been sufficiently debated. I will therefore move to strike out the word "five" in line four hundred and two, page 142, and to insert "ten." If this amendment should be made, I will then follow it up with the corresponding changes that will be necessary in this section of the bill. If the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] wishes a vote on a tax of 7 per cent. in the first instance I have no objection to a vote being taken on that. The clause, if amended as I propose, will read thus:

On cloth and all textile or knitted or felted fabrics of cotton, wool, or other materials, before the same has been dyed, printed, or bleached, and on all cloth painted, enameled, shirred, tarred, varnished, or oiled, a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "ten" and inserting "seven."

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that perhaps it would be better to allow the vote to be taken on inserting "ten" first, and then, if that should not be agreed to, on inserting "seven."

Mr. WILSON. I would rather vote on the "seven" first.

Mr. CONNESS. The vote will be taken on inserting the largest number first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. If the word "seven" is inserted I understand I cannot move to strike it out. I shall therefore insist on my amendment to insert "ten."

Mr. FOOT. I will suggest that, as it is proposed to insert different grades of taxation, the proper motion would be in the first place to move to strike out the word "five." If that is carried, it leaves it a blank, and then Senators can move to insert seven, eight, or ten, and the question will be taken in order, beginning with the highest.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will follow the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont. I simply wish to get the sense of the Senate on the tax on manufactures, and I will therefore move to strike out the word "five."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say simply this: the rate of duty on manufactures was fixed on great consideration by the Committee of Ways and Means, and adopted by the House of Representatives, and I think the Committee on Finance on the part of the Senate on the same consideration concluded that that was as high as the duty ought to be put upon these articles at present. I believe there is a great deal of unnecessary fright about what this bill will raise. I believe, moreover, that there is a limit to the capacity of manufactures, taken as a whole, to bear a tax. It is very different here from what it is in England. The great bulk of the manufactures there are owned by large companies, composed of men of great wealth. It is so in part to some extent in this country, but that by no means includes all manufactures. A great many of them have a hard struggle to get along, and they have not that superabundance of capital which is necessary in order to meet all contingencies.

Sensors will recollect this duty is to be paid at once on the sales. The sales are necessarily made on credit of six months, or four months, and three months. Three or four months is the ordinary rate. It requires, therefore, a large amount of money to make the payments in advance, and to await the returns of the sales; and only those possessing a large capital and having great facilities for raising money can meet them. If we attempt to put on such very heavy duties, in my judgment the result will be to put a great deal of money in the hands of rich companies having large stocks on hand, and who can stand the tax very well, while there will be other companies which are not able to keep those stocks, and which have not that power; and I am afraid the effect will be very disastrous upon them. We cannot possibly do all these things at once.

I think the mistake which my friend from Ohio makes is in supposing that all we have to do in relation to these things is to consider how much money we can get out of a given tax provided it is all paid; that it makes no difference in reality whether the tax is 5, 10, 15, 20, or even 50 per cent. I believe he thinks we can get a tax of 50 per cent. from manufactures without difficulty, because people will pay it. The result of all these things is to embarrass business to a very great extent. You must depend on the manufactures of the country for a very large and important part of your revenue, and depending upon them for a very large and important part of your revenue, the tax must be so laid as to enable them to pay it.

While in New England—and I suppose my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] will bear me out in saying that—there are some large and wealthy manufacturing companies, there are many smaller ones that are coming into existence and have a hard time to live, not so much perhaps manufacturers of cotton or manufacturers of wool, which are not so extensive, but there are very many small manufacturing establishments growing up in different sections of the country. The revenue you will get from one large establishment is larger perhaps than from two smaller ones, but the great mass of small manufacturing establishments after all pay the most revenue. It is the policy of the country to sustain them, and not to break them down in your effort to get more revenue out of the matter than you can well get, by simply considering, as we are too apt to do, some very large and rich companies, which perhaps could meet it and would be very glad to meet it, for the very great advantages they would derive from it over their rivals who are less able than themselves, and who are springing up all around them. I do not believe it would be for the advantage of the revenue.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not vote for a tax of 10 per cent. on manufactures, which I know is a pretty heavy tax, with any view to discriminate against manufactures, because I know this tax will be added to the price of the article, and will be paid by the consumer, poor and rich alike. But, in my judgment, the amount of revenue that will be yielded by this bill is not sufficient during a time of war. The Comptroller of the Currency estimates the amount at $250,000,000. I think the Senate have added to it considerably, especially in the liquor tax. But the aggregate during the next year will not exceed $250,000,000, which, in my judgment, is inadequate to sustain the present expenditures. The additional 5 per cent. on all manufactures will yield some fifty or sixty million dollars. It will be a tax as equally distributed as any we can assess. It will be from comparatively few persons; because, although it will reach to almost every article of wear and consumption, it will be collected from the manufacturers, many of whom will pay a largely increased tax, and therefore it will be a cheaper tax to collect than one collected from a great number of individuals.

The argument on this subject is perfectly apparent to every one. It is only a question as to the rate of taxation. I have no doubt of the capacity of our people to pay a tax of 50 per cent. on manufactures if it should be necessary. It would add 50 per cent., or 60 per cent. probably, to the cost of all manufactured articles; but I believe an assessment of this kind is an easier form of taxation than any other that could be proposed. As I said in discussing this matter a few days ago, when the framers of the Constitution were first exercising their exclusive power of laying duties on imports, they hesitated on the rates of duty as between 3, 5, and 10 per cent. The first tariff law levied duties of 5, 10, and 12½ per cent. They looked upon this tax on internal manufactures very much in the same light as we do now, and they hesitated between a tax of 3 and 5 per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A tax on imports is a very different thing from a tax on manufactures.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot distinguish between them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The distinction is simply this: in levying a tax on imports you do not call upon the manufacturer to pay the tax on the sale of the article; but it is paid on the importation, and the importer adds the cost of importation to the price at which he finally proposes to sell it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only difference is that the tax in the one case is collected from the importer, and in the other case it is collected from the manufacturer. In either case the cost of the duty is added to the cost of the goods in some form or other. That is the only difference that I know of. In the one case the manufacturer pays the tax, and in the other the importer. Both are mere agents of the Government to collect the tax and distribute it among the people. I cannot, therefore, see any difference between an internal tax and a duty on imports. However, it is a matter which any Senator can decide for himself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. A few days ago I insisted that the Senate should not impose a very high or unreasonable tax upon a western production. To some extent my judgment on that question was not agreed to by the Senate; but I do not intend on this question to be governed by what I thought was wrong policy adopted by the Senate then. I think 5 per cent. is a very high tax on manufactures. It is an increase over the last tax of about 60 per cent., I understand. I think it was 3 per cent. before, and now it is 5. I think that is very high, and I shall not vote for any change from the 5-per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON. The tax you complained of was an increase of 500 per cent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know the increase I complained of was 500 per cent.; but the Senate said we could bear it. The Senator from Ohio repeats that argument now. How much manufactured articles will bear is a hard question to decide. Cotton and woolen goods must be worn. Common decency requires that the people should be dressed and clothed, and they must be; and perhaps if you put the tax at 50 or 100 per cent., still the people would not go naked. You can force upon the necessities of the community an enormous tax perhaps, especially if you inflate the currency according to the policy of the Administration to correspond. I will not disguise the fact, however, that my judgment on this question is to some extent controlled by the belief that the tax to be paid by the manufacturer will be put on the price of the article and finally be paid by the consumer, and I think 5 per cent. is high enough.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make a suggestion or two in regard to a principal branch of manufacture which perhaps has not come to the notice of the Senate, though it may perhaps to some Senators; and that is the cotton manufacture. During the past year most of the cotton manufactories have been closed either wholly or partially. They had worked up the stock they had on hand when the rebellion broke out, and from the rise in cotton they made very good products and very good profits. After working up that stock on hand, they generally closed up their manufactories. They have within a few months past attempted to start again; but the supply of cotton is a very uncertain one; it is not known where it is to come from yet; the whole section of the country that formerly produced the cotton is in a very unsettled state; and the suggestion I wish to make to the Senate is whether at the present time it is desirable to increase the tax on that branch of manufacture more than two fifths or two thirds what it was before.

I will state further, as illustrating this matter, that in the city where I live, one of the cotton manufactories there has gone into the woolen manufacture, and another has recently sent an agent to England to bring out the proper machinery for the manufacture of flax, because they desire to go forward with some manufacture. They have been entirely closed as regards cotton manufactures, and they do not know where they are to get a supply of cotton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on striking out the word "five" as the duty on manufactures.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the idea of striking out the duty of 5 per cent.?

Mr. FESSENDEN. With a view to insert 7½ or 10.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the amendment proposed is a pretty sweeping one. After the consideration the subject has received, I hope we shall not vary the tax.

Mr. SIEMAN. We have been considering the subject ever since the bill has been before us.

Mr. COLLAMER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. The simple question, I understand, is on striking out "five," with a view to raising it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMEROY.) That is the question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cressess, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, Powell, Richardson, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Pomero, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Catlett, Chandler, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsay, Riddle, Stansbury, Tappan, Wilkinson, and Wright—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to insert on page 144, after the four hundred and forty-fifth line, the following:

On tobacco in the leaf, a duty of 20 cents per pound, which shall be a lien thereon until the duty has been paid.

Mr. President, we are looking around in every direction to find an income for our country. We are looking to whisky, and we are looking to forty other different things. Now, I present one single article, which, if taxed according to the proposition I send to the Chair, will, in all probability, bring some fifty millions. It will certainly bring that unless I have been misinformed. I have a letter in my hand from a gentleman who resides in a tobacco-growing part of the country, in which he calls attention to the importance of a tax on tobacco in the leaf as a source of revenue to the country. His statement is very short and explicit, and, in short, it contains the whole case; therefore I will read it:

"The suggestion which I am about to make may reach you too late to be acted upon, even if it shall strike you favorably. I always hesitate about making any suggestion in relation to a matter pending in Congress, and when I do make one it is with diffidence and reluctance. This matter of which I am about to speak, though it has been talked about in Congress, may not have been brought to your attention. It has been brought very specially to mine. It seems to me not to have received the attention in Congress which its importance demands. This is a tobacco-raising region."

That is, where this gentleman lives—

"tobacco is now a leading product here, and it bids fair soon to become the chief product. Have you ever thought what a revenue might be derived from even a small tax from tobacco in the leaf as well as in the hands of the producer? The crop of the whole country in 1860 was about four hundred and thirty million pounds; last year the crop was two hundred and eighty million pounds; and the crop for the current year is estimated at two hundred and sixty million pounds. While it may be supposed that the crop will be smaller this year than last, here it bids fair to be much larger. A tax of 10 cents per pound, which would be very light, on two hundred and sixty million pounds would yield $26,000,000; a tax of 20 cents per pound, which the article would well bear, would yield $52,000,000. Such a tax would not reduce the consumption of tobacco materially; I doubt whether it would reduce it perceptibly. I do not believe it would diminish the export, for I do not see where else the world is to get its tobacco. I believe that under such a tax the production would go on increasing as rapidly as it is now increasing throughout the North. Tobacco is a luxury, and therefore one of the most fit subjects for taxation. Fifty-two millions a year! Can the country afford to lose it?"

Mr. JOHNSON. Where does the writer reside?

Mr. SUMNER. In a tobacco part of the country.

Mr. HENDERSON and others. Give us the name.

Mr. JOHNSON. What part of the country? Mr. SUMNER. In an eastern State.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose in Connecticut, where they raise a very fine tobacco.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not quite done, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg your pardon, I thought you were through.

Mr. SUMNER. The last words of this letter are:

"Fifty-two millions a year! Can the country afford to lose it?"

Mr. President, I have done my duty in presenting this question to the Senate. I believe it ought to be considered. It remains to be seen whether there are any sufficient objections to this tax. If there are, I am not aware of them. They may be developed by discussion, but they have not presented themselves to my mind in the inquiry which I have been able to give to the question since my attention has been directed to it.

You cannot fail to perceive, in the first place, the large sum that may in this way be touched; in the second place, the comparative facility with which it may be touched, particularly as compared with many other taxes which we now impose by this bill. Here, in one large lump, by a tax on a single article, we may touch a very large sum. I believe in applying our taxation to a few articles, from which we may get large sums respectively, we do much better than by distributing the taxation over a vast number of articles from which respectively we may get comparatively small sums. If I were to make a criticism on the bill now under consideration, it would be that, discarding the best examples of other countries, it taxes a large number of articles instead of a few leading articles. I find that in 1857 in England the whole amount of the excise collected amounted to £17,000,000. I speak in round numbers.

Mr. JOHNSON. Eighty-five million dollars.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, sir. Out of that seventeen million pounds sterling, which was the sum total of the excise tax in 1857, upwards of fifteen million pounds sterling came from the tax on two articles—spirits and malt. Of course the Government were able to abandon the multitudinous taxes on other articles, on paper, if you please, on windows, on the light of heaven; and in a much easier way, with less odium, to receive a larger return from the people. I propose that, so far as possible, we in our country should imitate that authoritative example, that we should be taught by it, and that we should apply our taxation to a few articles so far as possible, and to avoid imposing it upon the large number of articles. As an approximation to what seems to me the right rule, I move the tax on tobacco in the leaf.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member certainly is right in bringing the subject before the Senate, because it comes recommended to him by a gentleman in whom he has confidence, and he is still more right if he thinks with the authority upon which he speaks. I had supposed before I inquired where the writer of that letter resided that he resided in the East, and in the tobacco-growing portion of the East, where they make a very fine kind of tobacco; a tobacco that is used almost exclusively in wrappings for cigars, and demands some sixty, seventy, or eighty dollars in the hundred. But the larger portion of the tobacco-growing region makes a very inferior tobacco. It makes so inferior a tobacco that upon an average it does not sell for more than eight or ten cents in the pound.

The honorable member proposes, if I understand his amendment, to levy, not an ad valorem tax upon leaf tobacco, which would cause the leaf tobacco of Connecticut and Massachusetts, if there is any grown in Massachusetts, and I believe there is, to pay a tax upon the actual value of that production; but a specific tax of twenty cents upon every pound of leaf tobacco. That as applied to Maryland tobacco and Kentucky tobacco and Tennessee tobacco would be a tax of some six or seven hundred per cent. on the value of the article, and as they are unable to sell that kind of tobacco abroad, where the most of it is sold, at a price which will justify the exportation of it and the purchase of it by the exporter at a larger amount than some eight or ten cents a pound, it would prevent the production altogether; and the effect of that would be that the entire production would be found in the eastern States, or at least would be found to consist of that very fine kind of tobacco which can only be produced in certain sections and in certain latitudes.

My friend from Massachusetts says that we ought to follow the English practice of taxation; that we ought to tax some few articles; that it would simplify the system, and would enable us to get clear of the necessity of taxing everybody and everything which enters into the use of man; but he does not propose that now. He has no idea of changing this bill, I suppose, for the purpose of modifying it so as to meet that view. He does not mean, therefore, to select tobacco for the purpose of getting clear of the other taxes to be found in this bill; but he proposes to tax tobacco some six or seven hundred per cent. higher than it has ever been taxed before. I think my ear could not have misled me, that when it was proposed just now to strike out the tax of 5 per cent. on manufactures, my friend voted against that proposition, and he voted against it with the knowledge that it was intended to fill up the blank which would have existed in the bill if the motion to strike out had prevailed, with an increased taxation beyond the amount which the committee had recommended, to seven or ten per cent. I suppose the honorable member would be willing to admit—I am sure if he will for a moment turn his mind inwardly and think of the subject he would admit—that a vast variety of the commodities which are manufactured in New England could bear a taxation exceeding 5 per cent. His colleague stated in the course of the day's session, and he stated it on Saturday, that he thought it could even bear an increase of double the amount which the committee proposed.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. I will say that I voted on that question with great hesitation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Still you voted.

Mr. SUMNER. Still I voted, certainly. The Senator is entirely right in the statement he makes. I voted with great hesitation. I want the tax on all articles to be as much as they will bear. I was not satisfied that manufactures would bear an increased tax. There were some reasons that led me to believe that they might bear an increase perhaps to 7 per cent.; but entertaining a serious doubt on the question I voted against the change.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not find any fault with the Senator.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that; but I wish the Senate to know precisely what governed me.

Mr. JOHNSON. Whether the Senator hesitated or not in giving his vote was a matter that I could not know until he stated it. He voted the very moment his name was called.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; what is very unusual with me, I forbore to vote when my name was first called.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not observe that. He does not forbear to vote usually, and he generally speaks out loud enough.

Mr. CONNESS. His constituents will be glad to hear that he hesitated about his vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the result of the hesitation rather strengthens what I am about to say. He hesitated to vote; and now he says he hesitated because he doubted whether the manufacturers of the East could bear this increase of taxation. If he will hesitate again over the amendment which he now proposes, he will withdraw that amendment, because I am sure he will see that all leaf tobacco cannot bear this increased tax; and that it is just as just to us in Maryland, Tennessee, and Kentucky to be encouraged, or not to have the production stricken down in our hands, to be encouraged in the production of this tobacco, as it is in Massachusetts to have their manufacturers encouraged in their particular manufacture. I put it to him if it is not probable, or, to state it more strongly and more truly, if it is not absolutely certain, that the tobacco of the constituents whom I in part represent, and those of the contiguous States of Virginia and Kentucky and Tennessee, will not be able to bear upon their leaf tobacco such a tax as he proposes.

The honorable member perhaps, like myself, is not in the habit of using tobacco, and his thoughts may not have been turned that way. Mine have not been from choice, but because of the position which I hold. I have been somewhat instructed in relation to this commodity because of the proposal to tax it. It was proposed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, I think, and perhaps by the Secretary of the Treasury in his message, to tax leaf tobacco 20 cents. It alarmed all our tobacco-growing people. It alarmed our tobacco merchants in New York, Baltimore, and elsewhere who buy and export the tobacco which we make. They all said that it would not bear the tax; not because people would not chew the noxious weed or smoke it, but because with reference to that kind of tobacco which we make, they could on the Continent make just as much as they wanted, although of an inferior kind, yet not so far inferior as not to be able to compete with our articles, and the result would be that the production in Maryland and in the States to which I have adverted would be stricken down in the hands of the planters.

Mr. President, I am sure that I do not make an appeal to the honorable member in vain when I say that there ought, at least as we now stand, to be some consideration paid to the condition in which Maryland, Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky are. The war has rendered almost valueless our former industry in all its branches except in this one branch. The whole business of the country, as far as manufactures and other things which are found necessary for the wants of the country are concerned, has gone from us. These southern States who, false to duty and false to honor, have left us, have left us comparatively without a market. We have nothing to sell but tobacco, comparatively speaking, and that we sell abroad. Now, impose such a tax as the one suggested by the honorable member, and you take away from us that article of wealth or of comparative wealth and prosperity. I hope, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the honorable member will not be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that this matter has been very carefully and thoroughly studied and considered in all its aspects in the Committee of Ways and Means, as I was informed from time to time, and they came to the conclusion that it would be very unwise in the present state of the country to put this tax on the unmanufactured article. I hope the time will come when we can do it without injuring the business. If it could be done without injury, I really should not make any objection to it; but at present I really believe it would be unwise to do it, and I believe the Committee on Finance concurred in that view.

Mr. SUMNER. If the experts testify according to the Senator from Maryland, then I see clearly that at this moment the tax that I propose might not be judicious; but I ask, what is the evidence? Of course I do not in any respect doubt the statement of the Senator; but do the experts say that such a tax as I have proposed is more than this article can bear? Do the experts say that tobacco with the tax I propose could not find a market in Europe?

Mr. JOHNSON. They do.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not so understood.

Mr. JOHNSON. Our tobacco in a great measure now is substituted by the German tobacco. The sales are falling off very much. If the Senator means by experts those dealing in the commodity, all the buyers of the article for exportation, without exception, have united in saying that a tax like the one proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, which is the one the Senator now proposes, would be fatal to production.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not quite sure that it would be fatal to production. Of course my own judgment is of no value against the judgment of those who, from their position and lives, are familiar with the article. I must act according to the information that I receive according to my inquiries; and taking all these and their results into consideration, I must say I am not satisfied that tobacco would not bear the tax that I have proposed. But if it would not bear a tax of 20 cents, then call it 10 cents, which would give us something over $20,000,000.

It seems to me there are two articles in our country on which we should make taxation bear, and we should shape everything in the future to that result: I mean tobacco and whisky. We can make those two articles support the Government without throwing the burden upon the multitudinous list which is in the present bill.

Whatever may be the result of the motion I have now brought forward, I am glad to have had the opportunity of calling the attention of the Senate to it, and I hope, if nothing comes of it now, that it will not be forgotten hereafter.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not intend to argue this question, or to expend the time of the Senate upon it. I will simply say to the Senator from Massachusetts that if he will investigate the matter closely he will find that his correspondent owns a very large stock of manufactured tobacco at present on hand.

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all. He is a collector in a tobacco district.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then he may be interested in increasing his fees in that way as collector. I can state to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is not a producer of the article in this country who will tell him that any such tax can be borne. Why, sir, when the proposition was made by the Secretary of the Treasury to tax tobacco in the leaf, numbers of individuals in my State wrote to me to inquire whether it was probable that such a tax would be levied or not; that if so, they would burn their tobacco. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN], I believe received similar letters in reference to this article in his own State. It is an article which perhaps is worth and is selling at $4, $4 50, and $5. Individuals may take up a wrong notion in regard to such a tax; but they have a notion that it would require the selling of their farms in order to pay the twenty cents a pound on tobacco. It would not only require the sale of the tobacco, but it would require the sale of the farm on which it is grown in order to pay such a tax.

As stated by the Senator from Maryland, it is a tax of five or six hundred per cent. on various qualities of tobacco. Any man who will suggest a tax of this sort is certainly suggesting a proposition that will ruin the growth of the article in this country. We are exporting large quantities of it now from this country; but already European countries have gone into the growth of it. We ought to encourage this production here, because it makes exchange for us in Europe; and, as was very properly stated by the Senator from Maryland, since we have lost the cotton of the South we need something upon which to build exchanges. I think, therefore, we ought to encourage the production of the article in this country upon that ground if upon no other.

This correspondent of the Senator from Massachusetts says that a tax ought to be levied on the leaf in the hands of the producer. I thought in all probability he had purchased up a large quantity of leaf tobacco, and wanted to impose a tax simply upon the leaf in the hands of the producer, not in his own of course; and I expect, if the matter were inquired into now, it would be found in all probability that he is the owner of a large amount of tobacco. I do not doubt it, because no reasonable man would make any such proposition.

Since this question of taxing tobacco and whisky, and other articles, has been before the Senate, we have been besieged here by individuals owning large stocks of those articles, and who can make fortunes out of them by a single turn of the wheel. Why, sir, a tax of 1 per cent. on some of these articles will put large fortunes into the pockets of various parties in this country. They have been thronging these lobbies ever since we have had this question under discussion; they meet you at every corner and every turn—men who expect to realize half a million by the settlement of this question. Whenever they can impose upon a gentleman in regard to these things they do it, and my friend from Massachusetts is certainly very much imposed upon when he thinks that this article can bear any such taxation as he now proposes.

If the Senator is so exceedingly anxious to increase the revenue as he professes to be, I think he ought to have voted for the proposition of the Senator from Ohio a moment ago to strike out the duty of 5 per cent. on manufactures and increase it to 7½ or 10 per cent. I do not ask him to do so, but I certainly do ask that he will look with some degree of allowance upon those gentlemen in Maryland, in Missouri, and in Kentucky and other States of the Union that produce something that is not produced perhaps in his own State.

Why, sir, some individuals regard tobacco not as a luxury, but as a necessary of life. Coffee is not a necessary or a luxury to me. I do not want it at all; but various parties must have it. There are various individuals to whom tobacco is almost as necessary as bread. Because the Senator from Massachusetts does not use the article himself, he ought not to desire to impose these taxes entirely upon everybody else or upon other people who do use it. Sir, I say this proposition is absurd.

Mr. POWELL. It is not my purpose to make a speech on this subject; but I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts has not informed himself about this tobacco trade, if he thinks he can get any revenue by taxing leaf tobacco. Is the Senator aware how much tobacco is grown in Europe with which we have to come into competition?

Mr. SUMNER. I know there is a great deal. Mr. POWELL. Why, sir, the American product is not one half what is grown in the world. Europe grows some 450,000,000 pounds, while this country produces about half that amount. In many countries of Europe where very little tobacco has been grown, Hungary, for instance, where formerly they only grew enough for their own consumption, in 1863 grew 88,000 hogheads of 1,200 pounds each, while in that year we only exported 101,000 hogheads. They are driving us out of the market all over Europe; and if you put any tax on leaf tobacco you will stop the production altogether. Heretofore we have got sometimes thirteen millions and sometimes twenty millions of money from our exportations of tobacco; but if you lay this tax on tobacco in the leaf, in my opinion we will not produce another pound for exportation.

Mr. SUMNER. I am content with the expression of opinion that has taken place, and with the permission of the Senate I will withdraw the amendment. But before I do I will remark to my friend from Missouri that he has entirely misunderstood the character of the correspondent whose letter I read. If he knew him he would not attribute to him any such idea as he did. The letter was written in good faith, founded on what he saw in his own district under his own eyes. It was a sincere, honest suggestion, patriotically made for the good of the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then he did not know what he was writing about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK. It is very desirable to get through with this bill to-day, if possible, and I therefore move that the Senate take a recess from half past four o'clock until seven.

Mr. POWELL. I will suggest that we meet at six instead of seven. That will give us plenty of time to get our dinners.

Several SENATORS. Say half past six.

Mr. POWELL. Well, I will say half past six, if gentlemen prefer that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We cannot very well get dinner in that time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope it will be fixed at seven o'clock. I would rather sit here without taking a recess; but if we are to go home at all we ought to have a little more time than is necessary to go home and come right back. It takes me three quarters of an hour to go home.

Mr. CLARK. Senators desire the recess to last until seven o'clock, and I do not feel disposed to shorten the time. I can come at any time that may be fixed upon. I will adhere to my motion, that the Senate take a recess from half past four o'clock till seven.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to perfect an amendment that has been adopted to section one hundred and two, on page 155. I propose to strike out the proviso to that amendment and to substitute in lieu of it what I send to the Chair. It does not change the provision, but simply perfects it. It is to strike out the proviso adopted in that section and insert the following:

Provided, That the duty hereby imposed shall not be charged upon receipts for the transportation of persons or property or materials between the United States and any foreign port.

It is merely a change of phraseology.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire also to amend that provision by striking out the words "except express companies." The words are inappropriate where they are placed, and those companies are provided for in the one hundred and third section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on Finance have increased the duty on stoves and hollow-ware as it was imposed in the bill by the House of Representatives from $3 to $5. I desire a separate vote upon that amendment proposed by the committee. I have hesitated myself to call up the subject, but my own judgment is that that tax is too high—too high in proportion to the other duties imposed upon manufactures of iron. I therefore ask for a separate vote upon that amendment. It is the clause on page 139, line three hundred and twelve:

On stoves and hollow-ware and castings of iron exceeding ten pounds in weight for each casting, not otherwise provided for, a duty of $5 per ton.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope that the views of the Senator from New York will prevail. The present duty upon those articles is $1 50 a ton. The House have increased it to $3, and the Senate have increased it to $5. I think that is too much. All the raw material that enters into the manufacture of these articles has been increased enormously in price, three times at least. Stoves are used most largely by the moderate and poorer classes of the people. All tenement houses now are built without fire-places, and with chimneys merely for the stove-pipes. I think that tax is rather too high.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be on concurring in the Senate with the amendment made in Committee of the Whole. That amendment was to strike out "three" and insert "five."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senate will concur with the committee in that amendment. The amendment was suggested to us by a man of very considerable experience and knowledge. He said that much more revenue might be derived from this source without injury to anybody. I took the pains to consult with a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, in whose judgment I have a great deal of confidence, on the subject, and he concurred in it. The fact is, they stand on a different footing altogether from everything else in the manufacture of iron.

We had before us a very intelligent gentleman, a constituent of my friend from New York, who was a large manufacturer of stoves. He objected to it, not on the ground that the article would not bear it, but he said it was a tax higher than on any other manufacture of iron, and what he objected to was the discrimination. I asked him if the discrimination would affect the trade in any way. He did not say that he should sell a stove less, or that it would affect the trade in any way. I adverted to the fact that the trade was an exceedingly profitable one, extensively carried on; that almost everybody had stoves; and that it did not come in competition with any manufacture of iron whatever. He admitted that to be so. His only argument was not a matter respecting his interest, but as arising from the appearance of the thing; that they were taxed higher in proportion than other manufactures of iron. He failed utterly, being a very frank man and answering truly about it, to give any satisfactory reasons to the committee, except that it was a discrimination. He did not contend that the discrimination would be in any way injurious to the trade, but he did not like the looks of it. I suggested to him that we could not very well spare the money on that account, if we could get it. He said that the previous tax had not been adequate. He admitted that the trade was very profitable. He said that if we imposed a tax of $3 as it stood in the House bill he thought that could be borne, but if we imposed $5 they should be obliged to add something to the price of the stoves. I concluded that the small amount that would be added by an additional tax of $2 on a ton of iron used in the manufacture of stoves would not amount to any more than the purchaser of a stove could well bear.

That is the question, and the whole question, as it stands. We looked at it with care and a disposition to do what was right about it. We had that gentleman before us. He appeared to be frank and upright and manly, and perhaps it was for the very reason that he was frank and manly about it that he entirely failed to satisfy us on the subject. I think it had better stand as it is.

Mr. COWAN. I do not think my honorable friend quite does justice to the gentleman who was before us on the subject of stoves and hollow-ware. I recollect very distinctly that he gave as a reason why this tax should not be raised that it would lessen the consumption; that the people who had a stove with a broken door or a cracked plate would struggle along with it for a long time rather than pay an increased price for the article; that they would get it mended rather than buy a new one. That is, perhaps, the only argument that can be adduced against the imposition of this additional tax other than that suggested by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island; and that is, that it is more than is placed upon any other article of the same kind and nature. I might add, too, that it goes further than to the stove of the poor man. It goes not only to his fireside, his fireplace, but it goes to the pot and to the skillet in which his dinner is cooked, and to the pan in which his beefsteak is fried. It covers all the class of hollow-ware, which is especially the necessity and the property of the poor.

I know of no reason why it should be taxed $5 a ton when other articles of the same material are only taxed $3. I hope the Senate will reduce it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question and decided that the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HARRIS. If it be not too late I will call for a division on that question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest that it is rather too late to call for a division. The result was declared deliberately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again if a division is demanded.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to have another vote on the question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We will fix it in the committee of conference.

Mr. HARRIS. I am afraid you will have too many things to fix there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in, there being, on a division—ayes 16, noes 9.

Mr. ANTHONY. On page 168, line sixteen, there is a little grammatical error. It now reads, "duplicate to the assistant assessors of the respective districts." It should read, "duplicate to the assistant assessor of the district."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that is right.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is my amendment, and the only one I expect to get in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I have two or three amendments to offer, and I suppose the Senate might as well dispatch one of them now as to wait until after the recess. I move to insert the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the judge of each United States district court shall appoint a commission to inquire and report the nature, amount, and value of any property belonging in whole or in part to any loyal person that may have been appropriated or destroyed for the public service by any military or naval officer, or any other person, under the authority of the United States; and also the nature, amount, and description of any property belonging in whole or in part to any loyal person that may have been held, occupied, or used for the public service by any military or naval officer, or any other person, under the authority of the United States, and how much the use or occupation of such property may have been worth; and also whether any property so occupied or used was thereby damaged, and the amount of such damage. And the commission aforesaid shall report to the said judge as well in vacation as in term time, who shall thereupon confirm said report, or remand it for further proceedings; and when the report shall be confirmed by said judge, it shall be final and conclusive between the United States and the owner or owners of said property. And in all cases where the report shows any amount to be coming to any loyal owner or owners of any property, upon the presentation of an official copy thereof, with a copy of the order of the judge confirming it, to the Treasurer of the United States, at the Treasury Department, the amount reported in favor of the loyal owner or owners of such property shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury collected and paid under this act not otherwise appropriated.

I do not propose to debate the amendment. I simply ask for a vote upon it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I will offer another amendment of the same character, except that it is restricted to the State of Kentucky instead of being general for the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator, who is a constitutional lawyer, that all laws for taxes must be uniform throughout the United States, and I suppose this amendment proposes to lay a tax on Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. You will better understand the uniformity of it when you have heard it read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the judge of the United States district court of Kentucky shall appoint a commission to inquire and report the nature, amount, and value of any property belonging in whole or in part, to any loyal person that may have been, or that may be, appropriated or destroyed for the public service by any military or naval officer, or any other person under the authority of the United States in the State of Kentucky, and also the nature, description, and quantity of any property belonging in whole or in part to any loyal person or persons within the State of Kentucky that may have been, or that shall be, held, acquired, or used for the public service by any military or naval officer, or other person under the authority of the United States, and how much the use or occupation of such property may have been worth, and also whether such property so occupied or used was thereby damaged, and the amount of any such damage. And the said commission shall report to the judge aforesaid as well in vacation as term time, who shall thereupon confirm said report, or remand it for further proceedings; but when the report shall be confirmed by said judge it shall be final and conclusive between the United States and the owner or owners of said property. And in all cases where said report shows any amount to be in favor of any loyal owner or owners of any property, upon the presentation of an official copy thereof, with a copy of the order of the judge confirming it, to the Treasurer of the United States at the Treasury Department, the amount reported in favor of the loyal owner or owners of such property shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury, equal to the amount collected and paid in the State of Kentucky under this act, except so far as the same may have been applied to the payment of the claims of the people in that State and herein provided for.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I will offer another amendment, to insert the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That no money raised under this act shall ever be applied to pay or subsidize any armed negroes in the service of the United States for any period of time after it goes into operation and effect.

Mr. President, I will read some facts in support of this amendment. I can as well present them before the recess as afterwards, as they will not occupy much time. I submit, of course, to the pleasure of the Senate in that regard.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very anxious to hear the Senator from Kentucky on this very important subject. It is new; it is a very novel question; and I shall be extremely happy to have him exhaust himself upon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I shall be very happy to enlighten my honorable friend. I have no doubt he needs light on this and many other subjects. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly. I feel the impression of the darkness that is upon my understanding, and I desire him to dispel it if he can.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, I will endeavor to do it.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that his amendment does not include mulattoes. It only speaks of negroes. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It becomes the duty of the Chair to announce that, by order of the Senate, the Senate will at this hour take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes; the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert, as a new section—

And be it further enacted, That no money raised under this act shall ever be applied to pay or subsidize any armed negroes in the service of the United States for any period of time after it goes into operation and effect.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senate is very thin, but I suppose that I have quite as large an amount of intelligence and a little more of attention and decorum than I should have if it were fuller, so that I prefer to go on at the present time.

I propose the amendment, Mr. President, as an economical measure, not only as a measure of right and justice to the owners of this class of property, but as one favoring the economical war administration of the Government; and in support of this position it is more my purpose to read some facts bearing upon the question rather than to make any remarks myself in support of it. I will read first from a correspondent of the Springfield (Massachusetts) Journal, writing from Port Hudson, Louisiana, on the 15th ultimo. I presume that that correspondent was a black Republican, as he was writing to a black Republican editor of a black Republican newspaper, and consequently that what he says in relation to the subject of slaves in that locality may be received by his political friends in this body as true, and is entitled to all the consideration which the truths that he relates may merit at the hands of the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I would inquire whether the black Republicans are the class of armed negroes that you refer to in the amendment as not being entitled to compensation. The amendment speaks of armed negroes. My inquiry is whether they are black Republicans.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will have a little patience he will soon discover the bearing of the facts which I am about to read, and he will concede that they are entirely pertinent to the occasion for this reason, they prove conclusively that the negro soldier is far inferior to the white; that he is much more wasteful of the Army supplies that are furnished to him, and that he renders less service and is much more expensive to the Government that employs him; and I suppose in these views the facts that this writer relates are altogether pertinent, and go to sustain the propriety of adoption of the amendment.

"THE CORPS D'ARRIQUE."

I suppose that is a sort of classical French. I am no French scholar—

"This body of troops, organized and equipped by order of General Banks, and intended to include about fifteen thousand men, having their headquarters at this post, has recently been subjected to several important changes. When the order of organization was promulgated, it contemplated the formation of eighteen regiments of five hundred men, with the same number of officers as in the regiments of one thousand."

There is one item of added expense for this description of soldiers. They are half regiments fully officered, and would consequently in that respect be twice as expensive as white soldiers.

"There were already three full regiments organized several months previous as 'Louisiana Native Guards,' and General Ullman"—

I believe he is the man who was known as the Hindoo candidate for the Presidency a few years ago—

"General Ullman had already commenced recruiting for the five regiments known subsequently as Ullman's brigade. These eight regiments were made the nucleus of the new corps, and during the summer and autumn of 1863, through the channels opened by the progress of the campaign, there were men enough enlisted to swell the number of regiments to about twenty-five, and General George L. Andrews was placed in command of the corps. But, unfortunately, it was found that the physical qualifications of the negroes were not equal to the hardships of drill and fatigue duty, many of them having in them the seeds of old and surely fatal diseases brought on by the vicious habits of plantation life, and many others being as yet young and immature in body and marked by hereditary taints. It is surprising to one unacquainted with the subject, to contemplate the terrible rate of mortality and to learn how many have lung and heart diseases, or are broken down by rheumatic affections, over-work, and ill usage. Thousands died, were discharged for disability, or deserted. The regiments dwindled down from five hundred to two hundred or three hundred; recruiting was stopped by an order from General Banks which contemplated the retention of as many able-bodied blacks as possible on the Government plantations; officers began to grow discouraged; resignations became the order of the day; disappointment on the pay question demoralized the men. All these causes combined to have an unfavorable effect on the corps.

"When the campaign commenced this season, four regiments were ordered to the field. To fill them up to six hundred each it was necessary to transfer men from three to four other regiments, leaving to each company in the latter only its officers and ten men. Then came the action of the War Department, changing the regimental numbers and designations to United States infantry, artillery, &c., and requiring a maximum of one thousand. Very little remains of the original corps, save in the regretful recollections of its past officers, and the formidable fortifications its men have erected here since the surrender of Port Hudson. General Andrews has gone North on leave, General Ullman succeeding to the command, and a full and careful inspection of all the works and forces here last week by General T. W. Sherman, who lost a leg in the siege of Port Hudson, has given rise to a rumor of a further change of commanders.

"What the future of the corps will be depends now upon the question of expediency: will the possible interests or necessities of our standing army warrant the enormous expense of organizing and drilling colored troops and bringing them up to the standard of white troops? As the resources of the South, agriculturally, are called out, the demand for labor of acclimated blacks will increase; if the available number is diminished by the requirements of a large army, there will be an increased opposition to maintaining black regiments. The question is of immediate and great importance. To fill up the black regiments in this department alone would require twenty thousand new recruits, and the relative mortality of white and black troops seems to indicate that it would be better to let the present black organizations die out and supply their places, if the necessity continues, from the army of foreigners now seeking our shores. Besides this reason there is another entering into the consideration of the subject, namely, the great cost of maintaining colored troops. They are, undeniably, idle, lazy, unproductive, and wasteful. The loss by wear and tear, such as the expense of keeping up their uniforms and equipments, of camp and garrison equipage, and all kinds of military stores and property, promises to exceed very greatly the corresponding expenditure for white troops, and it is scarcely a matter for doubt that their services are far less valuable, both in quality and quantity, to the Government. The subject is one which commands itself very forcibly to all who have an interest in the future character and condition of our national troops."

I presume that the honorable Senator from Kansas is entirely satisfied of the relevancy of the facts here detailed in connection with the subject of continuing the negro soldiers in the service, and particularly of adding to that class of soldiery. If it was not for fanaticism and partisan and political purposes individually and party, this inefficient, inferior, and expensive force never would have been enlisted. If the same considerations did not now impel to their continuance and augmentation, a sound political economy in the administration of the finances of the Government in the matter of war, and the greatest efficiency of the Army according to the number of men enrolled in it, would, in my judgment, immediately bring the Senate to the adoption of the proposition which I have presented in the amendment.

I will say, also, that in other points of view it was eminently improper to have employed this kind of soldiers. There were great and sufficient reasons not only connected with economy and efficiency in the Army, but of humanity to the black troops themselves, and to the white troops also, that ought to have forbidden the policy of making the negro slave either an object of, or a force in, carrying on this war.

I had a friend from the town of Mount Sterling in the State of Kentucky, Captain Samuel McKee, who raised a company about eighteen months ago and joined the service. There was not and is not now any more true and trustworthy Union man in all this broad land than he; and he is yet a friend and a sustainer of this Administration, notwithstanding the effect which its peculiar measures have had upon the institutions and the industrial interests of his State. He was captured by the rebels more than a year since and confined in Libby prison. He passed through here on his exchange some three or four weeks back. He had been in Libby prison thirteen months. He informed me that the aggregate number of Union prisoners that had been carried to Libby prison and to Belle Isle during his captivity was about eighteen thousand; that the prisoners in Libby were provided for about as well as the rebels had the means, and were sheltered; that on the island they were furnished with as much food and of various classes as they had it to bestow; but there were no huts to protect them against winter; there were no hospitals; the tents were much worn, and very insufficient for the protection of the prisoners. The consequence was that there was the most frightful mortality among them. He said that he had no doubt that fully six thousand of those eighteen thousand prisoners had perished from exposure, short allowance of rations and food, and consequent disease. He told me of the fraction of a Kentucky mounted regiment, when it was captured, numbering eighty-seven, of which every man had died there but three. He informed me of the fragment of a Missouri regiment of two hundred and forty odd men, which, with this Kentucky fragment, were prisoners upon Belle Isle, and of that number he said there were remaining, when he left Richmond, only about eighty survivors, and all the others had died.

Mr. President, this friend whom I have known from his infancy, whose father and whose grandfather I knew and were my neighbors and friends, had been a prisoner there for more than a long weary year, and the aggregate of those prisoners had been confined there from a period dating before the commencement of winter. The long imprisonment and the frightful mortality of those white prisoners was one of the baleful effects of the enlistment of negro soldiers. It has been said and published hundreds of times that the confederate authorities refused to exchange for negroes, or for officers commanding negro soldiers. But I have repeatedly seen published in our public prints what purported to be extracts from theirs, which represented that when negroes who had previously been slaves were captured by them they were returned to their masters into a state of slavery, but they had always been willing and had offered to exchange negro prisoners who were free before their enlistment, and their officers just as white prisoners. I suppose that this statement of the case is true.

But, sir, in support of a resolution which I offered on this matter early in the session I assumed this position: that humanity, policy, and sheer justice to the Union white prisoners who were in the hands of the rebels required that where they could be exchanged they ought to be then and there and at once exchanged, without any regard to negro troops or their officers, or if the rebels did refuse to exchange them, that because the rebels decided not to exchange a certain class of captives, it was no just ground and ought not to have been assumed by our Government as a reason or an obstacle to the exchange of such of our white troops as they were willing to exchange. This friend of mine ventured to me this opinion, that if that vast number of prisoners who had perished there by exposure and want and disease had been speedily and in good time exchanged, the vast majority of them would probably not have perished, but would now have been living. They might have returned to their homes as exchanged prisoners, and have rejoined the service, those of them whose terms had not expired, instead of dying in a prison without any of the attentions and solaces of family, of mothers, of sisters, and of wives. The policy of not delivering them from imprisonment, want, wasting disease, and a premature death, though the confederates refused to exchange all negro prisoners and their officers, established by Lincoln and Stanton, was not only cruel but it was murderous. It was their high duty to make every effort for the safety of the negro prisoners and their white officers, but the detention as prisoners, or even the execution of one or two hundred, or any number of them, by the rebels, in no degree mitigates the conduct of our authorities in permitting eight thousand of our white troops, who might have been exchanged, to perish in such horrible captivity. Their sufferings and death in no degree mitigated the captivity or death of the negro soldiers and their officers.

If the negro had not had arms placed in his hands, this deplorable history would never have been made.

I will name another case to illustrate the mistaken policy of incorporating into our armies negro soldiers. We read that General Wild commanded some negro forces down in the front of Richmond. He had a conflict with the enemy. Some of his troops were captured by the rebels, and his corps captured some of them. It has been published, and I have heard it stated in conversation, that General Butler, commanding that department, heard that the negro troops captured from General Wild's corps had been put to death by the rebels. Immediately he sent forward and reclaimed the rebel captives, whom he had ordered to some position up the river or North, I do not recollect where, with a view, if he ascertained that any of those negro troops had been put to death, to apply the bloody and ferocious law of retaliation to the rebel captives.

Sir, is this war to degenerate into a war of retaliation, of no quarter and general carnage? If that is to be the savage and ferocious principle—exploded ages and generations ago from all modern and civilized warfare—how shall it be applied, and to what extent? I admit the obligation imposed both by policy and humanity upon the General Government to protect all of its soldiery so far as it can do it without committing horrible outrage upon humanity. If the rebel troops put negro prisoners to death, and they who do the foul deed could be captured and identified, although I, with every man of common humanity, would feel shocked at the application of that atrocious law, I would not enter at least any open protest against their execution, but at the same time I would feel that it would outrage all humanity, that it would violate and shock the universal sentiment of Christendom; and if that principle of warfare is introduced into this contest and spreads, it will inevitably call the nations of the Christian and civilized world to interpose in the cause and for the protection of universal humanity.

But, sir, if those who murder the prisoners cannot be identified and the foul cruelty and crime fixed upon them, would our authorities put to death innocent men? Butler, I suppose, would; but I do not believe that the President of the United States could be brought to assent to it. Stanton might. Butler would, I have no doubt, if allowed, bring up and array in line men who were innocent of the crime, and because they belonged to the army that perpetrated that foul and bloody crime would himself have these innocent men bound, blindfolded, and put to death by the guns of a file of soldiery of equal or double their numbers. I maintain that such an act would be a cruel and a bloody and a most outrageous murder. The returned rebel prisoners could not be guilty, because the crime was committed after they had been captured. Sir, the soldiers in neither army are free agents. They are subject to the will and command, at the peril of life, of those who command them. It may be possible that some man who is a brute and a monster among the rebel soldiers—I do not know whether it is true or not—would, in cold blood, order the murder of these negro prisoners. If you can get the man who ordered the deed to be done, or those who voluntarily took part in it, they are the proper subjects for retributive, stern, and, if you please, bloody justice. But an unwilling instrument, a mere machine, a greater slave than the negro ever was—because every soldier is a greater slave, be he black or white, to his commander and to the military authorities under which he is placed than any man can be in any other condition—the man who is thus forced by the rigor of the universal rule of military law to execute the order of his superior, or himself to be executed and his life to be taken for disobedience to orders or mutiny, should not be held responsible. This is true especially in regard to men who had no part in the horrible transaction and were not present when it was enacted, whose souls revolt at such a deed as much as yours or anybody's; because they happened to belong to the same army, that they should be deliberately brought up and marshaled in a line of death, and a brute, clothed with a little brief authority, should undertake to immolate them, to murder them simply because they belonged to the same cause, is an act among the most atrocious that can be conceived.

Now, sir, the employment of this most expensive and inefficient soldiery has brought our country and our Government into that cruel dilemma. There is another point of view in which I object to the enlistment of the negro—its cruelty to him. The system has been pretty much from the start, and before any authority of law, for certain regiments and corps to receive all this population that would flock to their camps. I saw it done before the President was authorized by the first act upon the subject to organize negroes for the service of the United States. I saw on one occasion, in my native town, sixty or seventy negro men inveigled into the camp of a regiment, and move off with it in its march toward Tennessee. I knew many of the owners of those negroes, and the most of them were true, loyal, Union men. They sought the commander, a Colonel Adkins, of the State of Illinois, and asked permission to go in his camp and to take their slaves home. He denied them that right. They commenced proceedings in our civil courts against him, and went with the officers of the law, bearing the process of a sovereign State in their hands, and sought to have this process executed upon the colonel, and to replevy the slaves from him. Both were denied them, and I saw soldiers, by the command of his subordinate officers, present their bayonets and force the officer of the law from the ranks in the execution of this process.

Sir, there were many officers and soldiers from the northern and northwestern States in Kentucky who demeaned themselves in the most proper and exemplary manner; regiments from Indiana, Ohio, and other States. There was a Colonel Pierce, of the veteran twenty-ninth Massachusetts. He commanded the post in my town six or seven months. He was a soldier and a gentleman. He knew his own duties and powers, and he respected the authority of Kentucky and the rights of her loyal people. So of another Massachusetts colonel and his regiment that were stationed for a considerable time in Mt. Sterling. Our people regretted when these patriotic soldiers and true gentlemen left, and cherish for them pleasant and grateful recollections. This statement applies also to Colonels Harris, Sill, Vandever, Norton, and Fyfe, of Ohio, and Curtin, of Pennsylvania, and their noble commands, and many others that I could name, and particularly from Indiana.

But, sir, the number of negroes that have perished prematurely by exposure, by want, by starvation, disease, and pestilence, from being seduced to go to the armies and the camps of the United States soldiers cannot be numbered with any proximate certainty; but it is great, fearfully great. I have no doubt that the premature deaths resulting from these causes, among the whole mass of negro population in all the localities where the armies of the United States have held post, and have moved, would number from one to two hundred thousand, judging from the statistics I have seen of particular localities. The privations, the suffering, the disease, that they never would otherwise have been subjected to, and the premature mortality resulting to these unfortunate people by being thus connected with the armies of the United States, in its mass is incalculably greater than would have befallen them in centuries of slavery as it exists in the southern States.

Why, sir, about Vicksburg and Port Hudson, and down about Berwick bay, large numbers of old men and women and children were literally starved to death, died in the woods or on the river side or the beach from exposure, want, and disease, without any attention whatever. A gentleman from the locality of Berwick bay informed me that many women who passed with General Banks when he retreated at one time across Berwick bay threw their children with perfect callousness into the bay to perish; and that around all those localities there had been such mortality among this then nomadic and neglected population, going out in secret places, in bushes, in covers formed under the banks of the river, wherever they could find a shelter from the sun, and falling down and unable to proceed further, lay thickly over the whole locality, and, dying, the atmosphere had become most offensive from the effluvia of their decaying bodies.

Now, sir, I think that this mistaken and deplorable policy ought to be reversed. I think that the Government ought to retrace its steps in relation to the enlistment of negroes as soldiers. They never have and they never will prove themselves when they are brought into conflict with the white man anything like as effective. If the white man could not have been had in sufficient numbers to have filled up our armies for the prosecution of this war, and there was no other resort, there might have been some plea, some pretext for resorting to the negro. You give him now the same pay, &c., that you do the white man; and that is so large, so much greater in our service to that of any other Government in the world, that while so much inducement is offered to the white men there can always be obtained enough of soldiers of that superior race. They are more efficient, they are less wasteful of all the supplies of a soldier, they are more economical in every sense of the word.

The employment of negroes as teamsters or laborers would not shock or violate the rights of any portion of the community justly. In that sort of employment they would be useful, valuable. I suppose there are as many white men now performing these more menial and less soldierly offices as there are negroes in the service; and if the negroes, instead of being dressed up in uniform and armed with musket and sword and straps upon their shoulders, had been put to the offices of labor, it would have relieved as many white men from the performance of those menial offices, and would have placed them in the ranks where they would have been much more effective as a soldiery than the negroes who would have been thereby displaced.

I have no hope, Mr. President, of reaching the understanding or producing conviction with any man who is not already satisfied on this subject; but I think it due to the occasion, due to myself, due to my people, due to my country and to its Government, to present to the Senate these or any other pertinent facts touching upon this problem of making a soldier of the negro.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it is my purpose to occupy but for a moment the time of the Senate at this hour by replying to the remarks made in support of this proposition. We have in our employment seventy thousand colored soldiers. We have fifty or sixty thousand colored men in other employments connected with the Army; and the Secretary of War said to me the other day that he wished he could get forty thousand more as laborers. He would take all he could get, and we need thousands more than we can obtain. From Cairo to New Orleans, the Mississippi at nearly every point is guarded by colored soldiers. The localities are unhealthy. These soldiers have been forced to work night and day to throw up fortifications and do the drudgery of the Army. They have suffered, toiled, labored as no troops in the service have toiled and labored. We have lost unquestionably a great many of them on the Mississippi, as we have on the Atlantic coast, for wherever there is a colored regiment, and there is drudgery to do, the drudgery is put upon them.

But, sir, I rose to send to the Chair a letter sent to me a few days ago by Adjutant General Thomas, who knows all about this question. He has been engaged for months in raising colored troops, in observing their conduct and their action, and he is about going to Kentucky to raise several colored regiments in that State.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, May 30, 1864.

DEAR SIR: On several occasions when on the Mississippi river I contemplated writing to you respecting the colored troops, and to suggest that as they have been fully tested as soldiers their pay should be raised to that of white troops, and I desire now to give my testimony in their behalf. You are aware that I have been engaged in the organization of freedmen for over a year, and have necessarily been thrown in constant contact with them.

The negro in a state of slavery is brought up by the master from early childhood to strict obedience, and to obey implicitly the dictates of the white man, and they are thus led to believe that they are an inferior race. Now, when organized into troops they carry this habit of obedience with them; and their officer—being entirely white men, the negro promptly obeys his orders. A regiment is thus rapidly brought into a state of discipline. They are a religious people, another high quality for making good soldiers. They are a musical people, and thus readily learn to march and accurately perform their maneuvers. They take pride in being elevated as soldiers, and keep themselves neat and clean, as well as their camp grounds. This I know from personal inspection and from the reports of my special inspectors, two of my staff being constantly on inspecting duty.

They have proved a most important addition to our forces, enabling the generals in active operations to take a large force of white troops into the field; and now brigades of blacks are placed with the whites. The forts erected at the important points on the river are nearly all garrisoned by blacks—artillery regiments raised for the purpose—say at Paducah and Columbus, Kentucky; Memphis, Tennessee; Vicksburg and Natchez, Mississippi; and most of the works around New Orleans. Experience proves that they manage heavy guns very well. Their fighting qualities have also been fully tested a number of times, and I am yet to hear of the first case where they did not fully stand up to their work. I passed over the ground where the first Louisiana made the gallant charge at Port Hudson, by far the stronger part of the rebel works. The wonder is that so many made their escape. At Milliken's Bend, where I had three incomplete regiments, one without arms until the day previous to the attack, greatly superior numbers of rebels charged furiously up to the very breastworks. The negroes met the enemy on the ramparts, and both sides freely used the bayonet, a most rare occurrence in warfare, as one or other party gives way before coming in contact with the steel. The rebels were defeated with heavy loss. The bridge at Moscow, on the line of railroad from Memphis to Corinth, was defended by one small regiment of blacks. A cavalry attack of three times their number was made, the blacks defeating them in the three charges made by the rebels. They fought them hours, until our cavalry came up, when the defeat was made complete, many of the rebel dead being left on the field. A cavalry force of one hundred and fifty attacked three hundred rebel cavalry near the Big Black with signal success, a number of prisoners being taken and marched to Vicksburg. Forrest attacked Paducah with seven thousand five hundred. The garrison was between five and six hundred; nearly four hundred were colored troops very recently raised. What troops could have done better? So, too, they fought well at Fort Pillow until overpowered by greatly superior numbers.

The above enumerated cases seem to me sufficient to demonstrate the value of the colored troops. I make no mention of the cases on the Atlantic coast with which you are perfectly familiar.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. THOMAS,
Adjutant General.

Hon. H. WILSON.

Mr. WILSON. This is the testimony of Adjutant General Thomas, who well understands the subject upon which he speaks. He has two members of his staff constantly inspecting the posts on the Mississippi, and nearly all these posts are defended by colored troops. On the Atlantic coast, from Virginia to Florida, in every battle in which the colored troops have been engaged, they have extorted the admiration and commanded the approval of the officers under whose eye they have fought. Fitzhugh Lee hurled his chivalry the other day upon General Wild's black brigade, and the chivalry were shivered. Everywhere they have fought well and fought bravely; and everywhere they have been called upon to use the shovel, to throw up fortifications, do the drudgery, and they have by universal consent, by the admissions of officers under whom they have fought, excelled the white soldiers in the amount of labor they have performed for the country.

These are the facts. We want troops. We ought to have two hundred thousand men to-day more than we have. Everybody would reverently thank God if we had fifty thousand men to send to General Grant now. Here we have a proposition not to use any of the money we propose to raise or to pay the one hundred and twenty thousand colored men we have in the service of the Government who are doing their whole duty with unfaltering fidelity to the country. Can any loyal statesman say ay to such a proposition?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have but a word to say. If I understand the amendment, it prohibits the application of any part of the money that may be the produce of this bill toward the payment of the African troops.

Mr. DAVIS. If armed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know the number.

The chairman of the Military Committee says there are over one hundred thousand of these men now in arms as I understand him. Does the Senator from Kentucky propose that they are not to be paid for past services?

Mr. DAVIS. That is not the proposition; but it is that the pay shall cease to them as soldiers after the passage of this act.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then how are they to be paid? The recognition of the obligation to pay, if I understand the honorable member, up to the time of the passage of this bill is to be made, but out of what fund are they to be paid?

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the honorable Senator I will answer. They might be paid as laborers. The simple object and effect of the amendment if it is adopted will be to take arms out of their hands, as I understand.

Mr. JOHNSON. Discharge them. I suppose that to be the motive, because, however he may be opposed to this kind of troops, the honorable member will not be so unjust as to deny them payment for the services they may have rendered under the contract between themselves and the Government. I suppose, therefore, that his object was that on the day of the passage of this bill they are to cease to be soldiers in the Army of the United States. It may be true, and perhaps it is to some extent, that they are not as efficient as white troops. I know there are differences of opinion among the officers of the Army as to their present efficiency; but all history must be false, the history of our own Government during the period of the Revolution must be false if it be not true that after a while they will become as good soldiers as the white men. These men have now been in the service some six or seven months or longer, I forget how long, and they are more or less disciplined. They are perhaps now better than the same number of white men who may be enlisted in their stead, until they shall receive the same kind of military education; and that being the case, and as we want the troops, (however, I may think with the honorable Senator from Kentucky that it would have been better to have done without this description of troops if we could have got white troops in sufficient numbers,) it seems to me it would be very bad policy to discharge them. If they are not carried into the field and made to bear the brunt of the very severe fighting that is now going on, they take the places of those that are sent forward to share in the dangers and glories of that fighting. Forts are to be garrisoned, railroads are to be guarded, the communication with the Army is to be protected, and for all these duties these troops are just as efficient as any other troops; so that even conceding to the honorable member that they are not as efficient in all respects as veteran white troops, it seems to me to be clear that as they are efficient for the purposes for which they may be used, it would be bad policy to discharge them, particularly at this time.

I have no doubt—perhaps that is using too strong a term, but it is one that suits my own conviction—I have no doubt of the ultimate success of the Government in its present effort to restore itself; but it requires very great effort. The struggle which is now going on, and to which we are listening for its actual results from day to day with great solicitude, if that result shall be favorable to the United States, may terminate this war, and the deluded masses of the South may be brought back to the allegiance under which, by observing which, they were the happiest people that ever the sun of heaven shone upon. But the leaders will not permit them to return as long as they have any force in the field which they can wield for the purpose of keeping them in the condition in which they now are, a condition of unequaled suffering. What I desire to do, and what I am sure the honorable member from Kentucky equally desires to do, is by any force that the laws of civilized warfare authorize us to resort to, to put down this rebellion; and I should think, so far from its being a measure calculated to effect that object, the dismissal of one hundred and twenty thousand or one hundred and fifty thousand men from the armies of the United States would very materially serve to aid and comfort the rebels. I know that that is not the purpose of the honorable member from Kentucky; I know that in his heart he longs for the restoration of this Union as earnestly as any loyal man that breathes.

We differ only as to the means which from time to time it may be thought necessary to resort to, and the measures which it may be the proper policy of the Government to adopt; but I submit to him unless he is ready to supply one hundred and twenty thousand men now, now at this moment, to take the place of these black troops, he, instead of doing a service to the Union of which he is an honored member, would be doing a great service to the foe.

Mr. DAVIS. But a few words in reply. My proposition does not propose to discharge a single negro from the service of the United States. It only proposes to take the guns and arms out of his hands. I admit his efficiency for labor, and especially his efficiency for labor in the South. It was because his constitution is adapted to the southern climate, to its malarias, and can resist the diseases incident to the climate and locality better than the white man, that he was originally brought from his native Africa to the lower latitudes where rice and sugar and cotton and indigo are cultivated. I believe that if this Government had the magnanimity and the will to correct the error in relation to the employment of the negro soldiers and to correct other flagitious errors in its war policy, it would strengthen the Union cause and the Union Army and the Government, and operate as a force for the restoration of the Union twenty-fold more than the retention of these negroes in the Union Army. But, sir, I simply ask that they shall be disrobed of their habiliments as soldiers; that they shall take the inferior position where our common Creator has placed them; that where they can be made effective and valuable equally with the white man they shall be used; but that they shall not be used as soldiers, to shock the sentiment and the principles of two thirds of the people of the United States, including the rebel States, and to constitute an impassable and irremovable barrier between our present condition and reconstruction.

The number of negroes and the service they rendered in the revolutionary war was not felt in that contest. It was of so small and insignificant a character that it was not more than a drop in the bucket; and so with the service that they rendered in the war of 1812. I admit that General Jackson was right in employing all the negroes he could obtain in the siege of New Orleans. The loyal slaveholders of Kentucky or anywhere else have not objected to the negro being appropriately applied to the purposes of the Government in this war, not as a soldier, but as a laborer. If it had been essentially necessary, if it had been eminently valuable for the preservation of our Union, of our Constitution, and of our popular liberties, that the negro should have been engaged in the war as a soldier, I know no owner of a slave in the State of Kentucky who would have objected. I have the misfortune to own a few myself, and if it had been a life and death struggle between the rebellion and the Government, the loyal men and the traitors, whether the Union under the Constitution with the preservation of all its principles and all the rights and liberties which it guarantees to the people should perish or should be supported and continued by the services of the negroes, all that I have, and this feeble and withered arm itself, and this decaying citadel of life, would have been given freely to the cause. But, sir, I know that this great and holy cause has been prejudiced, weakened, brought into danger, and is now threatened, still threatened with final overthrow just by reason of the perverted manner in which a false and mistaken policy has applied the negro.

Sir, I know something of this General Thomas myself. I proposed here two sessions ago to raise a committee to investigate his loyalty. It was denied by this body. I was then prepared to prove that he was a rebel sympathizer, engaged and colleague with rebels at the onset of this war; that there were cannon and other property for the use of rebels loaded on a small craft near Georgetown, and that he was apprised of that property being there and of its destination, and he was invoked to interfere for the purpose of seizing that property. He refused to do so, as I was informed credibly, and as I have no doubt I should have proved by evidence entitled to all weight, until the property was carried off to secession. He then was a traitor to his Government; he was a traitor to his country; he was a traitor to that Government that had given him his military education and his high promotion in its armies. But, sir, he became a double traitor by betraying the traitors with whom he had linked himself. A man who is once a traitor should stand dishonored in the judgment of all men; but a man who is twice a traitor, who is a double traitor, ought to be scorned and damned to eternal infamy. That is the position of the witness who is here presented.

Sir, I do not believe a word of what he says in relation to the efficiency of negroes as soldiers. As laborers I know it is all true. From observation I know it is all true. But this race never invented an alphabet or figures; it has had every opportunity of civilization, to a greater or less extent, by contact with the most refined and civilized nations of the world, and yet it has never emerged from barbarism; it has proved its inefficiency; its physical organization is different and marks an inferiority to our race in many points, according to all the ethnologists of the world, both those who favor slavery and those who are opposed to it. And yet this race has its advocates for a claim to equality and amalgamation and miscegenation with the white race. Sir, in proportion as this system of miscegenation goes on it deteriorates the white race; and that is the reason of the inefficiency and degeneracy and premature decay of the powers on the south of us. It is the great admixture of this inferior race and the commingling with the white race.

How did the negro troops behave in Florida? How at Fort Pillow? How at all the points of collision where they came into contact with the white man in arms on anything like equal terms? I have seen a report of their prowess against Fitzhugh Lee down here in the neighborhood of Richmond, but that comes from General Butler, as I understand. A gallant soldier, a comrade of his, from his own State, who entered the service with him, and who knows him, pronounced him to me to be the greatest poltroon and villain that he knew. I never heard of his being at but one battle, except by his own proclamations—those proclamations that he has issued down from about Bermuda Hundred. I will warrant that he is far off from danger when the storm of battle, with its iron and leaden hail, is hurdling through the air. He was in a battle at Lowell. He has property that he rented to some gentleman, and this gentleman employed a man to put some pipe along under the ground, and the mechanic was engaged in that work. Butler came along, and in his insolent, imperious way, cowardly, (because every base coward is a tyrant unless he is in the presence of danger,) insolently directed that man how to do that work. The man went on and did it in his own way. He directed him again. The man looked at him: Said he, "This is not your work; I am not engaged to do this work for you," or words to that effect, "mind your own business;" and Butler kicked him insolently.

Oh, if a slaveholder, if a southerner had so acted toward that stalwart and honest and brave mechanic, who was there operating honestly in his vocation, how it would have called down the denunciations and the execrations of some of the pseudo-philanthropists of our country! Butler kicked him! In less than no time the old man, sixty-two years of age, who was in the ditch, sprung up, and in less time than it takes me to tell it, he had Butler on his back, and he throttled him there until he was about nearly choked to death. He let him up, and he just tucked his tail and marched off. It was the only battle I ever heard of Butler being engaged in personally, and in that one he was routed, horse, foot, and dragoons.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator let me appeal to him to let us get through with this bill to-night?

Mr. DAVIS. I have done, but I have something to say on this bill at length. I have done with this proposition.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does any Senator desire a separate vote on any further amendment made as in Committee of the Whole? If no Senator desires a separate vote, the question will be, will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. POMEROY. I believe the bill has not been made yet to apply to the District of Columbia in all its provisions, and I thought of offering this amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That wherever the word "State" is used in this act it shall be construed to include the Territories and the District of Columbia, where such construction is necessary to carry out the provisions of the act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It can do no harm.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. There is an amendment which I moved while in committee, and which I desire to move again and on which I desire to have a deliberate vote of the Senate. It is on page 135, to strike out lines two hundred and twelve, two hundred and thirteen, and two hundred and fourteen of section ninety-three, the tax on books.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

On all printed books, magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and all other similar printed publications, except newspapers, a duty of 5 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. SUMNER. I am sorry to occupy the attention of the Senate, even for a moment, especially at this late stage of a protracted discussion. But I feel that the question which I have now presented has not been adequately appreciated. I venture to say that, in point of principle, few questions of equal importance have arisen on this bill.

The tax on books is peculiar, and, so far as I know, without a precedent in other countries. In England paper has been taxed, but books not. Here paper is to be taxed and books too. For instance, there is to be a tax of 3 per cent. on paper, and then 5 per cent. additional on books, making a sum total of 8 per cent. on books.

The tax of 3 per cent. on paper seems to me contrary to sound policy. But the additional tax of 5 per cent. on books is more indefensible still. I have already likened it to a tax on wheat or flour or bread, which you do not think of imposing. More than either of these is a book "the staff of life." It may be likened also to a tax on the light of day, like the English window tax, which you do not think of imposing. Better shut out the light of day than the light of books.

The book in some cases may be a luxury, but in most cases it is a necessary, while always it is the handmaid of civilization. It is for all ages and all conditions. It is for young and old; for rich and poor. It is for the family circle as well as the library; but it is especially for the school. In all these places you will enter and demand 8 per cent. on every book. Every book, if it had a voice, would repel the demand.

Why not be instructed by the example of England, which has taxed everything taxable? Read the extensive list of articles taxed at the period of most searching and wide-spread taxation, and you will not find books. Read that marvelous enumeration, made by the genius of Sydney Smith; you will not find books. Here it is:

"Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot; taxes upon everything which it is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste; taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes on everything on earth, and the waters under the earth; on everything that comes from abroad, or is grown at home; taxes on the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man; taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite, and the drug that restores him to health; on the ermine which decorates the judge, and the rope which hangs the criminal; on the poor man's salt, and the rich man's spice; the brass nails of the coffin, and the ribbons of the bride: at bed or board, couchant or levant, we must pay. The school-boy whips his taxed top, the beardless youth manages his taxed horse with a taxed bridle on a taxed road; and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine which has paid 7 per cent. into a spoon that has paid 15 per cent., flings himself back upon his chintz bed which has paid 22 per cent., and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a license of £100 for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from 2 to 10 per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the channel; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble; and he is then gathered to his fathers, to be taxed no more."

A passage so exquisite in wit and language cannot be out of place, especially when considering what shall be taxed; but I ask you to bear in mind that the English tax-gatherer never laid his hand on a book. Everything else he might touch; but a book never.

And yet in our country it is now proposed to tax books. This is the land of public schools, and you boast that education, like justice, is free to all at the public cost. But a tax on books is in direct conflict with this beautiful principle.

Every argument for free schools pleads also for free books, at least so far as taxation is concerned. It will be a curious inconsistency to rear the school-house, often costly, where every child is welcomed without charge, and then compel him to pay a tax of 8 per cent. on every book which he carries in his satchel.

There is one term which fitly characterizes this tax. It is a term which has been adopted abroad, but which is more justly applicable to a tax on books than to any other tax. I mean a tax on knowledge. Such is the tax which is now proposed. And this tax, which cannot be named without awakening just condemnation, you are now asked to make an American institution. After a long struggle in England the various taxes on knowledge have been abandoned. I hope that our country, representative and defender of liberal ideas, will not commence a system which liberty and civilization must disown. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senate could discriminate between the kind of books I would agree to it myself. There are some kinds I should like to tax and some I would not. There is a cheap kind of literature which is said to be very profitable, and I think is very destructive, and it should be taxed. It is a little revolting to me to tax all books. I would not like to tax Bibles, spelling-books, and the publications of the American Tract Society; but I do not know where we can discriminate.

Mr. SUMNER. I think there is a difficulty in making the discrimination. No people has ever undertaken to impose such a tax, and I hope we shall not begin now.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Collamer, Davis, Harlan, Howard, Pomerooy, Powell, Sumner, and Wiley—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Curllie, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move after section fifty-nine to insert the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners of any manufactory of cotton or woolen goods may provide, at his or their own expense, a warehouse, established in conformity with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and such warehouse, when approved by the collector, is hereby declared a bonded warehouse of the United States, and shall be used only for storing cotton or woolen goods, and to be under the custody of the collector or his deputy. And the duty on the cotton or woolen goods stored in such warehouse shall be paid before they are removed, in pursuance of law.

This is an amendment I offered in committee, and there was no division on it. Since we give whisky, and very properly, I think, the privilege of being bonded, and all foreign goods have the privilege of being bonded, I cannot see why the privilege cannot be extended to our own productions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I trust that provision will not be adopted. It would make infinite expense.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have one more amendment which, like the one I have just offered, is in the printed list of amendments that was proposed to be offered by my colleague, who is absent. I have altered the word "final" to "finishing." In section ninety-three, line four hundred and thirty-eight, after the word "thereof," I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That if any of the articles named herein are manufactured in one district and receive finishing process in another, if manufactured by one and the same party, the tax shall be assessed in the district in which the article as aforesaid receives its finishing process.

This amendment, I believe, was rejected before because the term "final process," which is a legal term, was in, and therefore I have altered it to "finishing process." The amendment will be of great convenience to many tax-payers, and not the slightest loss or inconvenience to the Government. If the object is, as I am sure it is, on the part of the committee, to make the bill as little burdensome as possible to the tax-payers, while rendering all the revenue that can be collected from the articles taxed, I hope they will agree to this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole not otherwise disposed of.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HENDERSON. On page 224 I move to strike out from line one hundred and ninety to line two hundred and twelve, of schedule B, and to insert a provision in lieu of it. I offer the amendment merely for the purpose of opening that subject to a committee of conference between the two Houses.

The words to be stricken out were read, as follows:

Warehouse receipt for not exceeding fifty barrels of flour held in storage in any public or private warehouse or yard, 5 cents; exceeding fifty barrels and not exceeding one hundred barrels, 10 cents; exceeding one hundred barrels, for every additional one hundred barrels or fractional part thereof, 10 cents.

Warehouse receipt for not exceeding fifty bushels of grain held in storage in any public or private warehouse or yard, 5 cents; exceeding fifty bushels and not exceeding one hundred bushels, 10 cents; exceeding one hundred bushels, for every additional one hundred bushels or fractional part thereof, 10 cents.

Warehouse receipt for not exceeding fifty barrels of whisky, or beef, pork, bacon, or other salted, cured, dried, or preserved meats, held in storage in any public or private warehouse or yard, 10 cents; exceeding fifty barrels and not exceeding one hundred barrels, 20 cents; exceeding one hundred barrels, for every additional one hundred barrels or fractional part thereof, 10 cents.

Warehouse receipt for not exceeding fifty tierces of beef, pork, bacon, or other salted, cured, dried, or preserved meats, held in storage in any public or private warehouse or yard, 50 cents; exceeding fifty tierces and not exceeding one hundred tierces, $1; exceeding one hundred tierces, for every additional one hundred tierces or fractional part thereof, 50 cents.

The words proposed to be inserted were also read, as follows:

Warehouse receipt for property, goods, wares, or merchandise, not otherwise provided for in any public or private warehouse, when the property or goods so deposited or stored shall not exceed in value $500, 10 cents; exceeding in value $500, and not exceeding $1,000, 20 cents; exceeding in value $1,000, for every additional $1,000, 10 cents.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Had not the Senator better move that in addition rather than to strike out the clause?

Mr. HENDERSON. If stricken out, it will leave the whole subject open.

Mr. FESSENDEN. So, if he moves that in addition, the whole subject will be open, because that can be amended in any way that may be necessary.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator sees my design. The next clause provides that a "warehouse receipt for any goods, merchandise, or property of any kind, not otherwise provided for, held on storage," &c., shall pay 25 cents. If it happens to be pork, or wheat, or flour, a warehouse receipt may cost $5 or $10, but if the article happens to be cotton, or hemp, which is very largely grown in my State, it will cost but 25 cents, though the man may have $50,000 worth on deposit in warehouse. If it happens to be sugar or wool or any article of that character, no matter how much may be stored, the warehouse receipt is only 25 cents, because it is not otherwise specially provided for. My object is to provide that all property stored, no matter what may be its character and quality, shall pay a duty in proportion to its value. I am not particular about it; I only want to open the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not disposed to make any objection to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator desires that my amendment shall be in addition to the clause in the bill, and thinks that will accomplish the object better, I will agree to it; but I think the way it stands now it will open the whole subject. If you strike out the clause and insert what I have proposed, if the House of Representatives insist on retaining it as it is, the conference committee can insert this as an addition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILKINSON. The vote was taken on concurring in the report of the Committee of the Whole a few minutes ago while I was out. I wish to object to the amendment of the committee on page 28 at the end of section twenty-five, from line sixteen after the word "collector" to line nineteen, and if necessary I move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can have a separate vote on it by unanimous consent without reconsideration. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question on that amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment, to insert at the end of section twenty-five:

And the salary and commissions of assessors and collectors heretofore earned and accrued shall be adjusted, allowed, and paid in conformity to the provisions of this section, and not otherwise.

Mr. WILKINSON. I do not know upon what principle or idea the Committee on Finance reported this amendment. It seems to me that it clearly interferes with the amount of salary earned and due to collectors and assessors before the passage of this act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They get more under it, do they not?

Mr. WILKINSON. No, they get less, as I understand it. I may be mistaken in this. This section relates to the auditing of the accounts of the assessors and collectors, and provides how it shall be done. There is an amendment in the former part of the section which says that hereafter in the adjustment of the accounts of assessors and collectors of internal revenue "which shall accrue after the 30th of June, 1864," and the Committee on Finance added, also, "for services after that date, the fiscal year of the Treasury shall be observed," &c. Those amendments of the committee are proper, because they refer to the services after the passage of this act; but then at the end of the section they add this, which I think entirely neutralizes the amendments which they have inserted in the former part of the section:

And the salary and commissions of assessors and collectors heretofore earned and accrued shall be adjusted, allowed, and paid in conformity to the provisions of this section, and not otherwise.

I called the attention of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to this section to-day, and he says that it will materially cut down the salaries of collectors if this provision is adopted.

Mr. SUMNER. Is not that provision inconsistent with what is at the top of the page?

Mr. WILKINSON. I think it is.

Mr. DAVIS. It should be "hereafter" instead of "heretofore."

Mr. SUMNER. I intended to call attention to this. I am very glad the Senator has done it, for I find I had made a memorandum on the margin in regard to this matter. There is evidently some inaccuracy somewhere. I am not able precisely to explain it; whether the Senator from Kentucky, by his suggestion that "heretofore" should be "hereafter," is right, I do not know. There is something wrong about the passage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can explain it very readily. We provided a maximum in the former bill; we said that no collector should receive over $10,000 a year in the whole. It has been found that where a collector holds his office six months in a large district, and he collects enough to give him his $10,000, and he dies or resigns, and another one comes in, and in the remaining half year he collects enough to give himself $10,000, they both claim the maximum of $10,000. We have established a rule here that where there is more than one collector in the same year they shall not both of them receive the salary for the year fixed for the collector; and then we say that the salaries of the last year shall be settled on the same principle, which is the correct principle. Like all other office-holders, pretty much, not satisfied with what the law allows them, they will get the pay for a whole year's salary out of half a year's service if they can. The First Comptroller of the Treasury, who is a very valuable officer, when he came to settle their accounts refused to settle them on any such principle. He said the manifest meaning of the law was that the $10,000 should be paid for a year's service, and some accounts are hung up there for that reason, and we had the suggestion of the First Comptroller when we adopted this very amendment, providing that the same principle should apply to the settlement of former accounts. If they have any rights against the law and against the intention of the law, let them enforce them.

The Senator from Minnesota says, undoubtedly very truly, that he called the attention of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to it to-day. The Commissioner has been making a fuss about it for a week. He came to me about a week ago, very anxious about it for some reason or other, and all the reason I could get out of him was that he was afraid it would counteract some legal principle or other, and he was a law-abiding man. That was about the amount of it. He said the greater number of them where this question had arisen had settled upon the principle of this bill, had recognized its justice and agreed to it, but there were some few who hung out and said they would not settle in that way, and we now just authorize the Comptroller to settle their accounts precisely on the principle on which they should have been settled in the first place; and then if they have any other rights let them enforce them.

Mr. WILKINSON. I do not understand that the controversy between the Comptroller and the Commissioner is precisely as the honorable Senator has stated it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Commissioner stated it to me himself. I take it from his own mouth.

Mr. WILKINSON. I do not know what the Commissioner stated to the honorable Senator, but I will state what I understand to be the controversy. The Comptroller assumes to adjust these accounts on this principle, as I understand: he is to adjust them quarterly, and if the collector in the first three quarters of a year collects but very little, he allows, according to his construction, for the amount collected during those three quarters, and applies it upon the salary for three quarters of the year; and if during the other quarter he collects enough to bring his salary up to the maximum, he only allows him at the rate of one quarter's salary. That is what I understand to be the construction that the Comptroller of the Treasury puts upon it, and I think, and the Commissioner thinks, that it is an improper construction of the law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This section has nothing to do with that. That is applicable to one man; this is applicable to where there is more than one collector during the year. It says that two or three, or however many there shall be, shall not receive more than the maximum of the law.

Mr. WILKINSON. I think I can show that this section does have something to do with it. This says that the fiscal year shall end on the 30th June of each year. Now, suppose that last year a collector collected but very little during the first three quarters of the year; he was appointed, for instance, in August or September, and last quarter he collected enough to bring his percentage up to the maximum limited by the former act. He has been in office nine months; he collected say $300,000 in the first three months, and in the next three months $400,000. By the construction which the Comptroller places on the law it reduces the actual amount which should be allowed as the other officers of the Government construe this law, and as I believe the Secretary of the Treasury construes it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the Senator is mistaken about the construction that must have been given to the law, for this is old legislation in respect to the sales of public lands. There was a maximum fixed for a register and receiver of public lands. If they sold during the first quarter of a year so much land as that the percentage amounted to the maximum, they got no salary for the other three quarters, but if they sold not half so much during the first half of the year and a greater quantity the latter half, they were paid up. That has been the construction for a great number of years. The Senator must be mistaken.

Mr. WILKINSON. I know that there was a case in the Supreme Court in regard to the salaries of receivers and registers of the Land Office, and I know that the Supreme Court reversed the action of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and said that the rules of the Department could not govern and control the law in relation to their salaries.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What case was that? Does the Senator recollect?

Mr. WILKINSON. It was the case of the United States vs. Dixon, 15 Peters, 141. It is quoted in a pamphlet that I have now before me upon this very question, and that case is urged as against the construction which the Comptroller of the Treasury places upon the original revenue law. The court say in their decision:

"We do not perceive what connection the mode of keeping the accounts in the Treasury Department has with the compensation allowed by law to any public officer."

Mr. GRIMES. When was that decision made? Mr. WILKINSON. It is reported in 15 Peters.

Mr. GRIMES. Many years ago.

Mr. WILKINSON. I do not see what necessity there is for this clause in this bill if it is not to relate to back salaries.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is to relate to cases where there were two or more officers in the same year.

Mr. WILKINSON. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance stated that some of the collectors and assessors had had their accounts suspended. I am informed that the Comptroller has not passed one single case under the internal revenue law, but has held every one of them back.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Every one where this question has presented itself.

Mr. WILKINSON. I understand they are not allowed at all, that he has not passed a single case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We cannot remedy that in this bill.

Mr. WILKINSON. I am opposed to this retroactive legislation. I do not believe it is legal. I do not see any necessity for it. If the Comptroller is right he does not want any legislation to aid him in his decision. If his decision is wrong it is unjust to aid it by legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on concurring in Senate in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the twenty-fifth section.

Mr. WILKINSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Hendricks, Johnson, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Davis, Howard, Sumner, and Wilkinson—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Wade, and Wright—22.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are one or two little amendments which I have overlooked, that are necessary, in consequence of the changes in the section relative to banks. In line thirty-three of section one hundred and nine, page 162, I move to change the penalty from $1,000 to $200. We have made the returns monthly instead of half-yearly.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 164, line seventy-five of section one hundred and nine, I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendment striking out "one" and inserting "five."

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate do not concur with the committee in that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. WILKINSON. On page 63, section fifty-seven, line two, I move to strike out the words "Secretary of the Treasury" and insert "collector;" so as to read:

That there shall be appointed by the collector of every collection district where the same may be necessary, one or more inspectors of spirits, &c. &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that will not be agreed to. I do not see why the inspector should be appointed by the collector.

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. CHANDLER. He knows more about it.

Mr. WILKINSON. Under the law as it stands the collector selects the men to make the inspections of all spirits, oils, tobacco, &c.; and the reason why I move this amendment is that the collector, if he is a fit and proper man to hold the office, knows better who to select in his district to make these inspections than the Secretary of the Treasury does who lives a thousand miles away.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary of the Treasury can learn and ought to learn in regard to these things. If the collector has the appointment, it puts everything in the hands of the collector, and there is no check on him. It is necessary that some of these officers should be a check on others. I do not want the collector in any district to have the appointment of all the inspectors of coal oil, tobacco, and spirits, and everything else.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to ask if this amendment is not the same as the provision in the law of 1862.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This change was intended to remedy the defects of that law in a great many instances. This is one of them.

Mr. HOWARD. I prefer the old law most decidedly.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. POWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS again addressed the Senate. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the vote is announced I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is dividing.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask unanimous consent to interpose that motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You cannot do it without a quorum.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wished to make the motion before it was ascertained that we had no quorum.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent members.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is dividing, and it is not ascertained that there is not a quorum.

The result was then announced—yeas 22, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Hendricks, and Powell—3.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—24.

So the bill was passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 494) to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (No. 511) to provide for the more speedy punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 51.

Mr. DAVIS. Let us know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to the bill being taken up if the Senator wants that done, but I must move to-morrow to take up the fortification bill. I do not suppose, however, it will cause much debate.

Mr. SUMNER. I appeal to the Senator. Here is a bill which it is known to Senators about me for four weeks I have been pressing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. At this period of the session we must pass the appropriation bills before anything else.

Mr. SUMNER. I am with the Senator always on all those measures; but this is a bill for the establishment of a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs. I gave way—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know how long that will take when it comes up.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not think it will take a day. I hope the Senator will allow it to be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to take up the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts will not prevail. I made an effort to get the ear of the Chair for the purpose of moving to take up Senate bill No. 37, to prevent military interference with elections. That bill has been up and discussed four days, and I think it could be completed in a few hours. It is one of the most important bills that have been before the Senate, in my judgment. I hope the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts may be voted down, and the Senate may order this bill to be taken up and continue its consideration until it is disposed of.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is yours an older bill?

Mr. POWELL. Yes, sir; mine is the older of the two. It has been debated for four days. I have tried frequently to get it up without avail. I hope the Senate may now take it up and finish it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to appeal to the Senator from Illinois to withdraw his motion for a moment. I made a motion a few minutes ago that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You cannot do that, because the yeas and nays will be called, and there is not a quorum present.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We can call the yeas and nays on anything.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As I am opposed to adjourning over, I insist on the motion to adjourn. We shall accomplish nothing by sitting here to-night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator himself is opposed to adjourning over, I appeal to him. It is his right, of course, to vote against it; but it is his right, simply because he is individually opposed to it, to say that no other Senator shall have the right to express his desire on the subject?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly not; but we are having a struggle between three or four Senators as to the order of business, and the Senator cannot get the floor to make the motion except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This whole debate is out of order, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. TRUMBULL. These gentlemen are insisting on their rights, and the Senator from Indiana cannot make his motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from Illinois withdraw his motion?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It would require unanimous consent to interpose the motion to adjourn over, and the Senator cannot get it. I should object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 8, nays 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent members.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn if the Senator will withdraw his motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will. I will do anything. Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us have the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. POWELL. I ask for another division on the motion to adjourn, if the Senator from Maine will allow me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 14, noes 8; and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, June 6, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the States for bills and joint resolutions for reference only, and not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider.

COPYRIGHT LAWS.

Mr. JENCKES introduced an additional act supplementary to the act to amend the several acts respecting copyrights; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENDLETON, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1865, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENDLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. J. W. WHITE introduced a bill allowing compensation to members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the Delegates from the Territories; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

UNION GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. FENTON introduced a bill to extend the time for opening books of subscription to the capital stock of the Union Gas-Light Company of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

DIRECT TAXES IN INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. FENTON also introduced a bill to provide for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary States, &c.; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGERS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, introduced a bill further to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamboats and other vessels; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and, together with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER then proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States and Territories for resolutions.

COMMITTEE ON NORTHEASTERN DEFENSES.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, introduced the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the special committee on defenses of the northeastern frontier be continued during the present Congress.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RENDITION OF FUGITIVE SLAVES.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report to this House a bill for the repeal of all acts and parts of acts which provide for the rendition of fugitive slaves, and that they have leave to make such report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The latter part of the resolution would require unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Then I will strike out the latter part of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the previous question will not be sustained. That subject has already been passed upon by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was put; and the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate arising on the resolution, it goes over under the rule.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. HERRICK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish this House with a list of the United States steam vessels suitable to be employed in carrying the mails to and from foreign ports, together with a statement of the reduction that may be made, according to the suggestions of his annual report, in the crew and armament of each, when employed in such service, including, also, an estimate of the expense per month respectively of such vessels as he may report suitable for such employment when so reduced in crew and armament.

GUERRILLAS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back bill of the House No. 429, to provide for the more speedy punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes. The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. ANCONA. How does that bill come in under this call?

The SPEAKER. Under the call of States for resolutions bills may be introduced. That has been the uniform practice of the House.

Mr. ANCONA. Let the rule be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the 115th rule.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"115. Every bill shall be introduced on the report of a committee, or by motion for leave. In the latter case, at least one day's notice shall be given of the motion in the House, or by filing a memorandum thereof with the Clerk, and having it entered on the Journal; and the motion shall be made, and the bill introduced, if leave is given, when resolutions are called for; such motion, or the bill when introduced, may be committed."

The SPEAKER. Bills are in order when resolutions are called for.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the previous question.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order during the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LE BLOND. Is a motion to refer to a standing committee in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not now in order.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move, then, that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays to see whether the previous question is seconded or not.

The motion to lay on the table was disagreed to.

The House was then divided; and there were—yeas 60, noes 35.

So the call for the previous question was seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELDRIDGE, and COLE of California, were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—yeas thirty-five.

So (more than one fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, James S. Brown, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Edén, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hutchins, William Johnson, King, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrisou, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Benman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingels, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wilder, Willson, Windom, and Woodbridge—67.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. SMITH stated that he was paired with Mr. KERNAN; that his colleague Mr. RANDALL was paired with Mr. STILES; and that his colleague Mr. ANDERSON was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. KELLEY, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. HARRINGTON objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ANCONA asked to have the engrossed bill read.

The engrossed bill was read.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LE BLOND. I hope that my colleague will not press the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why?

Mr. LE BLOND. The bill has not been printed, and we do not know what are its provisions.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield to any inquiry.

Mr. LE BLOND. We understand on this side that the bill provides for the punishment of civilians as well as men in the military ranks. It ought to be referred to another committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in regard to that. This bill is for the amendment of two other acts referred to in it, and which affect exclusively the Army in the field and the department commanders. It is to have no effect where civil courts are established.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I ask my colleague why he will not let the bill be printed, in order that every member may be able to judge for himself. We prefer, on this side of the House, to judge matters for ourselves.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will state to my colleague that the bill was printed in the Globe more than two weeks ago, and has been placed before every member of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the demand for the previous question so as to allow the gentleman, [Mr. LE BLOND,] or any other member, to state what objection he has to the punishment of guerrillas who fire upon our wounded men and lie in wait to commit murder.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have stated that if the gentleman, or any other, desires to ask a question or to offer an amendment I will yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that as the bill was introduced under the call of States for resolutions it is governed by the same rule as prevails in regard to resolutions, that is, that if the previous question be not moved and seconded upon it, and a gentleman rises to debate it, it goes over.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I insist on the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. Does it not go over under the rule if any gentleman rises to debate it?

The SPEAKER. It does not, for the previous question was not withdrawn.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLEY called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Dawes, Frank, Donnelly, Driggs, Elliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Dixon, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—72.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Coffroth, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Hutchins, King, Knapp, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Strouse, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—37.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DAWES stated that his colleague, Mr. BOUTWELL, was necessarily absent, and was paired off with Mr. MIDDLETON.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, stated that he was paired off with his colleague, Mr. STEELE.

Mr. GARFIELD stated that his colleague, Mr. SCHENCK, was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. A. W. CLARK stated that his colleague, Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, had been called away on business.

Mr. ALLISON stated that his colleague, Mr. KASSON, was absent on account of illness.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, made a similar statement in reference to his colleague, Mr. PIKE.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF ASYLUM.

Mr. COX introduced the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the recent extradition of a Spanish subject, by the action of the Chief Executive of the United States, in the absence of a law or treaty on that subject, was a violation of the Constitution of the United States and of the law of nations, and in derogation of the right of asylum, which has ever been a distinguishing feature of our political system.

Mr. COX called for tellers on the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and Cobb were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 38, nays 57.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WILSON. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COX. I move to amend by referring it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by referring the resolution to the select committee on emigration.

Mr. COX. I suppose the object of the gentleman is to break down the right of asylum.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON moved the previous question. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FINCK called for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer to the Judiciary Committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the reading of that resolution.

Mr. COX. I do not think it has been understood on the other side of the House. I insist on the reading. [Laughter.]

The resolution was again read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is sufficient. I see the resolution is in reference to a man-stealer and slave-dealer.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Elliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—72.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, James S. Brown, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Scott, Strouse, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—43.

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIARY BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired. The remainder of the day is, by the order of the House, set apart for the business of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COX. Before the House proceeds to the consideration of the judiciary business, I ask the consent of the House to have printed a report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs relative to Mexican affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I have been appealed to by many gentlemen around me to yield; and that I may not do injustice to any, I must decline the first request that comes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will understand that no action is asked; it is merely to print the paper.

Mr. WILSON. If I yield to one I must to others; I decline.

WISCONSIN CIRCUIT COURT.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back Senate bill No. 55, in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I desire to move an amendment to that bill.

Mr. WILSON. I will hear the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I propose to add the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to interfere with the execution of processes or orders of sale, already in part executed, but the same shall proceed as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. WILSON. I see no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VIRGINIA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. WILSON, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 256, to change and define the boundaries of the eastern and western districts of Virginia, to alter the names of said districts, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa. The county of Berkeley has been by the old State of Virginia recently transferred to the State of West Virginia, and accepted by the State of West Virginia. It will therefore fall by this bill within the limits of that judicial district, for I perceive by the provision of this bill that the district courts of the United States are to conform to the State lines, and there may difficulty arise if jurisdiction should be attempted to be exercised by the district court of West Virginia and this county.

I suggest, therefore, to the gentleman from Iowa that there should be a provision inserted into this bill for the ratification of the transfer of that county.

Mr. WILSON. If the facts be as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the interests of that county will not be affected at all by this bill. That question is not at all involved in the questions presented by this bill, and I would prefer that it should be provided for in a separate bill.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection at all. I merely made the suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I assure the gentleman that no difficulty will arise out of this matter, and the object sought by him will be provided in a separate bill.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I will hear it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will state that the law now requires the circuit court of Virginia to be held at Richmond. The district court is now administering justice; or injustice, very arbitrarily at Alexandria.

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the gentleman that that matter is now before the Committee on the Judiciary on a resolution introduced by myself.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment to the bill?

Mr. WILSON. I prefer not to, as the subject is now before the committee, and it will be impossible to meet the difficulty by a few lines in this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman will hear my amendment read?

Mr. WILSON. Of course.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It is this:

And be it further enacted, That the circuit court of Virginia shall be held at Alexandria so long as Virginia is the theater of military operations.

Surely there can be no objection to that.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman will find many difficulties springing up as to the matter of jurisdiction under an amendment of that kind. I prefer that the committee report a separate bill to meet that case. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUMMARY TRIAL OF MINOR OFFENSES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 52) to provide for the summary trial of minor offenses against the laws of the United States.

The bill, which was read, provides:

That it shall be lawful for the judge of any district court of the United States to hold a special session of said court at any time, whether in term or vacation, for the trial of minor offenses against the laws of the United States as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever a complaint shall be made against any master, officer, or mariner of any ship or vessel belonging, in whole or in part, to any citizen or citizens of the United States, of the commission of any offense, not capital or otherwise infamous, against any law of the United States made for the protection of persons or property engaged in commerce or navigation, it shall be the duty of the district attorney to investigate the same, and the general nature thereof, and if, in his opinion, the case is such as should be summarily tried under the provisions of this act, he shall report the same to the district judge, and the judge shall forthwith, or as soon as the ordinary business of the court will permit, proceed to try the cause, and for that purpose may, if necessary, hold a special session of the court.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That at such trial it shall not be necessary that the accused shall have been previously indicted, but a statement of complaint, verified by oath, in writing, shall be presented to the court, setting out the offense in such manner as clearly to apprise the accused of the character of the offense complained of, and to enable him to answer the complaint. And the said complaint or statement shall be read to the accused, who may plead to or answer the same, or make a counter statement.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said trial shall thereupon be proceeded with in a summary manner, and the case shall be decided by the court, unless, at the time for pleading or answering, the accused shall demand a jury, in which case the trial shall be upon the complaint and plea of not guilty.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the court to sentence any person convicted on such trial to any greater punishment than imprisonment in jail for one year, or to a fine exceeding $500, or both, in its discretion, in those cases where the laws of the United States authorize such imprisonment and fine.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the court to allow the district attorney to amend his statement or complaint at any stage of the proceedings, before verdict, if, in the opinion of the court, such amendment will work no injustice to the accused; and if it appear to the court that the accused is unprepared to meet the charge as amended, and that an adjournment of the cause will promote the ends of justice, such adjournment shall be made until a further day, to be fixed by the court.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That at such trial, if by jury, the United States and the accused shall each be entitled to three peremptory challenges. Challenges for cause shall be tried by the court without the aid of triers.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAR NEWS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House for its information the following letter from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, June 6, 7 a. m.

SIR: We have dispatches from General Grant's headquarters down to six o'clock last evening, which state that there had been no fighting during the day.

The enemy made an attack Saturday night upon Hancock, Wright, and Smith, but were everywhere repulsed. Hancock's lines are brought within forty yards of the rebel works.

The rebels were very busy Saturday constructing intrenchments on the west side of the Chickahominy, at Bottom's Bridge, and toward evening threw a party across to the east side.

A dispatch from General Sherman, dated yesterday afternoon, June 5, half past three o'clock, at Altoona creek, states that "the enemy, discovering us moving round his right flank, abandoned his position last night, and marched off. McPherson is moving to-day for Ackworth. Thomas is on the direct Marietta road, and Schofield on his right. It has been raining hard for three days, and the roads are heavy. An examination of the enemy's abandoned line of works here shows an immense line of works, which I have turned with less loss to ourselves than we have inflicted upon them."

The army's supplies of forage and provisions are ample. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLfax,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILSON, from the same committee, reported back bill of the House (No. 305) to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the armies of the United States.

The bill was read. The first section provides that the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims shall not extend to or include any claims against the United States growing out of the destruction of or damage to property by the Army or Navy, or any part of the Army or Navy, engaged in the suppression of the rebellion from the commencement to the close thereof.

The second section provides that all claims of loyal citizens for quartermasters' stores actually furnished to the Army of the United States may be submitted to the Quartermaster General of the United States, accompanied with such proof as each claimant can present of the facts in his case, and that it shall be the duty of the Quartermaster General to cause such claims to be examined, and if convinced that they are just, and that the stores have actually been received or taken for the use of the Army, then to report such cases to the Third Auditor of the Treasury with a recommendation for settlement.

The third section provides that all claims of loyal citizens for subsistence actually furnished to the Army may be submitted to the Commissary General of Subsistence, accompanied with such proof as each such claimant can offer, and makes it the duty of the Commissary General of Subsistence to cause each claim to be examined, and if convinced that it is just, and that the subsistence has been received or taken for the use of the Army, to report such case to the Third Auditor of the Treasury with a recommendation for settlement, and that the action of the Quartermaster General or of the Commissary General of Subsistence, as the case may be, and of the accounting officer of the Treasury shall be final and conclusive upon such claims, which may be thereupon paid; provided that no claims shall be examined, audited, or allowed under the provisions of the bill until the claimant shall have taken and subscribed and filed with his claim the oath prescribed by the act "to prescribe an oath of office," approved July 2, 1862, excepting so much of said oath as relates to the discharge of the duties of officers, and every person falsely taking said oath under the provisions of this bill shall be liable to the penalties prescribed in the act of July 2, 1862.

Mr. WILSON. I call the previous question on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call for a single moment.

Mr. WILSON. I will do so for a moment to hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. THOMAS. The House will remember that this subject was under consideration a month or two ago, and they will recollect that a more comprehensive bill than the one now before this body was sanctioned by a very large majority of the House. After the principle of that bill was sanctioned, the majority thought it advisable to commit the bill to the Judiciary Committee, with a view to its revival and amendment. That bill has been considered by the committee, and has been reported with sundry amendments. It is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is a bill, of course, which I individually prefer very much to the one now before the House. But, in view of the late period of the session and the inevitable consequence growing out of any discussion of this subject—the defeat, perhaps, of both measures—I prefer that the bill now before the House shall pass and go into the Senate, because I know that a more comprehensive bill is under consideration before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate; and if a majority of that committee favor that measure, they can send it back to us in lieu of the one which we are now about to send to the Senate. Under these circumstances I waive, so far as I am concerned, all objection to substituting for the bill now before the House the bill which is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If gentlemen who are friendly to the payment of these claims differ from me as to the proper course to be pursued, I would suggest that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that then the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that both bills be considered together, and that one passed which will meet the sanction of the majority. But I prefer that the bill now before the House be passed, and subjected to the scrutiny and amendment of the Senate.

The bill was engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. WILSON moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask whether this bill covers anything more than property taken for the use of the Army.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not extend at all to damages?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. All right, GARFIELD.

The question was taken; and the bill was passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISABILITIES OF TRAITORS.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back an act to exclude traitors and alien enemies from the courts of the United States in civil cases, and from the public lands; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

CONFISCATION OF REBEL PROPERTY.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 329) to amend the laws providing for the confiscation of rebel property, and asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

It was so ordered.

REPEAL OF FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, from the same committee, reported, for several bills referred to the committee on that subject, a substitute entitled "A bill to repeal the fugitive slave act of 1850 and all acts and parts of acts for the rendition of fugitive slaves;" which was read a first and second time.

The bill repeals sections three and four of the act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters, passed February 12, 1793, and an act to amend and supplementary to the same, passed September, 1850.

The bill was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and called for tellers on the latter motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRIS, of New York, and COFFROTH, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 57; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 44, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, James S. Brown, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles H. Harris, Holman, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Strouse, Sweat, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Diggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—66.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WILSON moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under its operation the vote by which the bill was recommitted was reconsidered.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, withdrew the motion to recommit.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays on the passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question if he will withdraw the previous question.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I decline to withdraw it.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I wish to state to the House the reason why I asked the gentleman to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to say only a word.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I have the floor I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. If the gentleman from Kentucky does not want over two minutes I am willing to yield to him.

Mr. COX. Think of it! They condescend to give us two minutes to discuss the repeal of the Constitution!

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, Kentucky is the only State still adhering to the Union which has not abolished or taken the initiatory steps to abolish slavery. Missouri has already passed an ordinance of emancipation, and it is generally conceded, I believe, that the convention now in session in Maryland will abolish it in that State; Kentucky, then, in a short time, will be the only State, of all those adhering to the national Union, in which slavery will remain.

A MEMBER. What of Delaware?

Mr. MALLORY. I think slavery has been abolished in Delaware, or at any rate only exists there nominally.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has badly gone.

Mr. MALLORY. As the gentlemen on the other side of the House regard this as the fact, and as they know that the Constitution orders the surrender of fugitive slaves, I demand, as an act of justice to my State, that the fugitive slave act be permitted to remain on the statute-book. If you say that it will be a dead letter, so much less excuse have you for repealing it, and so much more certainly is the insult and wrong to Kentucky gratuitous. This act by which you declare your intention not to obey the injunction of the Constitution is wanton and useless, except for the purpose of bravely exhibiting your contempt for that instrument and the rights of the States. This act, remember, is the forerunner of an act to amend the Constitution so as to authorize Congress to abolish slavery throughout the United States. You must think you will fail in that effort, or you would not press this.

Mr. Speaker, if the fugitive slave law is repealed, and your provost marshals and recruiting officers draft and recruit the slaves of Kentucky; if this policy is continued, what need, think you, will there be to abolish slavery by constitutional amendment? Sir, I warn you against the course this Congress is pursuing. Already you have crushed out every feeling of love of the Union in the people of the revolted States, and you are besotted if you think that acts of oppression and wrong can be perpetrated in the border slave States without producing estrangement and even enmity there. Kentucky has remained true to her faith pledged to the Government, and I warn you not to persevere in inflicting on her insult and outrage. The framers of the Constitution gave us the right to reclaim fugitive slaves. It was conceded not as a favor, but as a right. No one disputed it; no one dared to dispute it. No one disputes it now. The President, and every respectable member of the Republican party, have again and again admitted the right. Do not indicate your contempt of it now by the passage of this repealing act, useless as you know it to be.

If you are determined to do it, will the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORRIS] who has charge of the bill withdraw the call for the previous question, to enable me to offer an amendment excepting my State from its operation, in order to save her from insult and do her justice?

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I must decline—

Mr. MALLORY. I did not expect that he would yield. Justice is a thing that I have long ceased to hope for from that side of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that there be a call of the House.

Mr. PENDLETON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STROUSE moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. DAWSON demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELDRIDGE and FENTON were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-five.

So, more than one fifth voting in favor thereof, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question first recurred on Mr. STROUSE's motion for an adjournment over to Wednesday next; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 87; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Griswold, Holman, Mallory, Moorhead, Morrison, Noble, Strouse, and Thomas—13.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Broomall, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Edgerton, Eliot, Finck, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Longyear, Marvin, McDowell, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Sweat, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—87.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to adjourn; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 8, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bliss, Eden, Eldridge, Morrison, Pendleton, Strouse, and Whaley—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Broomall, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Edgerton, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Chilton A.

White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—88.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question next recurred on the motion that there be a call of the House; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 44, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, James S. Brown, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Rogers, Ross, Strouse, Sweat, Watworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—44.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McDowell, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—66.

So the House refused to order a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Is it in order to move to postpone this bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to appeal to the gentleman to postpone the bill?

The SPEAKER. Not without unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent.

Consent was given.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from New York to allow this bill to be printed in the first place. Although I have not consulted with gentlemen upon this side of the House in reference to the time when a vote can be taken, I can say that we cannot do justice to this bill this evening. The excitement incident to the Baltimore convention and other matters has incapacitated gentlemen on that side of the House for considering constitutional questions. The United States courts have decided that this law is constitutional, and it is the only refuge left to a certain class of our citizens to protect their rights. Its repeal will help the rebels; help Jeff. Davis, and perhaps defeat Lincoln's nomination. I hope, then, the gentleman will postpone the bill, for the present at least.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. To what time does that side of the House propose to postpone the question and have a vote taken upon it?

Mr. COX. Let it be referred back to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. FENTON. With leave to report at any time?

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays, and call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I suggest that if the other side of the House will consent to the designation of a particular day when action shall be had upon the bill, I shall be inclined to postpone the consideration of the question.

Mr. HARDING. And allow discussion?

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. Meanwhile the bill can be printed.

Mr. COX. There will be no objection to postponing this bill, provided action be not attempted at once upon the day fixed upon.

Mr. WILSON. In order to do justice to the Judiciary Committee, I desire to say it was the intention of the committee, by having this bill re-committed and printed, to allow every member of the House to have full time to examine it before it should be brought back by a motion to reconsider. But the other side of the House, by entering a motion to reconsider, compelled this action to lay that motion on the table. The committee did not intend until that action by the other side of the House to press this bill to a vote to-day. Now, I presume it will be satisfactory to the committee if a particular time is agreed upon for taking this vote. If that is not done, I cannot see that anything is gained by postponing the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is certainly no advantage to be gained by postponing this bill for the purpose of having it printed, as there is no gentleman upon this floor who does not understand the full effect of the bill. It is one of those subjects upon which there can be no misunderstanding; so that nothing is gained, by way of information to the House, by a postponement. The only benefit will be to enable gentlemen who desire to discuss the subject to do so. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from New York to postpone the bill until some future day, and allow it to be open for debate for a reasonable time.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. How long a time will they ask for discussion?

Mr. GANSON. I suggest to my colleague that he postpone it until after we have amended the Constitution.

Mr. WILSON. Does the gentleman expect to vote for the amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. GANSON. I have no doubt I may be convinced of its propriety when I hear the chairman of the Judiciary Committee make an argument upon that subject.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the gentleman will vote for it, as I am satisfied he desires to do so if he can break loose from the party that now hampers him.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I renew the inquiry, how long a time do gentlemen ask for discussing this question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Such time as may be deemed reasonable.

Mr. MALLORY. I will state to the gentleman from New York that I do not think it will be proper to fix any time within which this discussion must take place. The gentleman and his friends will have the control of that matter, as they can move the previous question and close the debate. Why should the gentleman be solicitous to know how long we want to discuss the bill, as long as his friends can control the matter? It is impossible to tell how many gentlemen desire to make speeches.

Mr. COX. I would suggest that the bill be postponed until Friday next.

Mr. WILSON. There is a question of privilege set down for that day.

Mr. COX. Say Tuesday of next week.

Mr. WILSON. That day also is set apart for considering the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. COX. Say the first day after that is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that Monday of next week is not assigned for anything.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to Monday.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I am willing to set it down for that day with the understanding that the vote shall be taken on that day.

Mr. PENDLETON. I shall not agree to any understanding with reference to a vote on this bill; but I am willing, if I may be permitted to say so, to have it set down for any day the gentleman desires, and let it be printed in the mean time, and then when it comes up let it stand in the same position it does to-day; that will give gentlemen entire control of it.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I am willing to have it set apart for next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it will have as high preference if the House postpones it as it has now.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand that; and therefore I do not object to its being made a special order.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. And I suggest that after reasonable discussion the vote shall be taken on that day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York suggests the postponement of the bill until Monday next after the morning hour; and he desires to have unanimous consent in regard to the time when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. PENDLETON. There can be no unanimous consent in regard to taking the vote. I do not object to making it a special order.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair hears no objection to the bill being postponed until Monday next after the morning hour, and made the special order.

Mr. WILSON. Does that include any arrangement by which the vote shall be taken?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. WILSON. What effect will that have on the order of the House in relation to the consideration of the joint resolution in reference to the amendment of the Constitution?

The SPEAKER. The effect will be that the bill will be debated on Monday, and on Monday evening, if there be an evening session, and if not disposed of, it will then come up again after the joint resolution in relation to the constitutional amendment shall be disposed of.

Mr. ANCONA. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred certain petitions and resolutions, reported a bill to detach the counties of Calhoun and Branch from the western judicial district, and to annex the same to the eastern judicial district for the State of Michigan, which was read a first and second time.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I wish to say a few words on that measure. It is one about which the delegation were divided.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk read the bill.

The first section provides for detaching the counties of Calhoun and Branch in the State of Michigan from the western judicial district, and annexing them to the eastern judicial district of that State. The second section provides that this act shall not affect in any manner any suit or proceeding now pending in the court of the western judicial district, but that the same shall be proceeded in and determined in said court in the same manner as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I intend to move the previous question on the bill; but before doing so, will yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. It is well known to the older members of the House that the State of Michigan was divided into two judicial districts, I think about two years ago, and this is a proposition to detach two counties from one of the districts and transfer them to the other. The petitioners no doubt think they have good reasons for asking this change, and I am not disposed to comment on them or to consume the time of the House; but I think the reasons that they allege can be answered satisfactorily, perhaps, to them before another session of Congress. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the second Tuesday in December next, when I will not object to its passage, unless the petitioners are satisfied in the mean time with the present arrangement.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I cannot yield to the gentleman to make the motion to postpone.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. Then I hope the bill will be voted down.

Mr. UPSON. I hope not.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 30, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Mr. UPSON. I ask my colleague to withdraw his motion for a moment to allow me to make a statement.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I will withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. UPSON. I wish to state that these two counties, in one of which I reside and the other of which is a little north of that, were placed in the western judicial district without their knowledge and without their being consulted. Their business relations are wholly with the city of Detroit, and the people of the counties have to pass through Detroit in order to get to Grand Rapids, which is the seat of justice of the western district.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman answer me this question: was there any necessity whatever for creating that additional district last Congress?

Mr. UPSON. My colleague [Mr. Kellogg] can answer that question. I do not want to interfere with it any further than to have these two counties put back in the eastern district, as the inhabitants desire. The board of supervisors of the county of Branch unanimously requested me to have it done; and more than seven hundred and fifty electors of the county have petitioned for that course to be taken. I am informed by my colleague from the fourth district [Mr. LONGYEAR] that a similar application has been made by the people of Calhoun county. There can be no injury done by this to the people of the western district, and it will be simple justice to the two counties in question. They lie, the one on the Central road and the other on the Southern road, and are in immediate communication with Detroit, where they can go and attend to their business in half the time they could go to the western district. It is a matter of simple justice to them that this bill be passed.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I withdraw the motion to postpone.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMIRALTY PROCEEDINGS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 184) to facilitate proceedings in admiralty and other judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to move that the bill be postponed till some day in December next, if my colleague will yield for that purpose.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I will not yield for that purpose. I am willing to consent to its postponement for some days, in order that the gentlemen from New York [Messrs. KALBFLEISCH and ODELL] who represent the city of Brooklyn may be present. They are not now in their seats. Their constituents are interested in this measure. I am willing, therefore, to consent to a postponement for a week or ten days. I make the motion that it be postponed for ten days.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by postponing it to the third Tuesday in December.

Mr. COX. I will help my friend from Illinois on that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is right. [Laughter.]

Mr. FENTON. I suggest that the bill be postponed to two weeks from to-day.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I am willing to modify my motion in that way.

Mr. GANSON. I suggest to my colleague that one of the Representatives from Brooklyn to whom he has referred is now in the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I move the previous question on the motion to postpone for two weeks.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was postponed for two weeks and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was postponed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, addressed the Chair. The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from New York concluded his reports from the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I was about to remark that I have one bill more to report; but I notice that the member from Oregon who is interested in it is not now in his seat, and I propose to withhold it, and to yield for a moment to my colleague, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If the Judiciary Committee has concluded its business, I claim the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland has been recognized by the Chair.

EUROPEAN INTERVENTION IN MEXICO.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask leave to report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the correspondence referred to it the other day.

Mr. ARNOLD. I object.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. FENTON. I appeal to the gentleman from Maryland to withhold the report until my colleague, [Mr. POMEROY], who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, may be present. I know that he takes great interest in the question. I hope the report will not be made to-day.

Mr. COX. Allow me to say in response to the gentleman from New York that my colleague on the committee [Mr. POMEROY] is anxious to have this report printed, but wants to have it debated. We do not propose to take it up and adopt it now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Ohio that a motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Fluck, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Jenckes, King, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, James K. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, Orth, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Ross, Scott, Spalding, Strouse, Sweat, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—43.

NAVS—Messrs. Atley, Ames, Arnold, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Shannon, Smithers, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wilson, and Wyndom—55.

So the rules were not suspended.

THANKS TO COLONEL BAILEY.

On motion of Mr. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, the Senate joint resolution (No. 60) tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailey, of the fourth regiment of Wisconsin volunteers, was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and unanimously passed.

Mr. SLOAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY BUSINESS.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, Thursday of next week was set apart for the consideration of the business of the Committee on Military Affairs.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BEAMAN moved to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The bills on the Speaker's table were then taken up and disposed of in their order, as follows:

RELEASE FROM ATTACHMENT.

House bill No. 355, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to stipulate for the release from attachment on Government process of property claimed by the United States, and for other purposes, with an amendment of the Senate thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. ELIOT. I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in the Senate amendment; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF GOODS FROM PUBLIC STORES.

An act (S. No. 282) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from the public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes," approved February 29, 1864, was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. FENTON, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PORT ORFORD AND CAPE PERPETUA.

An act (S. No. 283) to abolish the collection districts of Port Orford and Cape Perpetua, in the State of Oregon, was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

An act (S. No. 272) to facilitate trade on the Red river of the North was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not think there can be any objection to that bill, and I hope it will be put on its passage.

Mr. FENTON. I think the bill had better be considered by the Committee on Commerce before the House determines to pass it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from New York has any objection to the bill, I should be glad if he would state it.

Mr. FENTON. I do not know whether I have or not. I desire to have it referred for the purpose of ascertaining—

Mr. DONNELLY. I hope at this stage of the session this bill will not be referred.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will suggest to the gentleman from New York that there may be some doubt whether the Committee on Commerce will be called again.

Mr. FENTON. I have no objection to the bill being passed over informally.

There being no objection, the bill was passed over informally.

VETO POWER IN WASHINGTON.

An act (S. No. 285) to regulate the veto power in the Territory of Washington was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLE, of Washington. I move to amend by referring it to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to ask whether the Delegate from Washington Territory has the right to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. Under the practice of the House, Delegates have the right to make motions but not to vote.

Mr. BEAMAN. I call for the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The motion to refer to the Committee on Territories was not agreed to.

On the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary, 35 voted in the affirmative, and 50 in the negative; no quorum.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. BEAMAN and LAZEAR.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 48.

So the bill was not referred.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, took the floor.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Washington yields to me to move that the House do now adjourn.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The motion was agreed to; and the memorial was laid upon the table.

AIDS-DE-CAMP.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution of the House transmitting a list of additional aids-de-camp appointed under act of August 5, 1861, showing their rank, &c.; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PERE MARQUETTE AND FLINT RAILROAD.

Mr. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, moved to take up Senate joint resolution No. 42, to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

LOCATION OF LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. THAYER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back House bill No. 435, concerning a certain location of lands in the State of Missouri; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted to the same committee.

ALEXANDRIA AND WASHINGTON RAILROAD.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Washington railroad, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, moved that Saturday of next week be set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Whereas it is provided in section nine of the act incorporating the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, that said company "shall run cars thereon during the day as often as every five minutes, except as to Seventh and Fourteenth streets, and on these once in fifteen minutes each way," or as often as the public interest may require; and whereas the cars are withdrawn from the service of the public on Sundays, contrary to the usage in other cities, and greatly to the inconvenience of the citizens and members of Congress in visiting hospitals and in attending to other necessary duties: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the reasons why said company do not run their cars on each day of the week in accordance with the act of incorporation.

Resolved, That the committee be further instructed to report to this House, with as little delay as practicable, such further measures, if any, as may be necessary to secure the running of the cars on each and every day of the week.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to.

And then (at ten minutes past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 7, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like very much, if the Senate will allow me, to take up the fortification bill now. I think we can pass it in a short time.

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall be allowed the morning hour.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course I shall not press the motion against the wishes of gentlemen.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, accompanied by a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, concerning the claim of the confederate tribes of Kaskaskia, Peoria, Piankeshaw, and Wea Indians, arising out of the provisions of the treaty of May, 30, 1854, with those Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a series of resolutions adopted by the Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, June 1, 1864, signed, "by order of the Synod, R. Z. Wilson, clerk," which I have been desired to present to the Senate. One of these resolutions, which gives an idea of the whole, is as follows:

"That we demand, in the great name of that God with whom there is no respect of persons, the immediate and unconditional emancipation of all persons held in slavery in the United States, the abolition of all laws making odious distinctions on account of color, and such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prevent involuntary servitude, except for crime, in the United States."

I ask the reference of these resolutions to the committee on slavery and freedmen.

They were so referred.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present eleven petitions of men and women of the United States praying for the abolition of slavery and such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union. In offering these petitions I beg to remark that the mass of the petitioners, now amounting to three hundred thousand, asking for immediate emancipation by act of Congress, I am instructed, are from the working classes. If you will look at the signatures you will find it so. In many letters the signers say their names have all been written on the anvil, the rail fence, the plow, or the work-bench. It may be remarked that Illinois is two thousand ahead of all the other States, "the fruit," my correspondent remarks, "no doubt of the seed sown by the ever-faithful Owen Lovejoy." I ask the reference of these petitions to the committee on slavery and freedmen.

They were so referred.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 299) authorizing the levy court of Washington county, District of Columbia, to levy and collect its portion of the direct tax imposed by the act of Congress of August 5, 1861, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and with a recommendation that their further consideration be postponed to the next session of Congress, the committee not being sufficiently advised as to the routes of the proposed roads:

A bill (S. No. 295) making additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; and

A bill (S. No. 297) making a grant of lands to the Territories of Dakota and Montana, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said Territories.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print two thousand copies of the currency act for the use of the Comptroller of the Currency, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution, and it was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a resolution instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of amending the neutrality laws, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. No. 121) donating public lands to the several States for the support and education of the orphan children of soldiers and sailors who die in the military and naval service of the United States; and

A bill (S. No. 239) to grant aid for the construction of certain railroads in Minnesota.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 493) for the relief of William Brindle, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 422) to amend an act entitled "An act to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico," reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating papers relative to the application of Richard Fitch for bounty land, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to move to take up the bill—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are still in order.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 487) to provide for the execution of treaties between the United States and foreign nations respecting the consular jurisdiction over the crews of vessels of such foreign nations in the waters and ports of the United States, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass. As the interests of justice will be promoted by the immediate passage of this bill—and I think it will take no time—I venture to ask the Senate to act upon it now.

Mr. HOWARD. I have just asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider a bill of mine, and the motion was not entertained, and I object to this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Michigan to move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for unanimous consent to consider the bill just reported.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not see any difference in principle, and I must object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered at this time.

MARQUETTE AND ONTONAGON RAILROAD.

Mr. CARLILE. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 469) extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad of the State of Michigan, have instructed me to report it back without amendment. The Senate a few days ago passed a similar bill, but it originated in this body. This bill has passed the House of Representatives, and if it can be acted upon by the Senate now it will only need the signature of the President to become a law. The committee thought it best, therefore, to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to its present consideration?

Mr. HOWE. I hope it will lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator objects it will lie over.

Mr. HARLAN. Allow me to make this explanation. The Senate has passed a bill substantially the same as this; but the House of Representatives having passed this bill, if the Senate should now concur in it it would become a law.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that the bill which the Senate passed interferes with the rights of another company.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator desires to examine it, I have no objection to its going over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be considered to-day if objection be made. The bill will lie over.

COLLEGE RANCHO.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 179) concerning lands in the State of California, which I think will create no discussion. It will be remembered that this is the bill which was discussed the other day, authorizing the Catholic archbishop of San Francisco to dispose of certain lands. I think there is no opposition to it now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. It will be remembered that when this bill was under consideration on a previous day, the committee was unable to report the facts connected with it. I have now a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office on this subject, which I will ask to have read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, June 3, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, inclosing House of Representatives bill No. 179 herewith in regard to the ranch known as Cañada de los Pinos, or College Grant, patented under date 24th February, 1861, to Joseph S. Alemany, Bishop of Monterey, and his successors.

I reference to the subject, I inclose herewith copy of my letter of February 1, 1864, to the honorable chairman of Public Lands, House of Representatives, and, in answer to your inquiry, have to state that the area of the ranch is 35,499.37 acres, its locality in the county of Santa Barbara, California, some twenty-five or thirty miles northeast of Point Conception, on which the light-house is situated, and some twelve or fourteen due north from the nearest shores of the Pacific. It is near the promontory on which are found the bituminous or asphaltum deposits from springs having their source far down in the bowels of the earth, the center of the spring being liquid and warm, often ranging to a temperature of 200° Fahrenheit, and which it is supposed are inexhaustible, extending under the bed of the ocean to an unknown distance seaward, covering the earth with an oily substance resembling coal-oil. I have not such data as will enable me to answer with any degree of accuracy as to the probable value of the ranch in question; but satisfactory information in that respect can doubtless be had from members of the congressional delegation from the State.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
J. M. EDMUNDS,
Commissioner.

Hon. J. HARLAN, Chairman of Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. Here is another letter on the same subject, which I ask to have read.

Mr. McDUGALL. Before that is done I wish to ask the Secretary if the amount of the land is stated at thirty-five thousand in that letter. That is the way it was read. I think it is a mistake; it should be thirty-five hundred acres.

The SECRETARY. Thirty-five thousand four hundred and ninety-nine and thirty-seven hundredths.

Mr. McDUGALL. That is a mistake, I think. The Secretary read the following letter:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, February 1, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to return you herewith the "bill concerning certain lands in the State of California," received with a letter of the 28th ultimo from the clerk of the committee.

This bill refers to a patent dated February 28, 1861, as recorded in the California Record, volume three, pages 225 to 235 inclusive, in favor of "Joseph Sadoc Alemany, Roman Catholic Bishop of Monterey," California.

In his petition to the board of land commissioners, the bishop claimed "the confirmation to him and his successors of the title to certain church property in California, to be held by him and them in trust for the religious purposes and uses to which the same have been respectively appropriated; said property consisting of church edifices, houses for the use of the clergy and those employed in the service of the church, church yards, burial grounds, gardens, orchards, and vineyards, with the necessary buildings thereon and appurtenances, the same having been recognized as the property of the said church by the laws of Mexico in force at the time of the cession of California to the United States."

A decree of confirmation was rendered by the said board accordingly, an appeal taken therefrom to the United States district court for the southern district of California, and as said appeal was afterwards dismissed, the decree of the board became final, and the patent was thereafter issued to the said "Joseph S. Alemany, Bishop of Monterey, and to his successors, in trust for the religious purposes and uses to which the same have been respectively appropriated."

The bill inclosed seeks congressional legislation so as to make it "lawful for the said Joseph S. Alemany, and his successors as the grantees of said patent, to lease, mortgage, or sell the said tract or ranch, or any part thereof, and all proper conveyances in that behalf to make and deliver, and the proceeds thereof to apply, under the direction of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of San Francisco, in the State of California, and his successors in office or other proper authority of the Roman Catholic church in said State, for the purposes of education anywhere within said State; anything in said patent or in the original grant or concession of said tract, or ranch, or other title whereby the same was acquired from and under the authorities of Spain, or Mexico, to the contrary notwithstanding."

"And all trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants, precedent or subsequent, expressed or implied, in said patent, grant, concession, or title, to the contrary hereof, and all breaches of the same, are hereby wholly waived, abrogated, discharged, dispensed with, and released on the part of the United States for the purposes of this act. And any conveyance or disposition made in pursuance thereof shall operate to pass the estate or interest conveyed or disposed of free and discharged from all such trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants."

The bishop, as the grantee and chief ecclesiastical authority in that region, is undoubtedly the proper judge as to the manner in which the interests of the church in the matters can be best subserved; and as the United States have now no proprietary right in the premises, I can see no objection to the bill in question being matured in a law.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
J. M. EDMUNDS,
Commissioner.

Hon. G. H. JULIAN, Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out in line twelve the words "lease, mortgage, or," so that if the amendment shall be made the bill will confer on the bishop in the name of the church the right to sell this land, and not to hold it and appropriate the profits from year to year forever.

Mr. CONNESS. I really do not see any object in that amendment, considering the land and where it is located and situated. If it was valuable city land, or there was ever to be a city there, or it had any considerable value that would induce their leasing it, then it might be desirable in the bill to confine the church to the right to dispose of it alone, and not to lease or mortgage it; but this land is probably not worth on the average thirty cents an acre. It is composed, necessarily, from the country in which it lies, of hills and mountain ridges, having a great altitude. There are scarcely any valley lands in that locality. It is near the coast range, where there are no running streams. There may be perhaps a creek running through it having a very narrow bottom; but it is land fit for sheep-ranges and pastures for cattle, and eminently fitted for the cultivation and production of the grape. Those are about the only purposes to which it is pertinent or useful. I doubt very much the propriety of imposing this restriction upon the bill. I am entirely satisfied, from my knowledge of the country and of this application, that the purpose is not to reserve an estate in it, but to sell and dispose of whatever they desire and have a customer for, and apply the proceeds in their own way for the purposes of education. It may be answered to that, that if their only purpose is to sell and dispose of the land the amendment is altogether right; but it is a restriction that we impose upon them that is not imposed upon any other person in connection with other lands.

Mr. HARLAN. I have but a word to say. It is manifest that they have not now the right to mortgage, lease, or sell this land, or they would not be here for the leave to be granted by Congress. There is an objection in the minds of the people of this country to immense estates passing into the hands of corporations which never die. We discard in this country all ideas of primogeniture, on the ground that it is better for the people of the country for the real estate to be disposable and to change from hand to hand at the death of the owner.

If this is an objectionable feature in other countries, and has resulted frequently in the ruin of the laboring people, we ought to guard against the accumulation of immense estates in the hands of corporations in this country. It is said that the chief cause of difficulty to a stable Government in Mexico has been that the landed property of Mexico has been rapidly passing into the hands of the leading church in that country, and thus is held from ownership on the part of those that cultivate the soil. I do not know how valuable this estate may be. It is a very large estate, and, judging from its appearance on the map, I infer it is a very valuable tract of country, selected many years ago by a people who always act very wisely in the selection of their locations. If it should be a very valuable estate, I see no objection to their selling it and permitting it to pass into the hands of private holders; but if they are permitted to lease or mortgage it, and thus hold it from century to century, I think it is subject to the objection to which I have alluded.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes ten—

Mr. HARLAN. If I were sure that the attention of Senators had been directed to this subject I would not ask for the yeas and nays; but I fear it has not been. I therefore ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Clark, Davis, Donnell, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Pomeroy, Rainey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Conness, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, McDougall, Richardson, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—8.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Trumbull, and Wright—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to the object of the bill. The only objection I have is founded upon a doubt as to the authority of Congress to pass it. I do not know that I comprehend the exact nature of the estate with which the bill deals. It is an estate granted by Mexico. It is held, therefore, a complete Mexican grant. Under the act of 1851 all grants—differing in that respect from the laws which were passed in carrying out the treaties by which we obtained Florida and Louisiana, which dealt only with inchoate titles—all grants, whether consummated grants or inchoate grants, were to be brought before the board of commissioners and confirmed by that board. If they were not confirmed Congress undertook to say they should revert to the United States. This grant was brought before the court; it has been confirmed, and the United States have issued a patent as they do in all such cases. The title having passed out of the United States, it seems to me we have no more authority over it than we should have had if consummate titles, that is to say, titles under a grant on the part of Mexico, had not been provided for by the act of 1851, but left to stand upon their own footing. This bill undertakes, as I collect from the reading of it, to discharge the grantees from trusts connected with the original title. It seems to me that over those trusts we have now no control. The matter is one to be settled between the State of California, or its proper authorities, who may be invoked at the instance of the grantee who holds the legal title, or at the instance of the cestui qui trusts for whom the title is held. That is the only difficulty I have to the passage of this bill. If the honorable members from California can satisfy me that the object cannot be accomplished except by this act of Congress, it would remove my objection to it.

Mr. CONNESS. My understanding of this case is that the United States Government never had a title to this land; that it is, as the Senator has properly stated, a perfect Mexican grant. We agreed by treaty with Mexico when California was ceded to us that we would inquire into and ascertain what Mexican citizens had title to property within the limits of that State, and that we would allow and confirm those titles as perfect which we found to be correct. In process of time this claim was presented under that treaty or the laws made in pursuance thereof; and in the act of confirmation the court of the United States in adjudicating the matter, which court was created by act of Congress, continued the restriction that was originally imposed by Mexico on the church, limiting the application of the proceeds of this estate to the religious uses and purposes exclusively of the church. That condition first imposed by Mexico in making the grant was continued by a court of the United States organized under the jurisdiction of Congress and by a congressional act. To whatever extent we indorsed and affirmed and enacted that condition, the owners of this estate come here and ask the competent congressional authority to remit it.

I am of the opinion that they have a full and perfect right to sell this land and do with it as they might without coming here. That is my opinion about it; but they have chosen to come. Why have they chosen to come? Because, the world over, persons are very careful in regard to the perfection of titles to estates; and to remove any doubt or any cloud that might hang over the transaction where parts of this estate were sold and the proceeds of which might be used for another purpose or other purposes than those contained in the original grant and in the act of confirmation and the condition accompanying it, they come here and ask us to modify, so far as an act of Congress can, the condition that was imposed upon them. I see no objection to its being done.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think the Senator from Maryland is mistaken in regard to the facts. The possessions acquired by the missions in California were acquired by the consent, or rather they were permitted by the Government, not in the forms of concessions or grants to the mission churches, but a mission was established here and there in different points in the country where there was a large Indian population with very much the same purpose that presidios were established at military posts in other parts of the country for the purpose of acquiring a command over the Indians. The mission acquired just as much country as they should find available and as they could populate with the Indian tribes that were assigned to them as dependencies. They never had a concession. They occupied with the consent of the Government and as a part both of the Spanish and Mexican policy. In 1824 they passed a law for the secularization of the church lands, and under that law all the church lands, particularly in the northern part of California, were secularized, with the exception of the church buildings, orchards, and vineyards.

I think the report as read from the desk, from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, is a mistake, and that the fact is properly stated in the letter sent to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, which has been read, that this property comprises the church buildings, their out-buildings, their college buildings, their vineyards, and orchard. I called upon the acting United States district attorney, who has had charge of the mission grants in California, and who is now in this city, and inquired of him as to the amount of land embraced in this particular college grant, and he informed me it was about half a league. In one of those letters it is stated at thirty-eight thousand acres. That would be an immense grant, such as was not reserved to any single mission in California. It is a mistake in the making out of the papers, or else it is an aggregation of all the public lands that have been conceded from some misapprehension of the clerk.

When the lands were secularized, it was done under a law that did not provide a concession either to the local clergy or to the superior clergy; but the law still permitted them to occupy and enjoy the church building, their out-buildings, vineyards, and orchards, and the small quantity of land to be assigned to them with a limitation as to its extent; so that in point of fact, previous to the acquisition of California by the United States, the clergy had no title by concession in these lands.

But as a matter of equity, upon their application to our courts, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, from the fact of their having been in possession and having had the use of the lands, they were conceded the title as a church, and according to the usage of ecclesiastical bodies, particularly of the Roman Catholic church, the head of the ecclesiastical body took the title conceded on the part of the United States in trust. I hold that as the entire title came from the United States with limitations prescribed by the United States, it is competent for the United States to withdraw those limitations and make it a full and unqualified concession. I do not see any objection to it. It certainly can work no wrong, and they think that it will work a great convenience to them.

Mr. JOHNSON. This bill seeks to accomplish two things, if I apprehend it. It says that so far as the United States are concerned, trusts, which they have by their patents said are to be connected with the title, may not be observed; but there is another thing in it. It authorizes the grantee to dispose of the property, to sell it. Now, for the soul of me I cannot imagine how any authority of the United States to sell can give any title to sell, inasmuch as there is no estate in the United States. The honorable member from California [Mr. CONNESS] is right in saying that the United States have now no interest in the property. I think he is right about the whole extent of that statement; but if the statement is wrong in any particular it is in reference to the trusts. The United States may perhaps be considered as themselves the trustee or creating the trusts in which the cestui que trust may be interested, and they may, so far as they are concerned, say that these trusts need not be executed; but how they can authorize the grantee to sell the estate puzzles me, inasmuch as the United States have no estate in the lands which they can authorize to sell. The whole title passed out of Mexico by virtue of the original Mexican grant. The whole title, if under the act of 1851 any title could have inured to the United States, passed out of the United States when the Mexican title was affirmed and the patent was issued. It seems to me they have no more control over the land, no more authority to authorize the land to be sold, than Maryland would have.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have the bill before me, and it not only provides to discharge them from any of the trusts which were imposed on the grant on the part of the United States, but it goes further and says:

And any conveyance or disposition made in pursuance thereof shall operate to pass the estate or interest conveyed or disposed of free and discharged from all such trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants.

It is not only a discharge of the trust on the part of the United States, but the United States are to undertake to guaranty it.

Mr. HARLAN. I will suggest an amendment to the latter clause of the bill by striking out all after the word "pass" in the thirtieth line in the following words:

The estate or interest conveyed or disposed of free and discharged from all such trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants.

And to insert these words:

All the right and interest of the United States in said land to the grantee.

So that it will read:

And any conveyance or disposition made in pursuance thereof shall operate to pass all the right and interest of the United States in said land to the grantee.

Mr. CONNESS. I would just as soon the honorable Senator from Iowa would move to postpone this bill indefinitely as move that amendment; and with that amendment, for one, I do not ask the passage of the bill. When we state here that which is the fact, namely, that the United States have no interest in this land, never had any interest in it, cannot acquire any interest in it, why should we pass an act to cede the right, title, and interest of the United States?

The honorable Senator from Maryland, who is very able and always extremely exact in his presentation of legal questions, suggests that he does not see what right we have to pass this act, because, as I understand him, there is no title in the United States; the United States have parted with their title. In other words, what right has Congress to pass an act authorizing any disposition of lands where they have no title? Do not legislative bodies constantly authorize the disposition of lands and provide for the conveyance of a legal and complete title in the cases of heirs without hesitation, where the United States have no title and never had any title except the title that might be derived from their ownership of the public lands? Do I understand the honorable Senator from Maryland to say that the Congress of the United States, the law-making power, have no right to pass any act authorizing the disposition of real estate unless they, the United States, have a title in the same? I apprehend that that is not a sound proposition, although I concede very freely that the honorable Senator is a great lawyer, while I am very willing to affirm that I am not a lawyer at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the member will permit me—

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. The difficulty is that over the subject of this legislation the United States have no control. If I am right, it is a case in which the lands are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of California, and if they are subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of California, what right have Congress to legislate so as to authorize the sale of those lands? Will the honorable member for a moment admit that it is in the power of Congress to legislate in relation to the real estate of California? I presume not. If, therefore, this be a portion of the real estate within the limits of California, over which the jurisdiction of that State exists, then he admits a case in which the United States have no power, because where the jurisdiction of the State exists upon a subject of this sort it is exclusive; it is outside of the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator, in place of reconciling his own proposition, has pursued another course. I asked the Senator whether he undertook to say that it was incompetent for the Congress of the United States to give authority concerning the disposition of lands where they did not have title. He does not answer that. But, sir, I do not desire to pursue this discussion. I wish to say, in conclusion, that the reason these people ask for an act of Congress, I suppose, is very palpable and plain, namely: that this land, in the confirmation of its title, passed the courts of the United States; that it is within the jurisdiction of the United States, although within the police jurisdiction of the State of California; the courts of the State of California did not confirm this land claim; and I think they have very properly come to the United States to ask a modification of the order that was made. I hope, and I ask, without any further discussion, that the question be taken upon the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this bill is going to take up any more time—

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for a vote; and I do not think we shall have any further discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to take up and pass to-day the joint resolution amendatory of the joint resolution temporarily increasing the duties on imports; and I shall therefore move to postpone this bill, if there is to be any further discussion upon it. The joint resolution to which I refer has been lying on our tables for some time, and it is important that action should be had upon it.

Mr. HARLAN. I can say to the Senator from Ohio that I think a vote will be taken on this bill in a minute or two.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to say four or five words in relation to the point suggested by the Senator from Maryland. We have passed similar bills to this repeatedly during every session of Congress since I have been a member of this body, and have at this session, where it was a matter of great doubt whether the United States had any title to the lands. The bills were passed, however, for the purpose of removing a cloud upon the title. We passed a bill through the Senate a few days since in relation to a very valuable property in California, in which it was probable that the United States had no title whatever. It was maintained, however, by some that they had; and for the purpose of clearing the title, removing this cloud upon it, a bill was passed relinquishing all the title, if any did in fact exist in the United States, to the holder. This I suppose is the only benefit that can grow out of the passage of this bill, to pass from the United States to the grantee, if the trustee should choose to sell the land, whatever rights the United States may have, if any do exist in the United States. If there are none, then nothing passes. If there is anything in the United States, it will enable them to sell it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from California that perhaps an amendment in this form, instead of the one moved by the Senator from Iowa, may do what the Senator from California desires and at the same time meet the point which the Senator from Iowa desires to meet; and that is that this bill operate by way of quit-claim as against the United States without affecting the rights of other parties.

Mr. HARLAN. I suppose that will be the effect of the amendment I have offered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will suggest an amendment which I think would cover the case, if the last clause of the bill was made to read in this way:

And any conveyance or disposition made in pursuance thereof shall, as against the United States and all persons claiming under them, operate to pass the estate or interest conveyed or disposed of from and discharged from all such trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants.

The fact as it stands here is this: the United States hold this title; at all events it assumed to patent this land to the Catholic bishop of Monterey; and in the patent which it gave to the bishop it put certain conditions and restrictions. The effect of the passage of the bill in this form would be, in substance, to give to him, so far as the United States is concerned, a clear quit-claim of the title, and he would have a right, as against the United States or any persons claiming under the United States, to dispose of it in fee absolutely discharged from the trusts.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the question will be taken without further discussion on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. There is no difference between the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin and that offered by the Senator from Iowa. I say that the United States have no title and never had any title in that land, and consequently we do not want this bill amended so as to quit-claim anything nor to cede the right of the United States to anything. I hope we shall come to a vote and let this bill be disposed of in some way. I am really tired of it. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McDUGALL. Before this vote is taken I desire to say one word. I differ somewhat with my colleague on this subject. The title to this land did rest, as I understand it, in the United States, by the acquisition of California, by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo. It was the United States that charged this land with these eleemosynary trusts, different from any other trusts, and governed by a somewhat different law. The party granting an estate, and charging the persons holding it for a charity or a religious purpose, has a right to affix terms, and that same person making the grant also has the right, according to the rule of English law obtaining in our country, and the law governing all charities, to relinquish those trusts, for the very reason that he had made the grant, and with the acquiescence of the person who had made the grant. Upon the ancient maxim that trusts cannot be divested, it might be granted a hundred times, and yet it would stand charged in whosoever hand the estate came, they having created the trust. The owners of the estate being vested with the charity, with the estate, they have a certain right of direction. They have under the English law, and the same rule has been recognized by our own courts with regard to eleemosynary grants, in various parts of the United States, and particularly in New England, and it has been the subject of one of the most learned and labored discussions in the Supreme Court of the United States. There is reason why the United States should cede to these parties the full ius emendi, so that the lands may be parted with without being charged with the trust imposed upon them by the grant under which they will have to claim title. I trust the bill may be passed substantially as it was introduced.

Mr. CONNESS. Do I understand my colleague to say that he is in favor of this amendment?

Mr. McDUGALL. No, sir; of course not.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say a single word on this bill—

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to yield to allow me to move to take up the joint resolution in relation to the duties on imports, which ought to receive the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand the Senator from Kentucky is willing to allow us to have a vote without further debate. The yeas and nays have been called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) Does the Senator from Kentucky yield the floor?

Mr. DAVIS. I will withdraw my application to make any remarks; but I shall be forced to vote against the amendment and the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no further discussion I will not press my motion.

Mr. CONNESS. There will be no further discussion.

Mr. CARLILE. I propose at least to test the sense of the Senate on this bill without voting upon amendments as they may be offered. As I understand it, the Congress of the United States has no more right to pass such a law as this than the legislative body of any other country. The power to grant this sale and change this trust, if it belongs anywhere, belongs to the Legislature of the State of California wherein the land lies. It is not pretended that the United States has any claim to this land, that there is any cloud about the title in consequence of any supposed claim of the United States. I therefore move for the indefinite postponement of the bill, and ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will undoubtedly lead to debate, and I therefore renew my motion to postpone all prior orders with a view to take up House joint resolution No. 81.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senate will not do that. We can come to a vote in a few minutes. This bill has been up twice. The Senator from Ohio has no more right to the attention of the Senate than we have for the consideration of this bill. He may claim that he presents a public measure. But, sir, I will not occupy time upon it. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. That will be a sufficient test vote, and I therefore appeal to my friend from Virginia to withdraw his motion. I think the bill will only occupy about five minutes longer.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest that at this period of the session all private bills, and all bills of a minor character, must give way to public measures. That has been the universal custom of the Senate, after the morning hour, to allow bills upon which the action of the body must be had to take precedence of any private bills. Unless that rule be insisted upon by the Senate it will be difficult to get along at this stage of the session. As a matter of course, it is entirely within the power of the Senate; but it is my duty to submit the motion. The resolution that I propose to take up is a joint resolution amendatory of the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports, approved April 29, 1864. A great many lawsuits and a great deal of litigation have grown out of that resolution, and it is very important to have action upon this amendatory resolution at an early day.

MR. CONNESS. It is only ten minutes past the morning hour. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. HOWARD. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Ohio what the resolution he proposes to take up relates to.

MR. SHERMAN. The Senator will remember that some time since we passed a joint resolution temporarily increasing the duties on imports fifty per cent. There is some doubt as to the precise time when that resolution took effect, and whether it operated upon goods in bond. Litigations and disputes have arisen upon it, and it is very necessary to act upon this resolution in order to define the precise time when it took effect. I do not think it will take long to consider it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Cowan, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Johnson, Powell, Richardson, Sherman, Ten Eyck, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Davis, Doollittle, Harlan, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sautsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Trumbull, and Wright—16.

So the motion was not agreed to.

MR. CONNESS. I hope we shall now have a vote without further discussion.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the proposed amendment?

MR. CONNESS. I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered upon that; but I will withdraw the call, with the consent of the Senate.

MR. CARLILE. I made a motion to indefinitely postpone the bill and the amendment, and asked for the yeas and nays upon that, which will test the sense of the Senate.

MR. CONNESS. I have no objection to having a test vote upon that.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on indefinitely postponing the bill, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

MR. CARLILE. I will withdraw my motion if it is desired, and allow the question to be taken on the amendment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion may be withdrawn by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Doollittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Johnson, Powell, Richardson, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, and Willey—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Davis, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sautsbury, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Trumbull, and Wright—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

MR. DOOLLITTLE. After the word "State," in the nineteenth line, I move to insert the words "not inconsistent with the laws thereof;" so that it will read:

Or other proper authority of the Roman Catholic church in said State, for the purposes of education anywhere within said State, not inconsistent with the laws thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

MR. COLLAMER. I hardly know how to vote on this measure, and I desire to have the bill read, with the amendments, so that we may see how it now stands.

The Secretary read the bill, as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That under the patent of the United States issued on the 26th day of February, 1861, to Joseph S. Alemany, as the bishop of Monterey, and his successors, for the tract of land or rancho known as Cañada de los Pinos, or College Rancho, situate in the county of Santa Barbara, State of California, as described in such patent, to have and to hold the same to him and them "in trust for the religious purposes and uses" therein mentioned, it shall be lawful for the said Joseph S. Alemany and his successors, as the grantees of said patent, to sell the said tract or rancho, or any part thereof, and all proper conveyances in that behalf to make and deliver, and the proceeds thereof to apply, under the direction of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of San Francisco, in the State of California, and his successors in office, or other proper authority of the Roman Catholic church in said State, for the purposes of education anywhere within said State, not inconsistent with the laws thereof, anything in such patent or in the original grant or concession of said tract or rancho, or other title whereby the same was acquired from and under the authorities of Spain or Mexico, to the contrary notwithstanding, and all trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants, precedent or subsequent, expressed or implied, in said patent, grant, concession, or title to the contrary hereof, and all branches of the same, are hereby wholly waived, abrogated, discharged, dispensed with and released on the part of the United States, for the purposes of this act; and any conveyance or disposition made in pursuance thereof shall operate to pass all the right and interest of the United States in said land to the grantee.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill ordered to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

MR. CARLILE. If I understand this bill, the Congress of the United States has no power to grant the authority assumed in the bill. The only effect that it can possibly have will be probably to convey the impression that rights may be acquired under this act of Congress. If what is desired ought to be granted, application should be made to the Legislature of California, wherein the land lies, for authority such as is proposed to be conferred by this bill, or it may be made to the judicial tribunals of that State. Certainly this Government has derived no power to pass such a law simply because of a patent issued under a grant which had been made by the Mexican Government. I therefore propose to record my vote against this bill, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon its passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. HOWARD. I confess that I see no such difficulty as the Senator from Virginia seems to see in this bill. I do not think that Congress is transcending its power under the Constitution in passing it. There was a time at least when the United States had an interest in the land in question—a time at which the United States had precisely the same interest in the land that was possessed by the republic of Mexico which made the original grant to the church. If I understand it properly, this grant was made by the republic of Mexico to a religious corporation, either sole or aggregate. I presume the grant was made to the bishop of the diocese, who, by the usages of the Church of Rome, under certain very ancient orders of the Pope, was the proper person to hold the title. The grant was made upon certain trusts and conditions, and the object of the grant was the promotion of the Roman Catholic religion and the maintenance of the Roman Catholic priesthood in that diocese. That was the object and purpose of the republic of Mexico in making the original grant.

The only question for us to determine, therefore, is whether the United States by acquiring this title, by becoming, in other words, the successor of Mexico to the sovereignty of the country, did not charge itself with whatever trusts and duties pertained to Mexico previous to the cession of the territory to the United States. I think the United States are the successor of Mexico in respect to this land, and that the United States are bound by precisely the same obligations, whatever they were, which were once incumbent on the republic of Mexico. It certainly cannot be denied that the republic of Mexico was bound to see to it in some form that the conditions and trusts of this grant were carried out in good faith, and that the land should be appropriated for the support and maintenance of the church, or of the priesthood; at all events, that it should be applied to the purposes intended by the republic of Mexico. The whole effect of the bill now before us is to waive any right, power, or authority which would otherwise pertain to the United States in reference to the continuation of this trust thus attaching to the land under the original grant. The United States does not seek to interfere in any way whatever beyond the mere abandonment of any right, power, or privilege which the Government of the United States might exercise, or ought to exercise, in the enforcement of this trust. So far, most assuredly, Mr. President, it is fit and proper for the United States to pass this bill. We simply cut ourselves off for the future from denying the right of the bishop or whoever may be in possession of this land to make a conveyance of it, and to sell it and transfer it from hand to hand. That is the sole effect of our deed, and the sole effect of this bill, as I understand it. Hence I see no difficulty whatever, and shall vote for the bill.

MR. CARLILE. I understand that all the United States had to do with this land was made its duty by virtue of the treaty entered into between us and Mexico, and that was to carry out in good faith the grants which had been made by the Mexican Government. That has been done by the United States in the issuing of the patent with the condition and covenants contained in it and which were imposed by the grant. Any future disposition of this property or the enforcement of any of the conditions contained in the grant must be made or must be had through the Legislature or through the State of California, which has entire and sole jurisdiction over the lands within its limits. After the Government of the United States had performed its duty in relation to this grant under the treaty entered into with Mexico, all authority which it had over the land ceased so far as related to the enforcement of the grant, the changing or altering of the grant, or the release of the grantee from any of the covenants attached to the grant. Any application to change the grant or to dispose of it or which seeks to make an entirely different diversion of the fund should be made to the State of California and not to the Government of the United States. Why, sir, the grantees under patents of land held in the Senator's own State issued by the Government of the United States might as well come to the Congress of the United States and claim a change in those grants or an alteration of them as this Bishop of Monterey.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Conness, Doollittle, Fessenden, Harlan, Howard, Howe, McDougall, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Richardson, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Powell, Sautsbury, and Ten Eyck—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Trumbull, and Wright—16.

So the bill was passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 274) in relation to the computation of the time within which an indictment may be found against persons charged with crimes against the laws of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (No. 281) to amend the sixteenth section of the act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (No. 284) to prevent the selling and circulation of counterfeit coin, and of counterfeit and altered Treasury notes and postal currency bills—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (No. 305) to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (No. 497) in relation to the village of Deposit, Delaware county, New York—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

trict of the State of Michigan—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A joint resolution (No. 87) amendatory of an act to provide for the deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department or department of Missouri—to the Committee on Finance.

COURTS IN WISCONSIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House of Representatives have returned the bill (S. No. 55) in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin, and for other purposes, with an amendment, which will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to interfere with executions, processes, or orders of sale already in part executed, but the same shall proceed and be perfected as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My colleague is not in the Chamber at this moment, and I ask that that amendment may be allowed to lie on the table until he comes in, so that we may have a consultation about it, and determine whether it is proper to ask for a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie upon the table for the present.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to postpone all prior orders with a view to take up House joint resolution No. 81.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 81) amendatory of the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports, approved April 29, 1864. As the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports was approved by the President on the 29th of April, at thirty minutes past seven o'clock p. m., but was not promulgated until the day following, the resolution provides that that joint resolution shall not be deemed to have taken effect until the 30th of April, 1864. It is not to be construed to include goods in public store, bonded warehouse, or bonded for warehousing or transportation prior to the 30th of April, 1864; and any duties which have been exacted and received contrary to the provisions of this resolution are to be refunded by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Committee on Finance reported the joint resolution with an amendment, to insert after "1864," in line five, the following words:

Nor shall said resolution be held to apply to goods which had been actually entered and the duties paid, and received by the collector, under the laws existing at the time of the passage of said resolution, before the collector had knowledge of its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senate will not agree to this amendment of the Committee on Finance. I do not know whether it will be persisted in or not. The amendment if agreed to will release from duty all goods in the bonded warehouses of the United States. It is a very important amendment, and I trust it will not be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken. The amendment now before the Senate has reference merely to goods imported up to a certain date.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask that it be read again, and the Senate will see what it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the resolution be read as it will read if amended, so that we may understand it.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the said joint resolution shall not be deemed to have taken effect until the said 30th day of April, 1864; nor shall said resolution be held to apply to goods which had been actually entered and the duties paid, and received by the collector, under the laws existing at the time of the passage of said resolution, before the collector had knowledge of its passage. And the said resolution shall not be construed to include goods in public store, bonded warehouse, or bonded for warehousing or transportation prior to the said 30th day of April, 1864; and any duties which shall have been exacted and received contrary to the provisions of this resolution shall be refunded by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should explain that the amendment now under consideration is intended to apply only to ports where notice had not been received and payment of duties had been made prior to the actual notice. To avoid the necessity of this amendment I will propose another, which, if it is in order, I will offer now, to insert after the word "until," in the fourth line, the word "after;" so that it will read:

That the said joint resolution shall not be deemed to have taken effect until after the said 30th day of April, 1864.

That will allow one full day for notice to all the ports in the United States, and it is presumed that for every port of the United States where goods are in warehouse that day will be sufficient for notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Ohio that his amendment is not now in order, not being strictly an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment of the committee, so that I can modify the resolution in this particular.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that, if the purpose of Congress now is to have the law take effect from the time the notice was given, it is but just to the Pacific coast to allow at least one day more, because one day is not sufficient for telegraphic dispatches with certainty to go to San Francisco. An average of two days, or three days, is more nearly the time. I make this suggestion because it is but simple justice that such an addition be made to their time. Of course my purpose is not to exempt them from the payment of any duty that they should pay. But, as I stated before, if the purpose of Congress is that the law should be deemed to have taken effect from the time at which they received notice, I should like to have it so amended. I leave the language to the Senator, but suggest that the same privileges be extended to importers on the Pacific coast that would be extended under the amendment proposed to importers on this side of the continent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This resolution as it was originally drawn and came from the House of Representatives provided that the previous resolution should not take effect until the 30th of April. It was thought that that was hardly time enough, and therefore the Committee on Finance proposed an amendment that it should not take effect until notice was received at the different places. The Secretary of the Treasury was of opinion that that would produce confusion, and we had some very considerable doubt about it. The amendment suggested by the Secretary is the amendment which the Senator from Ohio now proposes, that it shall not take effect until after the 30th of April. The 30th of April came on Saturday, the 1st day of May was Sunday, and the result would be that it would not take effect for any business purpose until Monday. That gives all the time that is necessary anywhere.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would be the 2d of May.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. That would do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That amendment was drawn with that view. As the 1st of May came on Sunday, and no duties are paid on that day, it substantially gives all the time necessary everywhere. I do not see any objection to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will now move in the fourth line of the resolution, after the word "until," to insert the word "after;" so that it will read:

That the said joint resolution shall not be deemed to have taken effect until after the said 30th day of April, 1864.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out in the tenth line the word "not" and to insert the word "remaining," after the word "goods," in the same line; and in the eleventh line to strike out the words "prior to" and insert the word "after;" so that it will read:

And the said resolution shall be construed to include goods remaining in public store, bonded warehouse, or bonded for warehousing or transportation, after the said 30th day of April, 1864.

This subject was discussed when the other resolution was under consideration, and the Senate decided to apply these increased duties on goods in store, and I hope the Senate will adhere to that decision. If my amendment should be agreed to, as a matter of course that will be the effect of it. I have before me a copy of the English law on this same subject. The English always apply the increased duties to the goods in store. I will read an extract from the law as it now exists in England. It is as follows:

"All goods whatsoever which now are or may be deposited in any warehouse or place of security, under any act of Parliament passed or to be passed for the warehousing of goods, without payment of duty upon the first importation thereof, or which may be imported and on board any ship, shall, upon being entered for home consumption, be subject to such and the like duties as may at the time of passing such entry be due and payable on the like sort of goods, under any act or acts passed for imposing any duty or duties of customs which shall or may be in force at the time of passing such entry, save and except in cases where special provisions shall be made in any such act or acts to the contrary."—16 and 17 Vic., cap. 107, sec. 20.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not looked at the British statute; but I rather think the honorable member will find there is a very material difference between the warehousing acts of England and our acts on this subject. The ground which I maintained and presented to the Senate on this question when it was before it on a former occasion was that there was as between the importer or owner of goods in warehouse and the United States a contract, which was such a proposition as my friend proposes would, as I thought, violate; it would not be keeping good faith with the importer. When goods are stored by the importer, he enters into a bond by which he is bound to pay the amount of duty then imposed, and the penalty of the bond is fixed with a view to that amount, and the amount that would be recovered by any of the bonds that these gentlemen have given would be the amount of duty to which the goods at the time when they were bonded were liable for.

The British law as I think—I speak not from a very distinct recollection, but a general recollection—does not require any ascertainment of the duties to which the goods are liable at the time when they are bonded. They are permitted to go into a warehouse, and when they are taken out they are to pay the duties which such goods are then liable for. It is, therefore, as I think, reasoning illogically, reasoning falsely, if I can use such a term, to apply the example in England to our own case. The practice of England is always to observe with studious good faith every promise which the Government makes to its merchants. If the Government of England had a law like ours which gave authority to warehouse upon condition that the owner would enter into a bond to pay the duties to which the goods were then liable, they never would have thought of telling him he should not take them out afterwards and sell them unless he would pay any additional duty which the Government might think proper to exact. There is, therefore, a difference between the two cases.

It is true that the Senate, when this matter was before them some days ago, thought it was right to impose such additional duty upon goods in warehouse; but it is very evident from the passage of this resolution by the House of Representatives that the House in the original resolution which this is intended to explain, never contemplated levying a tax upon goods in warehouse. It is for us to say, if the House committed a blunder from a want of such clear, unambiguous phraseology as would make their purpose clear, whether the Senate will hold the House to the consequences of that mistake. It is clear to my mind that but for that mistake these additional duties never could have been levied upon goods in warehouse. It was not suggested as the effect of the original resolution. The House passed the resolution, therefore, without any idea that that was to be its effect, and it was not until the Secretary of the Treasury placed upon it the construction which brought these goods within the operation of that resolution, that the House saw they had committed the mistake, and at once, as far as they had the power, endeavored to correct it by passing the explanatory resolution now upon your table. The object of my friend's amendment is to defeat that explanatory resolution, so as to make the House stand by the consequences of their original mistake.

Mr. SHERMAN. There can be no doubt but what the joint resolution to be modified by this resolution applied to goods in bonded warehouse. That was the construction put upon it by the Committee on Finance of the Senate. It was the construction put upon it by the Senate after debate, and that construction was adopted by the Senate on a motion to correct the resolution in that particular. It is also the construction put upon it by the Treasury Department, and which has been acted upon since. The goods in bonded warehouse after the date referred to in this resolution when withdrawn for consumption paid the duties. If we propose now to refund all the duties that have been paid on goods in bonded warehouse since the 1st day of May, and to release all the goods still in bonded warehouse, as a matter of course, notwithstanding all we hoped to get from that resolution, we shall derive but very little benefit from it. I see no breach of faith in the matter. Congress has a right to levy the duty at the time when the goods enter into the consumption of the country. The importer may if he chooses put the goods into public warehouse, and he may reexport them without the payment of duty; but if they enter into the consumption of the country there is no hardship in requiring him to pay the duty.

If any other construction was adopted, it would be a large bounty to the importers. Their goods have advanced already in the market equivalent to the duty, and if they now can enter their goods for consumption at the prices that prevailed before the increase of duty, it is substantially a bounty to them of the amount of the duty. At this time, it seems to me, the Government is in no condition either to refund the duty paid or to give them the benefit of that bounty. The law that I have read shows that in England, where this matter is well understood, they impose the duty in force at the time the entry is made for consumption.

I am also told another fact, that since we have imposed the increased duties on goods on shipboard, they have changed the form of the bond, and the condition of the bond now has been for more than a year that the importer shall pay the duty in force at the time of the entry; so that the point raised by the honorable Senator from Maryland does not now exist, and has not existed since the change of the law placing the increased duty upon goods on shipboard and in transitu. It seems to me, therefore, the whole reasoning upon which he bases his argument falls. I will not go over the ground now, because the Senate have discussed this matter fully before, and by a vote held that it was right under the circumstances in which we were placed to put this duty on goods. Perhaps ordinarily it would be wiser and better not to levy the increased duties until all the goods on shipboard, all the goods that have been ordered, and the goods in transitu in any form had been entered for consumption at the old rate of duties, but I think there is no faith involved in it, no principle involved in it. The Government has the right to levy the duty at the time the goods are entered for consumption in the country, and now it seems to me it is just and right to do so.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio be adopted it will make the resolution originally passed operative upon the 30th day of April.

Mr. SHERMAN. After the 30th day of April.

Mr. HENDERSON. That would be Monday morning, the 2d of May, I understand. I desire to state a fact in connection with this amendment that has come to my knowledge this morning. There is a large amount of railroad iron imported by the railroads of Missouri that is at New Orleans and has been there since 1861. No notice whatever reached New Orleans of the passage of the joint resolution increasing the duties within time to enable them to take out that iron. It would have been utterly impossible for them to take it out before the 1st day of May. No notice whatever could have reached the parties at St. Louis in time to allow them to do so. I allude to the Pacific Railroad Company. For a long time it was supposed the iron had been used by the confederates in making gunboats, and in the confusion that resulted from the taking of New Orleans it was in fact lost sight of, and they refused to deliver it to the railroad company, and the matter has been but recently adjusted. It would certainly operate very hard to make this additional duty payable by constituents of mine when in fact it would not be payable at other points. For instance, in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and all the ports upon the Atlantic coast there was no difficulty about getting the notice, and they had sufficient time to pay the duties and take the goods out of bond. It would certainly operate very harshly if this amendment were adopted without giving sufficient time for it to operate also in New Orleans.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as that particular case is concerned it might be a ground of exception from the rule by an express exception, or in a private bill; but it would not do to extend the time in all the ports.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly you should make it operative alike throughout the country. You should not make one pay and another not.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would be better to make an exception in favor of that importation of iron by the Pacific Railroad Company than to make it general. If the Senator is in possession of all the facts in that case, and can state them definitely in an amendment, excepting from the operation of this joint resolution the importation made by the Pacific Railroad Company of the iron actually in New Orleans at the time the law took effect, I will vote for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why not extend it a sufficient time to cover all?

Mr. GRIMES. What is the case in regard to the Pacific Railroad Company has been the case in regard to numerous persons doing business in all the western cities. As an illustration, some of my neighbors, who are dealers in crockery, buy most of their goods at Liverpool. They had imported a large quantity of goods, and they were stored in bonded warehouse in New York. When the resolution increasing the duties was passed a few weeks ago, the merchants in New York, being aware that it was under consideration, and having banking facilities by which they could immediately secure the money with which to discharge their liabilities, took their goods out of the bonded warehouses. These gentlemen, removed from the seaboard, fifteen hundred or two thousand miles away, not at all conscious that any such legislation was about to take place, and not having the facilities with which to pay up their bonds, have been obliged under the operation of that resolution to pay the additional duty, and hence they are compelled to compete in the market with men who have obtained their goods at a price less than this new imposition of duty. It is not only the case in the instance I have stated, but in regard to a great many merchants in Detroit, Chicago, St. Paul, Cincinnati, and all the western cities, who are in the habit of importing in that way. It seems to me there ought to be some uniform law on this subject. If the English law be, as has been stated by the Senator from Maryland, that the bond provides that the person shall be responsible for any duties assessed or that may be assessed, then they execute the bond with a fair and distinct understanding on their part.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state that that is in our bond. Our bond was changed a year ago, in conformity with our law which imposed the duty on goods on shipboard.

Mr. JOHNSON. Our bonds have not been changed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir, they have.

Mr. FESSENDEN. By regulation of the Treasury Department.

Mr. JOHNSON. When?

Mr. SHERMAN. For a year past.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not in accordance with law. The law distinctly says that the bond shall be taken for the payment of the duties at the time; and if such a change has been made it has been made without any law. They have got no law for it. I looked at the law when this question was up before, and my vote was entirely regulated by that law.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me we ought to have a law to that effect if we have not got any, and the bonds ought to be executed in compliance with that law, and then the parties who sign these bonds have a distinct understanding of what they are going to be called upon to do. Then it would be no hardship upon them, and they could not claim that we were perpetrating any wrong on them in imposing an additional tax; but it does strike me as rather hard when a man has entered into a bond in pursuance of a law that he will pay us a certain amount of money by a specified day, and we here, without any action on his part and without his knowledge, by a voluntary act of legislation, declare that he shall pay just double the amount that he agreed to pay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This matter excited some discussion several times when it was up, either last year or two years ago; I think it was two years ago, when we passed the tariff law and made a specific provision for the non-exemption of goods on shipboard to pay the duties. I stated then that that provision was according to my judgment, and that I thought also the law should be changed so as to apply to goods in bonded warehouse when they were entered for consumption. I saw no reason why that should not be adopted as a rule. I said that I should be willing to support that; that the great increase of value which was given by our law might very well be made available to the Government. When the resolution upon which this resolution was predicated was up the other day I objected to it. My reason was that I thought then and think now that when a change of system thus important is made, it should be made on fair notice. While I was for a change of system, my objection to that was that it was sprung upon the country without a moment's warning. In that tariff bill we gave a fortnight's notice, as the bill did not come into operation until some fourteen or fifteen days after its passage.

Mr. JOHNSON. About three weeks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator says three weeks. We gave ample notice, and I have since steadily stood by that provision as the settled policy of the country. I am still in favor of that policy. I see no reason, with the Senator from Ohio, why it should not be adopted as the policy that goods, when they are entered for the purpose of consumption, should be subject to the duties that may be imposed upon them at the time they are thus entered. But I think in ordinary fairness that that should only be done on fair notice, and that to seize at the instant upon goods that may happen to be in a particular position is not exactly carrying out the idea which I had when I gave that notice with reference to my own action in relation to goods that might be in bonded warehouse.

I was influenced also very considerably the other day by the argument of the honorable Senator from Maryland with regard to the contract entered into between the importer and the Government. I understand, however, as a matter of fact, that the bond actually given within a certain date—I do not know when; the Senator from Ohio is probably better informed than I am—at the ports of entry now is and has been for some period that they would pay the duties assessed at the time and such further duties as might be assessed when they were entered.

Mr. JOHNSON. That cannot be so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am informed it is so.

Mr. HENDERSON. It may be so, but there is no law for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is another question.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I meant to say was that I thought it was a mistake. I think the Senator is mistaken in point of fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think not. I have information which I think is direct upon that subject. My impression is it has been done under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is my understanding; but if there is any doubt upon that very material point we might lay this resolution over until to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it would be well to let it lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. COLLAMER. It would be well to let it lie over that we may have the law on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maryland read from the law.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; the law of 1846.

Mr. HENDERSON. I looked the law up and gave it to the Senator from Maryland, the law of 1846; and there has been no law passed since.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think at any rate that would be likely to have any effect. As the Senate is very thin we might as well allow the resolution to lie over until to-morrow, and ascertain how the fact is. I wish to say in regard to it, however, that if the bond stands under the old law, that is to say, the law of 1846, which provides definitely what bond shall be given, it might raise a question whether, after all, any rights were gained under a bond given in the way stated here unless you hold bonds given with a full understanding that they were good at common law if not as statute bonds. There might be a difference of opinion on that point. I suppose my friend from Vermont might think it was good for nothing, and perhaps I might agree with him on the subject.

But I understand as a matter of fact that the merchants, or a very large body of them at any rate, are not affected by the law that has been passed. The fact that such a bond had been required was known; and the notice that had been given here more than once was a notice which had in fact operated upon their minds to make them aware that hereafter goods in bond were liable or would be made liable to the duties that might be imposed up to the time when they were entered for consumption. At any rate, the Senate decided here the other day to impose them. I have great respect for the Senate, and ordinarily should yield to it and not contend any longer; but yet with regard to this resolution that has been called up by my honorable friend I do not feel instructed by the action of the Committee on Finance in retaining that provision, because you will remember, sir, that the vote in that committee stood equally divided, three and three, in reference to it, and it was simply reported because there was not power enough to strike it out. The opinions of the committee were equally divided, as it happened to be at that time; and I confess that after the decision of the Senate on the original resolution I was very much inclined to adopt the view which the Senate had adopted and adhere to it throughout. As there may be some doubt about the law I think the resolution had better be laid over, in order that the Senator from Ohio may get the Secretary's views on that subject, and ascertain specifically how the fact is and how it is founded, and it may give us some light.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly there may be a law on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make the motion that the joint resolution lie over?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Ohio. I do not wish to interfere with his action on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing that it should be laid over.

The motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 421.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to cross the path of my friend from Rhode Island, but the bill that I have spoken of every day I should like to bring forward as quick as I can. Is this bill likely to take any time?

Mr. ANTHONY. This is the bill to provide for the continuation of the Congressional Globe. The Senate is thin, and I have no desire to press the bill at a time when any Senators are absent who desire to discuss it; but it has been upon the table for some time, and I should like to have it disposed of.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not dispose of it now, and let it be understood that the bill I have in charge may be taken up and proceeded with tomorrow, if the Senate chooses?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know that this bill will take ten minutes. I do not know what the disposition of the Senate is on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not object to it. I only wish to make a continual claim as it were.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 421) to pay in part for publishing the debates of Congress, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall not adopt that old system of voting books to members of Congress. At the time we increased the compensation of the members it was understood that that system should cease. It was odious to the country; it was the subject of great abuse; and the revival of it, I think, will bring new abuses.

I certainly hope we shall not adopt that mode. If we cannot print the Globe at the present rates, let us pay them the money. It will cost a great deal more to adopt this system; and I think it will be of but very little benefit to members of Congress, and be a subject of just reproach on the part of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the proposition to increase the compensation for the printing of the Globe hereafter, or is it to furnish members with the Globe as it has been printed from the first?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will explain the bill. I explained it the other day, but I suppose Senators have forgotten it or did not attend to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was not here.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is necessary, if the Congressional Globe is to be continued, that there should be an increase of compensation. I suppose that is so apparent to every one that it is not necessary to go into the reasons of it. The late publisher of the Globe, Mr. Rives, submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing two propositions, either of which he would accept, for the continuation of the publication. One was an increase of fifty per cent. on the price paid; and the Superintendent of Public Printing, on whose judgment we placed more reliance than any other person in the matter, thought the proposition was not an unreasonable one considering the great advance that had taken place in all the materials and all the cost of publication, but that such an arrangement if entered into should be temporary, as we hope the prices will go down.

The other proposition, and the one which the publisher of the Globe desired to have adopted, was to return to the original contract which he made with Congress, and which was violated by Congress without consulting him. The original contract was that every member of Congress should be furnished with the Globe and Appendix from the commencement of its publication. In order to carry out that part of the contract, the publisher stereotyped the work and printed the back numbers to a considerable extent, and stored them away in a fire-proof building to await the calls for them as new members were elected to Congress. This part of the contract was abrogated by Congress, not, I think, as my friend from Massachusetts says, in consequence of the compensation law which provided that all books furnished to members of Congress should be paid for by themselves. I do not think the Congressional Globe was included in that act; I was not here at the time. I think it was not considered as one of the books that were furnished to members of Congress. The books that had been furnished were books outside, the works of Jefferson, the works of Franklin, the Annals of Congress, and a great many other books that amounted, I believe, in all to seven or eight hundred dollars, which some members of Congress did not receive but receipted for them, and took the money compensation, which was justly thought to be a very great abuse. I do not think the furnishing of the Globes is an abuse of the nature to which my friend from Massachusetts refers.

Without having any preference as to the two modes which the late proprietor of the Globe and his successors submit to Congress, this is the plan that the representatives of Mr. Rives prefer, because it is the original contract, and because they think it will give permanency to the publication. Mr. Rives was very decidedly in favor of that proposition, and I think it was on account of his preference for it and the delay of our committee to come into it that the bill has been delayed so long. The difference in the cost for this Congress will be about fifteen thousand dollars. This proposition will cost about fifteen thousand dollars for this Congress more than the other; but it will be seen that for subsequent Congresses, as the number of new members will of course be smaller than they are now, as the distribution has been interrupted for several years, the amount will probably be less. I suppose for the next Congress that this will be the cheapest rate.

Mr. SUMNER. I would ask the Senator whether the object he has in view might not be accomplished more directly, perhaps, by distributing these books among libraries throughout the country. If they are distributed among the members, I would ask how many of them would not get sacrificed, get lost, the sets broken and dispersed, so that perhaps as a whole set very few would reach any public library. The great object we should have in printing this large addition, it seems to me, should be to supply the libraries all over the country, not only the large town libraries but village libraries. I would have every library in the country supplied with this book. Eventually it will be a great source of historical knowledge which will constantly be referred to hereafter by anybody who is undertaking to write on the events of the time or to discuss them. It seems to me if we require directly that they should be distributed among libraries, that then we should not positively offend against the statute which we have passed. As I understand it, the existing statute with reference to the pay of members of Congress positively requires that they shall not vote themselves books without having the value deducted from their pay. Now it is proposed to do that. It seems to me we had better avoid that, and if it is thought advisable to take these books of the successors of Mr. Rives—on that I express no opinion—then to distribute them among the libraries of the country.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It is impossible for a Senator, who is not a member of the Committee on Printing, without taking considerable pains, to understand exactly this matter as it is. I believe I have the outline of it. I understand that the printing of the Globe cannot be continued on the present terms, and it becomes a question whether the reports of the proceedings of both Houses of Congress shall be discontinued or not. If I understood the Senator from Rhode Island aright, he states that there are two modes in which this printing of the Globe can be continued: one is by taking the back numbers and furnishing to each new member of Congress a back set of the Globes, and by doing that it will strengthen the hands of the publishers and they can continue the work; the other mode is by increasing the pay for the present issue of the Globe fifty per cent. We have those two questions before us: whether we will discontinue the Globe altogether and trust to the ordinary limited, condensed reports from the reporters' gallery and other sources, or whether we shall continue to have an accurate history of the transactions of Congress as they occur from day to day. I think the public mind and the public eye have been so long resting upon this publication that it ought not to be discontinued now, and cannot be discontinued without a very just complaint on the part of the country, especially as these reports, for accuracy and fidelity, have never been surpassed, if ever equaled, by any other work in the whole history of stenography.

If we were not in the midst of scenes which require a vast expenditure of money, if we were not driven to our wits' ends to tax everything under heaven for the purpose of raising money, perhaps it would be judicious to take the back numbers of the Globe, and either distribute them among individuals or have them placed in libraries as is suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not myself believe there is any necessity for any regulation of that sort if all members act as some few Senators that I have knowledge of do. They generally supply all the libraries in their States with the numbers of the Globe. I am sure I do. I send a copy of the Globe to every library I know of in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is to give a full set of the back numbers to new members.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Exactly, and that might be desirable if we were full of money and knew not what to do with it. I think, however, we had better not now undertake to go into the wholesale book business, but if it is necessary, to continue the publication of the Globe, to put it in a shape by which we shall increase the pay as a temporary expedient lasting for the present year, and we can in future adopt a system which convenience, economy, and the public necessity will demand or require.

I shall be opposed to this movement of distributing the Globe or giving to every new member all the back sets. I think it would not be justifiable, and although I am not more subject to the opinion of the country than any one else, I should hesitate a good while before I would give a vote of this kind under the circumstances.

Mr. CONNESS. In regard to whether back

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 175.

numbers of the Globe shall be authorized to be purchased and circulated, I must say for one that I have little feeling. I think the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from New Jersey is worthy of a great deal of consideration; that while it would be a very fair and proper expenditure in ordinary times it may be now too expensive to undertake it, although I in part represent a State here, new in its organization, new, necessarily, in its libraries, and therefore unsupplied with the records that the Congressional Globe furnishes, and which cannot be obtained from any other source. I find myself frequently called on for books for the purpose of circulation that I am not able to furnish. Since I have been here I have sent copies of the Globe, first, to each newspaper in my State, and then to each library; and that exhausted about all I was entitled to receive.

By some regulation of this Senate I discovered myself entitled to but one half the number of books that belonged to a Senator. I was a little surprised when I discovered that regulation. I called upon the Vice President before he left to look into the matter. We discovered this condition of things: that an order had been made by my predecessor transferring to another Senator of this body half the number that the seat I occupy, so to speak, was entitled to receive. It occurred to me that it was a regulation "more honored in the breach than in the observance." It seemed to be a strange thing to me that an outgoing Senator was entitled to a very large number of books that he might pass over to another by a simple order, while the incoming Senator had the responsibility of the circulation of intelligence such as is communicated by those books to his constituency.

I have said that I have observed the rule suggested by the two Senators on my left, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and the honorable Senator from New Jersey, of circulating these books among all the libraries in my State, both cities and villages; and I am now without books to supply ordinary demands. I have a letter on my desk, received this morning from one of the most prominent and valued citizens of our State, asking me to send him the Congressional Globe. I have none. I have scores of such applications. They do not ask them as mere property; but they would be well placed in the hands of many such citizens, and I think any reasonable appropriation to aid in a fair dissemination of this valuable record would be money well spent. As to whether each member shall be entitled to the back numbers or not, I confess I am not free to advocate or sustain it now, and prefer leaving that question to be determined by older Senators, and with a view to the economy involved in that proposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, as to the question of continuing the publication of the Congressional Globe I presume there can be but very little if any difference of opinion among us. I have no doubt, I have no question of the great importance of continuing that publication; I believe it is part of the history of the country. Nothing is more important than that there should be a correct record kept of our proceedings. I believe the opinion of the country has settled down upon that. It is very important, in my judgment, to the protection of members themselves, and that has been found so. Without the Congressional Globe we are at the mercy of everybody who chooses to misrepresent our opinions and our acts, and it would be impossible utterly in the nature of things to counteract the effect that might be produced. Depending, so far as I am concerned, entirely upon the Congressional Globe for a record of our proceedings, and regarding any other record as of no very great importance beyond the day and the hour, I prefer, myself, as an individual to trust to it. I think it is equally important to all of us.

The only question, then, that arises is, what is the cheapest and the best mode of continuing the publication? And upon that question I am not prepared to give any advice. I usually follow committees of Congress and their recommendations with reference to those matters, believing that in the nature of things they can come to very much better conclusions than I can.

The Senator from California spoke of applications that have been made to him for books. I suppose each Senator receives the Congressional Globes for the sessions during which he is a member of the body. The Globes to which the Senator has alluded were probably of the last session. The reason why the Senator has none to give is that he is not entitled to any except for this session. They will come to him for this session as the member entitled to them; and he will find that under the existing laws he will probably have as many as he cares to dispose of. I think under the law as it stands we get something like eighty or ninety copies of the Globe apiece, as published from Congress to Congress. As I understand this proposition, it is a proposition to furnish full sets of the Globe. They are stereotyped I suppose.

Mr. ANTHONY. Stereotyped and printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And the publisher supposes that he can make as much by being employed in printing and stereotyping the back numbers, and furnishing a certain number to new members, as he can make by an addition to his compensation for printing and publishing. It is very clear that one thing or the other ought to be done. The suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts struck me as a very valuable one; and that is, that there should be a provision inserted in the bill that they should be furnished by the members to libraries. It would take off any imputation that might possibly be thrown upon individual members for voting upon the subject, and at the same time would accomplish the most valuable purpose that we wish to accomplish, by placing them permanently at different points, where they can be consulted by those who wish to consult them, and information obtained as to any question upon which persons might desire to consult them. It is merely a matter of computation; and if the chairman states that his committee have examined the question, and are satisfied that it can be done in this way as well as in the other, I do not see but what we accomplish as much good by adopting this proposition as we should do by adding to the price in any other way. I take it, about the same amount is to be paid out of the Treasury in either case for the publication of the Globe; and in this way we multiply the number of full sets of the Globe to be distributed among our constituents. It is a matter of entire indifference to me how it is done, provided it is done in the cheapest possible way, and we accomplish the purpose of continuing the publication, which I deem to be a matter of absolute, imperative necessity.

Mr. POWELL. The Joint Committee on Printing have given this matter very careful and mature consideration. As has been said by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Rhode Island, something must be done, or the publication of the Congressional Globe must stop. There were two propositions before the committee. One was to increase the price, and the other to fall back upon the original contract made with the publisher of the Globe. After several sessions of the committee, and a full consideration of the subject, the committee came to the conclusion that the bill, as reported by the chairman, which has passed the House of Representatives, was the better proposition, and the one that would ultimately cost the Government less money. The proposition under consideration will cost some fifteen thousand dollars more this year than the other, but it will cost greatly less in all subsequent years, and it places the Globe upon a permanent foundation. We furthermore thought that it was but carrying out the contract originally made with the publisher of the Globe, which was abrogated by Congress without his consent. I have no question that the Joint Committee on Printing have adopted the wisest and best system to continue this work, and one that will ultimately result in the saving of money to the Government. I believe that was the unanimous opinion of the Committees on Printing of both Houses when we had this matter under consideration, and we had several meetings on the subject. The gentlemen of the House committee, as well as the gentlemen of the Senate committee, had very accurate calculations made about the cost, the result of which has been presented by the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

I have no hesitation in saying that this is the best proposition we can adopt for the continuation of this work. While it will cost more at this session it will cost less at any subsequent session. Moreover, I think Congress, in abrogating the contract with the publisher of the Globe, notwithstanding which he has gone on and printed it as far as he could, and placed himself in a condition to execute his part of it, to say the least of it, in my opinion, have not acted in good faith. I hope the proposition reported by the Joint Committee on Printing, which has passed the House of Representatives, will be adopted by the Senate. In the end it will be found to be the most economical proposition that can be adopted to have the Globe published, and I believe it will be carrying out the contract with the publisher of the Globe in good faith.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose we all desire to see the Globe continued. It has produced in the past, and will no doubt produce in the future, great public good; but the measure before the Senate is one which if it passes will place the establishment upon some permanent footing, as I understand the chairman of the joint committee to tell us, and as that is the case I think it would be better that the Senate should be more full than it is at present before the final vote is taken on the question.

As to myself, I am comparatively unadvised now, notwithstanding the explanation of my friend from Rhode Island, of the operation of this bill. The bill gives one cent for every five pages over a certain number, which was originally given and was afterwards taken away, a fact that Mr. Rives, I think, always complained of; but this gives it to him in the future. The honorable member tells us that there were two alternative propositions before the committee. The first was to increase the charges fifty per cent.; the other was to distribute the Globe as is proposed to be done by one of the sections in this bill. I understood him to say that the difference between the two modes would not average more than $15,000; and that perhaps would not be the average in a series of years. I think he is very much mistaken. I make the suggestion, in order that if the measure be postponed he may think of it very maturely, that he is very much mistaken when he says it will only cost some $15,000 more than would be the cost of fifty per cent. additional. Over the expenditure of fifty per cent. we shall have some control.

There is—and I think Congress hereafter will see it their duty to correct the printing in that particular—there is a great deal of matter published which need not be published. It may be contracted beneficially certainly to the Government, and beneficial to the reader. Who is there that wades through all the matter in the Globe? Speeches—I do not speak of the Senate; I do not mention the Senate—but speeches that are not made are published; speeches that are only partially made are published as prepared or after prepared. That should not be the business of a paper like this. It ought to give the debates as they fall from the lips of the speakers.

But over the other proposition, if we enter into this agreement, we shall have no control. I stated that my friend perhaps was mistaken as to the probable amount that the Treasury would have to pay if the bill passes as is proposed. I understand the section of the bill which relates to the distribution of the Globe to provide that every member of Congress now belonging to either body, or who shall hereafter become a member of either body, if he has not at the time when he is a member a complete set of the Globe, is to be furnished with a complete set: I had the honor to be a member of Congress in 1845, and continued until 1849, four years. Several members of the Senate are here for the second term; it is certainly true of the House of Representatives; but there is not a member of Congress I think in either body, and there never will be in any future Congress, who has a complete set of the Globe.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have one.

Mr. SUMNER. I have one also.

Mr. JOHNSON. For what time? Because you have been continuously a member.

Mr. SUMNER. I have one from the beginning.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When I first came into the Senate they were furnished under the law.

Mr. JOHNSON. How were they furnished? Those who have been furnished of course would not receive them, but those who have not been furnished with a full set are to be furnished under this resolution; and I do not know how many copies will be called for from time to time. I rather think that the immediate draft upon the Treasury will be some eighty or one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. TRUMBULL. All members were furnished with them until 1854.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can give the Senator from Maryland the exact figures.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Since 1854-55 only the current numbers have been furnished; but all who were members of Congress prior to 1854 had a full set up to that time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I did not look after my interest, for I did not get mine.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Every new member on entering Congress got the back set up to that time; but when we passed the new compensation law in 1855-56 that was cut off; but the members of the House of Representatives got them until 1856. They passed a resolution to that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was a member of that Congress. I came here in 1855, and we did not get them for that Congress. The last Congress that received the full sets of the Congressional Globe and documents was the Thirty-Fourth Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Ohio is a little mistaken. The House of Representatives passed a resolution to furnish themselves, and they coupled with that resolution a provision that they should be deposited in libraries and in public institutions. The Senate refused to agree to it. I recollect the controversy between the two Houses very well; but it was carried out in regard to the House of Representatives, and put on an appropriation bill, I believe.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was a member of that Congress, and, though I should have liked very well to get the books, I never got them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You received them. Not for yourself but for public libraries.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that a portion of the members of that Congress did get them, but the matter was stopped in some way. There was a difficulty about it; but I know that some members of the House of Representatives did get them.

Mr. JOHNSON. My object in what I have said, if I may be permitted to state it now, was to move the postponement of this bill until the Senate should be full.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to its postponement if it is desired; but as it is a matter which relates to the business of the Senate, if it is to be postponed I should like to have it made a special order, if the Senator who has charge of the financial bills will consent to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection, provided it does not come in the way of my bills.

Mr. WILSON. Say Friday next.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, I will say Friday next at half past twelve o'clock. But before that motion is put I wish to answer the Senator from Maryland. There is no doubt about what the cost of this is going to be. The Senate can adopt either proposition. Of course the compensation for the Globe is in some degree uncertain, because we do not know precisely how long the debates will be or how voluminous the reports will be; but the pay of the Globe is predicated upon three thousand pages for a long and fifteen hundred pages for a short session. If the Globe exceeds that number of pages, there is to be an allowance of one cent for every five pages additional. That of course is a somewhat uncertain element of the cost.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was repealed.

Mr. ANTHONY. But in this bill it is proposed to be reestablished. That was a part of the original contract. Now take for illustration the last Congress, the debates of which were pretty voluminous. The cost of the Globe was $166,570. Fifty per cent. additional to that would be $83,285. The back volumes of the Globe for both Houses will cost $47,120, and adding to that the excess of one cent for every five pages, $42,000, it will make altogether $98,544, showing a difference of $15,000 between the two propositions.

Mr. WILSON. I understand the Senator to say that the sets will cost about two hundred and fifty dollars apiece. If that be so, I think if we amend the first resolution so as to provide "that a copy shall be purchased for each congressional district and one for each Territory," that then they will cost about the same that it would to add this eighty-four or eighty-five thousand dollars every Congress. I think the cost of furnishing them to libraries in that way would be a little short of eighty-four thousand dollars. Then let the delegate and the member designate to what library they shall go in those districts. I am willing to vote for such a proposition as that. I am willing that at every Congress we shall vote a copy of the Congressional Globe for every representative district and every delegate district, to go into such library as the member may designate in that district.

But, sir, for one, I am opposed to returning to this system which was odious in the country, which led to great corruption here as everybody knows who was here at that time, and which was condemned by the country and condemned by Congress. I hope we shall not resort to it. I am willing to agree to this proposition if it shall be amended so as to require the Clerk of the House of Representatives to furnish each representative and delegate district represented in the present and succeeding Congresses, one complete set of the Globe and Appendix, to be placed in some library to be designated by the Representative and Delegate of each representative and delegate district, or something to that effect.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have now before me the deficiency bill of the 3d March, 1857, and the Senator from Ohio will now see that I was correct in my statement:

"To indemnify the Clerk for such sums as he may have expended for books under resolution of the House of Representatives of June 11, 1856, and to enable him under said resolution to furnish for each member and delegate of the House of Representatives who has not heretofore received the same the following enumerated books, namely: Gales & Senton's Register of Debates, Congressional Globe and Appendix, Public Land Laws, Instructions and Opinions, Elliott's Debates, Diplomatic Correspondence, Opinions of the Attorneys General, in five volumes, Finance Reports, Gales & Senton's Annals of Congress, John Adams's works, Jefferson's works, to be supplied from the numbers of said work now in charge of the Librarian, Hickey's Constitution, and Mayo & Moulton's Pension and Bounty Land Laws, $138,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

That was passed on the 3d of March, 1857. The Clerk of the House of Representatives under a resolution of the House furnished a number of the members with the books, and then an appropriation was made by Congress to enable him to furnish the whole of them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Were not those distributed to libraries?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly; but they were distributed under the direction of the member. The members were required to distribute them. I so stated before. They were furnished to each member.

Mr. SHERMAN. I only know that I never got mine.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a proviso requiring them to be distributed among libraries, and I presume the Senator from Ohio carried out the requirement of the law and distributed his in some library. The proviso is in these words:

"Provided, They be furnished at prices not exceeding those for which they were heretofore supplied: And provided also, That said books be forwarded by the Clerk to such public library in the district of each of said members and delegates as may be designated by said member or delegate."

I do not know how faithfully that was carried out; but I suppose it was carried out according to its terms. They were furnished to each Representative and Delegate, I think, of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, and this was the appropriation to pay for them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now remember the circumstance since it has been recalled to my mind. The Thirty-Fourth Congress, previous to the passage of the compensation act, passed the usual order for books for new members, and the Clerk had got some copies and it was said gave them to favored members before the repeal of the resolution by the compensation act. Seven or eight members got them. Subsequently, in the next Congress, this resolution was passed to authorize them to be distributed among the public libraries. The set allotted to me is now in one of the libraries in my district. I have never seen them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the motion is to postpone the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will assent to the motion to postpone it if it can be made the special order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why not act upon it now?

Mr. ANTHONY. Senators desire to have it postponed for further consideration.

Mr. COLLAMER. I object to making any special orders in the morning hour without the vote of two thirds of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will withdraw the objection, and for this reason: this is a matter which concerns the business of the Senate; it is almost a privileged question, I think; a matter which concerns our organization and the mode of transacting business, and there is no way of reaching it, unless we make it a special order.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to making it a special order if it is not made a special order in the morning hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator from Maine allow us to make it a special order for one o'clock? It is no use undertaking anything without his consent, and I am not going to place myself in the position of a rebel. I will ask his assent in the first place to allow us to make this bill the special order for one o'clock on Friday next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will make no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Maine assents, and I therefore make that motion, that the bill be made the special order for Friday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 40) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1865, asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JAMES F. WILSON of Iowa, Mr. GODLOVE S. ORTH of Indiana, and Mr. ROBERT MALLORY of Kentucky, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (No. 45) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain the title to certain property in Carson City and Territory of Nevada, for the purposes of a branch mint located in said place; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that motion is put, with the consent of my colleague, I will ask the Senate to take up the bill which I moved to take up last night, that it may be in order for one o'clock to-morrow. It is House bill No. 51, to establish a Freedmen's Bureau. I want to have it disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the other Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion?

Mr. SUMNER. He will for a moment to enable me to make this motion.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts will not prevail. I desire to take up the bill to prevent military interference with elections, which has been discussed elaborately here, and have action upon it. We have legislated a great deal for the negro, and I think we ought to give a day or two for the white man. My bill is to protect white men in their rights, and I do hope we may be allowed to finish it. We discussed it four days, and I do not think this freedmen's bill ought to intervene and prevent it from being disposed of. I want to finish the bill. I have been waiting for the financial measures to get through. I have been urging it at every chance I could get. I hope the Senate will vote down the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and then I will move to take up my bill and have it left as the unfinished business, so that we can conclude it to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill that I move to take up is one that comes from the House of Representatives; it has been lying on the table of the Senate for some time, and it ought to be acted upon. I have tried again and again to press action upon it, and now it seems to me the opportunity has come.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts why he does not go on with his bill to-day? We have got two hours yet before the usual time of adjournment.

Mr. SUMNER. Because my colleague is about to move an executive session.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the Senator's bill of more consequence than going into executive session and confirming a quartermaster or a commissary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator to take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SAULSBURY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Comess, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Carlile, Henderson, McDougall, Powell, Richardson, and Saulsbury—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, and Wright—19.

So the motion was agreed to.

MARQUETTE AND ONTONAGON RAILROAD.

Mr. CHANDLER. As that bill is now up, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the Senator to allow me to introduce a motion to bring back a bill which has gone to the other House.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly, if the Senator will renew the motion.

Mr. HOWE. It is House bill No. 469, extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad of the State of Michigan. It has been signed by the President pro tempore, and is now in the hands of the Enrolling Committee in the House of Representatives. I think it passed through inadvertence. The same identical bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands this morning. I move to have that bill recalled from the House of Representatives, in order that a motion to reconsider may be entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if it has not gone to the President, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOWE. The bill has not gone to the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose a motion to reconsider should be entered at the same time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not necessary now.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 7, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and under the rules referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed thirty thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents, twenty thousand for the use of this House and ten thousand for the Commissioner of Patents.

ADMISSIONS UPON THE FLOOR OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LAW, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules of the House be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the 134th rule providing for the admission of persons on this floor that, in addition to the persons named in said rule who are entitled to admission on this floor, ex-members of Congress shall be admitted within the Hall of the House while the House is in session.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were laid upon the table:

Memorial of citizens of Cincinnati relative to the width between piers of bridges on the Ohio river;

Memorials of the city of Milwaukee, for an appropriation for preserving the harbor at that city;

Memorial of the city of Baltimore in favor of South American Steamship Company;

Petitions of citizens of Malone, and of Saint Lawrence county, for ship canal round the falls of Niagara;

Petition of J. C. Stimpson, to change the name of a propeller;

Petition of Baber and Morrill to change the name of the ship Aureola to Southern Cross;

Resolution to change the name of the steamboat Gem to Emma Boyd, No. 2;

A bill (H. R. No. 398) to regulate commerce among the several States;

A bill (H. R. No. 471) in addition to acts in relation to the registry of vessels; and

A bill (H. R. No. 349) providing that the port of Portland, Maine, shall be placed on the same basis as the ports enumerated in the ninth section of the act of May 7, 1822.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. HOOPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to provide ways and means for the support of the Government; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

Mr. HOOPER. I now ask that the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. COX. I object to that.

Mr. HOOPER. The loan bills expire at the close of the present month, and this is to provide ways and means for the coming fiscal year. It is important that the bill should be reported.

Mr. HOLMAN. There will be no objection if the consideration will not be urged in less than one day after the bill is printed.

Mr. MORRILL. There will be no difficulty on that point.

No objection being made, it was agreed that the committee might report at any time.

LAND FOR MINT IN NEVADA.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary a joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain a title to certain property in Carson City, and Territory of Nevada, for the purposes of a branch mint located in said place, with an amendment.

The amendment was to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the cost of said land, and the expenses of the purchase and conveyance thereof, shall not be a charge upon or a claim against the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether or not this is Government land?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The facts are these: certain persons claim a preemption upon these lands, and the citizens of Carson City have agreed to contribute the necessary expenses to relieve the land of that claim. The Attorney General has given an opinion that under existing laws the Secretary cannot receive the title, and the purpose of the resolution is to enable the Secretary to receive the title. The proviso recommended by the committee precludes the possibility of any charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I understand there is a vested right in the preceptors which the Government desires to obtain.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRANT OF LAND TO WISCONSIN.

On motion of Mr. SLOAN, an act (S. No. 241) to grant to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public land to aid in the construction of a ship canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Dorr, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, in said State, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RANCHE BOLSA DE TOMALES, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Public Lands an act (S. No. 216) to grant the right of preemption to certain settlers on the Rancho Bolsa de Tomales, in the State of California.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

B. C. BAILEY.

On motion of Mr. HALE, the Committee of Claims was discharged from the further consideration of an act (S. No. 48) for the relief of B. C. Bailey, and the same was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DANIEL DOLAND.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Daniel Doland, of Roxbury, Massachusetts, for an increase of pension; and the same was laid on the table.

ELIZABETH P. MEANS.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 273) for the relief of Elizabeth P. Means; and the same was laid on the table.

WILLIAM R. MUDGE.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the petition of William R. Mudge for relief; and the same was laid on the table.

MAJOR GENERAL SAMUEL R. CURTIS.

Mr. WILSON asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House the defense of Major General S. R. Curtis against the report made by the McDowell commission, including in such communication all papers and evidence submitted on behalf of General Curtis in said defense.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the amendment that he shall also communicate the report itself of McDowell, I will not object.

Mr. WILSON. That has been communicated to the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman that he amend his resolution, so as to require the Secretary of War to communicate to the House the report of the commission itself also.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the gentleman that the report of the commission has already been communicated to the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, in that case I presume we do not need it.

Mr. ODELL. Oh! I think we had better call for it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution calling for information from one of the Executive Departments can only be considered to-day by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to know if the report has been printed in the Senate?

The SPEAKER. All executive communications are ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is suggested to me that it would be better for the House to call for the report of the commission, and I wish to include also the defense made by Colonel James R. Slack, of Indiana.

Mr. WILSON. I trust the gentleman from Indiana will not insist on adding anything to this resolution. I presume there will be no objection to the adoption of a resolution covering the case to which the gentleman refers, but I have a particular desire that we shall get this defense of General Curtis separately.

Mr. ODELL. I move to amend the resolution so as to call for the report of the commission.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not yet before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me very important that we should get the report of the commission before the House. It affects a great many gentlemen from my own State as well as from the State of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ODELL. I shall object to the reception of the resolution unless the gentleman from Iowa will accept my amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I did not hear the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest that the gentleman from Indiana draw up his resolution now on the spot and offer it when this is disposed of.

Mr. ODELL. My amendment is that the resolution shall include a call for the report of the commission.

Mr. WILSON. It has been communicated to the Senate.

Mr. ODELL. I am aware of that, but we want it in the House also.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that papers transmitted by the Executive Departments are printed but once, and the Department will have of course to copy the entire papers again and send them here.

Mr. WILSON. I am informed that the report has been ordered to be printed by the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. That does not give us control of the document at all. The Department could send the printed document here without any difficulty.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the gentleman draw up a resolution calling for the defense of Colonel Slack. There will be no objection to it.

Mr. WILSON. Let it come in as a separate resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to have the report itself brought before the House.

Mr. WILSON. Well, if the resolution is going to create any difficulty I will not press it now, but will wait until the States are called for resolutions. I offered it for the purpose of doing justice to a brave and patriotic gentleman, a resident of my own district; but if objection is made I will withdraw it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to stand in the position of objecting, and therefore I withdraw my suggestion.

No objection being made, the resolution was received and agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation to fulfill treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SALES OF GOLD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the consideration of the bill (S. No. 106) to prohibit certain sales of gold and foreign exchange, coming up as unfinished business, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Hooper to strike out the first section of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That it shall be unlawful to make any contract for the purchase or sale or delivery of any gold coin or bullion to be delivered on any day subsequent to the day of making such contract, or for the payment of any sum, either fixed or contingent, in default of the delivery of any gold coin or bullion, or to make such contract upon any other terms than the actual delivery of such gold coin or bullion, and the payment in full of the agreed price thereof, on the day on which such contract is made, in United States notes or national currency, and not otherwise; or to make any contract for the purchase or sale or delivery of any foreign exchange to be delivered at any time beyond ten days subsequent to the making of such contract; or for the payment of any sum, either fixed or contingent, in default of the delivery of any foreign exchange, or upon any other terms than the actual delivery of such foreign exchange within ten days from the making of such contract, and the immediate payment in full of the agreed price thereof on the day of delivery in United States notes or national currency; or to make any contract whatever for the sale or delivery of any gold coin or bullion of which the person making such contract shall not, at the time of making the same, be in actual possession. And it shall be unlawful to make any loan of money or currency not being in coin to be repaid in coin or bullion, or to make any loan of coin or bullion to be repaid in money or currency other than coin; or to make any other contract containing any stipulation for payment otherwise than in lawful money.

On this amendment the previous question has been moved.

Mr. THAYER. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw the previous question, in order that I may move to amend the amendment by striking out the last two lines—"or to make any other contract containing any stipulation for payment otherwise than in lawful money."

Mr. HOOPER. I withdraw the previous question to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania an opportunity to make a statement.

Mr. THAYER. These last two lines prohibit the making of any contract containing a stipulation for payment otherwise than in lawful money. It certainly cannot be within the contemplation of the Committee of Ways and Means to prohibit all contracts for the exchange of property where payment is to be made in merchandise or labor, or any other matter, not pertaining at all to dealings in gold or in bills of exchange, but which would fall within the letter and meaning of this provision. I cannot vote for the bill if this provision be retained. I do not think that its force will be in any degree impaired if these words are struck out.

Mr. MORRILL. I would also suggest that a payment in coin would be a payment in lawful money. I see no necessity for that clause.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words I have indicated.

Mr. HOOPER. I accept the amendment.

Mr. GANSON. The gentleman from Massachusetts who offered this amendment said that it was drawn with great care and deliberation. I desire to invite that gentleman's attention to the first clause, which declares it to be unlawful to make a contract for the delivery of gold coin or bullion. If a person in Chicago has $1,000 in coin or bullion he cannot under this act go to an express company and make a contract for its delivery at New York. If a person having gold coin or bullion in California desires to have it transported to New York and delivered there, he could not, under this bill, make a lawful contract for that purpose. I do not suppose that the gentleman intended that his amendment would have such an effect as this. It strikes me that the proposition should not be seriously entertained by the House.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the next clause declares that for the sale or actual delivery of any gold or bullion the payment of the price must be in United States notes or national currency, and not otherwise. This, of course, would make it unlawful to pay for coin or bullion in the currency of the State banks, or in a check upon a bank. And I take it for granted that the gentleman from Massachusetts does not seriously entertain the idea of prohibiting transactions of that kind.

The next clause refers to foreign exchange. Under it a person in New York cannot sell a cargo of grain and buy exchange with the cargo.

He cannot draw against the cargo. He cannot take a bill or a check on a bank for the purchase price of his cargo of grain. I do not see what necessity or propriety there is of interfering with these daily and necessary transactions of business. It certainly cannot tend to strengthen the Government; and the only effect will be to cause an entire disrespect for the legislative body that would pass any such enactment, or sanction any law containing any such provisions.

I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] has consented to withdraw the last provision, which is more absurd than any other, if that be possible.

But I do not wish to discuss these matters. I think that it is enough to call the attention of the House to these provisions. I do not see the aim and the purpose of the bill. It cannot strengthen the credit of the Government. The only measures which will serve effectually to restore and sustain the credit of the Government are a reduction of the present redundant irredeemable paper circulation, the raising of money for the purposes of the Government by loans, and collecting by imports and taxes revenue sufficient to pay the interest and create a sinking fund for the ultimate payment of such loans. This bill can do nothing but throw absurd obstacles in the way of ordinary business transactions of the country.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the last provision of the amendment offered by the member from Massachusetts. It seems to me that it is unconstitutional. It is there provided that it shall be unlawful to make any loan of money or currency not being in coin to be repaid in coin or bullion, or to make any loan of coin or bullion to be repaid in money or currency other than coin. I insist that that provision is against the Constitution. We have a Constitution which allows a man to pay gold for any indebtedness whatever; and if I make a contract payable in "greenbacks" I have a constitutional right to pay in gold. I say that Congress cannot take away that right. I may not have the disposition to pay in gold, still I have the constitutional right to do so.

We are proposing to legislate here against the terms and provisions of the Constitution. I for one shall vote for any reasonable proposition which this Administration may want to carry on its financial operations. I believe we are legislating on subjects which we cannot reach by legislation.

I have already addressed my views to the House on this subject, and I do not propose to detain them by any repetition of them at this time. I propose to add the following to the amendment:

Provided, however, That during the operation of this act the laws of trade and the law of gravitation be, and they are hereby, suspended.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the question which struck me on reading the Senate bill. It is provided, in the printed copy I have here, that it shall be unlawful to make any transactions in gold or foreign exchange. Without stopping to inquire whether it is right or wrong, whether it would be beneficial or otherwise, it strikes me, if the bill become a law, it will not be effective in controlling transactions in gold and foreign exchange. There is no penalty provided for the violation of the law. The bill declares that it is unlawful, but by what law will you punish the broker, or speculator, or gold gambler for violating this law?

Mr. HOOPER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the remaining sections of the bill. The gentleman has only the amendment that I propose. He will find that section four of the Senate bill provides for the punishment of any infraction of the law.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I have not seen that bill. Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, the amendment and the original bill are intended to accomplish one single result, and that is to prevent all sales and transfers of gold, unless the gold is delivered at the instant of transaction, and the payment is at the same time made in the notes of the United States or notes of the national banks. Whatever may be the language of either the amendment or the bill, that is the sole object of both. And I desire for a moment to call attention to the sweeping character of the proposition. No man shall sell gold unless he delivers it at the moment of sale or within the day. No man shall buy gold unless he pays for it in the notes of the United States or national currency notes. That is all of the Senate bill and of the amendment, so far as they relate to transactions in gold.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] called attention to a very grave objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER.] He objected to the last clause of the amendment. That clause provides that it shall be unlawful "to make any other contract containing any stipulation for payment otherwise than in lawful money." He objected to it because it would prohibit any bargain in which the consideration was to be other than lawful money, because it would prohibit a sale of merchandise or land for gold. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] yielding to that objection, assented to strike out the last lines of his amendment. I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this does not accomplish his purpose. In line eleven of the amendment it is provided that no sale or transfer of gold shall be valid unless the consideration is paid in Treasury notes or national bank notes.

Now, sir, I contend that under this clause of the amendment a man cannot sell his horse for gold; he cannot sell his land for gold; he cannot sell his wheat for gold. All transactions in gold are made illegal unless the price is paid in the notes of the United States or the notes of national banks. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] that this is a most extraordinary provision, and as fatal as extraordinary.

Mr. GANSON. How will it apply to California, where they have nothing else but gold?

Mr. PENDLETON. I am coming to that. Under this provision as it stands, no article of value except notes of the United States and notes of national banks can be paid in exchange for gold. It prohibits transactions in gold except upon the delivery of the consideration in that particular currency. The friends of the bill will say that a contract for the delivery of a horse for a price to be paid in gold is the sale of a horse, not the purchase of gold. If they yield that point they open wide the door for the evasion of the bill. They sacrifice their object over a quibble. But if that be true, the bill and amendment both provide that the gold shall be delivered within the day on which the contract is made. And if I am mistaken in the interpretation I give to the language of the eleventh line of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I submit that it is very clear that the transaction must be completed immediately. A man cannot sell upon credit any article at all for gold. There must be delivery of gold upon the day the sale is made and the article is delivered. If I am mistaken in supposing that the provision is as sweeping in relation to the consideration to be paid, I am not mistaken in the time in which the gold must be delivered; and a man cannot sell his horse, a bill of goods, his wheat, or his whisky for a price to be paid in gold, unless he receives the money in hand.

Are gentlemen willing to go that length? Even if it be necessary to pass a law to accomplish the avowed purpose of this bill, are gentlemen willing to go to the extent of these provisions?

On the Pacific coast all transactions are in gold. Amid all the fluctuations of the currency gold has maintained its normal position as money, and United States notes and notes of national banks are quoted as below par. Will you change all their transactions there? A man there does his marketing with gold, runs up his bills at stores and pays them in gold. The farmer keeps his account with his commission merchant and the balance is payable in gold. Men draw all their bills of exchange payable in gold; make their contracts for the future, and if breach is made the forfeiture is payable in gold. Is it to be pretended that under the idea of accomplishing what the gentleman from Massachusetts wants we shall sweep out of existence all their transactions and substitute the system of this bill?

If it is not out of order in the House to allude to the Constitution of the United States, I would like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts explain to me under what clause of the Constitution the Federal Government has power at all to touch this subject. Where does it come from? The practical operation of this bill is to prevent dealings in gold in the city of New York between citizens of that city. Will the gentleman tell me where the Federal Government gets the power to interfere between citizens of the same State in relation to contracts to be executed entirely within the limits of the State? Where does it come from? Congress has power to regulate commerce, but it must be commerce between the States. It is not pretended that this bill is to be operative only on contracts between citizens of different States or contracts to be executed in another State. Congress has power to coin money. I submit to every gentleman whether this bill is in aid of the power to coin money? There is no provision in the Constitution of the United States under which this power can fairly be brought.

When the gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question upon this bill, as I suppose he will, I desire before he does it to give us the particular provision of the Constitution under which he derives the power of regulating contracts between citizens of the same State to be performed within the jurisdiction of that State. If the gentleman desires to make an answer I will yield to him now with great pleasure.

And, sir, at the end of the bill there is the provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell in open market any gold in the Treasury of the United States not necessary for the payment of the interest of the public debt. I have no disposition to detain the House with any further comments upon that part of this bill. It was debated at length in both Houses, and the bill intended to confer that power passed. I see it stated that within a day or two past $1,000,000 in gold has been sold by the Secretary of the Treasury. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to the prophecies which were made to us at the time that bill was urged upon the House. If I recollect, one gentleman, supposed to be very familiar with all these transactions, and whose experience certainly entitled him to speak with authority, said here that if that gold bill was passed, for the next two years gold would never be above 130. It has not yet reached that point, and I doubt much whether it has ever been, except for a single day, since the passage of that bill, five per cent. below the point it was at when the bill passed. These are all vain, inefficient devices, for the purpose of bolstering up a redundant paper currency, and the sooner we come to the conclusion that if we desire to keep up the proper relation between the value of Government paper and gold in the country we must reduce the amount of circulation, and not attempt to hinder transactions in gold by any device of this kind, the sooner will we be able to arrive at a true solution of the difficulty.

I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House further. My only object was to call the attention of gentlemen who are not willing to go blindly to every length asked by the Secretary of the Treasury to look into the provisions of this bill and see whether they are prepared to usurp the power which is necessary to pass it, and whether they believe that after they have usurped that power the bill will accomplish the purpose designed.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, no member of this House is more desirous of doing everything within the power of Congress to facilitate the action of the Administration in the present emergency. I would strain every point of law for the purpose of doing that which the Government in its wisdom deem it necessary for Congress to do; and, sir, I would cheerfully vote for the amendment of my friend from Massachusetts if I supposed that, under the Constitution or under any law whatever, it could be sustained.

Sir, I favored the previous legislation of the House upon the gold bill. I believe that legislation was under the Constitution and the law. I do not believe that this amendment is under either. There can be no legislation, in my judgment, restraining speculative operations in gold except upon the principle that such operations are contra bonos mores; that gold, being the standard of value among civilized nations, is not an article of commerce, and hence that speculations in the article are in the nature of gambling and may be restrained by law.

But, sir, it seems to me that the amendment cannot be sustained under the Constitution, and hence there is no power in Congress to pass it.

By a fair construction of the amendment a man could purchase a bill of goods in Paris or Liverpool upon credit. In relation to foreign exchange a different principle may prevail. Foreign exchange is an article of trade and commerce. The custom of merchants has made it so, and it is doubtful whether Congress can pass a law saying that a contract for the delivery of a bill of exchange shall not be good unless that bill of exchange is delivered presently, or within ten days from the date when the contract is made. Can Congress say that a merchant shall not purchase a cargo of goods in the port of New York for which gold necessarily must be paid, or that which represents the value of gold in the port from which the goods started, upon a credit of thirty or sixty days? And yet, if we pass this amendment, such may be the fair construction. It seems to me that it is a regulation of the laws of contract which the Government has no power to enforce. I would do anything, not only to support the Government, but would do anything that I properly could do to foil the gold gamblers in New York, who are making money at the expense of the Government by their unpatriotic and dishonest dealings. But in order to do that I would not pass the amendment under consideration, which, in my judgment, is not warranted by the Constitution. I believe that if we were to adopt this amendment it could not be sustained in the courts; and I certainly, for one, will never consent to stultify myself by voting for a measure which I believe entirely illegal.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the report of the committee of conference to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The report was read. The committee agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows: that the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, which was to insert the words "and twenty-five consular pupils," and agree to the same with an amendment, to strike out "pupils" and insert "clerks." That the House agree to the twenty-eighth amendment of the Senate, as follows:

And the salaries of the consuls at Brindisi, Gibraltar, St. Helena, Boulogne, Zurich, Clifton, Coaticook, Erie, Goderich, Kingston in Canada, Port Sarnia, Prescott, Saint Lambert, and Longueuil, Toronto and Windsor, shall be $1,500 each; and the salaries of the consuls at Ceylon and Piræus shall be $1,000 each; and the salary of the consul at Chin Kiang shall be $3,000; and the salary of the consul at Bankok shall be $2,000; and the salary of the commercial agent at Madagascar shall be $2,000; and the salary of the consul at Nassau shall be $4,000, to commence after the close of the present fiscal year, and to continue during the present rebellion; and the salary of the consul at Lyons shall be $2,000, to commence after the close of the present fiscal year; and the salary of the consul at Manchester shall be $3,000, to commence after the close of the present fiscal year.

That the Senate recede from its twenty-ninth amendment after the enacting clause:

That the second section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1853," approved February 7, 1857, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

And agree to the following amendment in place of it:

That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized, whenever he shall think the public good will be promoted thereby, to appoint consular clerks, not exceeding thirteen in number at any one time, who shall be citizens of the United States, and over eighteen years of age at the time of their appointment, and shall be entitled to compensation for their services respectively at a rate not exceeding $1,000 per annum, to be determined by the President; and to assign such clerks, from time to time, to such consulates and with such duties as he shall direct; and before the appointment of any such clerk shall be made, it shall be satisfactorily shown to the Secretary of State, after due examination and report by an examining board, that the applicant is qualified and fit for the duties to which he shall be assigned; and such report shall be laid before the President. And no clerk so appointed shall be removed from office except for cause stated in writing, which shall be submitted to Congress at the session first following such removal.

That the Senate recede from its thirtieth amendment, which was:

That the President may, in his discretion, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the kingdom of Belgium, who shall receive no higher compensation than is now allowed to a minister resident.

And agree to the following in place of it:

That an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, appointed at any place where the United States are now represented by a minister resident, shall receive the compensation fixed by law and appropriated for a minister resident, and no more.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the third section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1860," approved March 3, 1859, is hereby repealed. And the fee for certifying invoices to be charged by the consul general for the British North American provinces, and his subordinate consular officers and agents, for goods not exceeding $100 in value, shall be $1, and the same fee shall be charged for certifying the growth or production of goods made duty free by the reciprocity treaty: Provided, however, That no such certificate of growth or production shall be required for goods not exceeding in value the sum of $200.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he permit this report to lie over for some days. There are many members absent who desire to vote upon it.

Mr. KASSON. I would very gladly adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana but for the fact that I intend, if possible, to leave the city for a few days, to try and recover from an illness under which I have been suffering for the last ten days.

The first point of difference with the Senate related to the matter of consular pupils. It was proposed by the Senate that twenty-five of them should be appointed; which it was sought to accomplish by repealing the repealing clause of a former act, thus restoring the original act, as designed by Mr. Marcy, Mr. Cass, and other gentlemen. Instead of that, it was thought by at least some members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that if authority were given for the appointment of such pupils it should be accompanied with some provision against their removal after they had made themselves useful to the commercial interests of the country by acquiring experience and a knowledge of languages. In lieu, therefore, of the section as it stood, the conference committee substituted mainly the section of the original law of 1856, with a proviso that clerks should not be removed except for cause, to be stated in a report to Congress. It is there provided that the number, instead of being twenty-five, shall be reduced to thirteen; and I desire to state to the House that the Committee on Commerce of the Senate were unanimous and extremely earnest for the appointment of these clerks, as required by the necessities of the commerce of the country. They also asserted, and I believe it to be true, that when the act was originally passed fixing the salaries of the consuls of the United States as they are now fixed, it was provided that these twenty-five pupils, as then called, should be appointed, who should serve as clerks to the principal consulates where the business needed them most. We have now increased the duties of these consuls very essentially, and they are obliged to employ clerks at their own expense. The Committee on Commerce of the Senate say they regard it as due to the principal consulates, where the labor is heavier, that the Government should supply them with clerks to aid them in the transaction of their business. It was yielded on the part of the House to the extent of thirteen, which are intended for the most laborious consulates.

Then as to another amendment which was the cause of considerable debate in the House, that amendment came from the Senate with a provision to authorize the President to appoint the minister resident at Belgium envoy extraordinary. To that the House dissented, and the Senate receded, and instead of that amendment proposed the first section of the act of 1855, by which we provided for sending envoys to all the ports where we now have them, and also to half a dozen other ports in Europe and South America, at the same time fixing the salaries for those envoys at the same rate at which they are fixed for ministers resident. We also agreed to that proposition. The President has power to send envoys where he pleases in lieu of ministers resident. This section provides, as the first section of the act of 1855 does, that if they go by the action of the President they shall only go at the same salary as ministers resident. This has been acted on by the Senate, and those who were opposed to the original measure waived that objection and agreed to this.

There is only one other amendment needing explanation. On motion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] it was provided that the payment of the salaries of our consuls in the British provinces—at Halifax, and most of the ports of the British provinces—should be in currency. These were not uniform, and it would be inconvenient, the Department having no system of accounts that would allow it to be done without great derangement. Further than that, it was found that at the more remote consulates, and, in fact, at the nearest, this currency could not be used except at an enormous discount on the part of the consuls themselves. These consuls are necessary to prevent smuggling, and we could not employ any respectable business man for less than $1,500. Any private establishment would be obliged to pay that much for the same character of service. Under the provision referred to the salary of these consuls would be about eight hundred dollars. Therefore, it would be impossible to get good men at this salary to go there and undertake to perform these duties. Under the circumstances I do not think that we could ask a consul to go abroad and expect respectable talent for less than we pay a first-class clerk in Washington. The conference committee have left the salaries of these consuls to stand as for consuls anywhere and everywhere, the salary being fixed at $1,500.

This is all I have to say until I have heard what shall be said by other gentlemen. If necessary, I shall then have something to say in reply.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I am reluctant to oppose a report of the committee of conference at any time, and especially at this time, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] is evidently indisposed. But on the question arising on this bill this House has defined its position. Now a report is brought in here, one which will not only evade the position the House has taken on a former occasion, but will open the door to half a dozen cases like the one objected to. I do insist that if we raise the grade of our foreign ministers, the time will not be long before their friends will come here and demand salary in proportion to their rank. I regard the proposition, therefore, as more mischievous than the original one, which only embraced one minister. We have decided that we would neither raise the grade nor the pay of the minister to Belgium. This report asks us to grant permission to raise the grade and pay of a half dozen, including Belgium, of course, without mentioning it by name. I do not think this will be agreed to. And then upon the other question in relation to consular pupils, while I admit that by changing the name to clerks the rose does smell sweeter, and by reducing the number from twenty-five to thirteen, and fixing it so that they cannot be removed, a part of the objection is avoided, yet the great objection is that after they have been educated abroad they may resign, as they will resign, and quit our employment whenever they can do better. There is no provision to avoid that objection, and we shall find that such will be the practical operation of the bill.

In relation to the salaries of these consuls in Canada, why, there are, I presume, in the pockets of almost every gentleman here from the northern border States numerous applications for appointments as consuls in Canada under the original proposition. If they are to be paid in gold, everybody sees that their actual salary is not only $1,500, but more than $2,500. If we shall adopt the report, and pass the bill, the applications will be far more numerous than they are now. I do not know but there may be some points in the provinces where the salaries should be more than $1,500, but certainly immediately along the borders they need not be more than $1,500.

I move that the consideration of this report be postponed until one week from to-day.

Mr. KASSON. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. COX. Before that question is put I desire to say that I do not see any special necessity for postponing it for a week. I had entertained hopes that the Congress of the United States would be about ready to adjourn in a fortnight.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire of the gentleman from Vermont if he does not think we can adjourn in two weeks if we devote ourselves to business.

Mr. MORRILL. So far as the House is concerned we can adjourn in about a fortnight. From indications in the Senate, I do not think we shall adjourn so soon as that.

Mr. COX. This bill was introduced early in the session and has received a great deal of consideration. This conference report has been before us, perhaps, ten days without any action being taken, and the time has come when we had better dispose of it. I think the committee of conference has disposed of the matters committed to them very justly. I was not here when this matter of the consular pupils was considered, but I had the pleasure of reading the remarks made by the eloquent gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON,] and he fully convinced me, if I was not before convinced by the arguments of Mr. Marcy and Mr. Seward, as well as from information furnished me from the Department of State, that these consular clerks are of great public utility in our foreign commerce, indeed almost indispensable. I am glad that the committee of conference changed their names. They call them consular clerks instead of pupils. Our consuls need more clerical force, and a force of a more permanent character. This need arises from a change of our revenue system in reference to triplicate certificates, which imposes a large and increased amount of labor upon the consulates.

Many of our consulates do not pay. There is a consulate at Manchester which a year ago, I think, before this system of triplicates, only paid a salary of $2,000, and $200 for office rent. Now that same consulate pays into the Treasury $15,000 over and above the salary of the consul. Our different consulates paid into the Treasury $100,000 more than last year, in consequence of the triplicate certificates and the additional fees for them; but there is no corresponding increase of clerical force over what there was before this new system went into effect. Therefore, I think that the committee in making this compromise, giving to these principal consulates thirteen out of the twenty-five clerks asked for, did nothing more than justice. It will enable the consuls to do their duties when first they take their office because of the assistance rendered by these permanent and accomplished clerks. It will assist to remunerate them for actual service, and induce them to stay at their places after they have reached their posts and learned their duties. I presume that no one who understands this matter will object to that part of the conference report.

As to the other clause which they recommended I will read it:

That an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary appointed at any place where the United States are now represented by a minister resident shall receive the compensation fixed by law and appropriate for a minister resident, and no more.

It is a general provision of law, so that these ministers resident shall not have their salaries increased in case they have their rank increased. That is all. I do not see any objection to that. It does not follow that the salaries are to be increased, as I understand it.

Mr. MORRILL. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if he does not know from his experience in this House that it will be most likely to follow, and that speedily; that these salaries will be increased just in proportion to the rank of the ministers?

Mr. COX. Well, that is not my experience, for we never had a case of this kind before.

Mr. MORRILL. Did not we have the case of the consul general of Italy?

Mr. COX. I do not recollect that as a parallel case. This provision will certainly not have that effect after the earnest protests that have been made again and again by the gentleman from Vermont and others. I have no doubt these protests will be all potential in future to prevent the increase of salaries, and that no gentleman who takes an office of this kind will ask an increase of salary. This is a fair proposition, a general one, having no special bearing, and it ought not to meet with any objection. That is all I have to say.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I should have been very willing to let this matter lie over till those gentlemen who are absent could have been present to consider it; but inasmuch as the matter has now come before the House, I am very desirous that it shall be settled one way or the other.

My friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] says that the House has expressed itself very emphatically upon these questions. I suppose he is aware that the Senate expressed itself quite as emphatically as the House. It is because there was a difference of opinion between the House and the Senate that a committee of conference was appointed. Such differences are ordinarily compromised. There is no other way in which we can arrive at joint action in cases of this kind.

Now, in relation to consular pupils I have expressed myself very fully upon another occasion, and do not care now to go over that discussion anew. I will say, however, that a member of the Committee on Commerce in the Senate, who was also a member of this conference committee, stated that applications had been sent to that committee through the Secretary of State from almost all our consuls asking for an increase of salary, or that the Government would pay consular clerks; and that the committee set aside all those applications, with three exceptions, with the expectation that provision would be made in part at least for this demand on the part of all our consuls by this very bill providing for twenty-five consular pupils.

You are aware, sir, that this matter was first brought up in 1856, by Mr. Marcy, when he was Secretary of State. He asked that there should be seventy-five consular pupils appointed instead of twenty-five. The number was cut down to twenty-five, and now the committee of conference have cut down the number still further to thirteen, and hence this provision, if it pass, will take only $13,000 out of the Treasury.

As I said when this matter was up before, it is very important that these consular clerks should be intelligent Americans, with some experience in consular duties. A case has come to hand since that debate bearing upon this very question. I send to the Clerk a paper containing extracts from a communication which has been sent to the State Department, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"MONTREAL, May 31, 1864."

"Since the death of Mr. Giddings the consulate in this city has been in the hands of an inexperienced clerk, and valuable papers and dispatches are carelessly lying about the consulate. And I find that a person by the name of J. W. Howes, formerly vice consul, has possession of the office to-day."

"He was formerly vice consul, and is now connected with the express business. He has possession of the office, and is reading dispatches which arrived from the State Department this day. Should this be so? The enemies of our country may take advantage of this condition of things to the detriment of our country."

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Giddings had no one with him, as I understand, but a young boy, sixteen or seventeen years of age, who was inexperienced in these matters. On his death the consulate was left entirely in charge of that boy; and this Mr. Howes, who is suspected of being disloyal, and with all a little dishonest, so that he cannot properly be trusted with the affairs of the consulate, took charge of the office without any authority.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the gentleman if he is not aware that there are at least twenty persons seeking that office, and among them even Senators and Representatives.

Mr. PATTERSON. That may be so, but I do not see how it bears upon this question. This man Howes, before an appointment could be made, worked his way into the consulate without authority from any source whatever, and has taken possession of the private papers of the consulate and of communications from the State Department, some of which have reference to himself, while others are of such a character that for good reasons they should not come to his knowledge. He has possession of those papers, and may make such use of them as he sees fit. The moment a knowledge of these facts came to the State Department, measures were taken to have him removed from the consulate. I ought, perhaps, to say that provision had been made previously for filling the place temporarily.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from New Hampshire has reflected on the character of J. W. Howes, when I am satisfied he does not know Mr. Howes. I have known him for years, and I know this, that, unless he has changed very much within a short period, he is as honest and true a man as the country affords. He has occupied very responsible positions in an express company, and I have never heard his integrity impeached. I know he belongs to one of the first families in Vermont, and I cannot but believe that any impeachments of his character are slanders.

Mr. PATTERSON. I can only say in reply that Mr. Giddings, having had confidence in this Mr. Howes, communicated his impressions to the State Department in respect to him; the State Department communicated with the Treasury Department and received information there that he could not be trusted, and that he should be removed from the consulate. There is no reason why he should be there now. I may be misinformed in relation to the gentleman; I trust I am. But how came he there? How has this honorable man worked his way there? He had no authority for taking the position. But I do not wish to discuss that question further.

I wish now to say a word in reference to the Belgian mission. I think the gentleman labors under a mistake. He says that the proposition is to raise the grade of the minister to Belgium. That is not the proposition. That authority already rests with the President. The proposition of the committee is not to authorize the President to increase the grade of a minister, but simply to enable him by an act of law to raise the grade without increasing the salary.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON. As I understand the gentleman from New Hampshire the President has now the power to increase this grade of a minister resident. If so, why is it proposed to confer that power upon him?

Mr. PATTERSON. We do not seek to confer it.

Mr. WILSON. Then why is it necessary to have any such provision in this bill?

Mr. PATTERSON. In 1855 a bill was passed providing that from and after the 13th of June, the President of the United States should, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint representatives of the grade of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to certain countries. After the passage of that bill certain interrogatories were put to the Attorney General by the then Secretary of State. Among them was this, "Can the President of the United States, without the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary in place of ministers resident, and secretaries of legation to each of them?" Mr. Cushing, the then Attorney General, taking the materials collected by Mr. Marcy, then Secretary of State, worked out his very elaborate and learned opinion, which is printed in the volume that I hold in my hand, and in which he gives the precedents and law on that subject, showing that the practice of the Government from its foundation had been for the President to appoint ministers of all grades without any action by Congress.

The reason why the impression had gone abroad that it was necessary to have a specific act in order to give the President authority to appoint ministers was that in the consular and diplomatic bills the places were mentioned by name at which certain salaries should be paid. That, however, did not take place until the last session of Congress under the Administration of Mr. Madison. Previously to that the language of those appropriation bills had been general. Subsequently the consular and diplomatic bill of 1856 was introduced and passed. In that act the word "shall" was omitted, because it was thought to be unconstitutional to direct the President to appoint ministers. It is now claimed that the act of 1860, authorizing the appointment of a minister to Sardinia, adopted the language of 1855. So it did. But it does not follow that this act reasserted or established the constitutional right of Congress to limit or prescribe the action of the President in these appointments.

And what is the history of that matter? After the Italian campaign, ending with the battle of Solferino, the Government wished to express its sympathies for, and to pay a compliment to, the Italian Government. A bill was drawn looking to the appointment of a minister plenipotentiary to that court, and it was under consideration a long time in the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. The phrase used was that the President "may" appoint. Mr. Mason, who was then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, saw the difficulty, and desired that the phrase should be modified. The committee authorized him so to correct the language of the act that it should not be extra-constitutional. He labored over it for a long time, but was not able to put it in a form that would suit the object of paying a compliment to Italy and at the same time keep within the language of the Constitution; and so he gave it up, leaving it to stand as it was. He did not wish, however, to take the direction of the bill on its passage, and asked Mr. SUMNER to do so. It thus appears that the words were placed there solely for the sake of doing a complimentary thing to the new Government of Italy. This is the history of the whole matter. The passage of that bill was offensive to Austria, and doubtless was one reason why that Government protested against the appointment of Mr. Burlingame as minister to Vienna, which resulted in his transfer to his present position in China.

Mr. WILSON. I may not understand correctly the answer of the gentleman from New Hampshire, but it does not to my mind afford an answer to the question I propounded. It is stated by the gentleman that the President has now the power; by virtue of the Constitution, to appoint ministers of any grade; that he has the constitutional power to raise the grade of the minister to Belgium from that of minister resident to that of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. Now, if the President possesses this power under and by virtue of the Constitution, can we confer any further power upon him by act of Congress? If we cannot, why should we attempt to do that which we cannot do? That is the question I desire to have answered.

While I am up I will put another question, so that the gentleman may answer both at the same time. I ask him whether the provision in this bill, in regard to fixing the rank of our ministers abroad, has not arisen out of the case of the minister to Belgium, and whether it is not sought to put through the case of the minister to that Power by this general provision, so as to avoid the objection made before of special legislation?

Mr. KASSON. I ask my friend from New Hampshire to let me answer. I think I can satisfy my colleague in reference to the point that he has raised. The President has the right to appoint ministers plenipotentiary, but the bill provides that these ministers plenipotentiary shall receive seventy-five per cent. of the salary fixed for envoys. If he raises the grade from minister resident to that of envoy, he also raises the salary, and that is not desired, because the expense of living is more regulated by the court than by the grade of the minister. In order to avoid the necessity of increase of salary the committee of conference provided that whenever such change is made he shall only receive the salary of minister resident. That fixes the compensation by the law of 1855.

Mr. PATTERSON. I prefer now to proceed with my remarks. I will say, in relation to the first question, that it was not the purpose of the committee of conference to give the President any power which he does not now possess, or to attempt to give him by an act of Congress powers which he holds by virtue of the Constitution. The object was to reduce the salary of any gentleman whom he should choose to appoint envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at any court where we now have a minister resident. That is the only object of the proposition which the committee have laid before the House.

In relation to the appointment of the present minister resident at the court of Belgium to a higher grade I know little and care less. He is a gentleman of whom I have but little knowledge, and I do not care the value of a straw about this matter, so far as it concerns him. I think, however, there is a misapprehension as to the nature of the proposition before the House.

Mr. WILSON. I think there is a misapprehension on the part of the conferees of the House in relation to their own report. It is said by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] and by my colleague [Mr. Kasson] that it is not proposed in this report to confer this power on the President—that he has it already by the Constitution, and that consequently it is not necessary for Congress to undertake to confer that which the Constitution has already conferred. It is provided that envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary appointed at places where the United States is represented by a minister resident shall receive the compensation fixed by law and appropriated for ministers resident, and no more. I understand in the bill as it is proposed to be amended it is provided that whenever the President deems it necessary for the public good he may increase the rank of these ministers.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is out.

Mr. WILSON. That was the provision in the bill as originally reported. The gentleman says that that is not the recommendation of the committee. Then it amounts to this: the committee proposes that the President may, if he sees proper, exercise the power which he has under the Constitution to increase the rank of a minister resident to that of envoy extraordinary, and that the person whose rank is thus increased shall not receive any additional compensation. It seems to me that it is not in accordance with the proper respect due on the part of this House to the dignity which should be maintained by this Government abroad to say that an officer shall have increased rank but not receive the compensation due to his increased rank.

By reading this report, I see that so far as an attempt upon the part of the committee to confer power upon the President is concerned I was in error, as is also the gentleman from New Hampshire; and therefore the answer of my colleague is complete in that regard; but that does not do away with the difficulty of tacitly inviting the President to increase the rank of the minister at Belgium, who represents us at the court of a foreign Power which has been most active in bringing about the establishment of Maximilian as emperor of the new empire of Mexico. Now that is a thing, when viewed in connection with the action this House has taken heretofore, which I think we ought not to do; neither should we invite the President, directly or indirectly, to do it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It was not my good fortune to be present when this matter was discussed on the original consideration of the bill, and I did not hear what I have since read, the very elaborate and exhaustive speech of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] upon the question of consular pupils, a question which in the first instance ought to have been referred to the Committee on Commerce. But, while I have no very fixed opinions upon the subject of consular pupils, I must say I am unalterably opposed to raising the grade of this minister at Belgium, for the reason that I think, as my friend from Iowa has suggested, it must necessarily bring with it an increase of his salary, and I think it ought to. I undertake to say that if this provision is adopted, by the next Congress we shall have a provision in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill to pay this minister the full amount of salary corresponding with the grade, and I think he ought to have it.

It is conceded that the President has authority, without any act of Congress, to appoint these ministers wherever he pleases; yet by putting in this provision here we invite the raising the grade in this instance and in many others; and this raising the grade, I say, will necessarily bring with it a demand for a corresponding salary.

I must therefore vote against the report of the committee of conference, with the hope that the bill will go to another committee, which will at least cut out this provision for raising the grade of this minister at Belgium, a court which, as the gentleman has said, is more hostile to us than almost any court in Europe. Indeed, I recently received a letter from a gentleman occupying a diplomatic position in Europe in which he spoke of the hostility of this court, and in which he expressed a hope that no action of our Congress would give any increased dignity to that court by raising the grade of our minister.

Mr. SPALDING. When this matter was up before it was fully discussed, and the House, after a great deal of deliberation, voted against both of these propositions. They voted decidedly against the appointing of these consular pupils, as they were then termed, some twenty-five in number, and now by the arrangement made by the conference committee the number is proposed to be lessened to thirteen, and their names changed from pupils to clerks, the principle remaining the same. This whole matter is an innovation upon the long-established usages of our country. Heretofore there has been no difficulty in finding among the great mass of our citizens a sufficient number to attend to the duties of these consulates, and yet it is now proposed to institute a favored class of individuals, who are to have fixed salaries, be educated, and who are not to be removable except under certain circumstances. To all that I object.

I object also to this specific legislation, under the guise of general legislation, to raise the grade of the minister resident at Belgium. It was said when this matter was before the House on a former occasion that the present incumbent was a man of affluence and needed no increase of salary. Now, I object to raising the rank for the convenience of any man, be his circumstances affluent or otherwise. I know the professed object now is to make the bill general and to accommodate it to all our foreign missions, but I cannot shut my eyes to the true object as developed when this measure was before us some weeks since. Then the provision was specific; then it was to accommodate the incumbent of the office at Belgium; and I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the true object now is, under a general provision, to accomplish that same purpose. I object to that.

I regret that this measure is reported when there are so many members of the House absent. I am sorry that this measure is to be sprung upon the House at this time; but if gentlemen are determined to press it to a vote I shall content myself with voting now as I have heretofore done, against these measures.

The learned gentleman from New Hampshire tells us that information comes either from the Committee on Commerce of the Senate or from the State Department that from nearly all our consulates a demand has come for an increase of salary. Why, sir, that is nothing unnatural or unexpected. We have not an officer in the service of the Government at this time who would not be glad to have an increase of his salary, and very many of them have sent in demands for an increase.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to explain for a moment?

Mr. SPALDING. With pleasure.

Mr. PATTERSON. I wish to say that the salary of consuls was fixed by the act of 1856, with the expectation that these consular pupils or clerks would be appointed, and by the act of last Congress requiring triplicate invoices of all goods imported into this country the labors of consuls were very much increased. That act has saved to the Government many thousands in consular fees, and has saved to the revenue, it is estimated, $10,000,000 by the prevention of frauds. But it has so increased the labors of consuls that where they formerly hired only one clerk they are now required to employ three or four, and they are consequently unable to pay for clerical hire.

Mr. SPALDING. I give my friend from New Hampshire full credit for that explanation. I was about commenting upon it, for I understood him to say substantially when he was up before that the duties of consuls had been largely increased; that they were appointed under the expectation that they would have the benefit of these consular pupils or clerks; that is to say, clerks employed at the public expense and not at their own; and that now they are compelled to employ and pay their own clerks. I grant that their duties have perhaps been increased and made more arduous, but that is the case with most of the employés of the Government. I appeal to the gentleman if it is not the case with members of Congress even, and if our duties are not four times as arduous and embarrassing as the duties of members of Congress were six years ago? And yet our pay is not raised. These foreign consuls all receive their pay as heretofore, in coin, and, as compared with the salary we receive for our poor services, their pay is nearly two dollars for our one.

Now, I wish to put this plain question to the gentleman from New Hampshire, if, with all this information from the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and all this information from the State Department as to the demands of our foreign consuls for an increase of pay or an increase of their salaries by the employment of consular clerks, he has heard of one solitary individual of them who has intimated a purpose of resigning his place unless his demands are complied with? If he will give me one instance I will give up to him the whole argument.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will give the gentleman one or two instances. The consul at Glasgow has intimated to the State Department that he shall be obliged to resign and come home, for he cannot live on his salary. The consul at Marseilles has intimated the same thing, and has overrun the income of the office three or four thousand dollars a year.

Mr. COX. With the permission of my colleague, I will say that I have here a paper from the State Department, which shows the additional amounts paid for clerk hire by several of the most important consuls, who expected to have the assistance of these clerks. It is stated in this document that the necessary clerical and office expenses in 1858 were as follows—these expenses are paid entirely by the consul, from their own compensation—namely: at Liverpool, $4,000; at Havre, $3,000; at Hilo, $2,000; at Lahaina, $3,000; at Calcutta, $5,590; at Aspinwall, $600; at Honolulu, $3,000; at Havana, $4,000. The consul at Paris states that he now pays for clerk hire $2,755 per annum. At Shanghai, the same item, $6,550. This additional clerical force, I presume my colleague understands, is in consequence of our own legislation. Mr. Seward, in his letter of January 9, 1864, upon this subject, says:

"Under the provisions also of the act of the 3d of March last, by which all invoices of goods imported into the United States, instead of a few only, as was formerly the case, are required to be authenticated, and that, too, in triplicate, the clerical work in the consulates has increased many fold; and while the amount of consular fees paid into the Treasury is largely augmented, the consuls have received no increase of compensation for the additional labor and clerical expense to which they are thereby subjected."

Then follows a statement of additional fees paid into the Treasury by consuls, showing an increase in the past year of over one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand from the gentleman from Ohio that this increased cost for clerk hire is owing to the law of last Congress in regard to triplicating invoices.

Mr. COX. A large amount of the additional labor thrown upon consuls was in consequence of that law. It was fully understood at the time that the law was enacted that it would increase the clerical labor in the consulates.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That I understand; and I think it affords a very good reason why there should be an increase of these clerks. I understand, further, that the law has operated very much to the benefit of the Government in the detection and prevention of commercial frauds.

Mr. COX. I see by a statement made in the Senate by the Senator from Michigan that some ten million dollars has been saved to the Treasury of the United States in the detection of attempted frauds owing to this new system of invoices. The Government really loses nothing, but gains much by increasing the number of consular clerks. It is a question not merely of economy but of justice to consuls who have to pay their clerks out of their own salaries.

Mr. KASSON. I believe the ground has been as fully covered in this debate as we can expect it to be. I move the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the motion to postpone, but I hope the House will reject the report.

Mr. STROUSE. I desire to submit a few remarks to the House.

Mr. KASSON. I will withdraw the previous question in favor of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STROUSE. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for withdrawing the previous question. Mr. Speaker, I very rarely take up the time of the House for the purpose of delaying necessary legislation; but I think it due to the subject before the House now to say a few words upon it. It is surprising to me, Mr. Speaker, to see opposition made when matters of this kind come up. There are certainly some moments when the bitter feelings of partisan antagonism can be relaxed in this House. After all, I believe we are yet

American citizens and Representatives of the American people. If there ever was a time when it was our duty to let the world know that we intend honestly and conscientiously to maintain the integrity and honor of the Republic, that time is now. We can show that spirit in one way by exercising liberality toward our representatives abroad. I am astonished that gentlemen who pride themselves on their patriotism and loyalty, and who represent patriotic and loyal districts, should rise here and oppose measures that are calculated to bring credit and honor to the country.

I have heard one gentleman remark, in the course of this debate, that our consuls abroad are paid in gold. Certainly they are. In what else should they be paid? We, here, are content and are compelled to take paper money at par, and we do not grumble at it, because it is the currency of the country at present. But I would like to ask that gentleman, or any other gentleman of his peculiar political persuasion, what he could purchase for a bushel of greenbacks at Ningpo, Manila, Shanghai, Jeddo, St. Petersburg, Nassau, Gibraltar, Bremen, Hamburg, Bordeaux, Rio de Janeiro, or even at Quebec, on our very borders? Why, he would not get a breakfast for a shipload of them.

I am astonished to hear this sort of twaddle in the Hall of the House of Representatives of the United States of America. Is gold so scarce? It is not scarce. We have more gold in this country now than there is in the rest of the world. Our Pennsylvania farmers have gold by the thousands of dollars. Gold is not scarce. It is not appreciated; paper is depreciated. We simply keep up the credit of greenbacks by mutual confidence. And we, who are denounced daily as copperheads, are the men who help to give them credit. We take this currency; we pay it out; we buy and sell for it; we look upon it as the currency of the country, because it has that ancient and patriotic title, "The United States promise to pay." Greenbacks are a "necessary evil."

Now, sir, I want to hear no more of this. Let our consuls, our ministers resident, our ambassadors, our envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary, who are the representatives of the United States abroad, whether, like the late Mr. Giddings, in Canada, or in Japan, be paid in gold. Let them be paid liberally; let them be able, under all circumstances and in whatever country, be able to stand up under the American flag and say proudly, "I am the representative of the United States of America." We want no "small potato business" here. [Laughter.] We want our men paid well. We want them paid in coin. We want them paid in the money of the world. We want them paid in gold, the standard of value, the money of the Constitution. If we take "greenbacks" that is our own business. We do not propose to let outsiders interfere in our internal affairs; I am for the Monroe doctrine in everything. When we go among foreign nations let us show that we not only have paper money but gold.

Why, sir, we have more gold than any other nation. Our mines in California and elsewhere are continually producing gold. And, sir, not only that, I represent the great coal and iron mines of Pennsylvania, which produce enough to pay the whole corps diplomatique in sound metal. Our resources are inexhaustible and we should deal liberally by all of our representatives at home and abroad, to give strength, credit, and renown to our Republic, which will, in a short time, under Democratic rule, be again the United States of America!

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in reply to what has been said. I think that the question involved is a very plain one. It is whether under the existing law when ministers resident are raised to the rank of envoys their salaries shall be increased as is provided in the law of 1855. It is deemed proper at this time, when we do not wish to increase these salaries, that a provision to that effect should be incorporated into this bill. That is all there is of it. I certainly think that the House, as well as the Senate, will yield to that amendment. It is simply an economical provision and nothing else.

As to the other question, it is generally conceded that it is to the interest of commerce to adopt this provision; that it is a duty we owe to the commerce of the country to give these additional clerks. Some of the members of the Committee on Commerce I know are interested in this matter. We leave the power where it is, but take away the necessity of raising the pay of these ministers; that is all there is of it.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman from Iowa I will say a few words. It seems to me there has been one oversight in considering this proposition. Gentlemen have failed to mention the annoyance and mortification of our ministers resident abroad, when they see the representatives of fourth-rate Powers taking precedence of the representatives of this great nation. In my judgment, this state of affairs is derogatory to our dignity and injurious to our interests. The critical state of our international relations constitutes a cogent, strong, and urgent reason for its immediate correction. I think that their rank ought in many cases to be raised; and I am in favor not only of raising the rank, but also of increasing the pay of these ministers resident. I would place them in a position where they would not be subjected to the present humiliation, or be injured in the influence legitimately belonging to them as the representatives of this Government. In regard to the clerks for whom this bill is intended to provide I would say that provision is rendered necessary in consequence of Congress failing to carry into effect the law concerning consular pupils. Our principal consuls have been compelled to employ their own clerks, and to pay them out of their own salaries. The intention of the original act was to give them pupils in place of clerks; and I think that this provision is just and proper.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and Cox were appointed.

The report was rejected; the tellers having reported—ayes 39, noes 55.

Mr. MORRILL moved that there be a further conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

GOLD BILL—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The House will now resume the consideration of the gold bill.

Mr. STROUSE moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, before calling the previous question I wish to say a few words in reply to the objections which have been urged against the bill. It seems to me those objections are ingenious and technical rather than practical.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] objects on the ground that a contract for the transportation of gold would be prohibited by the term "delivery," as contained in this bill. It occurs to me that the express man is acting as the agent for the purchaser, and the delivery referred to in my amendment takes place when the gold is put into his possession for transportation. But to meet the objection I will modify my amendment by striking out the word "or" in the fourth line and inserting "and;" so that it will read "sale and delivery," &c.; and I make the same modification in line thirteen, after the word "sale;" and also in the twenty-second line.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] asks me upon what phrase in the Constitution this bill is founded. I would call his attention to the eighth section, which authorizes Congress to provide for the general welfare; and also to the next paragraph but one, which grants the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. There is also the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. DRIGGS. Will the gentleman allow me to say one word? I ask but for a minute.

Mr. HOOPER. I will, if the gentleman will renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will. I desire simply to say that though my experience in gold speculation is probably not greater than that of other members, at the same time I am decidedly opposed to any attempt by legislation to regulate transactions between individuals. I conceive that we should only make ourselves ridiculous by the attempt. This bill provides that it shall be unlawful to make any contract for the delivery of gold or to pay in any other currency than that of the United States. Now, sir, suppose I were the owner of a house and lot, or of any other property which I desired to exchange for gold. Can the Congress of the United States prevent any such transaction between myself and my neighbor? I think not. If I might be allowed to offer an amendment I would move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and the bill would then be more valuable than it is in its present shape. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. PENDLETON moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. COX called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 53, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Hutchins, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Ross, Scott, Starr, William G. Steele, Strouse, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. Rollins, Sloan, Spalding, Thayer, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Wilson, and Windom—47.

So the bill was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HOLMAN stated that he was paired off with Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, otherwise he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. ANCONA stated that Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. GANSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and there were—yeas 51, nays 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Hutchins, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Perlham, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Rollins, Sloan, Spalding, Thayer, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Wilson, and Windom—51.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative, and the motion is not laid on the table.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. WILSON. I demand the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is hardly necessary, inasmuch as the motion will not be debatable.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to postpone the motion to reconsider until to-morrow, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I move to postpone it indefinitely.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman has not the floor to make that motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he move to postpone it until Saturday next.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and now move to postpone the further consideration of the motion until Saturday next, after the morning hour, and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I move to lay the whole subject on the table, including the gentleman's motion and everything else.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, another motion having intervened since the question was last taken upon laying on the table.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Hutchins, William Johnson, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Samuel J. NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Thayer, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—53.

So the House refused to lay the whole subject on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. A. W. CLARK stated that his colleague, Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, was absent from the city.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred on the demand for the previous question on the motion to postpone until Saturday.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to postpone was agreed to.

CALIFORNIA LAND TITLES.

On motion of Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 109, to expedite the settlement of titles to land in the State of California, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

VETO POWER IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill of the Senate in regard to the veto power in Washington Territory, the pending question being on the passage of the bill.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust my friend from Pennsylvania will not press that motion. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. COLE] has the floor upon the pending bill, and I am sure we shall all be very much gratified to hear him. I hope he will be permitted to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. THAYER. Very well, sir; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. COLE, of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I could not allow this measure, which affects the people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor, to pass without entering my solemn protest against it. By what influence the Senate was induced to pass the bill is unknown to me, except so far as appears from the record of the action of that body in regard to it.

I do not know any one in the Territory of Washington who desires the passage of this act. I have been asked by several members, since this matter was up yesterday, why it is that the Territory of Washington should be made an exception to all the other Territories in this matter of giving the veto power to the Governor. I would reply to that inquiry by giving a short history of the organization of that Territory.

In 1848 the Congress of the United States passed an act organizing all our then possessions on the Pacific coast beyond the Rocky mountains into the Territory of Oregon. All that country north of the forty-second parallel and south of the forty-ninth parallel, lying between the Rocky mountains and the Pacific ocean, was organized into the Territory of Oregon. There was a population there which had formed a provisional government, made its own laws, elected its own Governor and various territorial officers, its Legislature and its judges, and governed itself until the year 1848, when Congress saw fit to organize that country into a Territory of the United States.

The people who had settled that country were mostly from the frontier States of the West, from Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, and Missouri. They had traversed the plains and had endured hardships innumerable. They had, in fact, settled in favor of the Government of the United States the question of title between it and the Government of Great Britain to all that country on the Pacific coast. Finding that this people had done so much to give to the United States our vast Pacific possessions, and that they had shown themselves so competent for self-government, Congress, in providing an organic act for the Territory, left out, contrary to the usual custom in organizing new Territories, the provision giving the veto power to the Governor. Congress also gave to that Territory other legislation which it has never given to any other Territory of the United States. In the year 1850 Congress passed an act giving to an actual settler on the public lands in the Territory of Oregon, which then comprised Washington Territory, six hundred and forty acres if he were a married man, and three hundred and twenty acres if he were a single man, conditioned upon four years' residence and cultivation. This was done probably for the same reason as that for which Congress gave to the Territory a liberal organic act, as a remuneration in part for the essential service rendered by that people to the Government.

I had the honor of taking some part in the early legislation of the Territory of Oregon. I became a resident of Oregon in 1850, and was a resident of it during eight years of its territorial existence. About a quarter of the population of the Territory was embraced within the present limits of Washington Territory, prior to its organization. The population were of the same character and class—a permanent, industrious people, not a migratory people like those of California or of the new Territories of Idaho and Montana. It is true that a portion of Idaho was taken from Washington, in fact all of present Idaho; but it was settled up, not by the old settlers of Washington Territory, but principally by Californians and people from the States.

In 1853 the organic act of Washington Territory was passed by Congress, and the people were allowed the same privileges in regard to enacting their laws that the people of Oregon Territory were in the act organizing that Territory. In order that the House may understand just what powers were given to the people of Washington Territory in their organic act, I will ask the Clerk to read a section from the law organizing the Territory.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. But no law shall be passed interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; no tax shall be imposed upon the property of the United States; nor shall the lands or other property of non-residents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents. All the laws passed by the Legislative Assembly shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States, and, if disapproved, shall be null and of no effect: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to give power to incorporate a bank or any institution with banking powers, or to borrow money in the name of the Territory, or to pledge the faith of the people of the same, for any loan whatever, directly or indirectly. No charter granting any privileges of making, issuing, or putting into circulation any notes or bills in the likeness of bank notes, or any bonds, scrip, drafts, bills of exchange, or granting any other banking powers or privileges, shall be passed by the Legislative Assembly; nor shall the establishment of any branch or agency of any such corporation, derived from other authority, be allowed in said Territory; nor shall said Legislative Assembly authorize the issue of any obligation, scrip, or evidence of debt, by said Territory, in any mode or manner whatever, except certificates for service to said Territory. And all such laws, or any law or laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be utterly null and void. And all taxes shall be equal and uniform; and no distinctions shall be made in the assessments between the different kinds of property, but the assessments shall be according to the value thereof. To avoid improper influences, which may result from intermixing in one and the same act such things as have no proper relation to each other, every law shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title.

Mr. COLE, of Washington. It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that the powers of the Legislature of Washington Territory are very limited, that they hardly exceed those of the board of supervisors of a county in the State of New York. Besides this, all laws of the Legislature are to be submitted to the Congress of the United States, and if disapproved by Congress they are to be null and void. Here you have an absolute veto. All laws inconsistent with the organic act are null and void; and the court to decide upon them is a court appointed by the President of the United States. At the time of its organization the population was about five thousand. Its present population is three or four times that number—somewhat less, not much—and with about the same ability to sustain a State organization as two of her sister Territories which are about to assume position in the family of States, if their people listen to the voice of politicians instead of consulting their own interests. The principal interests of our people are farming and lumbering. But a small amount of mining is carried on within the present limits of our Territory, though good mines exist throughout its entire eastern section. But the adjacent mines in Idaho present greater inducements at present.

Men who are elected to the Legislature are generally men who are interested in the welfare of the Territory, and I venture the assertion that no Territory possesses a better code of laws or are the people in any better satisfied with their condition. We have had some half dozen Governors, none of whom, if we except the present incumbent, has desired the veto power.

The people have not abused the power with which the Legislature has been clothed. No conflict between the Territory and the General Government has ever arisen. The plan, so far as our Territory is concerned, has worked well. And I may add, for the eight years of the territorial existence of Oregon I was a citizen of that Territory, it worked equally well there. The people there as well as in Washington Territory proved themselves abundantly able to make their own laws. No portion of the people of my Territory have asked for this change. No acts on the part of the people or the Legislature coming in conflict with any interests of the General Government have ever been perpetrated or enacted. And no considerable number of the people of the Territory, and I doubt if any of its permanent residents, would look upon this change with favor. It was stated in the other branch of Congress when this bill was before it for consideration that the Federal officers of the Territory had asked it. It may be true that the Governor of the Territory, and perhaps some other of the Federal officials—though I think not many—may desire it and they may have asked for it. But I am quite certain no permanent citizens of the Territory of any party desire it. Were we always certain of having a Governor selected from among our own citizens, or could the people of the Territory elect their Governor, the case would be different, as the legislative power would then be entirely in the hands of those who are identified with our interests and understand our wants. But gentlemen all know what kind of men are generally sent out to new Territories by the party in power, it makes no difference what party that may be.

I am certain that gentlemen who represent the new States, and were residents of those States when they were Territories, will agree with me when I say they are not generally men noted for their talents, and their morals are not always calculated to improve and elevate even a frontier community. They are more frequently men who are anxious for place, as a requital for services rendered, or supposed to have been rendered, to the party appointing them. They are known generally to be unfit for position in the States, and they are therefore sent off to the Territories not so much because they are supposed to possess the necessary qualifications for the position, but they are "troublesome fellows," and the Administration must get rid of them. Having received their commission, signed by the President, with the broad seal of the Union affixed, they set out for their destination. Arriving in the Territory, they very frequently imagine themselves, if not "monarch of all they survey," at least decidedly "some pumpkins." Coming in contact with the people they endeavor to impress them with their importance by "putting on airs," (as it is termed in the expressive language of the country,) and playing the cheap lion on all occasions. Frontiersmen are generally good judges of human nature, and these would-be great men soon find their true position. It may be that it would be safer and more conducive to the interests of the people of the Territory to place legislation under the control of such a person, if such, perchance, should occupy the gubernatorial chair; but it will be very difficult to make the people of my Territory so understand it. They have been accustomed to make their own laws for eleven years without the intervention of an executive veto used by the stranger your Executive sends among them, and they have duly appreciated the power conferred upon and the trust reposed in them, and they will feel it a hardship that this abridgment of their liberties should be made without cause.

The people of Washington Territory are a loyal people. They are loyal to the Government and to the Constitution. They deeply sympathize with that band of heroes who are bravely fighting to restore obedience to the Constitution and the laws. It is true they have not been called upon to shoulder the musket in defense of their country in its present struggle for existence among the nations of the world, yet they have given largely in proportion to their means to the sanitary cause, and in times past have bared their bosoms to the Indian arrow and bullet. They are attached to the Union. They pay without murmuring the taxes you impose, though they have no voice in imposing those taxes. With them "representation does not go with taxation," an evil of which our forefathers bitterly complained. It is true a Delegate from a Territory may speak and make motions, (though even that poor privilege was questioned by a gentleman on the opposite side of the House yesterday,) but he has no right to vote. I am not complaining of this, but what I do complain of is your abridging our right to enact such little local legislation as may be found necessary from time to time to provide for and protect our own local interests.

I repeat, our population is of a permanent character, and men are not likely to get into the Legislature who have not the interests of the people at heart. It was stated in the other branch of Congress when this bill was under discussion that the Delegate from the Territory desired the passage of this bill; that he said the people were of a transient character, and many men got into the Legislature who had no interest in the country, and burdened the people with oppressive taxes; and it was upon such false representations as these that the bill passed the Senate. No such opinions were ever entertained or expressed by me, and no person was ever authorized to place me in that position. Whenever the people of my Territory feel themselves incompetent to exercise what rights they now possess, and desire the General Government to resume a portion of them, they are abundantly able to say so, and it will then be competent for Congress to act upon the matter. Or if any gentleman upon this floor will point out wherein they have misused their rights to the injury of the General Government, I will then listen with some patience to a proposition to abridge them.

As the Delegate from that Territory this House will bear me witness that I have not been backward in introducing measures to the consideration of the House which I thought to be conducive to the interests of the Territory. Some of those measures have been favorably considered by the House and the Senate, and have become laws; others are still sleeping in committees (I wish I had power to get them out) which have been favorably considered by them; and other very important measures to the people of my Territory have been consigned, I fear, to the "tomb of the Capulets." Had I desired the passage of this bill I would have been very likely to have introduced it and asked for it the favorable consideration of the House. If the majority of this House desire to pass it, they have the power and the right to do so; but I must be allowed to enter my most solemn and emphatic protest against it in the name of the people of my Territory. Were I to neglect doing so I should be alike untrue to myself and unfaithful to them. I did not know such a bill was under consideration in the Senate until it had passed that body and came in here for the concurrence of this House. I tried to send it to the Committee on Territories, so as to get it out of the way for this session at least. Failing in that, and the House, by the vote upon the question of reference, indicating a disposition to pass it, I must be allowed to say that I think it a most unwise measure, and not calculated to do any good either to my Territory or to the country.

The question does not present itself to the House in the light of an original proposition in the organization of a new Territory, when the organic act is first given the people to govern them, however questionable its propriety then. But you propose to take away rights the people have been accustomed to exercise for sixteen years: five years as an integral part of Oregon, and eleven years as citizens of Washington; and that, too, without cause, without their having betrayed or violated the trust reposed in them. They will inquire into the cause of this abridgment of their liberties. They will feel aggrieved at your action, and if it is done at the instance of Federal officials you have sent among them, it will be a cause of irritation toward them, and may lead to serious results. You may think it a trifling matter, but they will think it a serious matter. Parties in that far-off Territory are not altogether divided upon questions upon which parties are organized here. The most natural division, and, in fact, the real division, is that of Federal clique party and the People's party. It is true all the people do not belong to the people's party, for you can find some in every community who can be influenced by the arguments which power and patronage can yield, men who "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,

Where thrift may follow fawning."

We are not altogether free from them in our Territory; yet the substantial citizens are generally made of different stuff.

As a whole the people of my Territory are a people it were an honor to serve even in the capacity of a territorial delegate. I have been identified with their interests and that of their immediate neighbor, Oregon, for nearly fifteen years. I know their feelings. I have witnessed their many and untold hardships in crossing the sandy plains and mountain steeps, and in driving back the savage foe, and hewing out homes for themselves and their children in the forest and prairie wilds. I know the jealousy they feel toward the stranger clothed with a "little brief authority" to rule and lord over them you send among them upon every change in the national Administration. And now if those whom they look upon already as at least not of them seek to increase their power, by depriving them of a moiety of liberty they now possess, I know the chagrin and mortification it will cause them. It is true a Territory at best is but a state of semi-vassalage, yet my Territory has enjoyed comparative freedom in matters of local legislation within the scope of the organic act given them by Congress, which is quite circumscribed, yet they have been accustomed to a certain amount of freedom, and any abridgment of it without cause will, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, be to them a sad grievance. We are in a remote section of the Union. It will be a long, long while before we will be populous enough for a State. We shall have to endure our territorial vassalage many years to come; make it, I entreat you, Mr. Speaker, as light as possible. Brighten, encourage, build up a love for the Union and the Constitution of our beloved country in that weak, dependent, and distant ward: one day she will repay you for all the kindness you have displayed and all the favors you have bestowed upon her. I do not say you can drive her from you by harshness and severity, but I do say it is better to soothe than to ruffle her spirit. Your income tax, your license tax, your direct tax, and your import duties, fall equally upon us as upon yourselves. We pay all without a murmur. You have increased those taxes nearly two-fold this Congress. Although it is taxation, as I said before, without representation, yet the people of my Territory will pay it, believing it to be necessary to sustain the Government in this trying crisis; but do not, Mr. Speaker, insult them by the passage of this bill at the instance of those who are not sufficiently identified in feelings and interests with the people to use the power you propose to rob the people of to give to them.

If men sometimes find their way into our Legislature who are not sufficiently identified with the interests of the people to properly represent them, how can we expect the stranger reared in a distant land, intrusted with the lever of the veto power, to better that condition of things? I know it is said it is but a qualified veto; but we prefer no veto to a qualified veto. I know it is said in other Territories the Governor is clothed with the veto power, and in the instance of Utah it is absolute. The old lady, when remonstrated with for skinning eels alive, said, "Oh! that is nothing; they are used to it; I have done that these thirty years!" Well, Mr. Speaker, we are not used to it. It will not help the condition of these Territories by depriving us of a portion of our rights. You have been very indulgent toward us; but your indulgence has not spoiled us. We deserve no chastisement; and pray do not inflict it upon us. With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I leave the question, and move to lay the bill on the table, and on that question demand the yeas and nays, in order that the people of my Territory may be apprised who are the men in this House so anxious to serve them without their aid being sought.

Mr. THAYER moved that the House adjourn.

REVISION OF LAWS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Pending the motion to adjourn, Mr. DAVIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, moved to take up Senate joint resolution No. 59, to provide for the revision of the laws of the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Birch, lately contesting seats in this House, each the monthly pay of a member of Congress, from the beginning of this session to the 1st of June, instant, to reimburse them their expenses incurred in conducting said contests.

Mr. BEAMAN. I object.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to.

And then (at a quarter to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a memorial of Israel Deming, praying to be relieved from the further fulfillment of his contract for furnishing rations for the marines at Washington, Philadelphia, and New York, for the year 1864, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 504) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the marine hospital and grounds at Chicago, Illinois, and to purchase a new site and build a new hospital, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 296) in relation to the fees and emoluments of the marshal, attorney, and clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LYON, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 216) to grant the right of preemption to certain settlers on the "Rancho Bolsa de Tomales," in the State of California.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 486) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho," approved March 3, 1863; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A joint resolution (S. No. 60) tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailey, of the fourth regiment of Wisconsin volunteers.

BLUE MONT COLLEGE.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to consider the bill (S. No. 73) to enable the trustees of Blue Mont College to perfect title to their land.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the act to enable the trustees of the Blue Mont College to preempt a certain quarter section of land, approved March 2, 1861, so that the trustees may locate the college quarter for the use and benefit of the college with any military bounty land warrant of the act of 1855, the location to be made in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with an amendment, after the word "amended" in line six to strike out the following words:

That said trustees herein named may locate said college quarter for the use and benefit of the college with any military bounty land warrant of the act of 1855, said location to be made in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

As to authorize the legally constituted trustees of said college to locate on said tract of land any military bounty land warrant or land warrants issued under the military bounty land warrant act of 1855, said warrants being the property of said college, in the name and for the benefit and use of said college, said location to be made in accordance with the rules and regulations of the General Land Office, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed; and its title was amended to read as follows:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the trustees of the Blue Mont College to preempt a certain quarter section of land," approved March 2, 1861.

CHARGES AGAINST GENERAL BUTLER.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 422) to amend an act entitled "An act to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico."

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from New York allow me a moment to say a word personal to myself?

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I have received a letter, which I will read to the Senate:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, June 3, 1864.

SIR: I have read your resolution of inquiry. You can do me no greater favor than to have every act of my political life, which began on the first Tuesday of November, 1839, and ended on the 15th day of April, 1861, most thoroughly scrutinized.

I will thank you, also, to have every act of my official life, which began as brigadier general of the Massachusetts militia, April 16, 1861, and will end when this war does, if not sooner, subjected to the like examination. I have no favors to ask and but one act of justice, that the inquiry should not be ex parte; i. e., one-sided.

Your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,

Major General United States Volunteers.

GARRETT DAVIS, Esq., Member of the Senate of the United States from Kentucky.

Mr. President, this letter is couched in terms which every man would suppose an individual, conscious of his innocence and resenting imputations against him, would use. The terms of the letter certainly appreciate General Butler in my estimation, and are somewhat prima facie evidence of his innocence. He may be innocent of the charges imputed in the resolution which I offered a few days ago. He may not be innocent. I had no personal information on the subject. I have no personal prejudice against General Butler. I never saw him that I am conscious of. If he and all men against whom such charges can be made can challenge in the indignant terms that he uses an investigation, and come out unscathed by such an investigation, to me it would afford satisfaction. I am conscious that I never felt an impulse or a disposition to have an innocent man punished, nor an innocent man charged; and it always affords me pleasure for a man who is charged and who is innocent to have an opportunity and be able to exculpate himself.

General Butler says in this letter that he had read my resolution. Of course he understands its terms and its effect. He is a man of ability and large experience, and no doubt of parliamentary learning, and fully and correctly appreciates the appropriate effect of the resolution if it should pass. He not only in this letter desires but he challenges investigation and scrutiny. Of course he invites it according to the terms of the resolution which I have offered. That resolution is that a select committee of three be raised by the Chair to investigate the conduct of General Butler, according to the terms expressed in the resolution; that it have power to sit during vacation of the Senate, and to send for persons and papers. I understand General Butler to have accepted the gage, and to take it up just in the form in which it has been tendered to him. Now, sir, as a Senator and as a man I feel perfectly confident to do General Butler justice in this matter; to enter upon the investigation and the judgment of his action upon the facts that may be collected with an entirely just judgment, and to render him justice according to the truth of his case.

I therefore hope, in obedience to his wishes and request, that the Senate will permit the resolution to be read; that they will vote upon it without any debate; that they will pass it; that they will authorize the committee to be raised, and authorize it to proceed to the execution of the matters which the resolution would charge it with, as General Butler seems to desire. I therefore ask that the resolution be read, and that the Senate pass it.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope that it will be postponed until after I have passed my bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 422) to amend an act entitled "An act to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico." It proposes to amend the sixth section of the act to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, approved June 21, 1860, so as to enable the heirs of Luis Maria Baca to raise and withdraw the selection and location of one of the square bodies of land confirmed to them by that act, heretofore located by them on the Pecos river, adjoining the Fort Sumner reservation, and to select and relocate it in the manner provided by that act, at any time before the 21st of June, 1865, upon any of the public lands, unoccupied and not mineral, within the limits of the Territory of New Mexico, as those limits were known and defined by law on the 21st of June, 1860; and upon such selection and relocation, the title to that square body of land—being the one fifth part of the private claim confirmed to those heirs—so selected and relocated, is confirmed to them as fully and perfectly as if it had been selected and located within three years from and after the approval of that act.

Upon such selection and relocation all rights, title, and interest of those to the square body of land heretofore selected and located by them on the Pecos river, adjoining the Fort Sumner reservation in New Mexico, is divested and declared null and void, and are to revert in the Government of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. It appears that a family by the name of Baca were entitled to a grant of land in New Mexico, to a pretty large extent, called the Los Vegas grant. In June, 1860, Congress passed a law authorizing the heirs of Baca to locate this grant in five square bodies upon any unappropriated lands in New Mexico. They were allowed three years within which to make this location. Those heirs proceeded to locate their lands. Four of these square bodies were located; and the location was approved by the surveyor general of New Mexico. In June, 1863, the fifth body was located on a tract of land a little less than one hundred thousand acres. It was located upon the Pecos river, near Fort Sumner, in that Territory. Since that time the Government have seen fit to locate the Indians of that region, with which we have been long at war, upon a reservation; they have selected forty miles square with Fort Sumner for its center as a reserve for these Indians; and they have settled several thousand Apache and Navajo Indians upon that reservation. The location of this fifth square of this Los Vegas grant in favor of the heirs of this Spaniard is in the center of this Indian reservation, and it is deemed important by the Government to have this location withdrawn and removed to some other part of the Territory so as to give up the whole of this forty miles square for the Indians. It is in the center of the Territory, with Fort Sumner for its center, and the Indians are all around this location. The provisions of this bill are simply that the heirs of Baca shall be at liberty to withdraw their location on the Pecos river and to relocate it somewhere else upon other unappropriated lands in New Mexico.

Mr. CONNESS. I think this is the most important bill relating to lands that has come before this Congress. The act of 1860, referred to by the Senator from New York, was, to say the least of it, a very extraordinary act in its provisions. It allowed private parties declared entitled to a certain amount of land to locate that land, and that I believe equal to five hundred thousand acres. Am I not right?

Mr. HARRIS. Nearly that.

Mr. CONNESS. Nearly five hundred thousand acres, to locate it in five different bodies where they pleased. All the locations in accordance with that act have been made. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York, and of the Senate, to the fact that since the last location so made there has been more development of the resources of the Territory of New Mexico, particularly of its mineral resources and wealth, than had ever taken place before that time. Since that period the country has been occupied by a very large number of American soldiers, every man of whom is an experienced miner, all of them having been raised in the State of California. Very many of them, located at the posts in the interior, have given their attention at intermediate periods to mining, and many of their friends have been induced to follow them; so that at the present time there is a white population, experienced in discovering the precious metals, throughout the two Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. Until a recent period the population of both those Territories was confined almost exclusively to persons of Mexican origin. They are now being opened up to the settlement of our own people, as I before observed, entirely experienced in the search for the precious metals.

I had a series of conversations lately with a very intelligent officer from New Mexico, who was absent on leave. He considers himself the owner by discovery of one of the most valuable silver mines perhaps on the continent. He had with him some small blocks of silver which was the product of some of the ores submitted to test by him. He told me in the series of conversations I had with him that New Mexico and Arizona were undoubtedly the richest portions of the United States in the precious metals, particularly in silver; that they but awaited the establishment of law and protection to capital, and for the introduction of capital and its application to those mines, to add to the wealth of the United States enormously. Now you propose at this period of time to allow one hundred thousand acres of land to be selected where these heirs will in that Territory.

I submit that if the question of mineral lands was not concerned or involved at all, whether the act of 1860 gave the power to these heirs to thus locate these large bodies of land or not; they having once exercised that power and privilege, it is a very dangerous proceeding now to authorize them to relocate at this time as large a body as one hundred thousand acres without even the surveillance of the General Land Office or land department of the United States. If we should give them this power, they would be the veriest fools in the world and the most neglectful of their interests, if they did not make themselves as rich as Cæsar by the operation. Look upon the map that I have upon my desk here, and take the Mariposa grant in California. I cannot name the number of acres in it; but it is, I believe, largely within the amount of one hundred thousand acres; and that property has changed hands recently, and is now stocked for $10,000,000. There is not a silver mine upon it. It is but rich in its minerals to the extent that it contains gold, and mines of gold are always more precarious, more uncertain, and less continuous, as has been discovered by miners and by all experience, than mines of silver.

I submit it to the honorable Senator from New York, as well as to the Senate, that before anything further should be done with this bill, a very careful investigation should be made. I am not aware of the extent to which the committee from which this bill has come to the Senate have investigated the matter; but I think that from what I have said it will be seen that it is a very dangerous power to grant even with restrictions such as we might impose by amendments that might be offered and adopted to the bill. With this statement of the case and suggestion, I have done.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from California had had an opportunity to give a little closer attention to the provisions of this bill the line of his argument would have been changed. The bill expressly prohibits these heirs from locating their grant upon mineral lands. They are not allowed to go upon the mineral lands in New Mexico and locate upon them.

Again, sir, this square body of land which is the subject of this bill has been located within a year past. The location was on the 25th of June last. I will state further that it is not the heirs who make this application for a change of location, but it is the Government. The Government needs this land for its own purposes; and to show that this is so and that this is not a subject that has been acted upon without sufficient proof, I will read a paragraph or two from the letter of the surveyor general of New Mexico upon the subject. He says:

"By reference to the inclosed map of New Mexico, you will see that the Indian reserve covers the fifth location made by the heirs of Baca as above; but to disembarass the Government the heirs have signified (through their attorney, Judge Watts,) their willingness to remove this location, provided they shall be authorized to relocate the same under the same conditions, except as to time, provided in the original act of confirmation. The act now before Congress as above, authorizes this change of location, and gives them until 21st June, 1865, to make their new selection. This is little time enough, considering that it is unsafe now to move outside of the settlements in New Mexico without military protection. The justice and necessity of the act can, I think, but commend itself to your favorable consideration.

"The Navajo tribe of Indians, for whom with the Apaches the reserve on the Pecos is made, have consented to leave their country west of the Rio Grande, and remove with their flocks and herds to the Pecos. Already several thousands of them have reached their new home. The people of New Mexico are hopefully looking forward to the day when they shall have peace throughout their Territory, a condition of things not often nor for long periods enjoyed by that people."

It goes on further to state the importance of locating these Indians on this tract, with Fort Sumner as its center, where these Indians can be protected, and where the people can be protected against them.

Mr. CONNESS. I have but to say in conclusion that a statement from the surveyor general of New Mexico—whom I do not know—does not appear to me to be sufficient grounds upon which to pass this bill. It too often happens—I do not know that it is so in this case—that surveyor generals do not sufficiently consider the public interests. I hold in my hand, for instance, now, an article from a leading paper in San Francisco, going to show that a surveyor general of the United States in that State, a gentleman who has a very high reputation for ability and integrity, has absolutely, according to this statement, used his office to aid a few private parties in locating school land warrants upon nearly seven thousand acres of land within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco; that the knowledge that the land was surveyed as public land never was published by him until the parties entered the register's office at San Francisco with the warrants to locate the land. An act of this kind certainly shows that we should not rely upon the statement of a surveyor general.

But, sir, my purpose is not to embarrass the proceedings of the honorable Senator in asking for the passage of this bill, but to do my duty in making such suggestions as I think are due in the premises. I will say in conclusion, that in my opinion it will be very difficult indeed to locate one hundred thousand acres of land in a solid body in that Territory now, without including mineral lands within it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Richardson, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Davis, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, McDougall, and Powell—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—21.

So the bill was passed.

JURISDICTION OF FOREIGN CONSULS.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 487, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is somewhat important that it should be acted upon at once.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 487) to provide for the execution of treaties between the United States and foreign nations respecting consular jurisdiction over the crews of vessels of such foreign nations in the waters and ports of the United States.

In all cases where it may have been or shall hereafter be stipulated by treaty or convention between the United States and any foreign nation to the effect that the consul general, consuls, vice consuls, or consular or commercial agents of the two nations, respectively, shall have exclusive jurisdiction of controversies, difficulties, or disorders arising at sea or in the waters or ports of the one nation, between the master or other officer or officers and any of the crew, or between any of these last themselves, of any ship or vessel belonging to the other nation, such stipulations are to be executed and enforced within the jurisdiction of the United States, but before this act is to take effect as to the ships and vessels of any particular nation having such treaty with the United States, the President of the United States is to be satisfied that similar provisions have been made for the execution of such treaty by the other contracting party, and issue his proclamation to that effect, declaring this act to be in force as to such nation.

In all cases within the purview of this act the consul general, consul, or other consular or commercial authority of such foreign nation charged with the appropriate duty in the particular case, may make application to any court of record of the United States, or any judge, or to any commissioner appointed under the laws of the United States, to take bail or affidavits, or for other judicial purposes whatsoever, setting forth that such controversy, difficulty, or disorder has arisen, briefly stating the nature of it, and when and where it occurred, and exhibiting a certified copy or extract of the shipping articles, roll, or other proper paper of the ship or vessel, to the effect that the person in question is of the crew or ship's company of such ship or vessel; and further stating and certifying that such person has withdrawn himself, or is believed to be about to withdraw himself, from the control and discipline of the master and officers of the ship or vessel, or that he has refused, or is about to refuse, to submit to and obey the lawful jurisdiction of such consular or commercial authority in the premises; and further stating and certifying that, to the best of the knowledge and belief of the officer certifying, such person is not a citizen of the United States; and thereupon such judge, commissioner, or other judicial officer, on inspection of such application, the same being in writing and duly authenticated by the consular or other sufficient official seal, is to issue his warrant for the arrest of the person so complained of, directed to the marshal of the United States for the appropriate district, or in his discretion to any person, being a citizen of the United States, whom he may specially depute for the purpose, requiring such person to be brought before him for examination at a certain time and place; and if on such examination it shall be made to appear that the person so arrested is a citizen of the United States, he is to be forthwith discharged from arrest and left to the ordinary course of law. But if this shall not be made to appear, and such judge, commissioner, or other judicial authority shall find upon the papers heretofore referred to a sufficient prima facie case that the matter concerns only the internal order and discipline of such foreign ship or vessel, or, whether in its nature civil or criminal, does not affect directly the execution of the laws of the United States or the rights and duties of any citizen of the United States, he is forthwith, by his warrant, to commit such person to prison where prisoners under sentence of a court of the United States may be lawfully committed, or to the master or chief officer of such foreign ship or vessel, in his discretion, to be subject to the lawful orders, control, and discipline of the master or chief officer for the time being of such ship, and to the jurisdiction of the consular or commercial authority of the nation to which such ship or vessel may belong, to the exclusion of any authority or jurisdiction in the premises of the United States or any State. The expenses of the arrest and the detention of the person so arrested are to be paid by the consul general, consuls, or vice consuls; and no person is to be detained more than two months after his arrest, but at the end of that time is to be set at liberty, and is not again to be arrested for the same cause.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CENSUS IN 1865.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 45.

Mr. SUMNER. Is the Senator aware that there is a special order for one o'clock?

Mr. TRUMBULL. We can get through with this resolution by one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 45) in relation to the taking of a census in the year 1865. It provides that the Legislatures of the several States be requested to cause an enumeration of the inhabitants of such States and a census of their industrial interests on the 1st of June, 1865, to be taken upon the plan of the United States census, and to supply a copy of the original returns to the Census Office of the United States, at Washington.

The Secretary of the Interior is directed to prepare and forward to the Governors of such States as shall make provision for taking such enumeration and census the necessary schedules and instructions for that purpose.

The Secretary of the Interior is also directed to forward a copy of these resolutions to the Governor of each State, and to facilitate the object thereof in such manner as he may deem expedient.

The returns herein provided for may be transmitted through the mails free of charge, subject to such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I agreed to the reporting of this resolution; but two days since, when the matter was agitated, I understood the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] to declare distinctly that he was not satisfied with the resolution, and desired to have it looked into, and I understood him as being opposed to it. He has just stepped out of the Chamber, and I think it would perhaps be a surprise upon him if we were to pass it under these circumstances. In order to afford him an opportunity to be present when it is acted upon, although I do not wish to antagonize with the chairman of the committee, I will move that it be laid over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Chair will call for the order of the day, being House bill No. 51.

Mr. POWELL. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military or naval service of the United States, from interfering with elections in the States.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill which is the order of the day, being the bill from the House of Representatives to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs. It has been already awaiting the action of the Senate too long, and I hope it will not be postponed for anything else.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senate will take up the bill I have indicated. It is a bill of the utmost importance. It has been discussed pretty elaborately by the Senate, and I do not think it will take more than an hour or two to have action upon it. I do not think it is economizing time to take up bills and discuss them four or five days and then lay them aside without any action upon them. This bill concerns a matter of the very greatest moment and importance. The object of the bill is to protect and preserve the purity of the elective franchise. I hope that all prior orders may be postponed, and the bill may be taken up and proceeded with to-day. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Richardson, Van Winkle, and Willey—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—20.

So the motion to postpone the special order was not agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs. The select committee on slavery and freedmen reported the bill with an amendment to strike out of the bill all after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

That an office is hereby created in the Treasury Department to be called the Bureau of Freedmen, meaning thereby such persons as have become free since the beginning of the present war, under the care of a Commissioner, with an annual salary of $4,000, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and there shall be a chief clerk, acting also as disbursing officer, under bonds to the United States, with an annual salary of $2,000, and also such number of clerks, not exceeding two of each class, as shall be necessary, who shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall have authority, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to create departments of freedmen within the rebel States, so far as the same may be brought under the military power of the United States; and each department shall be under the supervision of an assistant commissioner, with an annual salary of $2,000, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and with authority to appoint local superintendents and clerks, so far as the same may be needed, at a compensation not exceeding the ordinary rate for similar services, subject, in all respects, to the approval of the Secretary.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the military commander within any department shall, on the application of the assistant commissioner thereof, supply all needful military support in the discharge of the duties of such assistant commissioner, unless there are controlling military reasons for withholding the same; and any military commander may be appointed assistant commissioner, without increase of salary.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several departments, and it shall be his duty especially to watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations, and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen, and generally, by careful regulations, in the spirit of the Constitution, to protect these persons in the enjoyment of their rights, to promote their welfare, and to secure to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners shall have authority, within their respective departments, to take possession of all abandoned real estate and all real estate, with the houses thereon, liable to sale or confiscation, or to any claim of title by the United States, and not already appropriated to Government uses; and also to take possession of all personal property found on such estate, and to rent or lease all such real estate, or any part thereof, with the personal property thereon, and to act as inspectors of the same; or in case no proper lessees can be found, then to cause the same to be cultivated or occupied by the freedmen, on such terms, in either case, and under such regulations, as the Commissioner may determine: Provided, That no freedmen shall be held to service on any estate above mentioned, otherwise than according to voluntary contract reduced to writing and certified by the assistant commissioner or local superintendent, nor shall any such contract be for a longer period than twelve months.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners and local superintendents shall be ready, as advisory guardians, to aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages, or where they have rented plantations or small holdings, in the organization of their labor; that they shall take care that the freedmen do not suffer from ill-treatment or any failure of contract on the part of others, and that on their part they perform their duty in the premises; that they shall further do what they can as arbitrators, to reconcile and settle any differences in which freedmen may be involved whether among themselves or between themselves and other persons; and in case such differences are carried before any tribunal, civil or military, they shall appear as next friends of the freedmen, so far as to see that the case is fairly stated and heard. And in all such proceedings there shall be no disability or exclusion on account of color.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That leases heretofore made by the supervising special agents of the Treasury Department, under the authority of the General Order 331, of the Secretary of War, dated October 9, 1863, and in accordance with the regulations of the Treasury Department, shall have the same effect as if made by assistant commissioners under this act; and such agents shall have the same powers in the premises as are given herein to assistant commissioners: Provided, That no lease shall be made by them for a longer period than one year, and that immediately upon the organization of any department of freedmen, such agents shall cease to execute their functions within such department, and shall deliver over to the assistant commissioner thereof all property and papers held by them as agents. But all expenses necessarily incurred by such agents in any department, prior to its organization under this act, shall be defrayed by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in his hands arising from the leases made by such agents.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall apply the proceeds arising from leases in the several departments to pay the salaries and other expenses under this act, so that the bureau herein established may become at an early day self supporting; and any proceeds over and above the annual expense thereof shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of all officers, civil and military, charged with the execution of any law, proclamation, or military order of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen, not mustered into, nor regularly engaged in the military service, to make return to the Commissioner of all their proceedings in execution thereof, under such regulations as shall from time to time be prescribed.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, before the commencement of each session of Congress, make full report of his proceedings to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall communicate the same to Congress. And the assistant commissioners shall make quarterly reports of their proceedings to the Commissioner, and also such other special reports as from time to time may be required.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the Senate only a short time ago was engaged for a week in considering how to open an iron way from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It is now to consider how to open a way from slavery to freedom.

I regret much that only thus tardily we have been able to take up the bill for a Bureau of Freedmen. But I trust that nothing will interfere with its consideration now. In what I have to say, I shall confine myself to a simple statement. If I differ from others I beg to be understood that it is in no spirit of controversy, and with no pride of opinion. Nothing of this kind can enter justly into any such discussion.

I shall not detain the Senate to expose the importance of this measure. All must confess it at a glance. It is at once a charity and a duty.

By virtue of existing acts of Congress, and also under the proclamation of the President, large numbers of slaves have suddenly become free. These may now be counted by the hundred thousand. In the progress of victory they will be counted by the million.

As they derive their freedom from the United States, under legislative or executive acts, the national Government cannot be excused from making such provisions as may be required for their immediate protection and welfare during the present transition period. The freedom that has been conferred must be rendered useful, or at least saved from being a burden. Reports, official and unofficial, show the necessity of action. In some places it is a question of life and death.

It would be superfluous to quote at length from these reports, which all testify alike, whether from Louisiana, South Carolina, Fortress Monroe, Vicksburg, Tennessee, Arkansas. I know not where the call is most urgent. It is urgent everywhere; and in some places it is the voice of distress.

Wherever our arms have prevailed the old social system has been destroyed. Masters have fled, and slaves have assumed a new character. Released from their former obligations, and often adrift in the world, they naturally look to the prevailing power. Here, for instance, is testimony which I take from an excellent report made in the department of Tennessee, under date of April 29, 1863:

"Negroes, in accordance with the acts of Congress, free on coming within our lines, circulated much like water; the task was to care for and render useful."

"They rolled like odds around military posts; many of the men employed in accordance with Order No. 72, district West Tennessee; women and children largely doing nothing but eating and idling, the dupes of vice and crime, the unsuspecting sources of disease."

From this statement Senators may form an idea of the numbers who seek assistance.

But the question is often asked as to the disposition of these persons to labor. Here, also, the testimony is explicit. I have in my hand the answers from different stations on this point.

"Question. 'What of their disposition to labor?'"

"Answer, Corinth. 'So far as I have tested it, better than I expected; willing to work for money, except in waiting on the sick. One hundred and fifty hands gathered five hundred acres of cotton in less than three weeks, much of which time was bad weather. The owner admitted that it was done more quickly than it could have been done with slaves. When detailed for service, they generally remained till honorably discharged, even when badly treated. I am well satisfied, from careful calculations, that the contrabands of this camp and district have netted the Government, over and above all their expenses, including rations, tents, &c., at least $3,000 per month, independent of what the women do and all the property brought through our lines from the rebels.'"

"Cairo. 'Willing to labor when they can have proper motives.'"

"Grand Junction. 'Have manifested considerable disposition to escape labor, having had no sufficient motives to work.'"

"Holly Springs and Memphis. 'With few exceptions, generally willing, even without pay. Paid regularly, they are much more prompt.'"

"Memphis. 'Among men, better than among women. Hold out to them the inducements, benefit to themselves and friends, essential to the industry of any race, and they would at once be diligent and industrious.'"

"Bolivar. 'Generally good; would be improved by the idea of pay.'"

Here, also, is a glimpse at Newbern, North Carolina, under date of February 26, 1864:

"Immediately on my return here, on the 12th of October, I instituted measures for placing the different abandoned plantations within our lines in this State under proper management and cultivation. As soon as it became known that as supervising Treasury agent I had charge of this property, I was visited by hundreds (and I might correctly say thousands) of contrabands, along with numerous white persons, desiring to obtain privileges to work upon the same."

And here is the testimony of General Banks, in Louisiana:

"Wherever in the department they have been well treated and reasonably compensated, they have invariably rendered faithful service to their employers. From many persons who manage plantations I have received the information that there is no difficulty whatever in keeping them at work if the conditions to which I have referred are complied with."

I do not quote further, for it would simply take time. But I cannot forbear from adding that the report from the commission on freedmen, appointed by the Secretary of War, accumulates ample testimony on this head, all showing that the freedmen are anxious to find employment. But your Treasury testifies to their productive power, for it contains at this moment more than a million dollars which have come from the sweat of freedmen.

It is evident, then, that the freedmen are not idlers. They desire work. But in their helpless condition they have not the ability to obtain it without assistance. They are alone, friendless, and uninformed. The curse of slavery is still upon them. Somebody must take them by the hand; not to support them, but simply to help them to that work which will support them. Thus far private societies in different parts of the country, at the East and the West—especially at all the principal centers—have done much toward this charity. But private societies are inadequate to the duties required. The intervention of the national Government is necessary. Without such intervention, many of these poor people, freed by our acts in the exercise of a military necessity, will be left to perish.

The service required is too vast and complex for unorganized individuals. It must proceed from the national Government. This alone can supply the adequate machinery, and extend the proper network of assistance, with that unity of operation which is required. The national Government must interfere in this case precisely as in building the Pacific railroad. Private charity in our country is active and generous, but it is powerless to cope with the evils arising from a wicked institution; nor can it provide a remedy where society itself has been overthrown.

There are few who will not admit that something must be done by the Government. Cold must be that heart which could turn away from this call. But whatever is done must be through some designated agency, and this brings me to another aspect of the question.

The President in his proclamation of emancipation has used the following language: "I recommend to them"—that is, to the freedmen—"that in all cases, when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages." Such is the recommendation from that supreme authority which decreed emancipation. They are to labor, and for reasonable wages. But the President does not undertake to say how this opportunity shall be obtained; how the laborer shall be brought in connection with the land; how his rights shall be protected; and how his new-found liberty shall be made a blessing. It was enough, perhaps, on the occasion of the proclamation that the suggestion should be made. Faithful labor and reasonable wages! Let these be secured, and everything else will follow. But how shall these be secured?

Different subjects as they become important are committed to the care of special bureaus. I need only refer to patents, agriculture, public lands, pensions, and Indian affairs, each under the charge of a separate Commissioner. Clearly the time has come for a Bureau of Freedmen. In speaking of a Bureau of Freedmen, I mean a bureau which will be confined in its operations to the affairs of freedmen, and not travel beyond this increasing class to embrace others, it may be of African descent. Our present necessity is to help those who have been made free by the present war; and the term freedmen describes sufficiently those who have once been slaves; and it is this class which we propose to help during the transition period from slavery to freedom. Call it charity or duty, it is sacred as humanity.

But here a practical question arises with regard to the Department in which this bureau shall be placed. There are reasons for placing it in the War Department—at least during the continuance of the war. There are other reasons for placing it in the Department of the Interior, which has charge of the public lands, Indian affairs, pensions, and patents. But whatever may be the reasons on general grounds for placing it in one of these two Departments, there are other reasons, of special importance at this moment, which point to the Treasury Department. Indeed, after careful consideration, the committee were satisfied that it was so clearly associated with other interests already intrusted to this Department, that it could not be advantageously administered elsewhere. Although beginning this inquiry with a conviction in favor of the War Department, I could not resist the conclusion of the committee.

Look, for one moment, at the class of duties already imposed upon the Treasury Department in connection with the very homes of these freedmen.

Congress has, by special acts, conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury extraordinary powers with regard to trade in the rebel States. There was, first, the act of July 13, 1861, entitled "further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and other purposes," which declared that commercial intercourse with any State or part of a State in rebellion, when licensed by the President, "shall be conducted and carried on only in pursuance of rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury." And it is further provided that "The Secretary of the Treasury may appoint such officers at places where officers of the customs are not now authorized by law, as may be needed to carry into effect such licenses, rules, and regulations."—Statutes at Large, vol. 12, p. 257.

There is another act of Congress, approved July 13, 1862, supplementary to the latter act, which confers additional powers upon the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to trade with "any place in the possession or under the control of insurgents against the United States."

There is also the act of June 7, 1862, entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes." In this act it is provided (section nine) that where the board of commissioners shall be satisfied that the owners of lands "have left the same to join the rebel forces, or otherwise to engage in and abet this rebellion, and the same shall have been struck off to the United States at said sale, the said commissioners shall, in the name of the United States, enter upon and take possession of the same, and may lease the same, together or in parcels, to any person or persons who are citizens of the United States;" and (section ten) the commissioners "shall from time to time make such temporary rules and regulations and insert such clauses in said leases as shall be just and proper to secure employment and support, at wages or upon shares of the crop, of such persons and families as may be residing upon the said parcels or lots of land, which said rules and regulations are declared to be subject to the approval of the President." (Statutes at Large, volume twelve, page 424.) The execution of this act is lodged in the Treasury Department.

Then comes the act of Congress, approved March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States." Under this act the Secretary was authorized "to appoint a special agent or agents to receive and collect all abandoned or captured property in any State or Territory, or any portion of any State or Territory of the United States, designated as in insurrection against the lawful Government of the United States." The act proceeds with details on the subject.

Such are the powers conferred by Congress upon the Treasury Department concerning trade and abandoned property in the rebel States.

These were followed by a general order from the War Department, as follows:

[General Orders, No. 33.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, October 9, 1863.

The President orders:

1. All houses, tenements, lands, and plantations, except such as may be required for military purposes, which have been or may be deserted and abandoned by insurgents within the lines of the military occupation of the United States forces in States declared by proclamation of the President to be in insurrection, will hereafter be under the supervision and control of the supervising special agents of the Treasury Department.

2. All commanders of military departments, districts, and posts will, upon receipt of this order, surrender and turn over to the proper supervising special agent such houses, tenements, lands, and plantations not required for military uses as may be in their possession or under their control; and all officers of the Army of the United States will at all times render to the agents appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury all such aid as may be necessary to enable them to obtain possession of such houses, tenements, lands, and plantations, and to maintain their authority over the same.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

By this order, as it appears, the Treasury Department has been substituted to the War Department in jurisdiction over "houses, tenements, lands, and plantations deserted and abandoned by insurgents within the lines of military occupation." This is broad, but it is positive.

In pursuance of these acts of Congress, and of this order of the War Department, the Secretary of the Treasury has proceeded to appoint special agents and to establish a code of regulations. I have in my hands now a small volume, entitled "Commercial Intercourse with States Declared in Insurrection and the Collection of Abandoned and Captured Property," containing the statutes and also the departmental regulations on the subject. It appears that there is now an organization under the Secretary of the Treasury, and also a system, both of reasonable completeness, to carry out these purposes.

In determining where the Bureau of Freedmen should be placed it becomes important to consider the interests which it is proposed to guard; and this brings me to another aspect of the question.

Looking at the freedmen, whose welfare is in question, we shall find that their labor may be classified under two different heads: first, military; and secondly, predial, or relating to farms. There will be still other laborers, including especially mechanics; but these will be chiefly in the towns. The large mass will be included in the two classes I have named. It is, therefore, these two classes that are to be particularly considered.

1. The first class is already provided for. It appears that one hundred thousand freedmen are already engaged in the military service as soldiers or laborers. Others will continue to be engaged in this way. These are all naturally and logically under the charge of the War Department; nor do they need the superintendence of the proposed bureau. The act of Congress equalizing their condition in the Army of the United States is better for them than any bureau.

2. But there will remain the other larger class, consisting in the main of women and children and farm laborers, who must find employment on the abandoned lands. To this labor they are accustomed. These lands are their natural home. But this class must naturally and logically come under the charge of the Department which has charge of the abandoned lands. Conceding that all in the military service fall under the superintendence of the War Department, it follows with equal reason that all who labor on the lands must fall under the superintendence of the Treasury Department, so long, at least, as this Department has charge of the lands.

This conclusion seems so reasonable that your committee were not able to resist it. But the testimony of persons who have given particular attention to the question is explicit also, so that experience is in harmony with reason. I have in my hands a letter from Colonel McKaye, an eminent citizen of New York, and also a member of the commission to inquire and report on this subject, appointed by the Secretary of War. After visiting South Carolina and Louisiana, expressly to study the necessities of freedmen, and to ascertain what could be done to benefit them, he thus expresses himself:

"In the first place, everybody who has had any practical experience of the working of the plantations or of the superintendence of negro labor will tell you that the control of the abandoned plantations and the care of the colored people must be in the same hands."

You will not fail to observe how positive this expert speaks. According to him all who have had "practical experience" insist that the care of the freedmen and of the plantation should be "in the same hands;" and so important does he regard this point that he names it first of all—"in the first place."

But Colonel McKaye is not alone. Here is a letter from Hon. Robert Dale Owen, chairman of the Commission on Freedmen, appointed by the Secretary of War, which testifies as follows:

"It will never do to have Treasury agents who lease the lands to white men and War Department agents who assign the same lands to colored people. Nothing but confusion and conflict of authority can result. It will not work at all. But even if it would, why employ two sets of agents to do what one set can do much better? And who is to inspect the leased plantations and see to it that neither employers nor employed are wronged? The men who gave the leases? But they are Treasury agents, and have nothing to do with freedmen. Or the freedmen's commissioners? But what authority can they have over men who do not hold their leases from them? The men who have the care of the laborer ought to have the leasing of the land and the inspection of the leases; and they should be authorized to lease equally to white and to colored people."

Such a statement is an argument.

This conclusion has the support also of General Banks, in a letter addressed to one of the Freedmen's Commission. Here are his words:

"The assignment of the abandoned or forfeited plantations to one Department of the Government, and the protection and support of the emancipated people to another, is a fundamental error productive of incalculable evils, and cannot be too soon or too thoroughly corrected."

The able and elaborate report from the Freedmen's Commission, just published, considers this question carefully. Nothing could be more explicit than the following testimony:

"But in the judgment of the commission the most serious error in connection with the present arrangements for the care and protection of these people arises out of the assignment to a different agency of the care and disposal of the abandoned plantations. To enter into the detail of all the evils and abuses that have arisen out of this error, and which are unav avoidable so long as it continues to exist, would occupy too great a space in this report. Suffice it to say that it is the source of the greatest confusion, and a perpetual collision between the different local authorities, in which not only the emancipated population, but the Government itself, suffers the most serious injuries and losses."

"And this is the purport of all the testimony which the commission has been able to obtain, not in the department of the Gulf only, but everywhere in relation to this matter."

"The unhesitating judgment of every person, official or other, not interested in the opportunities it affords for speculation, with whom we have consulted, coincides with that of General Banks. All without exception declare that no system can avail to effect the great objects contemplated that does not assign to one and the same authority the care and disposal of the abandoned plantations, and the care and protection of the emancipated laborers who are to cultivate them."

"And after the most thorough investigations I am authorized in saying that this is the deliberate judgment of the Commission."

It was on this ground of reason, and yielding to the influence of such authoritative opinions, that the committee were led to believe that there was no alternative on this practical question.

In the course of their inquiries the committee sought the opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury. With the heavy burdens of his Department resting on his shoulders, he does not desire any additional labor, but he does not conceal his conviction that the care of the freedmen must for the present be associated with the care of the lands. He would be glad to be relieved of all the responsibilities connected with the subject; but he hopes that it will not be divided between two different Departments. In that event it is feared that there will be little good from either.

I have dwelt with some minuteness on this question, because it seems to be the practical point on which there may be a difference of opinion. Already gentlemen have taken sides, and newspapers also. I regret this difference; but I trust that a calm and dispassionate consideration of the subject will render it innocuous. The first thought of all should be the cause.

There is another question which ought not to be passed over in silence, arising out of the desire to protect the freedmen from any system of serfdom or enforced apprenticeship. It is well known that among the former slave-masters there are many who continue to count upon appropriating the labor of their slaves, if not under the name of slavery, at least under some other system by which the freedmen shall be effectually bound to service. This very phrase "bound to service," standing alone, is the pleonastic definition of slavery itself. One of these slave-masters in a public speech said, "There is really no difference, in my opinion, whether we hold them as absolute slaves or obtain their labor by some other method. Of course we prefer the old method, but that question is not now before us." Such barefaced avowals were not needed to put humane men on their guard against the conspiracy to continue slavery under another name.

The bill now before the Senate provides against any such possibility by requiring, first, that the assistant commissioners and local superintendents shall not only aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages, but that they shall take care that the freedmen do not suffer from ill-treatment or any failure of contract on the part of others; and secondly, that the contracts for service shall be limited to a year. The latter provision is so important that I give it precisely:

"Provided, That no freedmen shall be held to service on any estate above mentioned otherwise than according to voluntary contract, reduced to writing, and certified by the assistant commissioner or local superintendent; nor shall any such contract be for a longer period than twelve months."

Here is a safeguard against serfdom or enforced apprenticeship which seemed to your committee of especial value. In this respect the House bill was thought to be fatally defective, inasmuch as it interposed no positive safeguards.

I do not know how extensive the desire may be to set slavery again on its feet under another name. But when we take into consideration the selfish tendencies of the world, the disposition of the strong to appropriate the labor of the weak, and the reluctance of slave-masters to renounce their habitual power, I have felt that Congress would not do its duty on this occasion if it did not by special provision guard against any such outrage. There must be no slavery under another alias. This terrible wrong must not be allowed to skulk in serfdom or compulsory labor. "Once free, always free:" such is the maxim of justice and of jurisprudence. But any system by which the freedmen may be annexed to the soil, adscripti glebe, will be in direct conflict with their newly acquired rights. They can be properly bound only by contract; and considering how easily they may be induced to enter into engagements ignorantly or heedlessly, and thus become the legal victims of designing men, it is evident that no precautions in their behalf can be too great.

It is well known that in some of the British West Indies an attempt was made, at the period of emancipation, to establish a system of apprenticeship which should be an intermediate condition between slavery and freedom. But the experiment failed. In some of the islands it was abandoned by the planters themselves, who frankly accepted emancipation outright. And in all it finally fell, blasted by the eloquence of Brougham. Here is a passage from one of his speeches:

"They who always dreaded emancipation, who were alarmed at the prospect of negro indolence, who stood aghast at the vision of negro rebellion should the chains cease to rattle, or the lash to resound through the air, gathering no wisdom from the past, still persist in affrighting themselves and scaring you with imaginary apprehensions from the transition to entire freedom out of the present intermediate state. But that intermediate state is the very source of all their real danger; and I dispute not its magnitude from myself. You have gone too far if you stop here and go no further; you are in imminent hazard if, leaving loosened the fetters, you do not strike them off; if, leaving them ineffectual to restrain, you let them remain to galling and to irritate and to goad. Beware of that state yet more unnatural than slavery itself, liberty bestowed by halves."—Third Series Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, volume 40, p. 1312.

"I have demonstrated to you that everything is ordered, every previous step taken, all safe, by experience shown to be safe for the long-desired consummation. The time has come, the trial has been made, the hour is striking; you have no longer a pretext for hesitation or faltering or delay. The slave has shown by four years' blameless behavior and devotion to the pursuits of peaceful industry that he is as fit for his freedom as any English peasant, ay, or any lord whom I now address. I demand his rights; I demand his liberty without stint; in the name of justice and of law, in the name of reason, in the name of God, who has given you no right to work injustice."—Ibid., p. 1314.

But surely there is no need of eloquence or persuasion to induce you to set your faces like flint against any such half-way system. Freedom that has been declared must be secured completely, so that it may not fail through any pretension or fraud of wicked men. The least that can be done is what is proposed by your committee.

Much more might be said on the whole subject; but I forbear. I have opened to consideration the two principal questions. If the Senate agree with the committee, first, on the importance of keeping the superintendence of the freedmen and of the lands in the same hands, so as to avoid local conflict and discord, and, secondly, in the importance of providing surely against any system of serfdom or adscription to the soil, the bill of the committee must be adopted.

For the sake of plainness, I ask your attention to the main features of this bill, under the following heads:

1. It provides exclusively for freedmen, meaning thereby "such persons as were once slaves," without undertaking to embrace persons generally of African descent.

2. It seeks to secure to such freedmen the opportunity of labor on those lands which are natural and congenial to them, and on this account it places the superintendence of the freedmen in the Department which has the superintendence of the lands.

3. It provides positively against any system of enforced labor or apprenticeship, by requiring contracts between the freedmen and their employers to be carefully attested before the local officers.

4. It establishes a careful machinery for the purposes of the bill, both as regards the freedmen and as regards the lands.

But the bill may be seen not only in what it does, but also in what it avoids doing. It does not undertake too much. It does not assume to provide ways and means for the support of the freedmen; but it does look to securing them the opportunities of labor according to well-guarded contracts, and under the friendly advice of agents of the Government, who shall take care that they are protected against abuse of all kinds. It is the declared duty of these agents "to protect these persons in the enjoyment of their rights, to promote their welfare, and to secure to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty." Under these comprehensive words all that is proper and constitutional will be authorized for their welfare and security, while liberty and labor will be made to go hand in hand. Thus far in the sad history of this people Labor has been compelled by Slavery. But the case at last will be reversed. It will be Liberty that will conduct the freedman to the fields, protect him in his toil, and secure to him all its fruits.

In closing what I have to say on this subject, allow me to read the official testimony of the Commission on Freedmen, appointed by the Secretary of War, in their recent report on this subject:

"We need a freedmen's bureau, not because these people are negroes, but because they are men who have been for generations despoiled of their rights. The commission has heretofore, to wit, in a supplemental report made to you in December last, recommended, to effect the above objects, the establishment of such a bureau; and they believe that all that is essential to its proper organization is contained, substantially, in a bill to that effect, reported on April 12, from the Senate committee on slavery and freedmen."

This is the bill which is now under consideration.

It will be for the Senate to determine, under the circumstances, what it will do. My earnest hope is that it will do something. The opportunity must not be lost of helping so many persons who are now helpless, and of aiding the cause of reconciliation, without which peace cannot be assured. In this spirit I leave the whole subject to the good judgment of the Senate. If anything better than the work of the committee can be found I hope that it will be adopted; but meanwhile I ask you to accept that which is now offered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will allow me to perfect the bill. There are a few amendments that I wish to make.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. In section one, line five, after the word "have" I move to strike out the words "become free since the beginning of the present war," and to insert instead "once been slaves;" so that it will read:

That an office is hereby created in the Treasury Department to be called the Bureau of Freedmen, meaning thereby such persons as have once been slaves, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. In section one, line ten, I move to strike out the word "bonds" and to insert the word "bond," making it singular instead of plural.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) That amendment will be made.

Mr. SUMNER. After the words "United States," in the same line, I move to insert the words "for the faithful discharge of his duties."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. In line thirteen of the same section I move to strike out the word "who" and insert the words "all of whom."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a clerical amendment, and will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. In section two, line seven, after the word "dollars" I move to insert the words "under bond, as required for the chief clerk."

Mr. GRIMES. How will it read then?

Mr. SUMNER. "And each department shall be under the supervision of an assistant commissioner with an annual salary of $2,000 under bond, as required for the chief clerk."

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what the amount of the bond to be given is. He is to give a bond similar to the chief clerk. What is that?

Mr. SUMNER. It is understood that the amount of the bond is to be regulated by the Department. The committee did not think it worth while to go into that detail. It is sufficient to require the bond, leaving to the Department to regulate the amount in the rules that it may establish.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. In section five, line seven, after the words "found on" I move to insert the words "and belonging to," so that it will read:

And also to take possession of all personal property found on and belonging to such estate.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. In line nine of the same section I move to strike out "thereon" and to insert "aforesaid."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. In section six, line two, I move to strike out the words "be ready" and to insert the word "act;" so that it will read:

That the assistant commissioners and local superintendents shall act as advisory guardians, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. In line five of the same section I move to strike out the word "organization" and to insert "application."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. In line eight of the same section I move to strike out the words "in the premises" and to insert the words "under any contract entered into by them."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, I am opposed to both the bill and the amendment—

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have this bill go over until one o'clock to-morrow for the purpose of taking up a bill relating to the military service, in regard to which we have a special message from the President. Would the Senator just as soon speak to-morrow?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. I will ask my colleague first whether it would not be better to allow this bill to go on for an hour and take up the message an hour later.

Mr. WILSON. Then we should not be able to pass it to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. I will ask my colleague if the bill that he proposes to take up will occupy much time.

Mr. WILSON. That I cannot tell. The bill that I propose to take up is the bill introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN] in regard to the commutation for military service. The President has sent us a special letter on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator submit a motion?

Mr. WILSON. As I suppose this bill will take a few hours, at any rate, I think we ought to attend to the other measure at once. I do not wish to interrupt the consideration of this bill, although I intended, if this matter had not come in, to have moved some amendments to the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not aware that there is to be any debate about it. Indeed I was not prepared to expect any extended debate on this question. I thought Senators might differ on some practical questions, but I have had no reason to suppose that there would be any extended debate upon it occupying time. I am in the hands of my colleague on this question. He knows that I do not wish to put any impediment in the way of such a proposition as he intimates, if it is one which grows out of the exigencies of the hour.

But the question now under consideration is one of vast importance, which has its own exigencies. It has already been too long postponed, and I humbly submit that the Senate ought to reach some conclusion upon it.

Mr. WILSON. Well, I will allow it to go on for an hour or two.

Mr. RICHARDSON. So far as the intimation comes from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that this bill must be passed speedily, I will only say that it will not pass the Senate without full and thorough discussion, so far as I am concerned.

I was about stating, Mr. President, when interrupted, that I was opposed to both the amendment and the original bill. The issue, as I think, is now fairly presented, whether we shall by law of Congress make the white people of this country support the colored. The Senator from Massachusetts presents an extraordinary position in relation to this subject. But a few days ago he was urging us to confer upon these freedmen the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia and in the Territories. He is here to-day urging us to extend to them charity and support, confessing in his argument, as is confessed both in the bill and the amendment, that they are incapable of taking care of themselves. The Senator during the progress of his remarks said that they presented this extraordinary condition in the States where our armies had advanced: the masters had fled from their plantations, leaving their slaves; that the slaves thus abandoned cannot support themselves; and he calls upon us now to establish a bureau to take charge of and protect those slaves upon whom on other occasions he seeks to confer the right of suffrage.

But I said that the bill and the amendment to the bill confess before the country that this population is incapable of taking care of themselves and that provision is made in both measures to take care of them. This is the provision in the original bill:

And the said Commissioner, and by his direction the said Assistant Commissioners, shall have power to permit persons of African descent—

Mr. SUMNER. That is the House bill; not the Senate bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say it is in both bills. I shall explain my meaning very fully to the Senator before I get through. I repeat it is in both bills; the provision in the House bill is in these words:

And the said Commissioner, and by his direction the said Assistant Commissioners, shall have power to permit persons of African descent, and persons who are or shall have become free, as aforesaid, under such rules and regulations as may be from time to time prescribed by said Commissioner and approved by the Secretary of War, to occupy, cultivate, and improve all lands lying within those districts now or heretofore in rebellion, which lands may have been or may hereafter be abandoned by their former owners, and all real estate within such districts to which the United States shall have acquired title, and which shall not have been previously appropriated by the Government to other uses, and to advise and aid them, when needful, to organize and direct their labor, adjust with them their wages, &c.

In the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts it is as follows:

That the Assistant Commissioners and local superintendents shall be ready, as advisory guardians, to aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages, or, where they have rented plantations or small holdings, in the organization of their labor; that they shall take care that the freedmen do not suffer from ill-treatment or any failure of contract on the part of others, and that on their part they perform their duty in the premises; that they shall further do what they can as arbitrators, to reconcile and settle any differences in which freedmen may be involved whether among themselves or between themselves and other persons; and in case such differences are carried before any tribunal, civil or military, they shall appear as next friends of the freedmen, so far as to see that the case is fairly stated and heard. And in all such proceedings there shall be no disability or exclusion on account of color.

So that both the bill and the amendment make the broad statement to the country that these people are incapable of taking care of themselves, and that is urged as a reason why this bureau shall be organized, that we may take care of them. But, sir, the idea now sought to be carried out and consummated by this bill, to make war for, to feed, to clothe, to protect and care for the negro, to give him advantages that the white race do not receive or claim, is one that has characterized the legislation of Congress and all the acts of the President and his Cabinet for the past three years. The negro has been fed and clothed at the public expense. In the amnesty proclamation of the President of the United States, sent to Congress with his message at the beginning of this session, we have this declaration:

"The persons excepted from the benefits of the foregoing provisions are, all who are, or shall have been, civil or diplomatic officers or agents of the so-called confederate government; all who have left judicial stations under the United States to aid the rebellion; all who are or shall have been military or naval officers of said so-called confederate government, above the rank of colonel in the army or of lieutenant in the navy; all who left seats in the United States Congress to aid the rebellion; all who resigned commissions in the Army or Navy of the United States and afterwards aided the rebellion; and all who have engaged in any way in treating colored persons, or white persons in charge of such, otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war, and which persons may have been found in the United States service as soldiers, seamen, or in any other capacity."

He will forgive any person who has treated the white soldiers of the United States in any other manner than as prisoners of war; but if they treat the black soldiers in any other way he will not forgive them. Why is this so? Is not the crime as great if they kill, when captured; white soldiers as black ones? And yet the President of the United States says, "I will forgive you for the one, but I will not forgive you for the other. You may commit murder, rape, violate the usages of civilized warfare upon the whites; I will forgive that; but touch the negro and you shall not be forgiven."

Mr. President, this exclusive regard for the interests of the negro is not only true in reference to the President of the United States, but it is true in reference to Congress. How many applications have been made here to investigate cases where white men have been, in violation of law, imprisoned, which, by a party vote, have been laid on your table, and all investigation stifled? What was the vote of the Senate when a negro was turned out of one of the street cars in this city? By that same vote that you laid those inquiries in reference to white men on your table, you caused one of the committees of this body to investigate the facts, to ascertain whether a negro had been turned out of a street car or not. The white man can be imprisoned, mobbed, or murdered—you do not care for that—but turn the negro from the cars, and you, with the speed of lightning, resist it.

The same doctrine that is laid down in the President's proclamation follows your action here, and not only here but everywhere else. Down in North Carolina, some little time ago, the rebels captured a portion of our troops who were natives of that State. They killed them. No investigation was ever had about them. No talk was ever had here about it. Nothing was ever said about it here. But, sir, when the rebels took Fort Pillow, and destroyed the negroes garrisoning that fort, you did not leave it to the military authority to inquire into the subject, but you sent a special committee in hot haste from here to inquire into all the facts. In the first instance it was the white man that was killed; you do not care about that, nor does the President; in the other it was the negro; you must send your committee to look after it, and the President, in a stump speech at Baltimore, tells the public that we must retaliate upon the rebels for the massacre of his beloved race at Fort Pillow; but is silent then, and at all other times, about the whites who were massacred in North Carolina.

I might extend the instances and exhaust the day. I have only alluded to these for the purpose of calling the attention of the country to the fact established by official records of the action of the Executive and of both branches of Congress. The negro must live and not toil. The white race must toil and fight to free him, to feed and clothe him. To consummate this is the aim and purpose of Mr. Lincoln and his followers. He and they have no ambition beyond this.

But, Mr. President, the Senator during the progress of his remarks congratulated the country that the black soldiers had been placed on terms of equality with the white, and we are told here and elsewhere, day by day, that they are as good soldiers as our white soldiers; that they are being employed for the purpose of fighting our battles. Sir, I deny it. It is not true in point of fact. Will the Senator from Massachusetts tell me where they, with a single exception, have borne the stars and stripes of the country in the storm of battle?

Mr. SUMNER. Which is the single exception?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Port Hudson. Do you remember any other?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator forgets Fort Wagner, where Colonel Shaw, of the Massachusetts fifty-fourth, fell on the very heights of the fort, and his dead body was covered by the dead bodies of his colored soldiers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am glad the Senator has corrected me. I want to do full justice to all men. The negro was not called into the service to fight battles, but to do garrison duty. The President of the United States, in his proclamation of January 1, 1863, tells us what he is going to do with the colored soldiers:

"And I do further declare and make known that such persons of suitable condition will be received into the armed service of the United States to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in such service."

Where are your negro soldiers with the army of the Potomac to-day? In the thirty days' fighting that has taken place, such as no country has ever seen upon the face of the earth, in what engagement have they been? They are in the rear garrisoning forts and positions that have been taken by the valor of white men.

There are, I am told, over seventy thousand negro troops in our Army. They are paid as much, fed and clothed as well as the white soldiers, and in this respect the equals of the whites, but in no other. Outside of forts they have fought twice, at most. In all other engagements where they have taken any part it has been inside of fortifications taken by white men's valor or made by white men's toil directed by white men's skill.

This talk about negroes fighting is a delusion and a myth. The President, the Commander-in-Chief of our Army and Navy, never intended and does not now intend that they shall do any other service in the Army except "to garrison forts, positions, and stations" which have been won by white men.

Mr. President, the continuance in office of Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet would insure the success of measures which place the black race above the white if mere laws passed by man could do so. God has made the negro inferior, and such laws cannot make him equal. I have watched the progress of things for a good while. You did not pass your bill here the other day to allow negroes to vote in this District. I was not astonished at the arguments that were made in opposition to it. You were told that elections were coming on, and if you conferred the right of suffrage upon the negroes in this District you would not be able to carry some of the States. That was the ground upon which some Senators on the other side opposed it, the ground of expediency, for the purpose of carrying popular elections. We may infer from the arguments which were made in opposition to that bill that as soon as the presidential election is over the right of suffrage will be conferred upon negroes everywhere. The Senator from Massachusetts will be able to carry his proposition next winter, if the people can be deceived to reelect Lincoln.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope this summer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You have no show in the world this summer. If you could carry that proposition now, you could not carry one of the northwestern States this fall. These gentlemen who are hanging behind now, who are with the rear guard, will be in the advance after awhile. If you are successful they will be with you and in the van. If we are successful they will lead us I say, therefore, the American people need not be deceived on this point unless they wish to be.

How is it, Mr. President, in regard to many of the generals in the Army? The instances are rare where a general agreeing with the President of the United States in his negro policies has been retired from active service, and in no instance has such a one been dismissed. As a general rule where a general in the field has agreed and proclaimed that the negro was his equal in all respects, and that the negro furnished and was the standard of loyalty and patriotism, no matter what faults or blunders he may have committed, no matter what disasters may have befallen our arms by his stupidity and ignorance, no matter what fields have been lost that should have been won, he has been sustained and promoted by the President. Take as instances Generals Banks, Butler, Schenck, and Milroy on the one side; Generals Buell, Fitz John Porter, Andrew Porter, and Keyes on the other. Banks, Butler, Schenck, and Milroy sung hosannas to the negro and lost fields; Buell, the Porters, and Keyes did not rely upon hallelujahs to the negro to beat the rebels; they relied upon courage, strategy, and war. The first class, except Schenck, command to-day; the second are out of the Army.

General Banks lost battles in Virginia that a general should have won; abandoned positions that could have been advantageously held by competent commanders. By his blunders and ignorance he has lost the Southwest, supplies, camp equipage, and munitions of war enough to enable Kirby Smith to maintain himself this year's campaign. He is still in command. He is sound on the negro policies of the President. He can pronounce the shibboleth, negro equality and loyalty, exactly right.

General Buell, an accomplished officer bred to arms, when, miles away from Pittsburg Landing saw and knew that our forces there under General Grant would be assailed by superior forces, hurried from Nashville to save Grant's gallant army, and reached the battle only in time to save the fortunes of the field and turn defeat into victory, as Dessaix saved Napoleon at the battle of Marengo. He fought and won the battle of Perryville. He lost no fields. He was not sound or was rather suspected of being unsound on the negro policies. He was retired from active command.

General Butler, at the outset of this war, in the preliminary engagements was a private in the ranks of Jeff. Davis. It is believed that his is the only instance in the world's history where a man commenced as a private on one side and rose to the rank of general on the other without fighting a single battle. Since his promotion he planned the battle of Big Bethel; it did not result advantageously to our arms. We have the authority of Governor Pierpont for saying that he has been more successful in getting silver fruit-baskets, spoons, the contents of banks, stores, &c., than he has been in winning fields. If one tenth that is charged against him is true he ought to be shot as a confirmed brigand, a highwayman. I suspect the fact to be that half of his crimes are concealed. He is still in command; he has risen upon the negro's credit. A short time ago it was thought his days were numbered. It was apparent to everybody that fighting was to be done that required both courage and skill. As Butler possessed neither of these it was thought General Smith would supersede him. Butler issued an order that the negroes on the boats running between Baltimore and Fortress Monroe should eat dinner at the same time and table as the whites. He was retained in command, and General Smith was placed under him. Butler was up to a few things; he is in favor of the President's policies; he can pronounce the shibboleth, negro superiority, exactly.

General Fitz John Porter has won many a hard-fought field. One of them has no parallel in history.

When General McClellan found he could get no support from here in his campaign against Richmond, not even thirty thousand men, though there were over one hundred thousand here and in the neighborhood, he commenced his retreat, fighting and falling back, bringing off his command, his munitions of war, and all that pertained to his army. The army reached Malvern Hill with Fitz John Porter in command of the rear. The rebels, confident of victory, assailed him with a force three to one. He repulsed them with great slaughter, gaining over them as complete a victory as has been won during the war. Porter, covering the retreat, displayed more ability and as much courage as Ney, Napoleon's brave marshal.

If Porter's fame rested on this battle alone it would carry his name down to the last syllable of recorded time. He is not now in the service. I will not proclaim the means by which he was dismissed the service, because it is not creditable to my country. He was supposed to be unsound upon the President's policies.

General Schenck's military fame rests upon the feat of dumping his men from a railroad car upon a battery at Vienna. His promotions were in consequence of soundness upon the President's proclamation. The President admired this so much that he agreed verbally to hold his commission as major general as an escrow, while Schenck served two years in Congress, and at the end of the time to hand it back to him.

General Milroy lost Winchester, with part of his command, ammunition, and supplies. But that did not matter; he was sound on the policies; he could pronounce shibboleth to suit Lincoln.

Andrew Porter and Keyes, although thorough soldiers, experienced officers, displaying on many fields their courage, skill, and science, are not trusted upon the policies.

This whole Government is being run to-day on the question of making all interest yield to that of the negro. If I were to bring a bill that would cost the Government the same amount this will for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the white soldiers who have been killed or died, I could not obtain for it over ten votes in this Senate. You will pass this, I fear. I wish we could defeat it. It is true the bill and amendment both, I believe, propose to pay over into the Treasury the residue of the money to be raised by leasing abandoned estates, &c. No dollar will ever go into the Treasury from this source, but every cent that freedmen want for food, for clothes, for every necessary of life, will be drawn from the Treasury as it is now. When the confiscation bill was passed there was a like provision in it. When the advocates of that measure were urging its passage, they said it would pay the interest on the national debt, and after a while pay the debt itself. The truth is, that all the sales of confiscated property do not now pay the expenses and never will. Each year millions are drawn from the Treasury to keep that in motion. But the Senator from Massachusetts tells us we must support these people by charity, and provides in the bill to pay the balance into the Treasury.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not said they should be supported. The Senator puts words into my mouth which I did not say. I said we owed to them care and protection during this transition period from slavery to liberty.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I accept what he says; but the Senator will permit me to call his attention to one remark in his speech, that this was "a great national charity." The Senator will remember that he used these words.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly. I said it was at once a charity and a duty.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Of course he thinks it a charity and a duty. Why the provision in the bill that the residue of the money is to be paid into the Treasury? It is to mislead the public mind. With your "charities and duties" in this direction you have brought us to bankruptcy, the nation to ruin, and our people once so happy and prosperous to toil and woe.

This "charity and duty" has united the South and divided the North. At the commencement of these difficulties we had, or thought we had, a large party in the South who were opposed to this rebellion. Mr. Lincoln notified us that there was a very large majority against secession. It was claimed that every State was devotedly attached to the Union except South Carolina. I believe that was true. Where are they now? This policy of yours has united them so completely that southern women are in the ranks, discharging the duties of soldiers, handling the musket and firing the cannon.

But still you say, let us go on. It does seem to me that, as reasonable men, we ought to stop, we should pause, we should hesitate. I am not often in the habit of thinking that anything Wendell Phillips says is either good or true; but he said the other day that for which any Democrat, if he had said it, he would have been confined in a fort. I cannot give his exact words—I quote from memory—but he said substantially that Jeff. Davis made a revolt, but Abraham Lincoln made a southern confederacy.

The reign of those who disregard all right does often receive the popular applause, but sooner or later even-handed justice deals to them the violence they have inflicted upon others.

The thought forces itself upon my mind often that all this effort to keep the negro before the public is for the purpose of attracting attention from the effort to overthrow liberty and establish despotism in this country. The wicked rebel and the negro, is the reply to any fear expressed that we shall lose our liberty in this contest.

Mr. President, in no country was liberty ever more menaced and endangered than it is in this country to-day. Like all countries in revolution, the people have conceded a little here and a little there on the ground of necessity until there is but little left. Cromwell in the revolution in England turned out the Parliament upon the plea of necessity. Napoleon when he ascended the throne of France with the bayonet drove the Assembly of France from its chamber. He permitted none to take their seats but those who supported him. A minority of that convention declared for him as emperor. The bayonet did the work.

Sir, what is our situation to-day? Where is trial by jury, your habeas corpus, your freedom of speech, your freedom of press, your liberty of conscience? Where are your free ballot, the first great birthright of Americans, and without which liberty cannot exist anywhere for a single moment? A few days ago certain newspapers in New York published a bogus proclamation, and they were suppressed by an order from Washington and the editors imprisoned.

Mr. JOHNSON. They were not imprisoned. They were ordered to be imprisoned, but Major General Dix did not do it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The order was given from here. Not only does the President and Cabinet imprison citizens who have committed no crime, but generals and colonels and second lieutenants who do not know the difference between Webster's spelling-book with the leaves all out and the leaves all in, and it is justified and sustained by the President. The only hope for liberty in this country is the defeat of Mr. Lincoln this fall.

Throughout the entire North to-day, in every congressional district, you have provost marshals. You have them in your country, too, sir; [to Mr. JOHNSON.] The provost marshals claim the right to try all cases that arise, criminal and civil. They doubtless have never heard that there was a provision in the Federal Constitution that the military should be subordinate to the civil authority. They are contesting with our courts whether they shall try any cases in the courts or not. That great right conferred by the Constitution of the United States, that no man shall be tried for his life or liberty unless upon due presentment by a grand jury, is gone. A lieutenant, who has never seen the inside of a law-book, who would not know what you meant if you told him that there was such a thing as liberty proclaimed in every article of the Federal Constitution, he would tell you, "Here is a military necessity."

I know it may be replied to me, as it has been, that these things are done in pursuance of a law passed by Congress. True it is so; but before you passed your law, before it had an existence you had your provost marshals in every district throughout the country. Civil liberty, the liberty of the citizen, was stricken down and it is gone. And now the gentleman from Massachusetts tells us that we must have universal freedom. Sir, I am in favor of freedom too; freedom for the white race.

Mr. President, I care not who administers this Government. The time has been when I felt anxious to elevate a statesman and friend to that position. That time has gone with me forever. Give me the man for President who will give me a free ballot, trial by jury, the freedom of speech, the liberty of the press, and the right of conscience, and I care not by what name you call him, nor who he is; but so help me God I will resist to the utmost of my power always the one who has stricken down all these great rights.

When the conscription bill authorizing the establishment of military courts was pending and under consideration in the Senate, I moved an amendment to limit its operation to one year. That amendment was adopted unanimously. It passed the House, as I believe. The committee of conference struck it out, as I suppose. At all events it is not in the bill now. The object and intention is to have military tribunals to take the place of courts. You intend to overthrow the judiciary and make a despotism. The machinery you have now in full operation. I do not believe that all or even half that voted for this bill are in favor of this, but the power is exercised by those who will do it. I repeat, then, I have no doubt that the Senator from Massachusetts will press and pass this bill. No matter what becomes of the white man; let him go; let him starve; let him fight your battles; send him to the front, and leave the negro behind; let his wife and children perish wherever they may be; but you must take care of the negro.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will permit me, I wish the negro to go to the front.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You said he would go.

Mr. SUMNER. I want us to allow him to go. He is anxious to go forward and perform military service. I want him to do it, and to save our fellow-citizens.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I know of no Senator and of no man in America who could do more to lead them to the front than the Senator himself, if he will go. I have no doubt if the Senator will go down to General Grant he can get at the head of those negroes, and if he will make one of his glowing speeches in favor of universal liberty and the black man's superiority, they will go with him to the front. I want them to go to the front, too; but, sir, they will not go. They will eat your rations and they will take your pay; they will guard your posts that do not need guarding; and that is all they will do.

Sir, I am opposed to this bill and all similar bills. The time has now come, when we must talk in reference to these things and talk plainly, and, for one, I intend to do so.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why not go on with it now?

Mr. WILSON. I want to pass another bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the question is put, I must say a word. This bill has been intrusted to me by a committee of this body. It is one which is watched with great interest by the public justly. Its prompt passage is required by the public interests. I think the Senate ought to make haste with it. If my colleague tells me there is other business which concerns the public interests, and which, in his judgment, is of higher importance than this bill, I shall yield; but I desire it to be distinctly understood that I take no responsibility for it. I do not consent to abandon this measure except in deference to his judgment as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. If he tells the Senate that within his knowledge there is business that ought to be attended to in preference to this, of course I shall yield.

Mr. WILSON. All I can say about it is simply this: the President of the United States has sent a message here to-day, which I believe has not been read, with a letter from the Secretary of War and a statement of the Provost Marshal General, urging the passage of the bill that is now pending before the Senate in order to raise men to reinforce our armies, and I think that any question for raising men to reinforce our armies is before any and all other questions in this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY.) It is moved that the bill before the Senate be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. And made the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Has it been made a special order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the motion before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is now unfinished business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to say one word. Every proposition to make a special order for the last two weeks has been resisted, and successfully resisted, I believe, by the majority, upon the ground that the public interests would not allow special orders at this stage of the session.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. Every proposition to make a special order during the morning hour, as the Senator will remember, has been resisted; but I am not aware that a proposition for a special order after the morning hour has been resisted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot say whether the Senator is certainly correct upon that or not. The argument has been made and objection urged that the condition of the public business of the Senate now as we are approaching the close of the session would not allow special orders to be made. Why is it that other bills are not allowed in view of the public interest to be made special orders, and this can be made so? This is a House bill. It has passed the other House; it is here; and if it goes back amended, of course it will receive the immediate consideration of that House. When it has been proposed that Senate bills that have never yet passed the House, and which must pass soon if they are to be considered in the House at all, shall be made special orders, the majority have voted it down. Certainly the interest that is peculiarly represented by the Senator from Massachusetts has occupied very much of the time of this session of Congress, and I cannot see that it is proper to make a special order upon this bill when it has been refused upon other bills.

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 12, nays 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires two thirds to make a special order, and it cannot be a vote.

Mr. WILSON. We must have the yeas and nays before the question can be decided, as there was no quorum on the division.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would modify his motion so as to postpone this bill until to-morrow. I am very anxious to get up in the morning hour to-morrow a joint resolution which has been before the Senate now for several days in the morning hour. I hope to conclude it in the morning hour; but if not, I do not wish to be precluded from having it considered after one o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. Let this bill be postponed, then, until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. HOWE. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. I am willing that it shall be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, as my colleague first moved.

Mr. HOWE. I take it there is no objection to that, and it is not necessary to call the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call will proceed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Fessenden, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Canfield, Davis, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Powell, and Richardson—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Colman, Cowan, Dixon, Foote, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Riddle, Sauts-bury, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wright—20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is agreed to, two thirds of the Senate concurring therein, and the further consideration of the bill is postponed to and made the special order of the day for to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. HOWE. The motion was not to make it a special order.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 286.

Mr. HOWE. Before that is done I wish to remind the Chair that that part of the motion which proposed to make this bill a special order was waived, and it is simply postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator is right. It was not specially assigned, but was postponed until one o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the question was put upon making it the special order; but with the consent of the Senate, that being the understanding of the Senate, the record will be made to conform to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There can be no question about the fact. The motion was modified and the bill was simply postponed until one o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no dispute about the fact, the Journal will be so made up.

Mr. WILSON. The whole Senate so understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be so corrected.

ARMY NEWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received the following dispatch, which will be read:

The Secretary read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON,
WEDNESDAY, June 8, 1864, 12 noon.

A dispatch from General Grant, dated yesterday afternoon, 3.05 p. m., reports: "All has been very quiet to-day. No casualties reported."

A dispatch from General Sherman, dated at Acworth yesterday evening, 6.30 p. m., says:

"I have been to Altoona Pass, and find it very admirable for our purpose. It is the gate through the last or most eastern spur of the Alleghenies. It now becomes as useful to us as it was to the enemy, being easily defended from either direction. The roads hence (from Acworth) into Georgia are large and good and the country more open."

Details of the position of our troops and contemplated movements are given, but are not needed for public information. The dispatch further states that "the enemy is not in our immediate front, but his signals are seen on Lost Mountain and Kenesaw."

Dispatches from General Canby, dated June 3, have been received, which report satisfactory progress in the organization of his command.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently laid before the Senate the following dispatch:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, June 8, 1.30 p. m.

A dispatch from Mr. Dana, at General Grant's headquarters, dated last night at 8.30 p. m., announces a victory by General Hunter over the rebels beyond Staunton, and that the rebel General Jones was killed on the battle-field. The dispatch is as follows:

"The Richmond Examiner of to-day speaks of the defeat of General W. E. Jones by General Hunter, twelve miles beyond Staunton, Virginia. General Jones was killed on the field. His successor retired to Waynesboro, and now holds the mountains between Charlottesville and Staunton. The paper further states that no hospitals or stores were captured by Hunter."

Another dispatch announces that our forces occupy Staunton. Hunter's victory and that our troops occupy Staunton is confirmed by the following dispatch just received from General Butler:

"All quiet on my line. Richmond papers of June 7 give intelligence of a fight at Mount Crawford between General Hunter and General Jones, in which Hunter was victorious, and Jones, rebel commander, was killed. Staunton was afterwards occupied by the Union forces. The fighting was on Sunday."

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

PERFORMANCE OF MILITARY DUTY.

Mr. WILSON. I renew my motion to take up Senate bill No. 286.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 286) to prohibit the discharge of persons from liability to military duty by reason of the payment of money.

It proposes to repeal so much of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, and the acts amendatory thereof, as authorizes the discharge of any drafted person from liability to military service by reason of the payment of $300 for the procuration of a substitute, or otherwise; but nothing contained in this act is to be construed to alter the provisions of existing laws relative to persons actually furnishing substitutes.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia reported the bill with an amendment, to add the following additional sections:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That nothing in the act approved February 24, 1864, amending the act approved March 3, 1863, for enrolling and calling out the national forces, shall be construed to repeal that part of the said act approved March 3, 1863, which requires that the board of enrollment, in making drafts, shall "make a draft of the required number and fifty per cent. in addition."

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That section twelve of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, be, and is hereby, so amended that the notice to be served on drafted men may be served within ten days after such draft or at any time within six months therefrom.

Mr. WILSON. Those sections are explanatory of two sections of the old act. I will allow the question to be taken on those amendments, and then I desire to move a further amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that there is some doubt about the construction of that act. The old law provided that there should be drafted fifty per cent. more than the number called for. It was not intended to change that provision; but there is some doubt of the construction of the law as it now stands, and this section is intended to put that right; to allow them where there is a call for one hundred men to draft one hundred and fifty, as under the old law, so that they may have a surplus of fifty. If the law is understood simply to require them to draft for the number called for, they will have to draft over and over again. If they were one short it would require a new draft.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on inserting the following as a new section:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That section twelve of the "Act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, be, and is hereby, so amended that the notice to be served on drafted men may be served within ten days after such draft or at any time within six months therefrom.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now offer an amendment which I propose shall come in as the second section of this bill:

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, on and after the passage of this act, to call out, for a period not exceeding one year, such number of men as the exigencies of the service may require by draft, according to the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," and the act, approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. WILSON. I now ask to have the message of the President and the letter of the Secretary of War and the communication from the Provost Marshal General read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will now lay before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying communication, will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to submit for the consideration of Congress a letter and inclosure from the Secretary of War, with my concurrence in the recommendation therein made.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 8, 1864.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, June 7, 1864.

Sir: I beg leave to submit to you a report made to me by the Provost Marshal General, showing the result of the draft now going on to fill the deficiency in the quotas of certain States, and recommending a repeal of the clause in the enrollment act commonly known as the $300 clause. The recommendation of the Provost Marshal General is approved by this Department, and I trust that it will be recommended by you to Congress.

The recent successes that have attended our arms lead to the hope that by maintaining our military strength and giving it such an increase as the extended field of operations may require an early termination of the war may be attained. But to accomplish this it is absolutely necessary that efficient means be taken, with vigor and promptness, to keep the Army up to its strength and supply deficiencies occasioned by the losses sustained by casualties in the field. To that end resort must be had to a draft, but ample expectation has now shown that the pecuniary exemption from service frustrates the object of the enrollment law by furnishing money instead of men.

An additional reason for repealing the $300 clause is that it is contemplated to make the draft for a comparatively short term. The burden of military service will therefore be lightened, but its certainty of furnishing troops is an absolute essential to success.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

To the PRESIDENT.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., June 6, 1864.

Sir: In accordance with the amended enrollment act approved February 24, 1864, and your orders on the subject, I am now conducting a draft in various sub-districts for their respective deficiencies on quotas of troops heretofore assigned. The results of this draft, so far as shown by reports of this date, are worthy of attention. They are, briefly, as follows:

Number of drafted men examined.....	14,741
Number exempted for physical disability....	4,374
Number exempted for all other causes.....	2,632

Total exempted .....	7,016
----------------------	-------

Number paid commutation money.....	5,050
Number who have furnished substitutes....	1,416
Number held for personal service.....	1,259

(This last includes some who may yet pay commutation money.)
Total not exempted..... 7,725

These reports come from sub-districts in eight different States. I invite your attention to the small proportion of soldiers being obtained under the existing law. I see no reason to believe that the Army can be materially strengthened by draft so long as the $300 clause is in force, nor do I think it safe to assume that the commutation paid by a drafted man will enable the Government to procure a volunteer or substitute in his place. I do not think that large bounties by the United States should be again resorted to for raising troops. I recommend that the $300 clause, as it is known, be repealed.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have always been anxious that the enrollment act should be as tender in its provisions as possible to the mass of the people, who are to bear the burdens of the draft. I have believed, and the commutation clause was inserted in the act originally in the conviction that it would lighten the burden of that draft to the mass of the people. I have no doubt it has done so. During this session of Congress, when we amended the original act, I stood alone in my committee in favor of retaining that provision, and I am exceedingly reluctant to give it up even now, and I did not vote for reporting this from my committee, but experience shows that we cannot raise men under that act so rapidly as we ought to do, and as the needs of the country now require. It will be seen from the statement of the Provost Marshal General that five thousand men paid commutation, while only one thousand rendered personal service, and fifteen hundred obtained substitutes.

It is now proposed to make this change, to allow substitutes to be obtained as formerly, to prevent the payment of money, and to reduce the term of service from three years to one year. I think we can raise the men for a short time very readily. The Government has no power to draft under the present act, although the Secretary seems to speak of it as if they had, for any time less than three years. Under the old militia law they had power to draft for nine months; but they do not propose to draft under that law. The enrollment act, as it now stands, is almost perfect in its framework, being the result of a great deal of experience. But, sir, I think it would be very hard to draft men for three years and not give them the privilege of paying this commutation. I cannot vote to do so. We want men now; and if we can obtain men by drafting for one year we ought to do so, for we hope the work will be done in that time. I move this amendment so that the time shall not exceed one year, for I want these two provisions to stand together, the one repealing the clause allowing the payment of commutation money, and the other reducing the time from three years to one year, leaving it discretionary with the Government to fix the number of the months.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not understand it as he states it.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Military Committee accomplishes his purpose. I understand him to say that he is against the repeal of the commutation clause provided a call can be made by the President for troops for the period of three years or any period longer than one year, and the amendment that he has offered he has offered for the purpose of taking from the President the authority to make the call for a longer time than one year. He does not repeal the acts which are now in force, and I am by no means sure that unless they are repealed, or those portions of them which authorize the call to be made for a period of three years, the President may not have the alternative of making the call for three years or any longer period than one year, not exceeding three years, even if the amendment is adopted. The object of the honorable member of course is to deny him the right to make a call for a longer time than one year. If he will phrase it, if it is not already done—it does not strike me as being very plainly done by the amendment—so as to say no call shall be made under those antecedent laws for a longer period than one year—

Mr. COLLAMER. It provides that the term for which the draft is hereafter to be made shall not exceed one year.

Mr. JOHNSON. Under this act. That is what it says. That is what struck me.

Mr. WILSON. No; it mentions the title of both the other acts.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then it will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. COLLAMER. The first expression in the amendment is perhaps doubtful. I think it says that the President "may" do this, instead of "shall."

Mr. JOHNSON. It ought to be put beyond doubt.

Mr. WILSON. I do not object to putting it beyond doubt. Certainly I want to give the President the authority to call men out for a term of one year or less.

Mr. JOHNSON. But he thinks he has that power now.

Mr. WILSON. I know they think at the other end of the avenue sometimes that they have got authority to do things which some of us think they have not, and we have taken occasion to say it. I have no doubt on the point that under the enrollment act the draft must be made for three years. It cannot be made for a day more or less.

Mr. JOHNSON. It cannot be made for a day more, that is very certain; but I suppose the ground upon which the Department and the President hold that under that act they may make a draft for a period short of three years is that the greater period includes the less. They are authorized to make a draft for three years, but they may make a draft for a less time. That is the view they take of it.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that I have just read the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. It authorizes the President to call for one year's men under the bill that is now before the Senate. Under the previous laws he can call for three years' men.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I supposed.

Mr. COLLAMER. It does not confine it.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I thought when I first rose. We can put it into shape so as to leave it without any doubt. I was about to say further, and I might as well say it now as at any other time, after the amendment shall have been reduced to form to accomplish the purpose of the honorable member—

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized on and after the passage of this act to call out for a period not exceeding one year such number of men as the exigencies of the service may require by draft, according to the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," and the act approved February 24, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. JOHNSON. That certainly requires amendment.

Mr. WILSON. In what respect?

Mr. JOHNSON. He would still be authorized to call for three years' men under that provision.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly not.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is not the purpose, and we can amend it in a form to leave it beyond all doubt.

I was about to say, assuming that this difficulty is obviated by an alteration of the amendment so as to answer the purpose, that even with that alteration, which is to limit the power of the President to a call for three years, I cannot vote for the repeal of the commutation clause. I would very much prefer, if it is found that the commutation clause does not provide a sum sufficient for the purpose of procuring a substitute, that the amount be increased, and for this reason: when the law was first passed, as nobody knows better than the chairman of the committee who advocated it, it became exceedingly unpopular, and there was an attempt made to persuade the public mind that it drew an invidious distinction between what are called the poor and the rich; that whereas the rich man could easily pay his $300 and get clear of the draft, the poor man would not be able to pay his $300; but it was soon found by experience that even in the case of men who were too poor out of their own means to advance the $300, if their condition in their neighborhood was such, in the estimate of those by whom they were surrounded and who were in better circumstances, that it was a very hard case to compel them to take the field and leave their families unprotected, the $300 were raised by others for them. If this bill passes repealing the right to commute, there will be a much better ground for appealing to popular opinion as against the equality of this legislation, because of the difference in pecuniary means between men. You leave still to the man drafted the right to procure a substitute. That the rich man can do.

The theory of the Executive, and of those at whose instance he advises it, is, that the $300 are not sufficient in the hands of the Government to procure a substitute. Why? Because the price for which alone a substitute can be procured will be $600, or any larger sum. If that is true—and to a certain extent it will be true—those who are able to raise their $600 or $1,000, and go into the market, can get clear of personal service by procuring a substitute; while the poor man who cannot raise the money, neither by himself nor by his friends, will be compelled to render personal service. The only possible way in which equality of duty founded upon allegiance can be brought about by what is proposed by the War Department and the President is by rendering the draft imperative upon all, that all who are drafted shall render personal service without substitutes. If the honorable chairman and the Senator will reflect for a moment they will see that we are saying to the poor man, "You must go into the field and risk your life, and absent yourself from your family, but he who has the means of procuring a substitute shall not go, if he thinks proper, into the field." He may procure a substitute and remain at home, safe out of harm's way.

Personally, therefore, unless absolute equality is to be enforced, I very much prefer, if the $300 commutation money is not adequate, so as to enable the Government to procure a substitute, to increase it to four or five hundred dollars. But just as certain as you enlarge the number who will require substitutes—and you do it to the whole extent of your draft as far as relates to those who are able to procure substitutes—will you increase the price of the substitute; and the consequences of that will be that our poor fellow-citizens will be forced to take the field, while their rich neighbors stay at home and discharge their duty to the country in dollars and cents, their bodies being out of danger and their families not being subjected to the agony to which the families of the land are now being subjected by losing husbands and fathers and brothers.

I shall, therefore, vote against the proposition to repeal the $300 clause, being perfectly willing to enlarge it to five or six hundred dollars.

Mr. GRIMES. I propose to amend the amendment by adding the following section to it:

And be it further enacted, That all persons who have been drafted under the acts, or either of them, of which this is amendatory, and who have been discharged from their liability to military duty by the payment of commutation money, shall be liable to any future draft as though no such commutation money had been paid.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would not be keeping faith.

Mr. CONNESS. If I understand the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, it provides that persons from whom the Government has taken money to the amount of $300, with the agreement that they should be exempted from the draft for three years, shall now be declared to be subject to the draft again. If it is to be so understood I cannot vote for it.

While up, I will say that while I am prepared to vote for the repeal of the commutation clause, and allow the act to stand, leaving the person drafted the right to present a competent substitute upon such terms as the parties may see fit to arrange between themselves, I cannot vote for a proposition which shall reduce the period of the draft to one year. It appears to me that the proposition to reduce the period of the draft to one year is very nearly equivalent to a proposition to abandon the war. That is how it strikes my mind. After it shall be adopted I shall expect next a modification that the draft shall be for the period of ninety days, so as to come up to the first estimate made of the continuance of this war.

I think it is not the time, Mr. President, when our armies are in the field and in conflict, some of them suffering reverses and others engaged in the death-throes of battle with insufficient reserves behind them, to teach the country that we are to have hereafter but a single campaign; or, in other words, that the war shall last, so far as our declarations are concerned, but for one year. I think it is time, in the face of those facts, to exercise the power of the Government to call out the citizen wherever he shall be found, who is subject properly to military duty, and to teach the enemy, the world abroad, and our own people, that we intend to continue this war. I look with disfavor and will cast my vote against the proposition to reduce the period of the draft to one year. I regret very much that there is any evidence that it is adopted as the policy of the Government or the Administration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to have the Senator from Iowa offer his amendment as a separate proposition, and after the vote shall be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will so shape it. I desire to vote for his amendment, and I desire to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. I believe, sir, that any attempt now to make the period of enlistment or of conscription one year will be virtually an abandonment of the war. I believe with the Senator from California on that point, and I do not believe in putting it in the power of this Administration to take that attitude. I shall, therefore, desire to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and to vote for that of the Senator from Iowa, if he will so shape it that I can do it.

Mr. GRIMES. I will withdraw my amendment until after the question is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts be made intelligible—and without that I suppose it is of very little value any way—so as to require the draft to be made for a period of one year, I am inclined to vote in favor of it. I am not very much of a military man; but my impression has been that we can very much better do that now than we could at the beginning. The regiments which we have formed have been all organized. We have probably as many of them as we shall ever want, and if we could keep them full it would be all that would be necessary. I suppose they are kept pretty well officered. The vacancies occasioned by the loss of officers could be filled up by appointing men from the ranks, raising them up to positions. Then we should have organized regiments with a considerable number of veteran troops among them. I think it altogether the better way to order a draft from time to time to fill up those regiments.

Let them remain the same, putting in the new drafted men with the old experienced men in the ranks; and they have all been pretty much filled up by reenlistments for three years until this campaign came off, which has decimated them. They should be filled, as I think, by drafting, and draft men from year to year, and by filling your ranks with those men you will keep the regiments in very good condition.

This idea of drafting men for three years and compelling their service is more than has yet been attempted in this country. I am not prepared to say what the effect will be; but this I will say: if you take away commutation, the price of substitutes of course will rise very much; they will be entirely beyond the reach of poor men or those having a moderate competence. Whenever you dispense with this commutation money so that men can ask just what price they please as substitutes, substitutes will be entirely beyond the reach of men of moderate competence and ordinary people in my quarter of the country, and therefore they must go into the service. If they are drafted to go away from their families and farms for one year, some exertion might be made by friends and others in some measure to supply their labor at home for a single campaign; but if you draft these men for three years at a time and under such circumstances, doing away with the commutation, as compels them to go, it is an unreasonable and an unnecessary call upon them. If you call them for the campaign to fill up your old regiments, and let them go home at the end of one year and fill the regiments up again with others, that will be requiring in some degree a turn-about among men, so that each may furnish some proportion of his service; but this drafting of poor men, and arranging your law in such a manner that they cannot pay the substitution money and cannot hire substitutes, on account of their high price, and drafting them for three years at a time, seems to me to be a very unnecessary and unreasonable burden, not called for even by our extreme exigencies. I think it should not be done. If the time were fixed at one year, and then you repealed your commutation clause, it might be endured; but even then it is subjected to all the objections which the Senator from Maryland has made to it; there are serious objections to it; but the great and serious difficulty is, that you go to a man and say to him, "You must leave your wife and children for three years together, but your neighbors are not to go at all." That ought not to be done.

Mr. WILSON. I am sorry to disagree with some Senators in regard to this question of time. I think it of vital importance to obtain men now within a few weeks, and I think it much easier to obtain men for one year than to obtain men for three years. It is a very hard thing to go to the people of the country and say to them, "We draft you into the service of the United States for three years; we will not allow you to pay commutation." It is especially a very hard thing to do when you do it in communities that have been hard pressed by previous efforts to fill their quotas, as some portions of the country have been. Sir, I believe we can obtain ten men by drafting for one year easier than we can obtain one man for three years.

Mr. BROWN. How?

Mr. WILSON. I believe if you put the term at one year men will say, "I will not pay the commutation money; I will not try to get a substitute; I will go into the service and do my part for one year." But three years is a large portion of a man's life; he feels the burden; he feels the interruption of all his social relations and all his business affairs; and it is very hard to say to him, "You shall go; you shall not pay any commutation." Some Senators talk as though drafted men ought not even to have the privilege of procuring substitutes, and of paying the large price for substitutes which they will have to pay if we pass this bill. They average some $500 at the present time. The bounty for substitutes or enlisted men throughout the United States to-day will average at least $500; and if you repeal this portion of the enrollment act the bounty will go up to double or treble that amount.

Sir, I think by adopting this proposition we can obtain all the men we want and put them into the field much sooner than in any other mode; and the time is of great importance to us, especially at a period like this, when we want men to sustain our armies that are advancing. Experience is proving to us that the old regiments in the field that have been filled up by drafted men, by substitutes, and by enlisted men during the past winter, have fought well and bravely, equal to any troops that have ever fought in the country. I am told by officers who have had two or three hundred of these raw men put into the old regiments during the present winter that the new men behaved admirably in every respect. What we now want is to fill up the regiments that have been cut down by the late battles; and it is an act not only of sound policy but of humanity to the people to have it understood that the term of service shall not exceed one year.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Massachusetts, if he will excuse the expression on my part, seems to me to be engaged in an effort to reason away the courage of the country. When the enrollment bill was before this body, and the honorable Senator was conducting it here as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, his proposition to limit the period of draft to two years was received with no favor in the Senate. That was about three months ago or thereabouts. What change is it that has come over the spirit of the dream of the country, or those who are conducting its Government, that should make them demand that the period of service now should be but for one year? I know there is a great deal of force in the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Vermont, that new men in old regiments, under experienced officers who have been in the field and understand the duties and fatigues and labors of war, are worth more than new men in a comparatively disorganized condition with new officers and scarcely any organization.

But, sir, shall we not avail ourselves of the value of those new men in the old organizations for a longer period of time than one year? I ask, is there any prospect to-day in the aspect of military affairs that demands that we should ask for a less period of service than we have heretofore asked for? Has the alternative not existed presented by the term of "three years or the war"? If the war shall be ended before three years, will not these men be subject to be discharged? Do you mean to teach the men of the country who are fit to be soldiers that they are fighting for the money they receive? Do you mean to unlearn them the lesson that we have endeavored to teach them, and which they themselves, I think, understand, that they fight for their own country, and for the perpetuated liberty of their people?

Mr. President, the difficulty that has stood in the way of drafting from the beginning of this war has been the irritation the draft has caused to the people, and from the application of the draft, the Government have gone to the offering of bounties in extravagant sums to obtain soldiers. Why did the Government not persist in the system of draft? I apprehend it was because they preferred to pay a large amount of money rather than to subject the people to irritation. Are you going to subject them now to irritation annually to fill the ranks of your armies? Are the people to be taught at this period of the war that they will have a draft regularly once a year, and then in addition as often as there shall be spasms at headquarters? Is that to be the policy upon which this war is to be continued hereafter? If it is, I can but say that my soul is sad; that my fears are superior to my anticipations of the future.

It is not my office to condemn here, but the contrary; at least so I feel it; but why is it that with the power to draft, our armies should be engaged in single contests as they are at this time, without one hundred thousand additional troops ready at any moment of time to be pushed forward as reinforcements? When only a few days since a proposition came from a few of the Governors of the northwestern States to furnish one hundred thousand men for one hundred days, what lesson did it teach? It taught this unmistakably: the country were indirectly, if not directly, told by the proposition and its acceptance and its indorsement by Congress that this campaign would end the war. I trust in God that this campaign will end the war; but I say it is unwise, I say it is unsafe to make the impression in the country, and to have these spasmodic jerks substituted for the persistent determination that becomes a great and intelligent people in the conduct of a great contest like this. There is nothing that astonishes the people who come here from the Pacific coast more than the half-hearted courage with which this war is being conducted.

Sir, there is power enough in the nation, there are resources enough in the nation, if God would only give us some power to organize it and to precipitate it against the enemy to win these battles, and to close this contest within a short time. If God would but inspire somebody, if He would but plant in some mind in authority the power to organize and then the power to direct, this great contest would be closed with more glory to the American people than ever before fell to the lot of any portion of mankind.

But, sir, instead of that we have had promises to the people and the world that the war was to last ninety days and then close; that we should end it in the next year certainly. We have the power to call out men by draft, but we fail to exercise that power; and now it is proposed to declare by the legislative authority that we will not call upon the men of America to fight this great battle lest they should be disturbed in their civil avocations, lest they should suffer some hardship by being removed from the theaters of peace to the great theater of war. All this is proposed to be done, sir, while day by day, if not hour by hour, there come to our tables dispatches that tell us of sanguinary conflicts where thousands and tens of thousands and continual tens of thousands of our brave heroes fall.

I undertake to say it here, Mr. President, that this war could have been closed long ago if the courage of the leaders of the people was equal to the courage of the people themselves. Why, sir, love of country among the people is a passion. To-day it but wants to be appealed to; it but seeks a leader; it but craves a master hand and a master spirit to guide it. Only recently you have had a magnificent exhibit of it. From having had chloroform in homœopathic doses administered to the courage of the people by its military leaders, the country has reached out and welcomed the hero Grant who now leads our forces so near the rebel capital. I say here, God give him power, for he shows a persistence, a tenacity, and a heroic courage unparalleled at least in the history of this war thus far. Now that you have found one man at least worthy of the homage of the nation, are you going to leave him by failing to build up a courage behind him? Why, sir, your military leaders cannot have courage so long as by your acts you demoralize the courage of the body of the people.

I hear much here and elsewhere upon the proposition of whether we shall use white men and black men in carrying on this war. Why, sir, I would use the beasts of the field; I would invoke the powers of heaven; and I would commend those from the infernal regions, that each might do its part in eating out and tearing out from the heart of the nation the malignancy that is directed at its vital seat; and while it was being done it would be the performance of a high office could a portion of that be directed at the craven cowardice, the shilly-shallying, the modifications by spasmodic jerks that are not characteristic of the spirit of the noble people who first planted themselves upon this continent, that are not characteristic of the advanced intelligence of the noble and magnificent courage that lies to-day, as certain as we sit here, in the bosoms of our people.

But Senators say "Dealeasily with the people." The people say "Command your hosts forward." Why, sir, what is the fact? and no better test, no better proof, can be presented. Let Grant take Richmond to-morrow, and though your convocations nominate civilians for the highest office in your gift, the people with acclamation would take him up and blot out all your flimsy work at one stroke.

I tell you, sir, the hearts of the most courageous men in your midst, the hearts of the purest men in your midst, the hearts of that portion of the people without whom you cannot maintain your Government, without whom you cannot conduct the war, without whom you cannot be wise in council, demand at your hands another spirit than that which you show, a spirit equal to that which the great body of the people feel who never, thank God, have a motive but to be right.

Mr. President, I do not imagine that any word that I can say will change a vote here. I do not imagine that a measure asked for—if this be asked for; I do not know that it is—by the Administration will have a vote less, by anything that I shall say, than my own. But I regret—and when the vote is taken I desire to put my vote on the record against it—that this proposition has been introduced here. Let it not go abroad among your own people, send it not back to the armies that are struggling in the field, send it not abroad across the wide sea where palpitating hearts and expectant hope stand trembling together looking at our contest, that we here in the highest body of the nation have determined that hereafter this war shall be conducted by jerks, by spasms, by mere puerile attempts that are unworthy of us, and unworthy of the great cause which we love, and for which so many thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of people lie cold in the grave to-day.

Mr. President, let us take care that we shall not die as a nation by a rotting to pieces, by inanition. In my opinion it is our great danger. Let us not hesitate to make drafts because of the effect of it upon the people, because of political campaigns, because it may affect this or that moneyed interest, because this or that branch of industry may stand still; but let us in God's name go forward and meet the just expectations of the people to fight the cause of right and of God, and let us in this our period be its great leaders and ministers.

Mr. WILSON. As I listened to the earnest, intense, not to say passionate words of the Senator from California, I almost wished that I too was a man of courage, that I too had this confidence, this hope, and this boastfulness. The Senator from California speaks of the spasmodic action of the administrators of the Government in raising men during the last few months. Does the Senator know that we have raised or reenlisted since the 17th day of October last six hundred thousand men, not to count black men, and that within the last year we have put in the field seven hundred thousand men; that we have made an exertion such as few nations ever made, and few nations can make; that we have spent $125,000,000 in bounties; that we have drafted; that we have used the whole power and influence of the Government to increase our military forces? Sir, we have put forth an effort that excites the astonishment and commands the admiration of the world; yet the Senator from California, whose constituents are not drafted nor called upon, rises to-day and rebukes the Administration, rebukes us, and talks glibly of the timid counsels of men who are quite as hopeful, determined, and brave as himself.

Mr. CONNESS. Let me say at this point of time just this of my constituents: that they have asked and prayed to be let into this war; that of some seven thousand men who have enlisted and are filling up your western posts in comparative idleness, but very laborious idleness, every man of them offered to reenlist, and that without your bounties, if you would let them go where the enemy is. There is no people on this continent, in proportion to their numbers, that are so ready to go into the field as those constituents of mine. Let this much be said for them.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I do not question the devotion or the courage of the men of California. They have proved their devotion to the country on more than one occasion. But, sir, that Senator should remember that some of us live in communities where the calls are over and over again; where sons, brothers, relatives, friends, neighbors, all have been summoned to the field of duty, and have responded to these calls. While we, their representatives, are ready to vote men and to vote money, we want to make these sacrifices of men and of blood bear as lightly as possible upon our people. Humanity and justice alike demand it.

General Grant is in front of Richmond. This rebellion is "coiled," to use the language of General Hooker, at Richmond, and within ten miles of that capital of treason. We have sent forty-eight thousand men to reinforce General Grant since the commencement of the march toward the rebel capital. Within thirty days we have gathered up over the country these reinforcements, two thousand of whom are the one hundred days' men raised in the State of Ohio.

Mr. WADE. Over two thousand have gone.

Mr. WILSON. Two thousand of them are already there, and others are hastening to that field of duty. The Government is casting a dragnet over the country, gathering up all the soldiers it can and hurrying them forward to the support of General Grant. If we had fifty thousand or one hundred thousand fresh men to send to his support to-day this rebellion would, I believe, go down within sixty days to rise not again.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator why we have not got them?

Mr. WILSON. We have raised men during the past eight months as rapidly as we could do it, and we have put them into the field. Since the 17th day of October we have put seven hundred thousand men in the field, and it is an unparalleled exertion of the power and the patriotism of the people. It requires time, it requires money, it requires organization to put such vast masses of men in the field. The Government now desire to continue that great work. It now asks us to repeal the commutation clause of the enrollment act to enable it to fill more readily the wasting ranks of our regiments in front of the rebel legions. The drafted man who pays his commutation to-day, if there is a new draft to-morrow, is liable to be drafted again to-morrow. It is proposed by the War Department to take away from the drafted man the power to commute by money, and I propose to shorten the time of service. Why? Because we can get the men far easier and quicker now when they are so much needed. Why, sir, there is not a man in the country who does not believe that we could by volunteering or by draft obtain the personal service of five men for a year easier than we could the services of one man for three years. It is to strengthen the country now, to strengthen it at once, to support General Grant and General Sherman, and our generals who are in the heart of the rebel regions, that I make this proposition to shorten the time of service. I believe it to be good policy now; I believed it to be so last winter; and I believe if we had adopted one year then as the time, and had ordered a draft for half a million of six or twelve months' men, we probably should have had one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand more men in the field than we have to-day—have had all the men that would be necessary to reinforce General Grant and supply the immense losses he has made, and must make, before he can crush Lee's army and enter the rebel capital.

Mr. President, I do not believe in all this talk that we have in the newspapers, and which is sometimes indulged in here, about bad management, shortcomings, timidity, and cowardice. When the history of this rebellion is written, when men study it, they will see that this nation has put forth an effort such as no nation in this century has put forth; that the people have given money and given blood with a lavish hand; that the Government, while it has made some mistakes growing out of inexperience, has directed the affairs of the nation with eminent ability. Sir, I believe history will pronounce that the Government of the United States and the public men of the United States have administered public affairs with ability, and that the people of the United States have manifested a patriotism and a devotion such as no nation ever manifested in the tide of time.

I see no reason for excitement about this proposition, no reason for indulging in reproaches, none for insinuations about timid counsels.

Sir, we agreed the other day to accept the services of a certain number of hundred days' men. Some of us thought the time was too short. If it had been six months or nine months or twelve months, I do not know that anybody would have objected to the proposition. But, sir, the State of Ohio promptly redeemed her pledge. Other States that made the same pledge are doing very well; but Ohio having a larger body of men organized was able at once to redeem her promise to the Government; and the capital of the country is protected to-day by these hundred days' men of the West.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have furnished eight thousand more than our quota.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator says that Ohio has furnished eight thousand more than her quota of those men.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will permit me, the State of Ohio in the month of May sent to the field forty-two regiments, forty-five thousand men strong, and the Government clothed, armed, and equipped those men as soldiers in one month's time.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Senator for the information. I did not know the number; but I knew Ohio had done exceedingly well.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me, that shows there is no necessity of a draft, when one hundred thousand men are raised in the Northwest in twenty or thirty days under the volunteering system.

Mr. WILSON. But the Senator will remember that these are one hundred days' men, men called out for but a short time. As much as we doubted the policy of calling them out, in the condition of the country, in the advance of our Army, in the need to use every soldier we had to aid General Grant, these one hundred days' men are rendering a service to the country surpassed by no body of men in the country. I wish we had one hundred thousand more of them; for I believe that if we had one hundred thousand men that we could push forward to the support of General Grant, the power of this rebellion would soon go down forever. General Lee carries the flag of this rebellion. Destroy his army, or capture that army, and this rebellion may linger for a few months, and there may be some small actions, but the backbone of the rebellion will be broken.

Sir, if I am to accept this repeal of the commutation clause I want to couple with it the authority to the Government to draft for a time not exceeding one year. I am told it is the purpose of the Government to do so. In fact, the Secretary so states in the communications before us; but they have no authority to do it under the law. The law is clear and plain; there can be no mistake about it. It requires that drafted men shall be drafted during the time of the rebellion, if it does not exceed three years, thus putting them on the same footing with the three years' enlisted men.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, very erroneous ideas might be formed by Senators and by the country from the allusion that has been made to the State of Ohio. It is not true that the other States in the Northwest have responded as promptly as Ohio to the call for one hundred days' men. No one of them has filled up its quota, so far as I know, except Ohio.

Mr. WILSON. I spoke of Ohio because I understood that she had filled her pledge, and more too. It was understood at the time of the call that she had probably more than half these men organized in regiments and could send them at once, whereas the other States had no organizations, and it would take more time to raise the men.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose they had them organized in what was known as the national guard, and organized in such a way that they could immediately respond to the call of the Governor. I have no doubt that the people of Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa would have responded with equal promptitude if there had been any organization through which the people could have been reached; but the call went to them when there was no such organization, and the result is that no State except Ohio, so far as I know, has been able to fill up its quota.

But I should like to make one inquiry in regard to the proposition now under consideration. Certain States have filled their quotas entirely of three years' men; other States have not filled up their quotas. Is it proposed that hereafter, under the provisions of the section which the Senator from Massachusetts has introduced for the consideration of the Senate, the States that are now in arrear shall be credited with a full three years' man by the draft that is to be made of a one year's man? For instance, suppose, as an illustration, that my State—which is not true, for she has an excess of twelve thousand three years' men—but suppose she had a deficiency of twelve thousand, and you go on and make a draft in that State of one year's men. Under this bill, if it shall become a law, are we to be credited with the full twelve thousand that may be raised there? Would that be fair toward the other States to say that a State that had been holding back and not filling up its quota might, by the operation of this new rule which you propose, now discharge all its liabilities by sending its men into the field for only one year, while the adjacent State that was more patriotic filled up its quota with three years' men? It seems to me that the bill, if it is adopted, will operate unequally and unjustly in that regard.

Mr. WILSON. Some of the States—the Senator's State is one of the number—have more than filled their quota. There are, however, only sixty thousand in the whole United States short. On the 1st day of May the State of Massachusetts was four thousand and seventy short in her quota. I state this on the authority of the adjutant general of the State. We had the whole month of May to fill our quota, and draft has been going on for three weeks. I have no idea that this measure will apply to her in the draft now going on. I do not intend it shall do so, at any rate. I only intend it to apply to calls that may be hereafter made. If we draft for a year in one State, and another State has furnished for three years more men than was called for, she ought to have the benefit of it, and the Government has acted upon the plan of giving full credit to States upon the three year basis.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I am certainly in favor of the repeal of this commutation clause. The Senate will bear me witness that in the beginning of the session I introduced a proposition to repeal the $300 commutation clause, and then stated that instead of raising men under that provision you would simply raise money by lottery; and it turns out to be true. Your draft, as far as it has advanced, has only got five per cent., as I understand, of men, and the balance has been paid in money. This proposition now is to repeal the commutation clause; and the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is that hereafter, if that clause be repealed, you shall draft for one year.

But, Mr. President, this is no time for rash counsels or idle words. I am for fighting this thing out, whether it lasts one year or two years or one hundred years, until the rebellion shall be suppressed; and I am not overly sanguine that one year will accomplish the object. But it seems to me that there is some plausibility in the argument that you should not draft for but one year until you shall draft again in another class who have not been called upon at all. It does not, as I understand it, affect the State which I in part have the honor to represent, for it is not deficient upon any call that has been made by the President of the United States.

It seems to me that the argument of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is defective in one thing. He says if you reduce this call from three years to one year you will get the men easier and more speedily, and fill up your armies at once. Why do you draft men at all? Because they will not volunteer; and if you draft them you draft them precisely as speedily for three years as you can draft them for one year. It seems to me that argument is altogether fallacious. If they are ready to volunteer, you do not need a draft; and if you have to draft you will get them for three years precisely as readily and as speedily as you will get them for one year.

I only arose to say that I am now for the repeal of the commutation clause as I was at the beginning of the session. I told you then, as this Senate will bear me witness, that before the Senate adjourned you would repeal that clause. I am now ready to repeal it; and I am ready to go further, and repeal the right of substitution; so that whenever a man shall be drafted he shall go into the service if he is an able-bodied and competent soldier. If this rebellion goes on, as I hope in God it may not, for another year, the right of substitution will be repealed, and all conditions as to age may be repealed, until every man able to bear arms will be required to bear arms; and when the last soldier shall have fallen we will hand the contest over to the women and children, and the old flag will triumph whether you have men under forty-five or not to bear it.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator will agree with me that in the draft of fourteen thousand men that has been made, if the time, instead of being three years had been one year, and the commutation remained the same as it is, we should have obtained more substitutes, and more men for one year than we now have. Many of the men who have paid the money would have obtained substitutes, because substitutes would have been cheaper for one year than three years, or they would have gone themselves rather than pay the commutation of $300 and be liable to draft the next call, as they are by law. That is the point I make.

Mr. BROWN. I will inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether this bill was not unanimously offered and reported by the Military Committee as it stands on the table?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly it was reported by the unanimous assent of the committee, although I have ever been for the commutation, and do not know that I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. BROWN. Then I ask where the Senator from Massachusetts gets the ground upon which he predicates the amendment which he has offered? Does it come from the Department? Is it a suggestion of the Administration? Or what is the ground on which he puts it? Or is it simply an amendment offered on his own motion?

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will remember that some two or three weeks ago I offered this proposition as a joint resolution, at that time intending to press it to a vote in my committee, but the expression of opinion in the committee showed me that it would be voted down. The Senator will find that the Secretary of War, in the communication he now makes, states that the intention is to draft for a shorter period than three years. He sustains the idea embodied in the amendment I offer, and the President is in favor of this policy I am confident.

Mr. BROWN. Then I presume the Secretary of War goes upon the ground that he already has the right to do so. Is that the case?

Mr. WILSON. I think the Secretary of War assumes—he certainly must assume from what he says in his letter—that he has that right; but he certainly has not the right. I will read the act if the Senator desires to hear it.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; I should like to hear it.

Mr. WILSON. There cannot be a doubt on this point. It must be a careless reading to leave any doubt of it. The eleventh section of the act of 1863 says:

"That all persons thus enrolled shall be subject, for two years after the 1st day of July succeeding the enrollment, to be called into the military service of the United States, and to continue in service during the present rebellion, not, however, exceeding the term of three years."

They are to go into the service for the present rebellion; but if the present rebellion lasts more than three years, then they are to go out at the end of three years. The drafted men are put on precisely the footing of the three years' men. The act says:

"Not, however, exceeding the term of three years; and when called into service shall be placed on the same footing, in all respects, as volunteers for three years, or during the war, including advance pay and bounty as now provided by law."

In every respect they were put on the same footing, and were intended to be the same as three years' men; and the three years' men are enlisted for "three years or during the war."

Mr. BROWN. I will only ask one other question of the Senator in order that we may get at a full comprehension of the scope of his amendment; and that is, is it in contemplation in the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts that the power to call out men by conscription for three years shall be taken away from the Government?

Mr. WILSON. My amendment is simply this: it authorizes the Government to call out men for a term not exceeding one year; they can draft men for that period. Here is a proposition to repeal the commutation clause of the old act. I assented to report it to the Senate to take the sense of Congress, but I think if we had time enough it would be the best and wisest policy to retain the commutation clause. The Senator has always advocated the repeal of the provision and so have all the members of the Committee on Military Affairs. If it is to be repealed now, I want to adopt this provision to authorize the President hereafter to call out men for a term not exceeding one year. I think this policy a wise and humane one; that it will bear more lightly upon the people and fill more rapidly the wasting ranks of our armies.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to shape an amendment with a view to cover the point suggested by the Senator from Iowa, and also by the Senator from Indiana, in relation to the effect of calling for one year's men so that they shall not count as three years' men; but I cannot do it at the moment at my table. For that reason I desire to move that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator from Vermont withdraw his motion for a moment to allow me to say a word?

Mr. COLLAMER. I withdraw it. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. CONNESS. I simply desire to say that I listened with some attention to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to hear from him arguments and reasons why his amendment should be adopted; but I listened mostly to a defense of the Administration against the remarks that I had the honor to submit. I will not undertake to reply. While I am not desirous of entering the lists in competition with the honorable Senator, that it may be ascertained, either for our satisfaction or the satisfaction of the country, which of us, the Senator or myself, is the best friend and the truest supporter of the Administration, I will say to the honorable Senator that I think, though he is exceedingly patriotic and I have no doubt exceedingly attached to the Administration, he has no advantage of myself on either point.

Mr. WILSON. I do not question the Senator's patriotism, his earnestness, his devotion to the country, or his support of the Administration, but I did think that in the Senator's remarks, while he was exceedingly earnest, he reflected rather sharply not only upon the Administration, but upon some of its supporters here. I am not the Administration's slave. I generally support their policy. On some things I have to condemn them, as does the Senator, and all of us.

Mr. CONNESS. I fully understand that, and will simply say that the only difference that I can see between the honorable Senator and myself on these subjects is that sometimes I breathe a little louder than he does. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable chairman of the committee inform us, if he can inform us, how many men it is proposed to call for by the Government?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON. That may in some measure influence my vote.

Mr. WILSON. I can ascertain by to-morrow morning.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you know how many men are now in the Army?

Mr. WILSON. I do not, and if I did I should not feel at liberty to say, because it has been the policy of the Secretary of War to keep it away from our own people; for, as he says, if he should let everybody know it, the enemy would soon know it; that he would give a great deal if he only knew how many men they had, and he supposed they would if they knew what we had.

Mr. JOHNSON. If he makes a call for a specific number of men they will find that out very soon.

Mr. WILSON. They will find that out; but they do not know the number of men in our service. We have got a large force in the field, but still we want more.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not understand the President or the Secretary of War to be limited as to the period of service. They want the law to remain as it is as far as I can get their opinion from the message.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator will find in the letter of the Secretary of War that he proposes to draft for a shorter period than three years. Under the militia law he can do it, but not under the enrollment act. That is as clear as sunlight.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 8, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the accounts of the superintendent of Indian affairs of the southern superintendency; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL M. DENMAN AND EBENEZER TOWNLEY.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made an adverse report on the memorial of Daniel M. Denman and Ebenezer Townley, heirs of John Denman and George Townley, for compensation for beef furnished during the revolutionary war; which was laid upon the table.

NIAGARA FALLS CANAL.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 126, to construct a ship canal around the falls of Niagara, and that it be postponed to the second Tuesday of December next, the day to which the Illinois canal bill was postponed.

It was ordered accordingly.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IDAHO.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Territories, reported back House bill No. 486, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho."

The bill provides that the Governor of the Territory of Idaho be authorized to reapportion the Territory for the election of members of the Council and house of representatives of the Legislative Assembly, provided the apportionment shall be based on an enumeration of the inhabitants and qualified voters of the several counties and districts of the Territory to be taken by such persons, and in such mode as the Governor shall designate and appoint, and the persons so appointed shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor, to be paid out of the territorial treasury; provided further, that the act shall not be construed to divest any member of the council, elected at the first election in the Territory, of any rights he may have acquired by virtue of that election, who was elected from any county or district within the present limits of the Territory of Idaho; and that the annual election in the Territory for the election of all officers provided for by the laws of the Territory, for the year 1864, shall be held at such places as is now provided by law, and such other places as the Governor may direct, on the second Monday of October.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRAVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS MUNSON.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Francis Munson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. COX. I am directed by the Committee on the Rules to report the following:

That rule 134, page 94 Barclay's Digest, be so amended as to include admission to the floor of the House, in addition to those named in that rule, of ex-members of Congress, provided that said ex-members of Congress subscribe a statement to be filed with the Speaker that they have no interest directly or indirectly in the prosecution of any claim or bill before Congress, and that they will not use the privilege of their admission for forwarding the interest of any one before Congress.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to strike out the proviso to that proposition.

Mr. COX. That proviso will keep out more than are now kept out. I know that it was a crying sin when I first came to Congress seven years ago that ex-members came within the bar and occupied our seats writing letters, lobbying claims, &c., until it became a nuisance, so that when we moved to the new Hall we adopted the rule excluding them

Mr. MORRILL. When my resolution was before the House for devoting the old Hall to the reception of statuary, the gentleman objected that the statue of Jeff. Davis would be included.

Mr. COX. I never made that objection that I remember. I helped the gentleman with his proposition. I always favored art in all its manifestations. I am sure of that.

I am very certain if the gentleman's party succeeds—and no doubt he thought it would until Fremont appeared—there will be no danger of Jeff. Davis's appearance here!

Mr. MORRILL. I think the resolution should be amended so as to require them to take the oath of allegiance at any rate.

Mr. COX. I object to such an amendment; for I think the gentleman's object is to break down this resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. Not at all.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire of the gentleman from Vermont whether it would not be well to require them to take the oath which is required to be taken in Kentucky to enable a man to vote—to support the Administration?

Mr. MORRILL. I think if they subscribe the oath now required it will be sufficient.

Mr. COX. I do not think the gentleman is in earnest. There is no danger of disloyal men and secessionists referred to coming here just now, while Generals Grant and Hancock are fighting them. There is no danger of disunionists or any such obnoxious men coming here and taking any part, at least upon this side of the House. And if they came this resolution would not prevent them from being properly arrested, properly tried, and properly hung.

Mr. MORRILL. Would not the resolution now admit the friend of the gentleman from Ohio, who is now sojourning in Canada?

Mr. COX. Of course, it would not exclude my former colleague; and the very first gentleman to welcome my former colleague would be the gentleman from Vermont, owing to the old friendship existing between them. He is not inculpated in this rebellion; and the gentleman from Vermont himself has often acted with him in a social and sometimes in a political way. He does not believe in a dissolution of the Union. These amendments and such unkind remarks unjustly prejudice and complicate this matter; and I insist that it is not germane to make allusions of this character upon such a question as this.

Mr. MORRILL. I insist upon my amendment.

Mr. COX. The President himself said my former colleague (Mr. Vallandigham) was not guilty of anything; and the only reason he gave for his action in exiling him was that he feared that he might at some time or other be guilty of something. So much for that fling at the absent.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, for I think that if we will only leave the doors open and induce Jeff. Davis to come here, that is the only way we will ever catch him. I would like to have him come here, so that we could catch and hang him.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Is another amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. An amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. In order to complete, in my estimation, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont, I move to add thereto the words "and who have never been engaged in rebellion against the Government."

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say that the oath already required to be subscribed is to that effect.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to lay the resolution and amendments upon the table.

Mr. COX. I do not yield to any motion of that kind.

This resolution came in the first place from the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LAW,] whom I do not see now in his seat. The motive he had in presenting it was entirely of a social character. He expects some time or other to come back to this House, and meet here his old friends; and it would not be either pleasant or comfortable for an ex-member to come here and be shoved off into the gallery, when he could make his visit delightful by intercourse with his old friends and associates here upon the floor. We guard by this amendment against any wrongful interference with the business of Congress upon the part of any ex-member. I hope this matter will be treated seriously and properly, and that the resolution will be passed without amendment. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to lay the report and amendments on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say a word or two.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my call in favor of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COFFROTH. I withdraw my motion also.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the report will be laid on the table. I was compelled to differ with a majority of the committee in relation to this matter. The present rule was adopted after great deliberation. The whole subject, as the Speaker will very well recollect, was referred to a committee two or three Congresses ago, who revised all the rules, and they recommended this rule excluding from the floor of the House almost everybody, and particularly ex-members of Congress. That rule was adopted by a very large majority, and I think it has worked admirably. I do not believe in this thing of admitting ex-members of Congress and giving them a sort of exclusive lobby privilege. I am aware of the provision in the proposed rule that they shall certify, but I do not think that any gentleman who came here would want to be compelled to take such an oath, and I am opposed to a modification of this rule. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will prevail, and that we shall lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 34, noes 60.

So the House refused to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question recurred on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, being first upon the motion of Mr. MORRILL to add to the proposed rule the following proviso:

Provided further, That such ex-members shall also take and subscribe before some competent officer the oath of allegiance required of members of Congress, so far as the same shall be applicable.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot withdraw it unless by unanimous consent.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to—ayes 54, noes 41.

The question recurred on the motion to strike out the proviso as amended.

Mr. COX demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and WASHBURN, of Illinois were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 49.

The Speaker voted in the negative.

So the proviso was not stricken out.

Mr. CRAVENS moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the whole subject was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following as an additional rule:

The names of members not voting on any call of the yeas and nays shall be recorded in the Journal immediately after those voting in the affirmative and negative, and the same record shall be made in the Congressional Globe.

The amendment to the rules was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following as an amendment to come in at the end of rule 145:

On Monday of every week, at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read, unless the call of States and Territories for bills on leave and resolutions has been earlier concluded, the Speaker may entertain a motion to suspend the rules.

The amendment of the rules was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the rules was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. THAYER. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Private Land Claims, for action at this time, House bill No. 435, concerning certain locations of lands in the State of Missouri.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

VETO POWER IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. SPALDING called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the consideration, as unfinished business, of the bill (S. No. 285) to regulate the veto power in the Territory of Washington; the question being on the motion of Mr. COLE, of Washington, to lay the bill on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the internal revenue bill, and a bill concerning lands in the State of California, severally with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the internal revenue bill, with the Senate amendments just reported from the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means and ordered to be printed. I was inclined to make a motion at once to non-concur with the Senate amendments, and to ask for a committee of conference. I suppose that it would facilitate the passage of the bill and save some time. But there are a number of important amendments; there are a large number of amendments in all; and many of them are of an important character, in which various members of the House feel an interest. Therefore it may be well that the bill shall be printed and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, which will act expeditiously upon it, and report it back at a very early day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I was in hopes that the gentleman from Vermont would have made another motion which I think would be more agreeable to the majority of the House; that is, that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and that the amendments be referred in the first instance to a committee of conference.

Mr. FENTON. I hope that the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois will be adopted by the House. I am inclined to think that that course will be generally acceptable to members, and will save a good deal of time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to say that if the subject be not referred to the Committee of Ways and Means these amendments should be considered in the House. I shall certainly object to a general motion to non-concur in all the amendments and to refer them to a committee of conference. The effect would be to prevent the House acting on the several amendments. I have no objection to the reference of these amendments to the Committee of Ways and Means; but otherwise I shall demand a separate vote on each amendment.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that a bill of this magnitude should not be left entirely to a committee of conference. There is too much at stake in it. It would be an entire surrender of the functions of the House to deliver it over bodily to a committee of conference without any consideration of amendments of such vast importance as those in this bill. I am therefore opposed to the proposition.

Mr. MORRILL. If it was the unanimous consent of the House to refer the amendments to a committee of conference at once, I would have no objection; but as there is a difference of opinion about it I hope the House will consent to have the amendments printed and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that if there be any general dissent to my proposition I will withdraw it. But I think it might as well go in the first instance to be adjusted by a committee of conference.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRILL's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the Senate amendments were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

VETO IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 285, to regulate the veto power in the Territory of Washington.

Mr. BEAMAN moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 45, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Rollins, Rose, Schenck, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Stuart, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—65.

Mr. BEAMAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was the consideration of the bankrupt bill, on which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, the select committee on a bankrupt law have agreed to certain amendments, which will remove all the objections to the bill which have been made on the floor. I will send them to the Clerk's desk, and ask that they be adopted.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

First amendment:

Add to section two the words, "For or against each assignee: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall revive a right of action barred at the time such assignee is appointed;" so that it will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several circuit courts of the United States within and for the districts where the proceedings in bankruptcy shall be pending, shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under this act; and, except when special provision is otherwise made, may, upon bill, petition, or other proper process, of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case as a court of equity. The powers and jurisdiction hereby granted may be exercised either by said court, or by any justice thereof, in term time or vacation. Said circuit courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the same district, of all suits at law or in equity, which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to or vested in such assignee; but no suit at law or in equity shall, in any case, be maintainable by or against such assignee, or by or against any person claiming an adverse interest, touching the property and rights of property aforesaid, in any court whatsoever, unless the same shall be brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall revive a right of action barred at the time such assignee is appointed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Second amendment:

On pages 56 and 57, in section forty-three, in lines thirteen and fourteen, strike out the words "or whose property has been seized, attached, levied, or taken," and insert the words "and held in custody;" and on page 57, in line fifteen of the same section, strike out the word "attachment," and also in line twenty-two of the same section strike out the words "such debtor not having sufficient property to pay his debts in full;" so that it will read:

Sec. 43. And be it further enacted, That any person residing and owing debts as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, shall depart from the State, District, or Territory of which he is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors, or being absent shall, with such intent, remain absent; or shall conceal himself to avoid the service of legal process in any action for the recovery of a debt or demand provable under this act; or shall conceal or remove any of his property to avoid its being attached, taken, or sequestered on legal process; or shall make any assignment, gift, sale, conveyance, or transfer of his estate, property, rights, or credits, either within the United States or elsewhere, with intent to delay, defraud, or hinder his creditors; or who has been arrested and held in custody under or by virtue of mesne process, or execution, issued out of any court of any State, District, or Territory, within which such debtor resides or has property, founded upon a demand in its nature provable against a bankrupt's estate under this act, and for a sum exceeding one hundred dollars, and such process is remaining in force and not discharged by payment, or in any other manner provided by the law of such State, District, or Territory, applicable thereto, for a period of seven days; or has been actually imprisoned for more than seven days in a civil action, founded on contract, for the sum of $100 or upwards, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Third amendment:

Add to section forty-one, page 55, the following: Provided, That whenever any corporation by proceedings under this act shall be declared bankrupt, such decree of bankruptcy shall work a forfeiture of all the franchises of such corporation, and the affairs of such corporation shall be wound up in the manner provided in this act in respect to natural persons.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRANK. I move in section thirteen to strike out "$250" and in lieu thereof to insert "$500;" so that it will read:

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if any person residing within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing debts payable under this act exceeding the amount of $500, shall apply by petition, addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which such debtor has resided or carried on business for the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing such petition, or for the longest period during such six months, setting forth his place of residence, his inability to pay all his debts in full, his willingness to surrender all his estate and effects for the benefit of his creditors, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAVENS. I wish to enter my protest against the passage of this bill, and I ask the gentleman from Rhode Island to yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. JENCKES. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana for five minutes. My time is limited or I would yield to the gentleman longer.

Mr. CRAVENS. As one of the select committee to whom was referred the subject of a bankrupt law, I have not been able to agree with the majority of the committee in recommending the passage of the bill now under consideration. The few minutes allowed me to speak on the subject will not permit me to refer to the details of the bill, but I have no hesitancy in saying that the committee have labored to avoid many of the defects found to exist in former laws on the subject of bankruptcy; and with all the pains taken to perfect this bill I believe it will be found to be radically defective and impracticable.

I have listened to the able speeches made in favor of the measure, and after giving the subject all the attention that I could bestow on it, I have come to the conclusion that this bill ought not to pass. I am aware that it is considered by some very ungracious to offer any opposition to a measure of this kind, which is claimed to be for the relief of a meritorious but unfortunate class of our fellow-citizens. I have heard, and not without feelings of sympathy, the eloquent appeals that have been made in behalf of the oppressed debtor. I would not be insensible to those appeals if I could. The distresses of mankind never fail to awaken in my mind emotions of sympathy. I have never in my life collected one dollar by suing, and I hope I never may be compelled to resort to that mode to collect an honest debt. It has always been the policy of those who have plead before Congress for the passage of bankrupt bills to portray the deep distress of the unfortunate debtor. Not more so on this occasion than has been the custom. In these times of civil commotion justice must be consulted, and our legislation should conform to its most rigid rules; and by those rules I have attempted to judge of the wisdom and expediency of this measure, and I find it condemned.

I believe the bill is not warranted by the Constitution of the United States, it is ex post facto, and it does impair the validity of contracts, which is forbidden by the Constitution.

I am not prepared to believe the framers of that instrument ever designed that the debtor should have it in his power to release himself by his own act and on his own motion, from his honest debts, incurred by valuable considerations received, and yet that is what this bill in substance proposes. I think it unsettles the very foundation of our whole social system, and adds another incentive to profligacy and reckless speculation, which now rages like a fever and deranges the public mind to an alarming extent.

I am not satisfied that this bill, should it pass and become a law, will not be rendered odious before the people on account of the facilities it will afford the dishonest debtor to release himself from his obligations to pay. That it may result to the advantage of some honest and worthy men I will not pretend to say; but they will be the last and the smallest in number who will enjoy its immunities. The reckless spendthrift, the speculator, and the stock-jobber are the men who will be the first, I apprehend, to take the benefit of the law. I think it safe to say that the western people, without respect to party, do not desire the passage of the law. There have been no petitions from the West, to my knowledge, asking Congress to pass a bankrupt bill. Such petitions are confined to commercial localities, and it is not a little strange that those localities where the Government has expended the largest amount of the public money during this war are those from whence come the most urgent demands for the law. Thousands there have grown rich on the misfortunes of the Government, and thousands more have determined to become wealthy without going through the slow and painful process of obtaining riches by economy and honest industry. Remove that dread of perpetual obligation to pay debts contracted, and will not the young and ambitious be tempted to embark in gambling in stocks on Wall street and elsewhere more readily? If the Government will stand ready to release whenever the unfortunate debtor has failed, what will there be to restrain him from the most reckless adventures? To my mind, the effect of this bill will be demoralizing.

Those who have urged the passage of the measure have not failed to refer us to the precedents furnished by the English statutes on the subject of bankruptcy. I am satisfied that, on examination of the statutory law of England running through a period of more than three hundred years, you will find no law which can be claimed as furnishing a precedent for this bill. The main feature and object in all English law on the subject of bankruptcy has been to protect the creditor, and the relief to the debtor has been merely incidental.

The American people have had ample experience on this subject. It is not a new theme to them; they have on more than one occasion passed judgment against the measure. In 1800 a bankrupt bill was passed for a limited period, but before the five years' time for which it was limited had expired the bill was repealed. In the troubled condition of the finances of the country generally, the subject was renewed in Congress in 1819-20, but it failed to receive the sanction of Congress.

The old Whig party made a bankrupt law one of the links in the great chain of measures which were to give relief to the country and the people on the triumph of that party to power in 1840. The party did triumph, and a bankrupt bill was passed at the extra session of Congress in 1840. But so glaring were the frauds practiced under the operations of that law that it was repealed the next year by a large majority in both Houses of Congress, but not until it had rendered odious all who had favored the law, and infamous nearly all who had the benefit of it. To such extent was this the case in my section of the State of Indiana that I know of no insult a man will resent quicker than a charge that he had taken the benefit of the bankrupt law. We want no such law. And especially is this true with the agriculturists of the West, and I believe it true of that entire interest in the western States. We have no objections to your adopting such regulations by your States as may not necessarily encroach upon our rights. If your commercial interests demand more protection than you now have, go to your States for relief, but do not ask us to consent to the passage of a law which will unsettle all our business and social relations.

I do not hesitate to predict that if this bill passes, as I now believe it will, the people will demand its repeal and it will be repealed before two years. This is not a proper time to pass such a law as this. The general depreciation of the currency is practically accomplishing all that could reasonably be desired by the unfortunate debtor. When paper depreciates to 200, as it will be in a few days, half your debt is paid by the operation of your legal-tender laws.

I am opposed to the principles of the bill now before us, and shall vote against it on its final passage. But these are revolutionary times, and I suppose the bill will be passed through, and when you have taught the people to repudiate their individual debts you must expect there will be less compunction about repudiating national debts.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I simply rose to say that the gentleman from Indiana is mistaken. Petitions have been sent to me to be presented to the House for the passage of a general bankrupt law.

Mr. ARNOLD. I desire to say that a large number of petitions have come from my district earnestly urging the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Rhode Island to yield to me in order that I may move as an amendment to this bill a provision which shall include municipal and other corporations.

Mr. JENCKES. I cannot yield for that purpose. It will not do to destroy the local governments of any portion of the country. It would diminish by just so much the administrative and executive power of the Government, and leave the territory within a municipal jurisdiction without any government.

Mr. WILSON. I think all that difficulty could be obviated by a section which I have prepared with special reference to that point. I certainly do not feel like sustaining the previous question upon this bill, or voting for it, unless an opportunity can be had to amend the bill in this and some other respects. I understand the committee at one time agreed to this principle; and all the difficulty the gentleman from Rhode Island suggests can be avoided, and it should be done.

Mr. JENCKES. At the request of the gentleman from Maine I yield to him five minutes of my time.

Mr. SWEAT. I have but a few words to say upon the subject. I have heretofore had my share of prejudice against what are called bankrupt bills—bankrupt bills as they have been heretofore passed and placed upon our statute-books. But I think this is of a different nature from any bill before presented to the Congress of this country; and I really hope it will become a law, and if there are any imperfections in it, let them be remedied by future legislation. I am in favor of the passage of this bill because it is clearly in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, and, in my judgment, is demanded by the best interests of the country. When the framers of the Constitution declared that Congress should have power to "establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States," they intended not only to give the power, but to make it the duty of Congress to pass such a law.

As it has been said, the law of 1800 was a law more especially for the benefit of the creditor than the debtor. The law of 1840 was especially for the benefit of the debtor, disregarding in a great measure the interests of the creditor. It does seem to me that gentlemen upon the committee who have had this subject under consideration have for the first time met this question; and I think they have presented it in such a way as needs only to be thoroughly examined and understood to receive the support of very many gentlemen in this House who have heretofore opposed the passage of a bankrupt bill.

Now I would ask the gentleman from Indiana, who has just spoken, and who claims incorrectly that the demand to be relieved from their honest debts comes alone from New England, whose interests are in opposition to the passage of a comprehensive, fair, and just bankrupt bill, such as is provided for by the Constitution? The only two classes of persons, as I view it, who can be opposed to the passage of a bankrupt bill under the Constitution are the grasping, merciless, and soulless creditors—and there are always more or less of those persons in every community who will never consent to the discharge of a debtor, though a vast majority of his creditors may be willing—and on the other hand the dishonest debtor. Now the dishonest debtor who has means at hand is not the man who will come forward and ask for the benefits of this law; but one of the peculiar advantages of this law is that it permits the creditor to force the dishonest debtor to have his goods, effects, and credits transferred to the proper assignee, and have his whole affairs investigated by and be subject to judicial action.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRAVENS] thinks that there is no necessity for the passage of this bill now. I should be very glad to believe as he does, that there is no necessity for it, and that there will be no necessity for it in the future. If he is correct I submit that the bill, being upon the statute-book, can do harm to no one. If there is no necessity for it, no man will claim its privileges or be subject to its conditions and obligations. But I do not agree with him; I think the necessity for its passage is apparent to every man, and more now than ever before, when there is such an increased demand for all the productive energies of the country, occasioned by the exhaustions of the war.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SWEAT. I did not understand that the gentleman limited me to five minutes.

Mr. JENCKES. My time is limited; but I will yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. SWEAT. There is one point I have not heard publicly asserted upon this floor, but which I know is asserted outside. The bill is said to be contrary to the history of this country. It is said to be undemocratic. I claim to have always belonged to a party that has stood between the Constitution and its assailants, giving them unflinching battle from the earliest days of our Government down to the present time, and I support this because it is a constitutional and necessary measure. It is said that there is no man who voted for the law of 1841 who is not now dead politically. I have yet to know of any man whose political position or life is of sufficient importance to weigh against measures like this. This bill seems to be one of the very few designed for the benefit of white men during this Congress, and I see no good reason why the claims and interests of one hundred thousand white debtors, embracing many of our most valuable business men, should not receive the favorable consideration of this House. If my political life and position are to be sacrificed for sustaining such a measure as this, then I have only to say that I shall esteem it a sacrifice made for a very worthy and noble object.

As my time is limited, I cannot of course extend my remarks. I can but express the hope that this bill may become a law. Place it upon your statute-book and you will give buoyancy, hope, and strength, for honest, useful effort, to tens of thousands who can never be released from their thralldom in any other way, and whose unrestrained services would be of invaluable benefit to the whole country.

Mr. CRAVENS. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman. I have not charged that this is a political or party measure. On the contrary, I am glad to know it is not. In my district I know no one, either Democrat or Republican, who asks the passage of such a bill as this. I know of no man of any party or of any shade of party who demands its passage.

As a member of the "special committee" I desire to say that I have had no opportunity to examine the provisions of this bill. It was considered in my absence. Hence I have urged no objections to the details of the bill. Perhaps it is as perfect as gentlemen could make it. I object to it, as I did to the bill of 1841, for it proposes to sponge out honest, individual debts of every nature.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, I have no arguments to add to those advanced by the gentleman who introduced this bill. It stands upon its merits as introduced by him, and upon its merits, I judge, it will eventually pass. But, sir, there is something in this bill so national and reasonable, that I feel called upon to add my voice in presenting to the House a few facts connected with the history of bankruptcy. The necessity for this law exists in the exigencies of the times and in the requirements of a great nation with its varied and conflicting interests; a necessity suggested by experience to every people, of establishing some just system of law, which shall give security to enterprise and reward and protect trade through all its risks, and bring wealth and prosperity to the whole country. Upon the same principle the light-house is built, which directs the mariner traversing the ocean to seek a harbor in the midst of a storm, where he may shun utter ruin and refit his shattered fortunes.

Sir, no assault can be made on this bill upon principle. The assault against it is made upon time-worn prejudices alone. The gentleman from Indiana tells us that the support of this bill does not come from the West. I believe that position is untenable; but that there does exist a great prejudice against the bankrupt law in all agricultural countries I must admit, for all history proves it.

Owing to the brief space of time allowed me in this debate, it will be impossible for me to enter at large into the historical review of bankruptcy from this point. But the hint may serve to show the way to others, and by reference to the following facts I believe a fair illustration may be had of the course of legislation against class prejudices.

The origin of courts of bankruptcy is sufficient to prove that every farmer feels a natural antagonism to anything in favor of the trader. In the earliest part of the reign of Edward III, when for the first time among the English people traffic assumed a form, those markets that are now common in all commercial countries first began in England. Then the English trader first made his appearance. His differences and competition with the farmer became a source of difficulty. The trader's dishonesty became a source of loss to the farmer. This state of things continued till the time of Henry VIII. So heinous had then become the offenses of the traders that bankruptcy was treated as a crime, and the bankrupt became a felon.

The first statute against bankrupts passed in England was the 34 and 35 Henry VIII, entitled "An act against such persons as do make bankrupt;" and the preamble was as follows:

"Whereas divers and sundry persons craftily obtaining into their hands great substance of other men's goods do suddenly flee to parts unknown, or keep their houses, not minding to pay or restore to their creditors their debts and duties, but at their own wills and pleasures consume the substance obtained by credit of other men for their own pleasure and delicate living against all reason, equity, and good conscience."

The penalty fixed as punishment for such offenders was marked with all the cruelty which the customs of that age and the prejudice of the ruling agricultural interest of England could invent.

Upon complaint made to the Lord High Chancellor and other high personages, they were empowered to seize the body and effects and land of the offender. Such the spirit of English law remained even to the reign of George II, of Hessian memory, when the system pursued against bankrupts was full of cruelty and injustice, and a bankrupt for not surrendering upon the day appointed for him to do so was declared guilty of felony and liable to the punishment of death.

As commercial prosperity and a more liberal policy developed in Europe, the odium attached to bankruptcy began to disappear, and enlightened statesmen turned their minds to the noble task of eradicating the popular and prevailing prejudice against the victims to the vicissitudes of trade and freaks of fortune.

The severities of old laws were relaxed, and although the fraudulent bankrupt is still liable to punishment, his life is safe, and imprisonment limited to a term of years.

But statutes which remove penalties and free the body often fail to illumine the mind and dispel popular prejudice—a fact which the whole course of legislation on this subject in modern times establishes with irresistible force. That ancient prejudice against trades among all classes of landed proprietors still exists in the popular mind, and forms, I believe, the basis of every argument against a national bankrupt law that has been advanced in this or any other legislative body.

Having endeavored to show what is the natural prejudice between the commercial and agricultural interests, I will pass to another point. I do not range myself in this debate, nor have I sought to do so at any time, as the representative of commercial interests exclusively, in antagonism to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CRAVENS] as the representative of agricultural interests. But certainly it is becoming in us, representing different interests, to overcome those prejudices which have characterized all legislative bodies and have brought woe upon the people. By reference to the statistics of my colleague, [Mr. WARD,] gentlemen will find, Mr. Speaker, abundant proof of the numerous and just grounds of complaint against Congress for failing to redress the undeserved wrongs of a large and worthy class of our fellow-citizens made bankrupt by no fault of theirs, victims of a fickle fortune or a false friend. I alluded to the history of British law in this respect, and of the conflict between traders and non-traders. When the existing prejudice against including the agricultural non-trading interest in the same category with bankrupt traders was adjusted, the difficulty was insurmountable. I appeal, therefore, to gentlemen to be superior to these prejudices, and to examine the bill on its own merits, and I am confident that they will find that this bill is based on principles established by all commercial nations; that it does no injustice to any class of our citizens, but on the contrary that it redresses the wrongs of a large and deserving class, and is in consonance with the practice of all the insolvent courts of the United States. The great quality of this particular law is in its spirit; it possesses a great and good principle as well as a wise policy as its foundation; it seeks not only to do away with all those difficulties that have prevented men once under the ban of bankruptcy from finding relief without cringing to the creditor and undergoing the law's delay, but also abolishes by practical working of the system introduced that remnant of feudal prejudice which favors the lords of the soil and humbles the trader before the farmer, aiming to strengthen and renew that glorious privilege of equality among all classes in the State which underlies our Constitution. In reply to the argument that this bill is not in accordance with the Constitution, and hostile to the principles of American law, I will point all objectors to this one fact, that the Constitution of the United States, framed in view of the American system of Government, provides that Congress shall have power to establish a general bankrupt law.

Such is this law. It is the result of one of the requirements of the Constitution. And we wish that this session shall not close, this day shall not pass, without leaving on our records some small testimony that we are marching on, with all other great commercial and agricultural nations of the world, in perfecting the system of our jurisprudence.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, by Mr. HAY, his Private Secretary, was received.

BANKRUPT LAW—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bankrupt law.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been very widely distributed. It has been studied, I presume, by members of the House, and I know it has been studied by men out of the House. Every suggestion of amendment has been considered, and, so far as proper, has been adopted. Its passage has been recommended from the principal Boards of Trade in the country, by the representatives of the debtor interest and by the representatives of the creditor interest. We have files of letters from both sides recommending its immediate passage. It seems to me that the reason urged by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRAVENS] ought to be no objection to its passage—that the district he represents will not in the least be affected by it. The commercial districts will be affected by it. They ask for it as a healthy measure in the administration of commercial law. They ask it, representing as they do the greater portion of the property of the country. These districts include a large portion of the active business of the country, and why not concede to them the very beneficial measure which they request at our hands? They agree that it is a necessity for them, and the prosperity of their business is the wealth and prosperity of the nation. It is but fair and just that we should yield to them what they demand.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is the wish of the agricultural portions of the country that this bill should not pass. I appeal to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] whether the contrary is not the case.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Let me ask the gentleman from Rhode Island whether he has adopted the suggestions which were made for the amendment of the bill?

Mr. JENCKES. I have.

Mr. DRIGGS. In answer to the appeal of the gentleman from Rhode Island I will say a few words. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRAVENS] has stated that in his district he does not know of a single man who is in favor of the passage of this bill. I wish to say that in my own district, and in any State west of my own, I do not know of a single individual opposed to the passage of a bankrupt law. I have been through all parts of my district, and I know that to be the case there. I think, from the little time I have had to examine the bill, that the special committee have prepared as good and wise a measure as we can hope to have, one founded on previous laws and experience; and I believe that the interests of the country demand its passage. I believe that the majority of the people of my State are in favor of the passage of such a law. I hope, therefore, that the bill will pass.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, this bill contains a provision to enable the House to make proper amendments if it be imperfect in any respect. It provides for the appointment of commissioners under the authority of the Supreme Court to provide rules for pleading and practice under it which shall be uniform in every district of the United States. I wish the bill to become a law at this session of Congress, so that the commission may enter upon their labors, and at the next session present to us their report on the subject. We may then have intelligent recommendations for future action. It is true that we cannot anticipate all the wants of the business of the country, but if we make a provision for the study of the law in the mean time, then we shall be able during this Congress to make corrections in its own work if there be errors in it. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. CRAVENS demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, moved that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 65, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Freeman Clarke, Cox, Cravens, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Scofield, Scott, William G. Steele, Strouse, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Rice, John H. Rice, Shannon, Sloan, Spaulding, Stark, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Williams, Wilson Windom, and Woodbridge—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, Ashley, Baxter, Blaine, Francis P. Blair, Boyd, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Clay, Cresswell, Dawson, Deming, Dumont, Eckley, English, Farnsworth, Garfield, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kaibfleisch, Kasson, Kernan, King, Loan, Mallory, McAlister, McBride, McClurg, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Stuart, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—68.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. CRAVENS demanded tellers on seconding the call for the previous question.

Tellers were not ordered.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 43.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. CRAVENS demanded tellers on ordering the main question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAVENS and JENCKES were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 44.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. THAYER moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CRAVENS. Is the bill engrossed?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CRAVENS. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. GRINNELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call—will not indulge in that kind of cruelty.

Mr. CRAVENS. I will withdraw it if gentlemen will withdraw the bill.

Mr. JENCKES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CRAVENS. Gentlemen have not been disposed to be gracious in assigning the floor.

Mr. JENCKES. I yielded to the gentleman all the time I could. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. CRAVENS. If it is the desire of the House that I shall withdraw it, I will withdraw it.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I renew the demand.

Mr. JENCKES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The bill, not being engrossed, goes to the Speaker's table.

Mr. JENCKES, at a subsequent time, moved to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The motion to reconsider was entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 8, 1864.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to submit for the consideration of Congress a letter and inclosure from the Secretary of War, with my concurrence in the recommendation therein made.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, June 7, 1864.

SIR: I beg leave to submit to you a report made to me by the Provost Marshal General, showing the result of the draft now going on to fill the deficiency in the quotas of certain States, and recommending a repeal in the clause of the enrollment act commonly known as the §300 clause.

The recommendation of the Provost Marshal General is approved by this Department, and I trust that it will be recommended by you to Congress. The recent successes that have attended our arms lead to the hope that by maintaining our military strength and giving it such increase as the extended field of operations may require, an early termination of the war may be attained. But to accomplish this it is absolutely necessary that efficient means be taken, with vigor and promptness, to keep the Army up to its strength, and supply deficiencies occasioned by the losses sustained in the field. To that end resort must be had to a draft; but ample experience has now shown that the pecuniary exemption from service frustrates the object of the enrollment law by turning money instead of men.

An additional reason for repealing the §300 clause is that it is contemplated to make the draft for a comparatively short term. The burden of military service will therefore be lightened, but its certainty of furnishing troops is an absolute essential to success.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

To the President.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., June 8, 1864.

SIR: In accordance with the amended enrollment act approved February 24, 1864, and your orders on the subject, I am now conducting a draft in various sub-districts for their respective deficiencies on quotas of troops heretofore assigned. The results of this draft, so far as shown by reports to this date, are worthy of attention. They are, briefly, as follows:

Number of drafted men examined.....	14,741
Number exempted for physical disability.....	4,374
Number exempted for all other causes.....	2,642

Total number exempted.....	7,016
----------------------------	-------

Number paid commutation money.....	5,050
Number who have furnished substitutes.....	1,416
Number held for personal service.....	1,259

(This last includes some who may yet pay commutation money.)
Total not exempted.....	7,725

These reports come from sub-districts in eight different States. I invite your attention to the small proportion of soldiers being obtained under the existing law. I see no reason to believe that the Army can be materially strengthened by draft so long as the §300 clause is in force, nor do I think it safe to assume that the commutation paid by a drafted man will enable the Government to procure a volunteer or substitute in his place. I do not think that large bounties by the United States should be again resorted to for raising troops. I recommend that the §300 clause, as it is known, be repealed.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES B. FRY,
Provost Marshal General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and printed, with leave to the committee to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The latter part of the motion requires unanimous consent.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object to that.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I withdraw the latter part of the motion.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of business from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

WATER TAX IN GEORGETOWN.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 129) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to lay and collect a water tax, and for other purposes," approved May 21, 1862.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SIXTH STREET WEST.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, a bill (H. R. No. 364) authorizing the opening of Sixth street west.

The substitute was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert the following:

That the corporation of the city of Washington be, and are hereby, authorized and required to open Sixth street west from the canal to Maine avenue, under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in accordance with a plan approved, in May, 1822, by James Monroe, President of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to hear some explanation of that bill.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. The House, I suppose, is well aware that according to a plan approved by President Monroe in 1822, Sixth street west was extended through and across the Government reservation west of the Capitol. I cannot see any reason why that street should not be extended according to the original plan. It is one of the important streets of this city. The wharf at the foot of Sixth street is one of the best and most important landings we have, and the fact that the street is closed across the reservation compels the citizens of that street to go around by Four-and-a-half street, and compels persons going to Alexandria to go by that street also, or by Seventh street. I can see no reason or propriety in this state of things.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I understand the object of the bill is to open the street so that passengers can pass along it across the canal and through the reservation over on to the island.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. That is the object.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I would inquire if the obstruction of Sixth street is in violation of the Monroe doctrine? If so, I will go for the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The bill is carrying out the Monroe doctrine, as it is in accordance with the plans of President Monroe.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. The original plan was approved by President Monroe.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the title by inserting after the word "authorizing" the words "and requiring."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SERVICE OF PROCESS.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back bill of the House No. 434, to authorize bailiffs of the orphans' court in the county of Washington, District of Columbia, to serve process issued by said court, and for other purposes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, bill of the Senate No. 26, to provide for the public instruction of youth in the county of Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. PATTERSON. As this bill has not been printed, perhaps I ought to say a word in the way of explanation, especially as it is an important bill for the District of Columbia. It will be observed by comparing the Senate bill with the substitute, reported by the House committee, that there are several minor amendments, some of them intended to perfect the bill, and others designed to bring it into more complete conformity with the best results of the experience in those States where systems of education have been most liberally and successfully sustained.

In the twentieth section we have endeavored to give efficiency to the system by requiring attendance at school under a penal enactment. This is in accordance with the school laws in most of our northern cities, and would seem to be especially necessary here, where education has been so long and so generally neglected.

In the nineteenth section we provide for an increase of the school fund by requiring all penalties and forfeitures imposed for the violation of the laws of the United States to be paid into the hands of certain officers, who are made the custodians of this fund, and are required to expend it for school purposes.

But the most important feature of the amendment is to be found in the seventeenth and eighteenth sections, and in the proviso to the nineteenth section, which provides for separate schools for the colored children of the District. To accomplish this we have provided that such a proportion of the entire school fund shall be set apart for this purpose as the number of colored children between the ages of six and seventeen bear to the whole number of children in the District.

These are the principal points of difference between the Senate bill and the substitute reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia. I may say that the committee were unanimous in their approval of these provisions, and I trust that that foreshadows the unanimity in the House.

We may have differences of opinion in regard to the proper policy to be pursued in respect to slavery; but we all concur in this, that we have been brought to a juncture in our national affairs in which four millions of a degraded race lying far below the average civilization of the age and depressed by an almost universal prejudice are to be set free in our midst. The question now is, what is our first duty in regard to them?

WAR NEWS.

The SPEAKER. With the permission of the gentleman from New Hampshire the Chair will lay before the House a communication from the Secretary of War.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON CITY,
WEDNESDAY, June 8, 1864, 12 noon.

SIR: A dispatch from General Grant dated at five minutes past three yesterday afternoon reports: "All has been very quiet to-day. No casualties reported."

A dispatch from General Sherman dated at Acworth yesterday evening at half past six says: "I have been to Alatoona Pass and find it very admirable for our purpose. It is the gate through the last or most eastern spur of the Alleghenies. It now becomes as useful to us as it was to the enemy, being easily defended from either direction. The roads hence from Acworth into Georgia are large and good, and the country more open." Details of the position of our troops and contemplated movements are given, but are not needed for public information. The dispatch further states that "the enemy is not in our immediate front, but his signals are seen on Lost mountain and Kennesaw."

Dispatches from General Canby dated June 3 have been received, which report satisfactory progress in the organization of his command.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT—AGAIN.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think there can be no difference of opinion on this, that it is our duty to give to this people the means of education, that they may be prepared for all the privileges which we may desire to give them hereafter.

I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The substitute reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 495) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company."

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend the third section by inserting after the word "Washington" the words "on relation of the complainant;" so that it will read:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That for each and every violation of the foregoing provisions the said company shall forfeit and pay a sum not less than five dollars and not more than $100, which may be recovered with costs of suit, on complaint of any person aggrieved, in any court of competent jurisdiction in the District of Columbia. Such action may be prosecuted in the name of the city of Washington, on relation of the complainant, and one half of the penalties recovered shall be for the use of the city of Washington, and the other half for the use of the complainant.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend by striking out the proviso to the third section, as follows:

Provided, however, That any party complainant shall, before commencing such action, file with the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia a bond to be approved by the clerk of the said court with at least one surety, to be approved by said clerk, and in a penalty of $100, conditioned that the complainant shall well and truly save harmless and indemnify the said city against the payment of all costs and charges which shall be recovered against said city by reason of the failure of the complainant to prosecute or maintain his said complaint.

And inserting in lieu thereof as follows:

Provided, however, That in no event shall the city of Washington be liable for any costs in any such suit, when judgment may be rendered against the relator of all costs, in case of his failure to prosecute or maintain his complaint.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the first section by striking out "three" and inserting "two," so that it will read, "that the railroad company shall run one car each way every two minutes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend by inserting at the end of section six as follows:

Each of which tickets shall entitle the holder to one passage in any car of the company for any distance on either main line of railway, or on either branch thereof, or between the terminus of either of said branches and any point on said railway or branch.

So as to make it read:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said company, within twenty days from and after the passage of this act, to have prepared tickets for passage on their cars, and to keep them at their office for sale by the package of twenty-five, or over, at the rate of twenty-five for the dollar; each of which tickets, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend the bill by inserting the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That if the said railroad company shall refuse or neglect to make the returns required by the act, it shall forfeit and pay, for the use of the Treasury of the United States, the sum of $100 per day for each and every day of such neglect; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate to notify the district attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia of such refusal or neglect, and he shall forthwith commence proceedings for the recovery of the penalties aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to amend the first section of the bill by adding the words "every day, including Sunday;" so that it will read, "that from and after the passage of this act the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company shall, during all sessions of Congress, run one car each way every day, including Sunday, every two minutes."

Mr. BEAMAN. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that is rather too stringent a provision. Even if the propriety of running the cars on Sunday be conceded, it is not necessary that they shall run so frequently as on week days.

Mr. DRIGGS. As I prepared my amendment in a hurry, I will say briefly to the House what it is that I desire to accomplish. I think that the existing law, if properly construed, means that the cars shall run every day of the week. I withdraw the amendment which I offered, and will substitute this for it:

Provided, That the Company shall hereafter cause the cars to be run on said road and all its branches each and every day of the week.

Mr. HOLMAN. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that while it is important that cars shall run on Sundays on account of the hospitals at the termini of the road on Seventh and Fourteenth streets and Pennsylvania avenue, it is a matter of the utmost importance that the cars should run on that day especially for the convenience not only of the citizens generally, but of ladies and men who are visiting this capital for the purpose of seeing patients at the hospitals.

Mr. DRIGGS. If the gentleman will allow me—

Mr. HOLMAN. While it is a matter of the first importance that the street cars should run on Sunday, still there is not the same necessity to have them run as frequently on Sunday as on other days of the week. I think, therefore, on Sundays that the cars should not be required to run oftener than every fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, it is well known that in all the principal cities where they were originally opposed to the running of cars on Sunday they have after experience been compelled to yield their objection. It has been found necessary to have the cars run on Sunday for the transit from one portion to another of persons who desire to attend to the Sabbath services at the different churches. Now there is no city where the cars are more needed on Sunday than Washington. It is well known that we cannot go about to the several hospitals unless at vast expense for coach hire. Last Sunday I was compelled to pay $8 for the use of a carriage for one hour. If it is not wrong to go out in carriages I do not see why it is wrong to go in the street cars. There is no feeling of reverence for the Sabbath involved in the question. We are obliged now to keep livery stables open on Sunday as well as other days.

Mr. STROUSE. I am in favor of the amendment.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will move a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan. I think it will better accomplish the object which he seeks. I move that there be a provision that the cars shall be run on such railway according to the original act.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think that will cover the whole case.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. According to the original act they are required to run every five minutes on Pennsylvania avenue, and on Seventh and Fourteenth streets every fifteen minutes.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this amendment; and when I say that, I have leave also to say that I yield to no man in my devotion to the sentiment and feeling of strict observance of the Sabbath day. But, sir, I look on it as a mockery to suspend the running of the street cars on that day in this or any other city, when we permit, not only permit but grant a general license to everybody who can afford it to ride in his or her carriage to church or any other place on that day. You or any member here can hire a barouche or phaeton and go to any place of public worship on Sunday morning; there is nothing wrong in that, forsooth; but the poor man, the laboring man and his family cannot have the street cars either to go to church or to refresh themselves from the heat and dust of the city in the green fields of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say to you and to this House that we must exercise a more enlarged liberality, a little more feeling and disposition toward securing the means for the benefit and comfort of the masses of our people, and not alone for the favored few. Let these street cars run on Sunday. Let the laboring man, he who works from morn to night and earns his daily bread by the sweat of his face, use them to go wherever he pleases for five cents. Let us act in a liberal spirit. There is no outrage on any religious observance due to that day. We can afford to be liberal in this country. Let him who goes to chapel, let him who goes to the green fields and meadows around here, let the servant-maid, the washerwoman, everybody, in fact, who chooses to, ride in these cars on Sunday as well as any other day. Let them have the same privilege as those who are able to ride in carriages. Let us act fairly and impartially.

I am glad we have at last a question devoid of party politics; one in which we do not find the inevitable negro. I see that we have cars where "colored persons" are admitted. I have not the slightest objection to that; if they pay they have the right to ride. As I have already said, we ought to act in a liberal spirit toward the citizens of Washington.

But now, sir, the city of Washington has become truly metropolitan, and the cars run from the navy-yard to Georgetown, and from the river to the extreme northern limits of the city, and we may have other roads. The world is moving; let us move with it. Let the cars run every day. There should be no objection here, and whatever the feelings, sentiments, and opinions of our friends here may be in relation to a violation of the Sabbath, let them sink such considerations when they remember that those who can afford to, ride in their carriages everywhere and anywhere on the Sabbath; whereas the poor man is obliged to walk or remain at home for want of a conveyance. Now Washington has become an important place. The population, permanent residents and sojourners, amounts to two hundred thousand, and they want facilities of locomotion from one part of the city to another.

We are the Legislature of the District; we make the laws, and we have no right to stint or circumscribe any right or privilege the citizens may demand. Let us act with a liberal, humane, charitable, and enlarged spirit, and let us grant what the people demand for the benefit of all classes, irrespective of any private feelings, private considerations, or sinister motives.

Mr. HALE. I trust this amendment will not prevail. We surely are not going to set an example to the people of this country of such a violation of the Sabbath day as this amendment would bring about. If gentlemen have no conscientious scruples on the subject, some respect at least is due to those who have. The Congress of the United States should not at any time, but least of all now, authorize any act which, in the estimation of a large portion of the American people, involves a violation of the law of God.

So far as I know, no city in the Union authorizes or compels street cars to run on Sunday.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman is mistaken. The cars are authorized to run on Sunday in Boston, New York, Detroit, and many other cities.

Mr. HALE. I was not aware of the fact, and I am sorry to hear that it is so. I did not suppose there was any city in this country which permitted cars to run on Sunday. I still hope there are none which compels a corporation to violate the Sabbath as this amendment does.

I certainly shall never vote to permit, much less require, a corporation of our own creation to violate what I believe to be a law of God. There is no necessity for it in this case. The street railroad has only been in use here for a comparatively short time, and people got along without street cars any day in the week, but now they say we cannot do without cars on Sunday. They are no doubt a great convenience on week days, but on Sundays as all the offices are closed members cannot use them for that purpose.

The principal reason given for compelling the company to run cars on Sunday is that the rails lead out to one or two hospitals in the neighborhood, and a few members of Congress would be accommodated easier or cheaper than in any other way in getting to them. This reason would be wholly insufficient if there were no other means of conveyance, as the distance is by no means too great to walk; but there are, and always will be, ample modes of getting there without using the cars. By this law we compel the drivers and conductors of these cars to work on Sunday, on pain of losing their places if they are too conscientious to break what they may regard as a law of God.

The horses, too, who drag these cars six days in a week are fairly entitled to rest on the seventh, by the law of humanity as well as the "higher law."

I make no impeachment of the motives or principles of gentlemen who advocate this measure; but I doubt the wisdom and policy of it, to say nothing of its moral aspect, which with me is conclusive, as I could not vote for it without doing what I regard a moral wrong.

I therefore earnestly hope the House will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, demanded the previous question.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that until I can perfect the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. My amendment is to add to the end of the first section the following:

Provided, That on Sundays the said company shall run cars at the same intervals of time as prescribed in the original law for other days of the week.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. CHANLER. My object in rising is not so much to enter upon a discussion of the religious aspects of the matter as to address myself to a practical aspect of the question. I should be very sorry if, in voting against the gentleman who last spoke, I should be considered as acting contrary to religious rules, or to the good of society; but experience in New York has proved that one of the best means of controlling that element of disorder which is set at liberty on Sundays in the streets of the city, is to furnish them with cheap means of getting out of the city and dispersing through the country. If left in the city they horde in places which certainly are objectionable, and where they indulge in the lowest habits. By tempting them out in the fresh air we remove them from the very sources of vice.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 59, nays 40, not voting 83; as follows:

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. PRICE moved to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was put; and the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAR NEWS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, just received from the War Department:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON CITY,
WEDNESDAY, June 8, 1864, 1.30 p. m.

SIR: A dispatch from Mr. Dana, at General Grant's headquarters, dated last night at 8.30 p. m., announces a victory by General Hunter over the rebels beyond Staunton, and that the rebel General Jones was killed on the battle-field. The dispatch is as follows:

"Richmond Examiner of to-day speaks of the defeat of General W. E. Jones by General Hunter, twelve miles beyond Staunton, Virginia. General Jones killed on the field. His successor retired to Waynesboro', and now holds mountains between Charlottesville and Staunton. The paper further states that 'no hospitals or stores were captured by Hunter.'"

Another dispatch announces that our forces occupy Staunton.

Hunter's victory and that our troops occupy Staunton is confirmed by the following dispatch just received from General Butler:

"All quiet on my line. Richmond papers of June 7 give intelligence of a fight at Mount Crawford between General Hunter and General Jones, in which Hunter was victorious and Jones, rebel commander, was killed. Staunton was afterwards occupied by the Union forces. The fighting was on Sunday."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

General applause on the floor and in the galleries followed the reading of the communication.

VOTES RECORDED.

Mr. COX asked and obtained unanimous consent to have his vote recorded on the passage of the tariff bill. He voted "no."

Mr. J. C. ALLEN asked and obtained similar consent, stating that he had been absent by reason of sickness when the vote was taken. He voted "no."

Mr. L. MYERS asked and obtained similar consent in reference to the vote on the passage of the bill for the punishment of guerrillas. He voted "ay."

WASHINGTON GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill (S. No. 77) to amend the act incorporating the Washington Gas-Light Company.

The bill provides that from and after March 1, 1864, the Washington Gas-Light Company shall not receive from consumers more than thirty-three and a third cents per hundred cubic feet of gas furnished by it, subject to a discount of not less than ten per cent. on all bills for gas if paid at the office of the company within five days from the rendition thereof, provided all arrears have been paid.

The first amendment reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia was to strike out the word "March" and insert in lieu thereof the word "June."

Mr. TRACY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was then agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia was to insert before the words "from consumers" the words "more than thirty-one cents per hundred cubic feet of gas furnished by it to the Government, nor."

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Committee for the District of Columbia has not been unanimous in its action on this bill. There are, I think, other interests to be protected by that committee and by this House besides those of the Washington Gas-Light Company, or of any other corporation. After this bill had been introduced in the House, a memorial from the common council and aldermen of the city of Washington and signed by the mayor was laid before us, earnestly protesting against any increase in the price of gas. I will read a protest and petition signed by hundreds of the people of this city which was also laid before our committee:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The undersigned, residents and gas consumers of the city of Washington, respectfully protest against any increase in the price of gas, believing such increase to be unjust and unfair toward the people of said city; and also pray your honorable bodies to grant an act of incorporation to the "People's Gas-Light Company," who agree to furnish the United States Government, corporation of Washington, and citizens with gas for $2.50 per thousand feet—the same as is now charged in other large cities of the Union.

It was such representations from the people and the authorities of the city that induced the minority of the committee to investigate this subject. We find as the result of our inquiries that in Brooklyn, New York, and Boston the gas companies charge only $2.50 per thousand feet for gas, paying the Government tax themselves, while in the city of Washington, where the average cost of gas to the Government and the people, after deducting the discount of ten per cent., is $2.61, that tax is imposed upon the consumers. The stock of the New York gas companies which charge only $2.50 per thousand feet is very much above par. The fifty dollar shares of one of these companies are selling at $300, which is an advance of six hundred per cent. If the representations of this Washington company, in respect to the cost of making gas and the necessity of suspending operations at present prices are correct, how could that be the fact in relation to the New York companies?

One word now in relation to the profits of the Washington Gas-Light Company of this city in previous years. According to the statement of the superintendent of these works, the company has reserved $50,000 from its profits since its organization in 1848, which it has expended in repairs and the extension of its pipes and mains, and in addition to this has cleared a net profit of seven and one fifth per cent. on all the capital invested from the first. It is admitted, also, that they have divided a dividend of ten per cent. per annum since January, 1856, to January, 1864, at which time they failed to declare a dividend.

These statements should be taken in connection with the fact that the original outlay of $50,000 in the erection of rosin works was nearly all sunk in the failure of those works.

In 1852 the capital stock was increased by an act of Congress to $300,000. This was expended in the erection of the island works and the extension of mains. And, sir, it was stated before the committee by a gentleman whose sacred profession should entitle him to credit, and who was formerly the superintendent of the company, that members of the company were the original contractors of this work and sub-let it from twenty-five to forty cents on the original cost, payable in stock, and by selling the remaining stock at and above par realized by the operation almost one half of the $300,000 as profit.

But, sir, instead of $50,000, it may be shown that more than $250,000 have been laid aside from the profits of this company in addition to the annual dividends of ten per cent.

The original capital stock by the act of July 8, 1848, was.....	$50,000

In this communication I wish to lay before the House a correspondence carried on in 1862 between Mr. Brown and Commodore Smith, chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. The first is a letter from Mr. Brown, called out by a section in the naval appropriation bill making provision for the erection of gas works at the navy-yard:

OFFICE GAS-LIGHT COMPANY,
WASHINGTON, July 22, 1862.

DEAR COMMODORE: I notice in the naval appropriation bill an item for gas works at the Washington navy-yard.

Since the estimate was approved by you for this expenditure Congress has (by act of July 11, 1863,) reduced the price of gas to all consumers, fixing the net cost to the Government at only $2.52 per thousand feet, instead of $3.15 as heretofore, being the very heavy reduction of sixty-three cents, and allowing only two cents more per thousand than is paid in New York, Boston, Baltimore, &c.

I speak from an experience of fourteen years in the business, and am not mistaken when I aver that this is less than gas can be made and distributed for at any works which may be erected at the navy-yard so long as coal costs by the twenty thousand tons eight dollars in the sheds, as is now the case.

This company, at the instance of the Government, expended nearly twenty thousand dollars to carry its mains, &c., from the Capitol to the navy-yard, for the particular accommodation of that establishment; as there was no prospect of nor has there been any private consumption of gas on the line at all justifying such an outlay. The clear profit on this whole line of mains has not reached five per cent. per annum, and to take the navy-yard consumption from us now would reduce it to less than one per cent., and thus involve a loss to us of the whole sum expended, as before remarked, at the instance of, and as an accommodation to, the Government. This injustice I know you will not permit to be done. The company thinks in common fairness it has a right to furnish all the gas used by the Government in Washington, since that same Government, by the exercise of a questionable power, has so seriously reduced the price of gas as to hazard the very existence of the company; for the price of $2.52 allows only a profit of three cents per thousand feet beyond the actual cost of gas at our counter in 1861, and of course we can only live by a largely increased consumption of gas, (which was the argument used in Congress to justify a reduction in price,) instead of a withdrawal of so heavy a consumer as the navy-yard.

I have the honor, &c.

J. F. BROWN, Secretary in charge.

Commodore SMITH, Chief Bureau, &c.

Now, will the Clerk read the Commodore's reply?

The Clerk read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, July 23, 1862.

SIR: I have received and duly considered your letter of the 22d instant.

Having found the gas bills for the Washington navy-yard so heavy, averaging about $811 per month, I considered it my duty to the Government to endeavor to obtain gas at a less cost.

I therefore asked an appropriation to erect gas works in the yard, and feel confident we can make gas from petroleum at a cost of not exceeding $1 per thousand cubic feet. We pay for gas used at the navy-yard and hospital near New York $1.50 per thousand cubic feet.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH SMITH.

J. F. BROWN, Esq., Secretary (in charge) Washington Gas-Light Company.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, August 1, 1862.

SIR: Your communication of the 22d ultimo, calling the attention of the bureau to the naval appropriation bill—item, "gas works" at the Washington navy-yard—and also reduction of the price of gas to consumers, &c., has been received, and the civil engineer of this bureau consulted on the subject. A copy of his report is herewith transmitted.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH SMITH.

J. F. BROWN, Esq., Secretary (in charge) Washington Gas-Light Company.

Mr. PATTERSON. Commodore Smith referred the letter of Mr. Brown to the chief engineer at the Bureau of Yards and Docks for a report upon its contents. I call the attention of the House to his reply. It will be found both interesting and instructive:

The Clerk read, as follows:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS,
NAVY DEPARTMENT, August 9, 1862.

SIR: I have examined the communication from Mr. Joseph F. Brown, secretary of the Washington Gas Company, in reference to the construction of gas works at the Washington navy-yard, and respectfully report:

When the gas was introduced into the yard it was reported that there was an understanding between the gas company and the Navy Department that if the company would extend their main from the Capitol to the navy-yard the Government would become a consumer at the yard. I have no knowledge of the existence of such an understanding, except the reports at the time; but if such was the fact, the Department certainly expected and would have the right to claim that the yard should be amply supplied with gas of good quality.

The consumption at the yard commenced in July, 1855, and from the first there were many complaints of the irregular burning of the gas and of insufficient light. On the 22d February, 1856, I was obliged to report to the commandant that since the introduction of the gas there had been constant reports and complaints from the watchmen of the failure of some of the lamps to burn regularly, and that on several occasions they were entirely without gas light in the yard. These complaints continued and became so frequent, and the quantity of gas charged became so large, that on the 27th January, 1857, only about eighteen months after the introduction of the gas into the yard, I again reported on the subject and recommended the erection of gas works in the yard.

The statements made by Mr. Brown merit particular notice, and I respectfully call your attention to some of them. He says: "This company, at the instance of the Government, expended nearly $20,000 to carry its mains, &c., from the Capitol to the navy-yard, for the particular accommodation of that establishment." I do not know what Mr. Brown means by "mains, &c.," unless he means the lamp posts, lamps, and side branches, along the avenue and Eighth street, none of which were put up for the particular accommodation of that establishment, (navy-yard.) The only expense which could have been incurred for the accommodation of the navy-yard is the cost of the mains, and that not entirely, because the same main supplies a large number of street lamps, marine headquarters, and private consumers, and at this time two Army hospitals. From a very correct map of the city, I find the length of main required to convey gas from the Capitol to the navy-yard is 6,312 feet. This pipe can be purchased here at 55 cents, and laid for 16 cents per foot, making a total cost of 71 cents per foot; but to provide for contingencies I estimate it at 80 cents per foot, making an aggregate of $5,056, instead of near $20,000, as stated by Mr. Brown. An examination of the gas bills shows that the amount paid the gas company for gas at the navy-yard during seven years is $20,750. How much of this is profit it is difficult to determine; but I have no doubt it is fully 50 per cent., and if so the profit has been $10,375, in seven years, on an expenditure of $5,050. Taking it for granted that the main was for the exclusive use of the yard, which, however, is not the fact, because, as before stated, it supplies a number of street lamps, the marine headquarters, and private consumers, now a profit of $10,375, on an investment of $5,050, is at the rate of more than 205 per cent. in seven years, or very nearly 30 per cent. per annum.

Mr. Brown states that at $2.52 per thousand there is only a profit of three cents on the thousand; if this be so, then the profit on the gas supplied to the yard has been as follows: during five and a half years of the seven, the price paid was $3.50 per thousand, and the remaining one and a half year $3.15 per thousand. If the cost of manufacture is $2.49, then the profit $3.50 per thousand is $1.01 per thousand, or more than forty per cent., and at $3.15 it is sixty-six cents per thousand, or more than twenty-six per cent.

I have endeavored to ascertain the cost of the manufacture of gas in the different cities, and learn from good authority that in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, the cost ranges from ninety cents to $1.20 per thousand, and there is pretty good evidence that it does not exceed those prices in the fact that the Brooklyn Gas Company have voluntarily entered into a contract to supply the Brooklyn yard for three years at $1.50 per thousand, and this is certainly at a profit, otherwise they would not undertake it.

Upon the presumption that the Washington company can manufacture the gas as cheap as the establishments in other cities, I assume $1.20, the highest price named, as the cost of its manufacture, and find their profit for five and a half years has been $2.30 per thousand, or more than 191 per cent.

The Washington works are probably constructed in the best manner, and doubtless they are ably managed; the only cause then which should produce a difference in the cost of the manufacture of gas is a difference in the cost of coal, which I presume in ordinary times is not material.

This company seems to exhibit great anxiety to prevent the construction of gas works in the yard, that they may retain the navy-yard as a consumer. Now, to show of how little value the profit on that consumption is, if the statement made by Mr. Brown in regard to the cost of manufacture be correct, I submit this calculation: Mr. Brown says at $2.52 the profit is only three cents per thousand feet, making the actual cost of manufacturing gas $2.49 per thousand. A profit of three cents on an expenditure of $2.49 is about one and two tenths per cent.; and as in ordinary times, when the workmen are not employed at night, the gas bills for the yard amount to only about $100 per month, according to Mr. Brown's own statement, the profit would be only $1.20 per month on the whole consumption of the yard.

This sum would not pay the expense of attending the meters, and is too insignificant to warrant any exertion on the part of the company to defeat the erection of works in the yard. I am satisfied, however, that Mr. Brown has made a very extravagant estimate of the cost of manufacture; but if his estimate be correct, the establishment must be very badly constructed or badly managed, neither of which do I believe to be the fact. I believe the works are as well constructed and as well managed as any gas works in the country, that the secretary has made a great error in his estimate, and that the actual cost of gas is far less than stated by him.

Probably no article of manufacture affords a greater profit than gas; and this is evident from the fact that the stock of gas companies is seldom in market except upon the death of a stockholder, or when one meets with adversity to render a sale necessary. That the profits of this company are enormous I have no doubt, for it is said that the capital stock is $500,000, and that they have expended over $800,000 in the construction, enlargement, and extension of their works; this extra $300,000 and upwards, then, has been expended from the profits of the establishment, while, at the same time, the dividends to stockholders have always been ten per cent. I believe it can scarcely be said that a full and sufficient supply has ever been furnished the yard by the company. During the past year much night-work has been done, and I have heard many complaints of the insufficiency of light. Under these circumstances I do not conceive that the company have any just cause of complaint if the Department erect its own works and manufacture its own gas, the company having failed to meet the reasonable expectations based upon the alleged understanding referred to.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. S. SANGER,

Engineer of Bureau, &c.

Bear Admiral JOSEPH SMITH, Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Mr. PATTERSON. So much in respect to the past. It seems to me, sir, that a company which has enjoyed such golden opportunities for amassing wealth through sixteen years of peace should share the sacrifices of this time of war with the Government and the people who are beginning to feel the burdens of taxation.

It is said the price of coal, which in 1862 was $8, has now advanced to $13.50, and that there should be a corresponding increase in the price of gas. That does not follow, if the profits heretofore have been exorbitant, which I think has been clearly shown. But I have some doubt as to the fact. Coal costs by the single ton in this city at the present time, as is stated, $13 50; it is obtained, however, by the cargo, as I am told by the able and accomplished superintendent of the insane asylum in this District, at $9 50 per ton.

But, sir, if gas light can be furnished with a fair profit in Boston, Brooklyn, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore at $2 50, why should the price be advanced here, where the Government is now paying $2 52 and the people $2 70 per thousand feet, and where the Government tax is charged to the consumer, as it is not in those cities? The cost of coal and labor is not greater here than in most of those places. I have inquired somewhat carefully to ascertain the actual cost of gas at the present time. From New York I learn that the cost there is $1 80 per thousand feet at the moment of delivery to the consumer.

At the insane asylum of this District, already referred to, gas of a superior quality is made from the refuse of petroleum oil, a more expensive article than coal, at one dollar per thousand feet, or, including the interest on all outlays for the construction and repair of works, at something less than two dollars per thousand feet. These, it will be borne in mind, are private works. Public works can manufacture gas at a much lower rate.

I now call attention to an estimate which I have made of the cost of producing gas in this city. I think it will be found to approximate very exactly to the facts in the case, and if there is any variation that it is in favor of the company.

A ton of coal will yield, allowing four feet of gas to the pound, 8,960 feet. Value of 8,960 feet of gas at $2 70 per thousand feet is $24 19. At $2 52 per thousand the cost to Government is $22 58.

The members of this House should remember in connection with these estimates, made upon what I regard as good authority, that the Government is paying this company over $100,000 a year.

It is urged that the depreciation of the currency has lessened the profits of the company. I admit it, but claim that the increased quantity of gas consumed in hospitals and other public buildings, resulting from the war, renders a full equivalent for the loss on the currency.

I do not wish to detain the House further upon this subject. I have simply done what I believed to be my duty in presenting these facts. I think an increase in the price of gas in this city would be a wrong done both to the Government and the people; and I therefore earnestly desire that the bill may be defeated.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I have no desire to inflict any outrage upon this House or upon the people of this city, but I wish to deal with this question simply as a practical business question. My friend from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] has dwelt so long with the stars and the planets that it is perhaps difficult for him to come down and look upon sublunary affairs in a practical light.

I undertake to say that the price which this company now receives from the Government for its gas will not pay the cost of the crude article of coal they use in its manufacture and the cost of manual labor necessarily employed. I care not what have been the past profits of this company; I care not what profits may have been made by the original contractors in building the works; and I care not what speculations may have been put forth before this House in reference to the navy-yard, or officers connected with the same. I will show the cost of the materials of which the gas is manufactured and the cost of labor, and then we can determine definitely whether or not we are paying the company a fair and reasonable rate for what they give us. While I would not inflict any wrong upon this community, I am not willing that the Government of the United States shall descend to petty larceny by the use of its power to compel this company to furnish gas for less than the cost of its production; and I say that unless we come, as we should do, to the relief of this company, we shall be doing them a great wrong, and shall subject the good faith and honor of the Government to merited censure.

The gentleman from New Hampshire has introduced before the House a memorial signed, he says, by many distinguished men of this city and by some of the city officials, protesting against increasing the price of gas. Sir, that was a memorial praying Congress to charter a new gas company, and it was got up by the parties who were pressing the committee for a charter. We have granted that charter, but at the same time the men who signed that petition, representing the city government, have said to individuals of that committee that the present company should be relieved and be permitted to increase the price of their gas.

Now, sir, there are certain facts which are stronger than arguments. Coal costs to-day in the city of Washington $13 88 a ton at wholesale, delivered, and that is what this company paid for the last coal they purchased. And I have a letter from the president of the Manhattan Company of New York saying that coal costs them in the city of New York $10 50 a ton; and they buy in immense quantities. I know also the price of coal in Philadelphia, in Buffalo, in Albany, and other places, because I have for years been interested in the sale of gas coal. I have sold and am selling gas coal now in the city of Albany for ten dollars a ton, or more than that sum.

Now, the quantity of gas produced from a ton of coal depends very much upon the quality of the coal. It varies from seventy-five hundred to ninety-three hundred feet, and in some instances very pure coal will yield ten thousand feet. The coal used here is a very fair quality of gas coal, and fifty-seven tons, the daily consumption of this company yields four hundred and sixty-five thousand feet of crude gas, as it goes into the first meter. That is not the amount which goes to the consumer, but the amount prepared by the company and kept on hand, subject to leakage and condensation. Now, I appeal to a member of this House—and I could state the fact from my own observation and experience—but I appeal to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. STARR,] who is familiar with this subject, to state what is the loss of gas by condensation and leakage, taking the average of gas companies in the United States.

Mr. STARR. I will say, being somewhat professionally acquainted with the business, that the average loss, taking all the works in the United States, is not less than sixteen per cent. In large cities like New York and Philadelphia the loss runs from thirteen to sixteen per cent.; but the average, taking all the works in the United States, is sixteen per cent. on the aggregate products of the works.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from New Jersey if gas stock is not considered the most valuable stock to be had, and if it does not generally pay the largest dividends.

Mr. STARR. I can say that investments in gas stock are generally considered good, better, perhaps, than the average investments of the country.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Having received the answer to my question from the gentleman from New Jersey, I will proceed with my calculation. The result of the daily consumption of fifty-seven tons of coal is 465,000 feet of gas by actual measurement. Now, sir, to be liberal in the premises, I have deducted but fifteen per cent. for condensation, and that I undertake to say from personal knowledge is a very reasonable and low estimate. The result of that deduction is 395,250 feet as the product of the consumption of fifty-seven tons of coal. I will call it in round numbers 400,000. The cost of the coal per day at $13 50 a ton is $769 50. But the actual price paid to-day for coal is $13 88. The cost of the coal then is $769 50 per day, and the labor upon it is $375. Wages are $2 50 a day. That is what is now paid by this company and other companies. And for that reason, and by reason of the enhanced value of coal, all our gas companies which are restricted by legislation are appealing to the legislative authorities for relief. Those not so restricted are obtaining relief by raising their prices. Computing the price of the coal and of the labor, you have $1,142 60 as the cost of the coal and the labor on it in the production of this gas, that is the manual labor only without reference to the interest upon capital invested, the incidental expenses, taxes, insurance, and salaries for superintendents. In payment for this expense for manual labor and coal, they receive, at the present price of gas, which we permit them to charge, but $1,045 per day.

Figures, according to an old adage, do not lie. Men may be in error in their estimates, and their errors may be perfectly honest. I would indorse my honorable friend from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] for honesty the world over, but I cannot indorse the correctness of his opinions in regard to the cost of producing gas on earth, of which cost he has no personal knowledge. His professional avocations have taken him too long into the upper regions of space—where, according to the nebular theory of La Place, in which both the honorable gentleman and myself are believers, gas is furnished in untold quantities, and at very reasonable cost—to permit him to know or consider the cost of its production here below, where coal and machinery and labor all range at higher prices.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a practical question.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I will certainly yield for that purpose.

Mr. WILSON. My question is this: if this gas company is losing money every day, why is it that its stock keeps at par or above?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. The reason is that the company has cherished (perhaps delusively) confidence in the good faith and integrity of Congress, and has believed that the Government would have honesty and fairness enough to come forward and give reasonable protection to their interests and capital.

I am informed by one of the prominent directors of the company, (Colonel Freeman,) a gentleman of high standing and unimpeachable integrity, whom I have known most favorably for some years, that unless this relief be extended to the gas company it will not be able to and cannot supply either the Government or this city with gas.

Mr. PATTERSON. The gentleman has suggested that I have dwelt so long among the nebulae that I do not understand this question practically. I will ask him whether if I should purchase a coal mine in Pennsylvania and sell coal to this gas company it would make my views more practical.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I rather think it would. I should most certainly hope for such a result, but no coal comes from western Pennsylvania to Washington, and before it can do so, under the laws of trade now existing, both the honorable gentleman and myself will cease to be members of this House.

Mr. BAXTER. I would ask the gentleman what the stock of this company was worth on the 1st of January, 1864.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I have learned from directors of the company that it was held at about 120, but without sales.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does the gentleman mean to say that this company, with its stock at twenty per cent. premium, comes here begging for relief?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I understand that this stock is held largely by minors and widows and orphans, who are dependent for support entirely upon its dividends, and I think I might mention many western railroads of which the gentleman may know something whose stocks are held above their real value.

Mr. BAXTER. What dividends has the company made?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. It has already been stated by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] that the company, taking their outlay and receipts from the beginning, have made on the average a little over seven per cent. I believe that to be true; but for the last six months they have made no dividend and they could make none. They are now in debt for the very coal which they have provided for the use of the Government and the city for the last six months.

Mr. BAXTER. What is the reserve capital of the company?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I do not know, nor do I care. If the gentleman means surplus, they have not a dollar.

Mr. BEAMAN. I would ask the gentleman if the dividend of seven per cent. was not made after the improvement of the mains?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I suppose the fact to be this, that the parties who originally owned this stock years ago did make money on the construction of the work, but that is no reason why the present innocent holders of the stock should be losers. I have very great respect for the integrity of every member of this House, but I doubt very much if any gentleman here would have been conscientiously unwilling to make money under such circumstances. Certainly I should not, and I am honest enough to own it. I believe that every man who has enterprise enough to go into these investments and spend his capital and money in them should receive a fair remuneration. But that has nothing to do with the present case.

But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot take up the time of the House by going into further details on this matter. I undertake only to say that the cost of coal to-day is such that the company cannot pay for it with the price which it receives for gas, without any reference to interest, incidental expenses, insurance, taxes, or anything of that kind. I may also allude to the fact that in the making of gas there is a large quantity of lime used, the price of which has also gone up very high.

I will point the House now to a significant fact as indicating what is true in regard to gas companies all over the country. I see in the Syracuse Journal of the 1st of June, 1864, a notice that the price of gas has been raised there by the action of the common council—which has the control of the company there in respect to price—from $2 50 per thousand feet to $4 10. In the city of Utica the price is raised to $4 20. And yet the price of coal in the city of Utica is only $8 50 per ton, and in the city of Syracuse $8 per ton, or about that; and these prices will be increased if the cost of material and labor shall continue to advance.

This state of things exists all over the country. It could not be otherwise in these times of inflated currency. Everything is now enhanced in price. We pay our laborers more. We pay our servants more. We pay more for everything that we eat, drink, and wear. And it is right that we should. And yet it is sought to defeat the meritorious application of this company, because two or three years ago, when coal was lower, when labor was cheaper, when everything cost less, gas could be profitably supplied here at less rates than the Government authorized to be charged.

The sole purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to allow this company to charge a reasonable increase in the price of gas. It receives now from ordinary consumers $2 70 per thousand feet, and from the Government $2 52. This bill authorizes it to charge the Government $2 89, and to charge private consumers $3, which is $1 10 less per thousand feet than is charged in the city of Syracuse, and $1 20 less than is charged in the city of Utica, and less by like amounts than is charged in other cities throughout the country.

There is another consideration which the House should bear in mind. Washington has been aptly styled "the city of magnificent distances." We all know how much space there is in it unoccupied by houses, and we also know that the profits of gas companies depend largely upon the number of tenements furnished with gas upon a given length of main. This company has extended its mains from the navy-yard to the city of Georgetown. Members know very well how much of the intervening space is unoccupied by dwellings. All over the city it has laid fifty-seven miles of mains. The consumers of gas in this city do not average, per mile of main, one fourth of the average of other cities. I am simply desirous of having justice and equity done to this company, nothing more. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the bill and amendments be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendments were laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with various amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line seven, to strike out the word "even" and insert "odd;" and after the word "of" to insert "public;" and after the word "land" to insert "not mineral;" and in line twelve to strike out the word "even" and to insert "odd;" and after the word "of" to insert "public;" and after the word "land" to insert "not mineral;" so that it will read:

That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Michigan, for the construction of a wagon road for military and postal purposes, from Saginaw city in said State, by the shortest and most feasible route, to the Straits of Mackinaw, every alternate or odd section of public land not mineral for three miles in width on each side of said road to the extent of three sections to the mile. Also for a road from Grand Rapids, in said State, through Newaygo, Traverse City, and Little Traverse, to the Straits of Mackinaw, every alternate or odd section of public land not mineral for three sections in width on each side of said road to the extent of three sections to the mile.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line twenty-one, after the word "be" to strike out the words "lawful for the commissioners or agents to be appointed by the Governor of said State to select (subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior) from the even vacant sections of land belonging to the United States," and to insert "the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to select such lands from the odd sections or parts of sections."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line thirty-three, to strike out the words "Governor of the" before the word "State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, after the enacting clause, to strike out the words, "that the benefits of this act shall be forfeited by the State of Michigan unless the Governor thereof shall officially communicate his acceptance of the same to the President of the United States within six months from the approval of this act: Provided, That when the Governor shall have so accepted the grant and shall have the lines of said roads located, upon his furnishing the Commissioner of the General Land Office," and to insert in lieu thereof, "that when the Governor of the State of Michigan shall furnish the Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line ten, after the word "charts" to strike out the word "definitely," and in line eleven to strike out the word "same" and insert "definite location of the line of each of said roads;" so that it will read:

That when the Governor of the State of Michigan shall furnish the Secretary of the Interior with maps and charts, showing the definite location of the line of each of said roads, it shall be his duty to have the land granted to each of said roads withheld from market, and reserved exclusively for the purposes aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four to strike out the following proviso:

Provided further, That in case the Governor of the State of Michigan shall deem it necessary to the letting of contracts for building the roads to sell or transfer any or all the lands hereby granted, it shall be lawful for him to do so, with the express provisions, however, that all such certificates for deeds or patents as he may find it necessary to give shall be in the form of contracts for deeds or patents, to be given only when the conditions of this grant are fully complied with; and when the commissioners appointed by the Governor shall certify, under oath, that any ten consecutive miles of either of said roads are completed, and the Governor is satisfied that the same has been done in accordance with the third section of this act, he may give final certificates for patents for three sections of land to each mile of road thus completed; and upon the presentation of such certificates to the Secretary of State of the State of Michigan, it shall be lawful for him to execute to the party or parties named in said certificates, or to his or their assigns, patents for the amount of land called for in said certificates.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And when the said Governor shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any ten consecutive miles of either of said roads have been completed under the provisions of this act, and in accordance with the third section thereof, stating definitely where said completed section of road commences and where it terminates, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to cause patents to issue to said State for three sections of land for each mile of road thus completed, as aforesaid, and soon until the whole of said roads is completed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line forty-two, after the word "be" to strike out the words "valid if;" in line forty-four, after the word "road" to insert the words "or for any road or for any part of any road made before the passage of this act;" in line forty-six, after the word "for" to strike out "the first" and to insert "each;" and in line forty-seven to strike out the words "and so on till the road or roads are completed," and insert "completed according to the provisions of this act;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided further, That no patents shall be given for any of the aforesaid lands before the completion of ten consecutive miles of road, or for any road or for any part of any road made before the passage of this act, or for any greater quantity than thirty sections for each ten miles completed according to the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the fourth section of the bill by adding to the end of the section these words:

Nothing in this proviso, however, shall be construed so as to prevent the application of so much of the said three sections per mile as may be necessary to finish any part of said road partly made before the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands whether this bill is agreeable to his views, and whether it has been before his committee.

Mr. HARLAN. The bill has been before the Committee on Public Lands, and the amendments that have been adopted by the Senate in Committee of the Whole were those proposed by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not desire to disturb anything about it that I know of. I suppose it is intended by our western friends that this Government shall never get another dollar out of these public lands. I only wanted to know whether there was a fair division of the spoils among themselves. [Laughter.] If they agree about it, I have nothing to say.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the passage of this bill will result in advantage to the Government in this: the roads proposed to be built will be constructed through a dense forest in the State of Michigan not now inhabited, or at least very sparsely inhabited, and if the roads should be built and alternate sections of land used for that purpose it will probably bring into market the remaining sections of the public lands.

Mr. HOWARD. I will add one single word. One effect of the passage of this bill will be to establish a post route between Saginaw, in the State of Michigan, and Mackinaw, in the same State, through a dense wilderness, as has been justly remarked, and through which hitherto the Government has had no means of transporting the public mail except by means of a train of dogs that has passed and repassed over that route during the winter, accompanied by men upon snow shoes, delaying the mail sometimes three or four weeks in its passage between those two points.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

INTERCOURSE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senate to take up a very important bill for consideration at the present time. It is Senate bill No. 232, in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection.

Mr. DAVIS. I will not oppose that motion, but I ask the privilege of presenting a joint resolution, that it may be read and printed for the information of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator will allow this bill to come up, I will not object.

The motion of Mr. MORRILL was agreed to.

PEACE RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. DAVIS. I now offer the joint resolution. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution without previous notice. The Chair hears no objection. The first reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read a first time by its title, as follows: "A joint resolution to restore peace among the people of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will now be read a second time.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of it.

Mr. HOWARD. Let us hear it.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

A joint resolution to restore peace among the people of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That three years of civil war in which the enormous expenditure of blood and treasure has no parallel in the world's history, and whose wide-spread rapine and diabolical cruelties have shocked Christendom, and which, from alternating success, has produced no essential results, prove that war was not the proper remedy for our national troubles.

Resolved, That if the people of America would save and restore their shattered Constitution and avert from themselves and their posterity the slavery of a military despotism and of a public debt, the interest upon which all the avails of their labor and economy will never meet, they must bring this war to a speedy close.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to propose a cessation of arms and an amnesty to the authorities of the confederate States of America, with a view to a convention of the people of all the States to reconstruct their Union; and if that cannot be effected, then that said convention agree upon the terms of a separation of the States without the further effusion of blood, and of a lasting peace among them.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to the reception of those resolutions.

Mr. DAVIS. They have been already received.

Mr. SUMNER. They cannot have been received in the dark.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to know what the motion is before the Senate, and whether that paper has been received yet by the Senate for its action. If it has not been received, I object to its reception.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the position of the resolution as the Chair understands it. The Senator from Kentucky desired to introduce it and the Chair called for an objection. After the reading of it by its title the Senator from Iowa desired that it should be read at large for further information, and it now being read, the Chair is of the opinion that it is within the power of any Senator to object to it at the present time.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. HOWARD. I object to it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWARD. I call the Senator from Kentucky to order.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Chair permit me—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution cannot be received.

Mr. HOWARD. It is not then subject to debate.

Mr. DAVIS. I just rise to a question of fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky can go on by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. CHANDLER. I object.

Mr. DAVIS. The Chair does not state the transaction as it occurred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the power of the Senator from Kentucky to appeal from the decision of the Chair, and that question is open to debate.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question will be, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

Mr. DAVIS. I just ask to state the facts without any comment upon them. I asked leave to present a joint resolution. The Chair replied that it would be read if there was no objection. It was read by its title, and the Chair announced that the resolution having once been read it was now upon its second reading. That is the fact.

Mr. JOHNSON. I submit to the Chair if that is the fact, as stated according to the recollection of the member from Kentucky, it is too late now to object to the reception of the resolution; and I will suggest, with all the respect which I feel for the Senator from Kentucky, that the better way to dispose of it is to vote upon it at once.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not care what disposition the Senate makes of it. I should like to have the resolution printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that as the resolution was about to be read a second time the Senator from Iowa called for its reading at large for information.

Mr. DAVIS. The Chair announced that it was on its second reading.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it when a resolution is introduced here, and it is read by its title, we do not know from that what it is, and gentlemen wish before making objection to the reception of a paper that the paper be read, and it is read that time for information, to see whether we will object to it or not. Otherwise men are obliged to make their objections without knowing what the thing is at all.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to say a word? All I ask is that the resolution be printed. I have no objection to the Senate making any disposition of it that it may please.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it that the gentleman by having it offered and objected to and not received will get it printed in the Globe; but I take it it cannot be printed by the Senate until it is received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON. The difference between the course proposed by members who have objected to the reception of the resolution and the point which I suggest will, I think, be in the public estimation very important. The objection to the reception of the resolution rules the resolution out, if I understand the rule, if a majority of the Senate shall sustain the objection. If that is taken now, it will appear by that vote, apparently unexplained, that there is but a majority of the Senate, or may be but a majority of the Senate, opposed to the resolution. I think the resolution is of that character that it is very important to have the Senate decide upon it at once, so that the public may know, and that the rebels may know, what is the opinion of the Senate upon this proposition.

It is hardly necessary to say for myself that I shall vote against the resolutions, each one of them, not only because I think them ill advised in the ordinary acceptance of the term, but because I think their adoption would be seriously mischievous to the cause in which we are now enlisted. I should very much prefer, therefore, that the Senate should at once come to a vote (to which I do not understand that the member from Kentucky has any objection) upon the resolutions themselves, and see how many Senators there are opposed to the propositions contained in the resolutions and how many in favor of them, a fact which will not be ascertained by a mere question upon their reception.

Mr. CONNESS. I am willing that the vote shall be taken now, and would prefer that it should be taken, but not upon the adoption of the resolutions. Sir, those are extraordinary resolutions. They contain, among other language, a recognition or admission that there is such a Power as the confederate States of America. I object to that, and to the reception of any document containing that language. If the Senate could take a direct vote upon the reception of the resolutions I think it would be well to ascertain how many Senators there are who are willing to receive such a paper; but for one, I am not in favor of letting the resolutions pass to the question of their adoption or rejection.

Mr. POMEROY. I am sure the decision of the Chair is entirely in harmony with the course that the Senate pursues every day. These resolutions were presented by the Senator from Kentucky by the courtesy of the Senator from Maine who had just had a bill brought up before the Senate. He asked leave of the Senator from Maine to introduce these resolutions. The Chair received the resolutions in order that the Senate might know what was their character. The final question upon their reception or whether Senators should object or not could not be determined until they were read. The Senator from Iowa desired to have the resolutions read in detail.

They have been read. Then was the proper time for the Senate to decide whether they would receive them or not. As soon as they were read, the almost spontaneous sentiment of the Senate was that they should not be received. That is the decision of the Senate which I think should be sustained.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If these resolutions are properly before the Senate—

Mr. POMEROY. They are not before the Senate. The decision of the Chair is that they are not.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The decision of the Chair as I understand is that they are before the Senate, but not for present consideration, objection being made. If they are before the Senate I move their rejection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the Senate I will withdraw that appeal and simply ask that the resolutions be printed by order of the Senate, and the Senate can vote whether they will print them or not.

Mr. POMEROY and Mr. SUMNER. I object to their printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the appeal to be withdrawn? Mr. DAVIS. Then I will not withdraw it.

Mr. HOWARD. If I understand the posture of this question rightly, it is this: the Chair has decided that the document offered by the honorable Senator from Kentucky has not been received by the Senate, and is not, therefore, the proper subject of its action; for such I believe would be the consequence of the non-reception of the paper. If we have not received it we cannot act upon it; it is not before us for consideration in any sense. I understand the Senator from Kentucky to have taken his appeal from that decision of the Chair; and the question now before the Senate is one of fact simply, and nothing but fact; and it is, whether we have actually received this paper which has been presented by the Senator from Kentucky for our consideration, or whether we have not received it. Upon that subject I have but one opinion. I hope the question will be taken on the subject-matter of the appeal whether we have received it or not; in other words, whether the simple reading of a paper to the Senate for the information of the Senate as to its contents, and for the purpose of enabling the Senate to determine in their own minds whether they will receive the paper is, in itself, a reception of the paper. It seems to me to involve such an absurdity as not to admit of any discussion.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to call for the order of business of the Senate.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Let us dispose of this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is too late for the Senator from Maine to object, this having been undertaken by unanimous consent.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like for us to set our foot on this thing at once and put an end to it.

Mr. GRIMES. When this resolution was introduced it was read a first time by its title. The Chair then said that the resolution would be read a second time, and I called for its reading at large. I take it that the resolution was before the Senate, having been read once in the ordinary form in which bills and joint resolutions are read. Hence it seems to me that the motion of the Senator from Indiana is in order to reject the resolution, and in that way we can have a positive and direct vote and a fair expression of the sentiment of the Senate on the subject embraced in the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to state one single fact. The Senator from Michigan and myself do not recollect the facts exactly alike. When the Senator from Maine moved to take up his bill out of its order I rose and addressed the Chair, and said that I would object simply for the purpose of presenting a joint resolution, merely to have it read and printed for the information of the Senate. The Senator from Maine then requested me to waive my objection to his motion until his bill was taken up, and then he would not object to my presentation of the resolution for the purpose which I had declared. After his bill was taken up and the Chair had announced that it was before the Senate, I rose and addressed the Chair and the Chair addressed me. I then presented a joint resolution. The Chair announced that the Senator from Kentucky asked leave to present a joint resolution and it would be read for the information of the Senate. Any gentleman had the privilege at that stage of the business to call for its reading at large, but no Senator asked for its reading at large, and the Clerk proceeded to read it by its title. It was then read by its title, and the Chair announced that the resolution having been read once the question will be, "Shall it be read a second time?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

The question being put, the decision of the Chair was sustained, and the joint resolution was not received.

INTERCOURSE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. MORRILL. I now call for the consideration of my bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 232) in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection, which had been reported by the Committee on Commerce with amendments. The first amendment was to strike out the first, second, and third sections of the bill, after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That sales of captured and abandoned property under the act approved March 12, 1863, may be made at such places in States declared in insurrection as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as at other places now authorized by said act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the captured and abandoned property to be received, collected, and disposed of, as provided in said act, the said agents shall take charge of and lease, for periods not exceeding twelve months, the abandoned lands, houses, and tenements within the districts therein named, and shall also provide, in such leases or otherwise, for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of national military occupation within said insurrectionary States formerly held as slaves, who are or shall become free. Property, real or personal, shall be regarded as abandoned when the lawful owner thereof shall be voluntarily absent therefrom, and engaged, either in arms or otherwise, in aiding or encouraging the rebellion.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all moneys arising from the leasing of abandoned lands, houses, and tenements, or from sales of captured and abandoned property collected and sold in pursuance of said act or of this act, or from fees collected under the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and approved by the President, dated respectively the 28th day of August, 1862, the 31st day of March, and the 11th day of September, 1863, or under any amendments or modifications thereof, which have been or shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the President, for conducting the commercial intercourse which has been or shall be licensed and permitted by the President, with and in States declared in insurrection, shall, after satisfying therefrom all proper and necessary expenses to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and all accounts of moneys received or expended in connection therewith shall be audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the first section of the "act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of fraud in insurrectionary districts in the United States," approved March 12, 1863, is hereby extended so as to include the descriptions of property mentioned in an act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July 13, 1861, and an act entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, respectively; and that the sales provided for in said act first mentioned may be made at such places as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. And section six of said first-mentioned act is hereby amended so as to include every description of property mentioned in the acts of July 13, 1861, and July 17, 1862, aforesaid; and that all property, real or personal, described in the acts to which this is in addition, shall be regarded as abandoned when the lawful owner thereof shall be voluntarily absent therefrom, and engaged, either in arms or otherwise, in aiding or encouraging the rebellion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line three, after the word "thereto" to strike out the words "are hereby extended" and to insert "shall apply;" and in line six, after the word "being" to insert the words "within districts;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the prohibitions and provisions of the act approved July 13, 1861, and of the acts amendatory or supplementary thereto, shall apply to all commercial intercourse by and between persons residing or being within districts within the present or future lines of national military occupation in the States or parts of States declared in insurrection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the fourth section the following:

Whether with each other or with persons residing or being within districts declared in insurrection and not within those lines; and that all persons within the United States not native or naturalized citizens thereof shall be subject to the same prohibitions in all commercial intercourse with inhabitants of States or parts of States declared in insurrection as citizens of loyal States are subject to under the said act or acts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section six, line one, after the word "that" to insert the words "so much of;" in line three, after the word "two" to insert "and the fourth section of the act approved March 12, 1863, as directs;" and in line five to strike out the word "directing;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of the fifth section of the act approved May 20, 1862, and the fourth section of the act approved March 12, 1863, as directs the manner of distributing fines, penalties, and forfeitures, is hereby repealed, and that in lieu of the distribution thereby directed to be made to informers, collectors, and other officers of the customs, the court decreeing condemnation may award such compensation to customs officers, informers, or other persons, for any service connected therewith, as will tend to promote vigilance in protecting the public interests, and as shall be just and equitable, in no case, however, to exceed the aggregate amount heretofore directed by the said fifth section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven, line three, after the word "States" to strike out the words "not under the laws of blockade," and in line six, after the word "provided" to insert the words "in this act and;" so that it will read:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no property seized or taken upon any of the inland waters of the United States by the naval forces thereof shall be regarded as maritime prize; but all property so seized or taken shall be promptly delivered to the proper officers of the courts, or as provided in this act and in the said act approved March 12, 1863.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the eighth section, as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to authorize agents to purchase for the United States any products of States declared in insurrection, at such places therein as shall be designated by him, at such prices as shall be agreed on with the seller, not exceeding the market value thereof at the place of delivery, nor exceeding three-fourths of the market value thereof in the city of New York, at the latest quotations known to the agent purchasing: Provided, That no part of the purchase money for any products so purchased shall be paid, or agreed to be paid, out of any other fund than that arising from property sold as captured or abandoned, or purchased and sold under the provisions of this act. All property so purchased shall be forwarded for sale at such place or places as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the moneys arising therefrom, after payment of the purchase money and the other expenses connected therewith, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and the accounts of all moneys so received and paid shall be rendered to and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as additional sections:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That so much of section five of the act of 13th of July, 1861, aforesaid, as authorizes the President in his discretion to license or permit commercial relations in any State or section the inhabitants of which are declared in a state of insurrection, is hereby repealed.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That all officers and privates of the regular and volunteer forces of the United States, and all officers, sailors, and marines in the naval service, are hereby prohibited from buying or selling, trading, or in any way dealing in the kind or description of property mentioned in this act, and the act to which this is in addition, whereby to receive or expect any profit, benefit, or advantage to himself or any other person directly or indirectly connected with him; and it shall be the duty of such officer, private, sailor, or marine, when such property shall come into his possession or custody, or within his control, to give notice thereof to some agent appointed by virtue of this act, and to turn the same over to such agent without delay. And for any violation of the provisions hereof the officer, private, sailor, or marine so offending shall be liable to the penalties mentioned in the sixth section of the act of 12th of March, 1863, aforesaid, and shall also be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, and fined not exceeding $5,000, and to punishment in the penitentiary not exceeding three years, before any court competent to try the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. The importance of this bill justifies and perhaps demands that I should state to the Senate its character and effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have to interrupt the Senator to call for the special order of the day.

Mr. MORRILL. What is the order for one o'clock?

Mr. WILSON. The bill that we adjourned upon last night, and which it is very important should be acted on to-day. We want to get it to the House of Representatives, so that the Military Committee of that House may have it to-morrow morning. I will ask the Senator if he thinks he can get this bill through in a brief time.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose it will not occupy much time. I cannot answer for it. It is a bill of great importance, and it is desirable that it should pass at an early day and go to the House of Representatives; but still I cannot assure the Senator that it will not be likely to give rise to much discussion.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator had better give way, and let the bill we adjourned on last night be taken up and considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is before the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the special order be postponed with a view to proceed with this bill.

Mr. WILSON. Let it be done informally.

Mr. MORRILL. If the bill occupies much of the time of the Senate I shall not insist upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think it will lead to debate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope this bill may go over. I have not had time to examine it; but I find that it is a bill that will very seriously affect the people I represent.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator allow me to explain it?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to that; but I do not want it acted upon to-day, as I have not had time to examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the special order will be informally postponed to allow the present consideration of the bill which has been before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. After the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri, it seems to me that this bill is likely to take some little time, and I think it is of great importance to dispose of the other measure to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let the Senator from Maine make an explanation of the bill. I should like to hear it.

Mr. JOHNSON. A mere explanation will take but very little time.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the special order will be postponed to allow the Senator from Maine to proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state in the first place, Mr. President, the general character of the bill. It is twofold. It relates to the commercial intercourse between the loyal States and the States in insurrection, and it provides for the collection of abandoned and captured property. I will refer the Senate to the statutes which are affected by it. By the act of March 12, 1863, it was provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should appoint certain agents whose business it should be to collect, in the States declared by the President in insurrection, property, which was denominated in that act abandoned property. By the act of July 17, 1862, certain property was declared to be forfeited to the United States; or, in other words, all the property of certain classes or persons in rebellion against the United States was declared forfeited, and denominated prize of war. By the preceding act, the act of July 13, 1861, certain property was declared forfeited which should be found in transit between the States in insurrection and the loyal States. In other words, all intercourse between the States in insurrection and the loyal States was declared illegal, and all property attempted to be carried from one section of the country to the other was declared forfeited.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce to this bill extends the provision of the act of 1863, whereby the Secretary was authorized to appoint agents to collect abandoned property, to the two preceding acts, and makes it his duty to collect, within our lines, all property both abandoned and declared forfeited by those acts to the Government of the United States; and that is the extent of the bill on that subject. By the act of July 13, 1861, as I have already stated, all intercourse between the States in insurrection and the loyal States was declared illegal; but there was this proviso:

"Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, license and permit commercial intercourse with any such part of said State or section, the inhabitants of which are so declared in a state of insurrection, in such articles, and for such time, and by such persons, as he, in his discretion, may think most conducive to the public interest; and such intercourse, so far as by him licensed, shall be conducted and carried on only in pursuance of rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. And the Secretary of the Treasury may appoint such officers at places where officers of the customs are not now authorized by law as may be needed to carry into effect such licenses, rules, and regulations; and officers of the customs and other officers shall receive for services under this section, and under said rules and regulations, such fees and compensation as are now allowed for similar service under other provisions of law."

It will be seen, then, that upon this statute of 1861, as a general proposition, all commercial intercourse between the loyal States and the States in insurrection was absolutely prohibited, with the proviso that the President might authorize and permit such trade in such articles as he deemed necessary between those States. Under that proviso the Secretary of the Treasury ordained certain rules and regulations for the trade between the insurrectionary and the loyal States; and it is understood that a very large trade has sprung up under those regulations; so that the committee were led to believe that the exception came very near being the rule itself; that the intercourse which the act of 1861 had declared illegal between the States had been rendered legal by the rules and regulations of the Treasury Department, and trade between those sections, that is, the contiguous sections, was very little restricted; and under those rules and regulations it is believed that a system of general abuse grew up.

The committee, therefore, to restore the statute of 1861 to its original purpose, provided for the repeal of that proviso, and as the bill now stands, as reported by the committee, all commercial intercourse between the States in insurrection and the loyal States is declared illegal.

Mr. HENDERSON. Tennessee has been declared in insurrection. Would this bill prevent any trade with any part of Tennessee?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir; the bill of the committee prevents any commercial intercourse between any State declared by the President to be in a state of insurrection and the inhabitants of a loyal State.

Mr. HENDERSON. But suppose some of the ports were declared open under another law?

Mr. MORRILL. That would be an exception.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not find it in this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. If I am understood, then, two propositions are contained in the bill: the first is to prohibit all commercial intercourse between the States and sections which by the act of 1861 are authorized to be declared in a state of insurrection by the President, and the proviso of the act of 1861 which authorizes the President to grant and permit licenses in such cases is absolutely repealed.

The next proposition is that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint agents whose business it shall be within our lines to collect all abandoned property and all property which by the act of 1861, and the subsequent act of 1862, was declared to be captured, and proceeds upon the idea that, it being the property of the United States by those acts, it is to be converted for the support of the Army and for the Treasury.

Perhaps I ought to state one other section, the seventh section of the amended bill, which is only in addition by way of enforcing the foregoing provisions. It has been found that in all this region of country a very large trade sprang up, and it is believed to have proved very injurious to the public service. Officers of the Army and officers of the Navy have been largely engaged in one way or another in trade in the products of that country. Section seven prohibits officers of the Army and of the Navy, and soldiers in the Army and sailors and marines in the naval service from engaging in trade or in any way interfering with this property, except as their duty may require them to turn the property over to the commercial agents appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

It was found, moreover, Mr. President, that in the naval service large quantities of cotton had been captured by officers of the Navy and claimed to be prize of war, out of which has arisen a great deal of trouble between the officers of the Navy and the commercial agents. This bill provides that none of this property which by the previous acts is declared to be forfeited to the United States shall in any contingency whatever be considered prize of war, and the officers of the Navy are prohibited from so treating it, or reducing it to their custody, or in any way whatever interfering with it, except to turn it over to the commercial agents.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suppose that provision does not include captures made at sea.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course not. It carefully excludes captures made at sea. I believe I have now given a brief statement of the character of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not quite sure that I understand the bill from the explanation made by the honorable member from Maine, although it has been made in a very lucid way. I do not understand it because I am not sure that I understand the antecedent legislation; and if the honorable member will answer the questions which I am about to ask, he may remove the objections to which it seems to me the bill is obnoxious.

The act of 1861 prohibits all trade between the insurrectionary States and the loyal States; but it has within it an authority which I believe is in the proviso which this bill seeks to repeal, an authority to the President to declare any port or section of any such State to be a port or section between which and the loyal States trade may be had. The State of Tennessee, the whole State, has been declared to be in a state of insurrection; and under the general provisions of the act of 1861, if we had done nothing more, there could have been no trade carried on between the people of the loyal States and the people of Tennessee; it would all have been prohibited; but under the proviso contained in that act the President declared Memphis to be a port with which trade might be carried on, and a very heavy trade has from that time to this, whenever the river has been open, been carried on between the States above and Memphis. Perhaps nearly the whole trade upon the river that Missouri has had since the war commenced has been a trade with the port of Memphis, and they were authorized to have that by virtue of the authority conferred on the President by the proviso. Now, the honorable member from Maine proposes by this measure, if I understand him aright, to repeal that proviso, so as to take from the President the authority to except any place out of the operation of the act of 1861, which declares all those States to be in a condition that no trade can be carried on with them, so as to put Tennessee—I illustrate it by Tennessee—in a condition where no trade can be carried on with her.

We were told, and we rejoiced over the result when it was accomplished, that the opening of the Mississippi river was all-important to the loyal States upon the river, and to ourselves on this side, for a good deal of that trade makes its way to the Atlantic coming this way, either coming entirely through by our railroads, or stopping at Cincinnati or other places, and going by rail around to New York. We succeeded in making the river open practically; and when that was done a very considerable trade was carried on between the States bordering upon the river and the port of Memphis, because the President, under the authority conferred upon him by the proviso of the act of 1861, authorized trade to be carried on with that portion of Tennessee; but if you repeal that proviso it cannot be carried on in the future, and the whole State of Tennessee will be excluded from the privilege of trade with States below or above her, and the loyal States above will be excluded from the privilege of trading with her. I can only guess at the probable result. The honorable member from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] is of course more familiar than I am with the extent of the trade that has been carried on, and the effect of now arresting it; but I can imagine that the repeal of that proviso would be very fatal to the loyal citizens of Missouri, and be exceedingly obnoxious.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not understand the bill to have the effect contemplated by the Senator from Maryland. By the fifth section of the act of 1861, which contains the proviso, the President is authorized to declare in a state of insurrection any State or section of a State; but from time to time he may change that declaration; so that if I am right in this construction, the effect would be that to-day he may declare the whole State of Tennessee in a state of insurrection, and then, according to the provisions of this bill, all trade would be prohibited; but to-morrow the circumstances of the country may be changed, and he may declare one half of the State of Tennessee to be in a state of insurrection, and the other half not; and then, under the provisions of this bill, that half not declared to be in a state of insurrection would be open to trade and commerce. The simple proposition of the Committee on Commerce is that while we are proceeding against a section of the country in a state of war, and declaring it to be in a state of insurrection, we will not hold that that section of country is in such condition that it is safe to maintain commercial relations with it; that when we declare a State or a section of a State to be in a state of insurrection, that condition is inconsistent with the idea of commercial relations, and with that section of country we shall hold no commercial relations whatever.

As there seems to be a desire to take time to look into the bill, and I agree that it is of the utmost importance and should be carefully considered, I have no objection that it shall now subside.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to say a very few words before the bill is postponed. The act of 1861, which authorized the President to declare insurrectionary States to be in a state of insurrection, and provided that thereupon commerce with them should cease, and that all intercourse with them by land or water should be unlawful, and that the vessels and vehicles engaged in it might be forfeited, was a necessary condition to a state of war. The idea of carrying on a war with any people, and at the same time holding commercial intercourse with them, is a paradox; it cannot be. The Senator from Maine is right when he says that if we can carry on commerce with them we can furnish all the supplies to make war on us. And I undertake to declare, whatever gentlemen may say to the contrary, that if this business of trading with the enemy is suffered to go on, our war never can end.

I wish now to say a word in relation to the clause of the act of 1861 to which allusion has been made. The proviso was put in for a purpose. We understood in passing that act that when the proclamation was issued under it there would be a state of war, absolute, unconditional war; and the Supreme Court of the United States in the prize cases held unanimously that that was our condition after the act of 1861 and the proclamation under it. As we stopped all intercourse and had an actually existing state of war, a question arose whether there might not be a practical difficulty in ever putting an end to it under such a law. As our Army went on, as we hoped it would, in the occupation of the enemy's country, and that country was opened to the loyal part of the United States, it was apprehended that intercourse might be needed to feed the towns and cities in the rear of our armies; and the question immediately arose whether that could be done consistently with the laws of nations, as we had now put the United States in a state of war with the insurrectionary States, to be governed of course by the laws of nations. Thereupon examination was made, and it was ascertained distinctly that by the law of nations the power to declare war, in modern times, within the last two hundred years at least, has been considered among nations as a power that may modify that war; it may license intercourse with particular parts and sections under peculiar circumstances. We wanted the President to have power to permit intercourse as we progressed in the possession of the country; and inasmuch as the President had not the war-declaring power, that being in Congress, it became necessary in order to invest him with that authority to have an act of Congress, the war-declaring power, to enable him to do it; and therefore the proviso which has been referred to was put in the act of 1861 that the President might license intercourse in such articles and by such persons as he might deem safe, in such sections of the country as he had declared to be in a state of insurrection, as the public service might require.

I have read the bill of the Senator from Maine with some care, but I do not know that I understand it sufficiently to see how it relieves the difficulty. I understand it to repeal the proviso of the act of 1861. It repeals the power given to the President for such a contingency as I have stated. Suppose we should get possession of Richmond next week, and our troops being there, some of our people being there, could any intercourse be held with Richmond to carry provisions in there to keep the people of the town from starvation then? Virginia has been declared to be in a state of insurrection; a state of war exists between that country and this, and intercourse has necessarily ceased. The insurrection in Virginia has not been suppressed, but we have got possession of some part of the country; it will not do for us to say that where we have military possession we will permit the people to starve; intercourse must be, temporarily at least, restored to them. I desire to know how this is to be done under this bill? Suppose you repeal the proviso which I have mentioned, how are we to get along in relation to any part of the country that we take possession of when we have not suppressed the rebellion?

I wish it to be borne in mind at the same time that, as I understand it, all attempts to undertake to say that a particular section of a State, or a whole State, if you please, when one tenth of its inhabitants declare themselves to be loyal, is reclaimed from a state of insurrection, are practically impossible; the thing is a failure. I need not go over the experiment that has been made under that. What has been done in Florida? You take possession of two or three towns, invite the people to take the oath of allegiance, and then in a few weeks you are compelled to leave there and turn over those people whom you have thus induced to take the oath of allegiance to the mercy of their enemies if they have any; you abandon them to the enemy. It has been done in Florida twice already; it has been done in part of North Carolina; and I think it has been done to some extent in Texas. How many of those good people who have been thus practiced upon have actually lost their lives by it, I do not know, but I think large numbers. The truth is that to reclaim any State or part of a State to allegiance to this country, and reestablish an entire government overit according to the genius of our institutions, with proper local legislation and United States legislation, is a thing impracticable until the whole insurrection, all its military power, is put down everywhere. The army of the rebels has been hunted out of Tennessee, but it is down on the borders of Georgia, fifty or one hundred miles off; the war is going on; one half the people of Tennessee are looking to that rebel army with a hope of its return, and the rest of them are looking to it with a fear of its return. How can any State be expected to be reclaimed, I mean quietly, satisfactorily, and safely, in that way? It never can be done. The truth is that the military force of this insurrection must be subdued everywhere before you can reclaim and return to their allegiance people anywhere.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to another point in connection with this bill. I do not agree with him that the President, after having to-day declared a State to be in insurrection, can to-morrow declare that a certain part of it is not in insurrection. There is nothing of that kind in the power given to him by the act of 1861; that law does not contain any such thing. It does give power to license an intercourse where he thinks the public service requires it and it can be safely done; but the power to declare a State or a part of a State to be in insurrection does not authorize him afterwards to declare a part of that State to be reclaimed from insurrection. That is entirely a different power. He may license intercourse, and he ought to have that power, to be exercised when the condition of things produced by military force may require it. But if the power is taken from the President to grant these licenses, I desire to know what the bill provides in lieu of it. I do not ask the Senator from Maine to answer now, but in due time, when the bill comes up again, to say how intercourse is to be permitted where we have reclaimed a part of the country, when the necessities of that country require it. Who is to decide that, and how is it to be decided?

Mr. HENDERSON. Before this bill goes over, I desire very much that the Senator from Maine, who has charge of it, will turn his attention to it, and attempt to secure something in another direction from that which he seems to be now pursuing. Although a great many of the people of Missouri have been long disposed to complain most bitterly of the rules and regulations imposed upon trade, I have not been inclined to complain of the Secretary of the Treasury on that subject. I know that some of the regulations are very onerous and burdensome upon trade that our people desire to carry on, and that might be very advantageously carried on with certain portions of the country that have been subjected to our arms; but I have always thought that the rules and regulations upon such trade ought to be very stringent lest frauds should be committed, lest arms and ammunition and the means of carrying on war should be given to the rebels. But if the proposition now made by the Senator from Maine shall carry, it cuts off all trade entirely. The Senator from Vermont is perfectly correct upon that subject. The act of 1861, without the proviso which has been referred to, cuts off all trade between the loyal and insurrectionary States, and any property coming from one of the States declared to be in insurrection is confiscated, and may be seized by the officers of the Government immediately on coming within our lines. The only trade that can be possibly carried on, the only interchange of commodities between the States declared in insurrection and the loyal States is carried on by virtue of the proviso to the fifth section of the act of 1861, but if the Senator from Maine succeeds with his bill no trade whatever can be carried on, for it repeals that proviso.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to state a fact which ought to be taken into consideration by the Senate. I will go as far as any Senator toward cutting off an improper and contraband trade between the loyal and seceded States. I know that our people are very desirous to open up unrestricted trade, indiscriminate trade with the southern States. I know that they argue in my State that that will do more toward converting the people of the South and bringing them back to a return of peaceful relations than anything else which can possibly be done. In fact, many of them argue that commerce will do a great deal more than our arms toward bringing about a return of peace. I have differed and differed materially from gentlemen who thus argue, and I have desired at all times to see such regulations adopted as will prevent the carrying to the rebels of anything that may aid them in their work of treason. But suppose we cut off all trade entirely, what will be the result? I desire to call attention to that consideration especially. In the State of Tennessee, where there is perfect peace in large portions of it, say for instance at the city of Memphis, there would have been very great suffering, indeed, but for the trade which has been allowed. What course shall we pursue? Because the State of Tennessee has been declared to be in a state of insurrection, shall we say that we will starve to death all the people in that State? Suppose we take the country, and our armies, as they have a right to do, seize upon and use the corn and the hay and all the provisions the people there have to sustain themselves, what shall be done? Will the Government of the United States feed the people of Tennessee at its expense, furnish rations to them as we have been compelled to do there and in various other States, or shall this restricted trade be opened up so that the people of that country can give us cotton in return for something to eat? It is a plain proposition: we have either got to starve those people or to furnish them with rations under the direction of the Federal armies at the expense of the Government, or else we must open up a restricted trade, so as to let them exchange commodities with us. There is no question of that.

One other consideration. I have no doubt that the Committee on Commerce have been led to report a bill of this character in consequence of the numerous frauds committed by Treasury agents in the southern States. I have been informed that those frauds have been great. But the Secretary of the Treasury is not to blame for this; the President is not to blame for this. Until we can make all men honest by legislation such things will occur, and they will occur in all departments of business. The temptations upon the Treasury agents in the southern States are very great; the temptation is presented to them almost every day to make a fortune; and I have no doubt that numbers of men who went down there believing themselves to be honest men have turned out to be fraudulent and corrupt individuals. But are we to do a very great wrong because some men turn out to be dishonest? I say not, and I hope no such measure as this in the present state of the country will be adopted.

The Senator from Vermont, according to my view, is perfectly correct in holding that when the President has once declared a State to be in insurrection he is functus officio on that point, he has discharged his duty, he has no power then to proclaim that the State is not in insurrection so as to allow intercourse with it. He can open a port of entry where he thinks it desirable to allow foreign trade, but not by virtue of that act. If this bill shall be passed it will cut off all trade, not only the contraband trade but that which is advantageous to our own Government, to the people of the West, and to the poorer people in the southern States who perhaps have been loyal at all times.

I think, therefore, that this bill deserves a very close examination, and I hope that it will be passed over for the present. I thought it necessary to say something while it was now before the Senate. I hope that no act will be hastily passed which will inflict such very great injury on the Government and on the people of the West and on the people behind our armies, many of whom are loyal, and many of whom will become so by proper and restricted trade.

Mr. TEN EYCK. The Committee on Commerce, who reported this bill, regarded it as one of the utmost importance, and with the knowledge derived from investigations of the matters involved in it, as a member of that committee regarded it as of as much importance as the passage of the bill which it is proposed to take up in place of this. Still, I am willing that this shall now give place to that bill, and that this may be laid aside with a view of perfecting it and meeting some of the questions which have been proposed by Senators on this floor in relation to its probable operation. I think it highly important and worthy of consideration, and every day that we refrain from the passage of this bill not only inflicts a gross injury on the Union cause, but encourages, I had almost said, thousands of men to depart from the line of rectitude which has characterized them throughout life and engage in a wholesale raid upon southern productions in the shape of cotton and other things; and not only that, sir, but goes to prolong the war.

It would be a very serious thing, I admit, to starve all the Union people within the lines of our armies as they advance; and perhaps it would be a very serious thing to starve those who are not Union people, though I should not regret their sufferings as much as I would those who have Union sentiments, if such a calamity should happen. But, sir, while we are looking to the protection and comfort of the Union men and women who have suffered in consequence of their fidelity to the ancient flag, we must not overlook the fact that we have prolonged their sufferings, prolonged the rebellion, strengthened the arm of traitors by allowing this very trade, in consequence of which not only Union men and women but rebels of the deepest dye have been fed and have had their pockets crowded with greenbacks, by means of which they could carry on the rebellion. Under this permission to trade, supplies have not only gone in, but bullets and powder, instruments of death which our heroic soldiers have been compelled to face and meet upon almost every field of battle in which they have been engaged in the South. I am not at liberty to mention any of the evidence that has come before the committee of which I happen to be a member, on this subject; but if I were to mention the facts, they would make the cheeks of every American Senator tingle with shame.

I am greatly afraid that in some quarters the movements of our armies have been directed more with a view to carry on trade and to procure the productions of the southern country than to strike down the rebels and put rebels under their feet. I fear it, sir. I am so greatly convinced of it that I am anxious that this bill shall be perfected and passed at the earliest possible period, so that if possible not even a day shall pass over our heads before we put an end to these nefarious transactions.

Sir, the whole valley of the Mississippi along the line of this permitted trade has been debauched; not merely the Treasury agents, (for that is a very small matter,) but men engaged in carrying our flag, not only upon land but upon the internal waters; and I am greatly afraid that under the plea of maritime capture raids have been set on foot, extending inland many miles, and money has been paid for the products of the country, and even gone into the hands of rebels with a perfect knowledge that they were such.

I intended to do nothing more than call the attention of the Senate to the importance of passing a bill of this kind, and passing it speedily; but I am willing to defer to the wishes of the chairman of the Military Committee in order that the bill in regard to a draft may be taken up and passed without any further delay.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very glad that this revelation of facts, which the public have believed for a great while, comes now with so distinguished an indorsement. The honorable Senator from New Jersey will pardon me for an inquiry which I propose to make: whether the acts and things which he has condemned have been done by members of his own party, or by that unfortunate class of people in this country who are denominated "copperheads."

Mr. TEN EYCK. Sir, in this matter I know no party and I know no distinction between members of different parties. I have made no revelation; I have simply intimated my fears and my doubts on this subject, and they are so strong as to include members of the party to which the gentleman belongs as well as members of the party to which I belong. Without discrimination and distinction, I for one am anxious to tear up the whole thing by the roots, to destroy it root and branch, and I trust this bill will do it.

Mr. WILSON. I call for the order of the day.

COURTS IN WISCONSIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Floor in the chair.) Before taking up the order of the day the Chair will, with the indulgence of the Senate, lay before the body the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 55) in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin.

The amendment was read. It was to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to interfere with execution-processes or orders of sale already in part executed, but the same shall proceed and be perfected as if this act had not been passed.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DOOLITTLE subsequently said: My attention was not called to the vote concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill relative to the circuit court in Wisconsin. I move that that vote be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the amendment ought not to be concurred in. The very object of the bill was to prevent an inconvenience arising from having part of the records in the district and part in the circuit court. This amendment destroys that, and I think it should be non-concurred in.

The amendment was not concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (No. 186) to incorporate the Baltimore and Washington Depot and Potomac Ferry Railway Company;

A bill (No. 364) authorizing and requiring the opening of Sixth street west;

A bill (No. 434) to authorize the bailiff of the orphans' court, in the county of Washington and District of Columbia, to serve processes issued by said court, and for other purposes;

A bill (No. 495) to amend the charter of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company; and

A bill (No. 89) as to sewerage and drainage in the city of Washington.

The bill (No. 486) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho," approved March 3, 1863, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

PERFORMANCE OF MILITARY DUTY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 286) to prohibit the discharge of persons from liability to military duty by reason of the payment of money.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on an amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] has prepared some amendments that cover the point intended to be covered by my amendment, and I think more fully and in better guarded language. I therefore withdraw my amendment for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Vermont to offer his.

Mr. COLLAMER. Last night this bill was laid over at my suggestion, as I desired to prepare some amendments. I have prepared them and shown them to the chairman of the Military Committee, and he is willing to adopt them. I move now to amend the bill by adding the following additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That all calls for drafts hereafter made under the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and of any act in addition to or amendment thereof, shall be for a term not exceeding one year.

And be it further enacted, That this act shall not extend to or include drafts to be made in any district or subdivision thereof, to fill its quota on calls already made, but the same shall be completed under the laws in force before the passage hereof.

And be it further enacted, That no person drafted on future calls shall be liable to be again drafted until the present enrollment shall be exhausted.

And be it further enacted, That the number of men furnished from any district for the service of the United States beyond and above its quota on calls heretofore made, and the term of service of such men, shall be considered and allowed to said district in calls hereafter made.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be taken on each separate amendment in its order, as each section is a distinct proposition. The first question is on the first additional section.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not wish any division of the question.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. HENDERSON. I ask for a division.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the right of any member to have a distinct vote on each separate proposition of amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. When a call is made for a division it is proper of course.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The first section of the amendment will be read:

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That all calls for drafts hereafter made under the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and of any act in addition to or amendment thereof, shall be for a term not exceeding one year.

Mr. COLLAMER. The bill before the Senate is a bill to repeal the $300 commutation clause of the existing law. My proposition is not to strike out from the bill, but to add these additional sections to it, and I wish to explain for a few moments the relations which these different sections bear to each other, making a system by themselves. The first one, which has just been read and which is to be first voted upon, provides that the future drafts shall be for a term not exceeding one year. I made my remarks on that proposition yesterday, explaining my views. If you repeal the commutation clause, the necessary consequence is, as was suggested by the honorable Senator from Maryland, a very great rise in the price of substitutes; they will not fall within the reach of ordinary people. Then, in relation to people of ordinary circumstances, to say to them that we will repeal the commutation clause, of course elevating greatly the price of substitutes, and draft them for three years, and make all go who are able to go, is an extremity which I do not believe the service of the country demands.

In the next place, I believe that in the present state of our Army affairs, the drafting of twelve months' men and putting them into the regiments already existing, which are officered by officers of experience, with considerable bodies of experienced men, will give us a good organization, and the men thus drafted in a very short time will make as good and efficient soldiers as if they were all veterans. Hence I believe it will be best to make your drafts for shorter periods and to make them so as always to have a reserve force to fill up our Army when it is necessary. Undertaking to draft men when you are actually in the presence of the enemy in the field cannot answer the purpose. Our present great service immediately before Richmond cannot be relieved by men drafted now. I am not now speaking of volunteering or of the States that may turn out from their existing organizations some militia for short periods; but the bill before us relates to drafting from our national forces agreeably to our laws of draft; and I say nothing can be derived through that channel and from that source which can furnish any present relief to the Army. The bill, therefore, looks to the future, and looking to that future, I believe the better way is that the draft be made in the autumn, that it be made for a year, that the drafted men be put into existing regiments with the experienced men, and by the opening of the spring campaign these men together with the experienced men who are with them will form an efficient force for the whole campaign; and then in the succeeding fall another body of men should be drafted so as to be ready to fill up the Army when the terms of their predecessors expire; and that plan of drafting from time to time and filling up your armies as they need it should make a system.

In order to preserve the consistency of the system, the next section which I propose is that this drafting by the year shall not apply to making up the quotas of States which are in arrear on past calls. That section is a necessary part of the system. It is that any district which is in arrear, shall fill up its arrearages with three years' men under the law as it now exists and under which other States have filled theirs.

Not only are there States in arrear, but there are other States that are a good deal in advance of the calls, that have furnished more men than the calls required; and the next section of my amendment provides that in all cases where districts have furnished a larger number than was necessary to fill the quotas which were required of them on calls heretofore made they shall have their excess of men reckoned according to their term of service toward the future calls. So you perceive, Mr. President, that this section and the preceding one provide in relation to districts in arrear and in relation to districts in advance.

Another section is, leaving past drafts to be governed by existing law, that in future drafts for a year's service a man who is drafted shall not be put back for draft again until the roll is through. That is, you shall not call on a man and send him for a year and then put him back in the list and draw him again, when his neighbor under the same circumstances has not gone.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is not that the law now?

Mr. COLLAMER. No. There is a law of that kind in relation to certain kinds of substitutes, but it is not the law generally, though to my mind it ought to have been, and it certainly ought to be now if we go by this system, so that people shall take their turns in this matter. These different sections constitute my system, and hence I desire that the question should be taken on them all together as one amendment; but those unfavorable to the system, who desire to defeat it, of course want the question taken by parts.

Mr. BROWN. I trust, Mr. President, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont will not be adopted; and permit me here to recur to the manner in which this measure comes before the Senate. This question having had the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs was reported upon, and the bill reported is now before you; but a motion was made on the strength of it which changes the whole system, a motion made by the chairman of the committee without any concert with that committee, and I do not know as yet from what source it emanates. I must object for one to that mode of dealing with questions of such gravity. I believe the Senate will bear me out in the statement that in the discussion which transpired here before it was insisted upon strongly by those most conversant with our military management, and those most intimately connected with the War Department in their personal relation, that the length of service for three years was one of the best features connected with the enlistment. As long as the question of volunteering was open, it was insisted upon all the time that we should have the longest term of service; and it was said, and said very properly, that as a purely military question it had been found that one year was not long enough within which to fit troops for the field, within which to fit them for enduring those hardships which campaigns involve them in. It is not simply the equipping of troops, it is not simply putting arms in their hands, but it is, so to speak, the seasoning of the bodies of the soldiers to the endurance of those fatigues that makes the soldier and makes the value of the soldier; and I say that within the period of one year you cannot expect to have that effective soldiery which you will have within two years or three years. I believe I am sustained when I say that that has been the representation which has come to us continually from the War Department, and that no counter representations have ever come to us from the Military Committee in this body.

But it is now proposed to change that mode and to make all future drafts for simply one year; and why? I have heard no reason assigned for this change, which is going to make a very serious change in our military arrangements, except the one fact that it will probably fall lighter upon those who are drafted. If that consideration is to obtain, I see no reason why you should fix the period at one year rather than at six months, or at six months rather than at three months, or at three months rather than at one month. So far as the question is concerned of the onus upon the person drafted, of course the shortest time will be the most preferable to him; but I believe in this question we should not consider the onus to the person who is drafted, but the necessity of the Government and the necessity of an effective service.

It may be said, and has been said, that there will be a greater willingness to enter into the service where the term is for only one year than where it is for three years; but it must be considered that we are now on the subject of a draft and not the subject of voluntary enlistment, and, as was well explained by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] yesterday, the question of time is not a question that enters into the consideration of our carrying through this draft effectively. If we see fit to draft these men we do it for three years by the same machinery, at the same cost, with the same equipment, that we do for one year, so that the whole outlay and expenditure of the Government is the same in the one instance as in the other. Furthermore, we have the same means of enforcing the draft for the three years that we have for the one year; the persons drafted report themselves, or where they abscond are found, and the means of putting them into the service is precisely the same. It is simply a question on their part of indisposition or disposition to serve, which the Government has never taken into account heretofore, and I do not think ought to take into account now.

I do not desire to enter into the larger considerations as to the nature of this service, but I think I am safe in saying that the Government heretofore, and within a very brief time, has given evidence that it deemed it necessary that enlistments for the future should be for a longer period than one year. It has not only done so, but it has gone to the extreme point of paying large bounties to a very large number of soldiers who had a part of the service of one year or less to serve, to induce them to go into the service for three years.

I assume that in the discussion of this question, so far as its military aspect is concerned, we have a right not only to know what the views of the Government and of the military arm are, but that it is our duty, so far as it may be consistent, to consult its experience and to accord to its views. Now I ask, what is the strongest assurance which has been given of the views entertained by the War Department on this subject? Is it not the reenlistment within the last sixty days of a large part of the Army, and the offering to them of enormous bounties if they would reenlist for the term of three years? That, I believe, is an uncontroverted fact; and yet it was provided in that reenlistment that they should have that privilege even where they had one year still to serve. What is the natural inference? It is that the Government condemns the policy of enlisting soldiers for a single year. If it is going into the enlistment of men for one year to-day, what was the sense of paying these enormous bounties not sixty days ago to those who had one year still to serve, or within a sufficient amount of that time to cover the campaign that would probably take place during the year?

That is the argument that I address to the bill as it connects itself with our military administration; and I say that not only have I the right to assume here that the judgment of the Military Committee of this body is against the amendment, but that the judgment and the action of the War Department are against the amendment also. It remains, therefore, for those who advocate such a radical change in our war policy to show some controlling reason why we should depart from that mode which assures us an efficient service for one which at best is doubtful, which the best military authorities contend is inefficient. I have not heard any such reasons advanced, except that it would be more acceptable perhaps to those who are drafted. As to the simple question of justice or of equalizing this burden, I say that when you establish a system of draft by lottery it is just as equal that the term of service shall be for three years as that it shall be for one year. The equality is the same. The simple fact that the term calls for a longer period does not change its justice or its injustice.

I do not desire to enter into that part of the discussion which has been presented by the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] as to the effect that this change in our policy may have upon our standing and the prosecution of the war. He has shown, I think, very clearly, that the only effect it can have is that of discouragement, of raising the question in the public mind whether you are able to finish this war in one year, and if you are not able to finish it in one year, what are going to be the consequences of the discharge of all the troops that have been engaged in that service who shall have been drafted under these drafts, and the substitution of new troops for them. I say he has well shown that the only effect of that can be the effect of discouragement upon the public mind; and I think the effect of it will be to show itself in discouragement upon the public mind as far as our moneyed condition is concerned. When the people see a policy which certainly has not the marks of vigor about it that the older system had, when they see us engaging in it at this time, shortening the period of enlistment, they will begin to raise the question whether you are as much in earnest about carrying this war through to the end or not, and its only effect in a financial point of view will be that of depression, as it will be in the other point of view.

I regret, sir, that the amendment has been offered. I regret that an amendment involving so much of a change, so wide a departure from the military policy heretofore, has not been submitted to those who are intrusted by this body with the discussion and examination of that matter and all similar matters, that they might confer more lengthily with the Department of the Government that is conducting the war, and learn from it the views which it may entertain as to the effect and as to the result of this proposition. I trust, sir, that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I expect, Mr. President, to support the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Military Committee; but I do not then expect to vote for the bill which proposes to repeal the law that allows the drafted man to pay $300 and be discharged on that payment. I shall vote for the amendment because I think, now that it has been announced to the Senate that this war is to be prosecuted for twenty years, if necessary, the horror of the draft ought to be divided among the people; that if one set of men are drafted this year to serve twelve months, and they have to go because the power of the Government makes them go whether they can go well or not, then at the end of the year their neighbors should be subjected to the same horror, and let this dreadful demand upon the service, upon the blood, and upon the life of the people be distributed upon all. It is not right to say to twenty men in a neighborhood, "You shall go; you shall leave your families whether you can or not; you shall go without the privilege of commutation whether you leave starving wives and children behind you or not;" and then to say to every other man of the neighborhood, "Because we have taken these twenty men for three years you shall remain with your wives and children safely and comfortably at home for these three years." I like this feature of the amendment, because it distributes the horror of the draft more equally and justly over the whole of our people.

There has been some force in the argument presented by the Senator from Missouri, that a man taken fresh into the field is not so good a soldier as the veteran; but I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that it is not proposed out of these drafted men to organize new regiments, but that they shall take their place in the old and trained regiments, and I understood from him that the experience of the war has demonstrated that when the newly enlisted soldier is placed by the side of the veteran in the midst of trained regiments he does almost equally good service with the veteran. I understand him to take his position on that proposition.

If, then, the Senator who is at the head of the Military Committee, and who represents the War Department in this body, informs us that, being thus distributed, the drafted men will do as good service or almost as good service during the first year as during the second or third, the only consideration for us is what is right, what is justice, when we do make this demand upon the people for their service, their blood, and their lives? I say let one set of men go for one year, another for another, and then take the remaining third for the last year. But I desire to say that I do not agree with my colleague when he says, and I do not respond to the sentiment, that this war is to be supported until all the men of the country have failed, and that then we shall hand it over to the women and the children. Sir, I suppose that we represent a wise people; that there is some wisdom in the Senate; that this is a body which is governed by considerations of public policy and public good, and not by sentiments of passion alone. Is this war prosecuted to gratify a passion, or is it prosecuted to save a Government, to save a people? If prosecuted to save a people and a Government, then the sentiment of my colleague cannot be well supported. His sentiment is that we shall bring upon ourselves, as well as upon the southern people, entire destruction; that we shall leave no people here; that the law with its iron hand shall take hold of every man in the country without respect to age provided he has the physical strength to endure a campaign. I will say to my colleague that he will not be supported in his extreme views by the people. The people expect great results from this campaign; and when another year comes rolling around, and it is found that this war is not yet closed, and that there is no reasonable probability of its early close, my colleague and Senators who agree with him will find that the people will say that this effusion of blood must stop; that there must be some adjustment. I prophesy this. Of course I cannot say that it is so now; but I say that if another year rolls around with this war as far apparently from a close as we now perceive it to be my colleague and other Senators will find this to be the sentiment of the people.

But, sir, I want to say a word or two upon this measure as it comes from the Committee on Military Affairs. Last winter I opposed the repeal of the commutation clause, and the Senate agreed in that view. The Senate disagreed to the proposition that a man should not be allowed to commute; and it remained the law of the land that there should still be reserved to the citizen when drafted the right to pay his money and not go to the field. I ask the Senator who is at the head of the Military Committee of this body, and who represents the War Department here, what there is in the history of the country since the Senate took its position last winter on this question that authorizes a departure from the policy we declared then? We then said that we would resort to volunteering rather than to the draft. That was the view of the Senate. What is there in the history of the last few months which shows that we ought to abandon the policy that we sustained at the last vote on this question? I know of nothing, sir.

A call was recently made in the Northwest; whether wise or unwise, whether for good or bad motives, whether to get a force in the field, or for political considerations, I will not stop now to discuss. A force of one hundred thousand men was called for from a few of the northwestern States, and what was the response? In a very few weeks, I believe, Ohio furnished the full amount demanded of her. Indiana has furnished, as I understand, about one half—about ten thousand men. I am not informed in respect to the other States. This much, however, is certain, that a call being made, a short call to meet this present campaign, the response was immediate. That is the only call for volunteers since we amended the conscription law, and it met a ready response, an immediate response from the people, because they hoped this war could be brought to a close this year. I am free to say that if a demand had been made upon the people to volunteer for three years your regiments would not have been so filled up. The people now are not ready to go for three years as they were at first; and I believe it will be slow work to fill up the regiments for three years, even if the bounties be ever so large. But the point I make—

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me simply to make a suggestion on that point?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. The State of Ohio that has sent thirty-eight regiments so promptly and readily into the field for a short term of one hundred days owes several thousand men to the country for three years, and we must have a draft there to make them up.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest to the Senator that the simple reason of that is because the Government has not enforced the draft there.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That was not the case in Indiana. Indiana has given more than her quota, and I believe she has several thousand men in advance; and yet her Governor proposed to furnish twenty thousand men for one hundred days, and the response of ten thousand came up at once. Whether we can fill up the other ten regiments I am not prepared to say; I have not the information. But the point I make to the Senator who represents the War Department upon this question is this: he led the party in the Senate that was opposed last winter to the repeal of the commutation clause; he said it was not sound policy to repeal it; he advocated the propriety of allowing a man to pay his money when drafted, and that this money when paid into the Treasury should be used to pay bounties and secure volunteers; I want to know of that Senator—his speech yesterday failed to give us the information—what has occurred in the history of the country since that time to justify a change of position on the part of Congress. It is not enough for me to know that the Secretary of War has written us to do it. I have not yet bent the knee so humbly as that a mere demand of the Secretary of War is to be responded to by me. It was my judgment last winter that there should be reserved to the citizen this right of paying his $300, for there are so many of the people who cannot go without utter destruction to their interests. That was my judgment then. I have observed the condition and progress of the war from that time to this, and there is nothing, so far as I have observed, to justify me in abandoning the position that I took when I voted upon the very proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts. Now, when the Secretary of War addresses us, and says to us, "Abandon this policy, change it," I want him to give us the facts that shall justify the Senate in abandoning that which it thought right last winter. Why are we not informed of the number of men in the field? When the Secretary of War asks of us to abandon a position deliberately taken, why are we not told how many men are now away from the farms and the workshops of the country? Is it seven hundred thousand or is it one million of men that we have in the field, and where are they and how are they being used?

I do not agree that the head of a Department may write to Congress and say, "It is my pleasure and will that you shall abandon a policy." If he will give us reasons, facts that justify it, of course then those reasons and facts will have their proper weight and influence upon our judgments. But what reason does he give? The reason that he gives is that the Provost Marshal General has informed him that in some eighteen districts in eight different States he has commenced the draft, and out of fourteen thousand drafted men he has secured but two thousand six hundred men. I believe that is the information which comes to us from the Provost Marshal General's office. That is a very limited view of the subject. When three hundred thousand men are wanted, is the Provost Marshal General to select out a few districts where the men drafted amount in all to fourteen thousand? What districts they are, in what States they occur, he does not inform us; but he selects a few districts, amounting in all to fourteen thousand drafted men, and he wishes Congress to be governed by the result of the experiment in those districts. Is that enough to justify us in abandoning the policy that we adopted? I do not believe many men are going to be obtained by a draft; I do not believe a very good army will be got by a draft; I do not believe an army will be put in the field by a draft that will whip General Lee. Under the system of volunteering men who can go well go willingly; but by the draft men are forced to go when their interests will scarcely allow them to go. They go into the field, not as volunteers with pride in the cause, but they go into the field because the iron hand of the law has taken them and dragged them into the field. It is not the army that you must have if you are to have success.

But the Senator from Vermont has said you cannot draft men now and get them into the field in time to help General Grant before Richmond. I think that is plain enough to any Senator. You cannot get this draft immediately. If they are to help General Grant, it must be done very shortly, unless a siege takes place, which is hardly to be expected. But I agree with the opinion of the Senator from Vermont that the draft will not bring into the field for the present campaign an army of much service.

The military operations of the country last year did not amount to much after the taking of Vicksburg on the 4th of July. That substantially closed the campaign in the Southwest. Very little was done upon the Potomac after that. And why should we assume now that the fall months will be full of military operations, more than they were last year? If a draft is to be had, let it come under the law that we have; let the money be paid into the Treasury by men who cannot well go, and let that money be used to pay bounties and to secure the services of men to go as a voluntary act on their part. In that way you will get better soldiers; you will get them more readily; you will fill up your army sooner, and you will fill it up with a better material.

But, sir, my opposition to the measure just now is because the Secretary of War has not furnished us any facts that justify the Senate in changing its position. I take it that Senators voted last winter from an understanding of the subject. It was fully discussed. The volunteering has been as successful during this spring as any Senator expected it would be; as many reenlistments of the veterans have been secured, I suppose, as the Senator from Massachusetts expected; I believe he said in the Senate that it was a success; it is not questioned that it was a success. Then let each man that cannot go to the field under the draft pay his $300, and let that be used for the purpose of encouraging men to volunteer that can go. The country is not yet stripped of men that have not families dependent upon them; and being encouraged by large bounties, by bounties paid by the Government, by bounties paid by the States, by bounties paid by the counties and cities, I apprehend that unless the belief is fastened upon the public mind that this war is not to end within any reasonable time, the armies can be filled up again.

There is one argument that was used by the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BROWN] that I intended to refer to when I was speaking of the subject to which I first alluded. They said it would discourage the country to call out men for but one year. I look at it from another point of view. We are now in the midst of a campaign that it was said was to close this war: it was proclaimed all over the country, it was announced to foreign Governments that this campaign, with the mighty military power that we brought into the field last winter and spring, was to crush the rebellion and to restore the Union. That was the assurance given to the country and to the world; and that expectation fastened itself upon the public mind; and now will it be said that even another year will not do it, that we are not safe in drafting men for a full year from this time, but that we must go full three years more? What will be the effect? The country will say, "The Senate now declares that this war is not to be closed by this campaign, it is not to be closed within a twelve-month, but it is to go on eating out the life of the country, eating up the resources of the people, consuming the blood of the people for yet three years more." That is the position, that is the argument of the Senator from California and of all Senators who insist that this draft shall be for full three years. If there is a draft ordered for one year, the country will say, "That is to complete this campaign with success, and if necessary to meet one more campaign in the spring;" but if you say the draft shall be for three years, it is a giving out on the part of Congress that we cannot close this war in a year, that we must have soldiers in the field yet for three years. The argument I think destroys itself.

I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the President may have power to make a draft for twelve months instead of three years. For that single proposition I shall vote, because then you conform the conscription law to the laws which allow volunteers. Under the present law the President is authorized to call volunteers into the field for any term not exceeding three years. It is under that law that he has called men out for a year. It is under that law he has accepted volunteers for one hundred days. Conform the conscription law in that particular to the law authorizing the calling for volunteers, and I think it will be well; I see no objection to it. I am willing to give to the President that discretion. Let the responsibility be upon him. Let us say simply that the President may enforce the conscription law for such a term as in his judgment the public service requires, not to exceed three years; for that will mitigate its severity. I am willing to vote for that, but I am not willing to go further simply because the Secretary of War demands it of us, and to repeal the commutation clause.

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. President, I favor the bill which was offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. MORGAN] referred to the Military Committee, acted upon by them, and reported back to the Senate, for the simple repeal of the commutation clause in the enrollment act. When the amendatory enrollment bill was before the Senate last January, I offered an amendment to it, repealing the commutation clause. The question was discussed at some length in the Senate by the Senator from Missouri and by the Senator from Indiana; and I thought that the reasons that were then presented ought to have been sufficient to induce the Senate to dispense with that clause of the law. The predictions which were then made, I think, have been fully realized. It was stated then that we should be driven to the necessity of repealing that clause of the law, or else we should be compelled to dispense with the services of men in the field. The time has arrived when men will not volunteer for a period which is calculated to render them efficient as soldiers; the country is in an extremity which demands their services; and the only remedy that is left is to take such steps as will bring men to fill up the ranks of the Army.

There have been periods in the history of every Government and every country when it has become necessary that a portion of its citizens should devote themselves to the service of their country, and die for it if necessary. That period I think has arrived here; that crisis is now upon us; and whatever we may say or whatever we may desire to do in relation to the accommodation of the draft to the wishes of the majority of the people, we must consult at the same time the interests of the country. It is due to the country that we should be impressed with the importance of the considerations which now weigh upon it, and the necessity of men not for a few days or a few months, but men who are to devote themselves to that service, and to become veteran soldiers for the defense of the country.

I thought that I foresaw at the commencement of this rebellion that it was not to be terminated in either thirty, sixty, or ninety days. I take but little credit to myself for that foresight, for I think any man of ordinary intelligence should have known that a war of the magnitude of that upon which we were then about to enter could not be closed in that brief period; that ten million people, who were determined to consummate the crime of overthrowing and destroying the Government, could not be subdued in any period so brief, particularly when they inhabited a country of such vast extent. In 1861, when the incipient measures were taken here for the raising of new regiments, the proposition was made that the system which had heretofore prevailed of raising soldiers for five years should be dispensed with, and that in order to fill up the new regiments the period of enlistment should be two or three years. I opposed it as a member of the Military Committee, and I was in favor of the period being continued at five years. I thought I foresaw the necessity of a standing army, and the necessity for an army involved the necessity for veterans.

I said that I should be glad to accommodate the people; I would be glad to popularize this conscription law if possible; I would be glad to concede what the Senator from Vermont states is eminently just. He states that it is unjust for a portion of the people to be called into the field to serve as soldiers for a period of three years while their neighbors remain at home and render no service at all. That may be practically true; but the Government is to be served upon the one side, while the interests of the people are to be consulted upon the other, and I think, as I stated before, that the crisis has arrived when we must consult the interests of the Government. If the commutation clause had been left out of the conscription law originally when it was passed by the Senate, or if it had been repealed last winter, none of these difficulties would now have to be met. In place of reducing your patriotism to a money standard, a paltry sum of $300 which is to discharge all the liabilities that a man owes to the Government, instead of filling your coffers with money, you would now have your ranks filled with men; and when it became necessary to resort to stringent measures to raise troops, those measures should have been executed without any faltering, and the Army should have been filled up. It might have been filled up if the conscription law had been executed, divested, as it should have been, of the commutation clause. I predicted then that before the adjournment of this session of Congress we should find a necessity for its repeal. The necessity existed at that time, and I believe now it is forcing itself upon the minds not only of the country but of Senators that it must be repealed.

The Senator from Vermont suggests that one year is a sufficient period of time for which to draft men; that it is onerous; that it is a burden upon the people to take one man from his home while you leave his neighbor by his side to remain and demand of him no service. That, it is true, is his misfortune; the country demands his services; and if one man is so unfortunate as to be drafted while another escapes the draft, that is a mere difference of circumstance or a difference in fortune. The Senator thinks that one year is a sufficient period, and he suggests, in order to remedy the difficulties which will occur by reason of the reduction of the Army, that this system of drafting can be constantly going on; that new men can be drafted to fill up the ranks as the service of the one year men expires. I think that would render the entire system nugatory. You would have two streams passing backward and forward; one stream of transportation going to the Army, and another stream of transportation returning from the Army; one stream of soldiers going and another returning, and neither of them remaining there long enough to become efficient, or to render any service to the country. You would enhance the cost of the war perhaps one hundred fold by resorting to this temporary expedient for the purpose of popularizing a system of drafting men, which never can become popular. There is no popularity about it. There is a question of fairness about it, but there is no popularity in it. I say the men should be drafted for a period necessary to close the war if possible. I do not know that it can be closed in three years, or in five years, or in ten years; but whatever the term is, we should have men who become inured to the hardships and the toils of the field, who will make good soldiers, and who when they are there will remain. I do not mean to keep them there compulsorily, or in violation of their contract, or in violation of the law; but I would make the law such that when you get a man into the ranks, and he becomes an efficient soldier, his services shall not be dispensed with at the end of ninety days or six months, and then some raw man be taken who is to go through the same process, thus enhancing the expense of the thing two or three hundred fold. The success of the southern armies has resulted from the very circumstance that their services are perpetual. They discharge no man from their army. A man once got into the southern army, and made a soldier, is a soldier for the war, perfectly regardless of the time for which he originally enlisted or the law under which he enlisted; he is compelled to serve so long as his leaders conceive that they need his services.

I think the recent campaign, and in fact all the battles of the last year, have demonstrated the benefit to be derived from old soldiers. One of them is certainly worth five or six raw recruits on the field of battle. Suppose, sir, that Lee's army, with its present experience and discipline, was confronted by an army of raw recruits; suppose that the army to-day under General Grant was such an army as was led to the battle of Bull Run, how long would they face the enemy? Why, sir, they would be driven from Virginia like sheep; they could not stand a moment; one regiment would drive a division of them. But now our men have come to a point where they are irresistible. They have been reduced to perfect discipline. They have been inured to the hardships of the field; they have become perfect soldiers in every respect; and if you undertake now to change your policy as to the term of enlistment, when you dispense with these soldiers you will never have an army again; you will have a volunteer rabble as you had at the commencement of the war, and you will not keep men in the ranks sufficiently long to reduce them to discipline, or even subordination.

I oppose the amendment, because I believe that it is fraught with the greatest danger. I think this is no time to resort to a temporizing policy in order to popularize the draft or to make it more palatable to the people. The country is in an extremity. We must have the services of men, and we must have their services for a sufficient time to make them efficient and valuable to the country. I shall vote for no such measure as this amendment. I shall merely vote for the naked proposition to repeal the commutation clause as recommended by the Military Committee, and that will make the bill efficient. Then we shall be able to raise troops for three years and to fill the ranks at once; not fill our coffers with greenbacks, but raise substantial men, men capable of carrying the musket and the bayonet, and of driving the rebels off the continent if necessary.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, the legislation upon the subject of conscription, as I understand it, has been this: early in 1863 we passed a conscription law allowing the right of substitution and the right of commutation by paying $300. At the beginning of the present session an amendment was proposed to that original conscription law, and then a motion was made to repeal the $300 commutation clause. At that time we had had but slight experience in the enforcement of the draft. For the first draft we received some thirty-five thousand men, who did not pay their commutation money; some forty-seven thousand paid it. I thought I saw at that time that the operation of the law would never be effective while the commutation clause was retained in it, and hence I moved to repeal it; and in my speech I gave it as my opinion that if that provision of the law remained in force you would not get more than twenty per cent. of all the men drafted under it. The report now of your Provost Marshal General shows that instead of getting twenty per cent. you have got only seven per cent. Only seven men out of every hundred have been brought to the ranks of the Army under the effect of this commutation clause. It does seem to me it is too plain for argument. You draft a man, and say to him that he may buy his exemption for $300, when at the same time he can get seven or eight hundred dollars bounty if he wishes to go into the Army. He will never come in under a draft. It is wholly inoperative. If a young man wishes to go into the Army he will not enter under the draft, because he can buy his exemption for $300, and he can get seven or eight hundred dollars bounty as a substitute. It is the plainest possible proposition, as it seems to me.

But my distinguished colleague asks, what is there in the changed condition of the country since the first of this session which renders it necessary to repeal that clause now and not necessary at that time? The force of that argument does not strike me, for I was for the repeal of the $300 commutation at the beginning of this session of Congress, and so voted and so spoke. But many things have transpired since that time which it seems to me authorize this change. At that time it was said by gentlemen with great confidence, and I doubt not with great candor, that the draft would be effective; that it would bring men into the field and in sufficient numbers to uphold the standard of the country. I feared then that such would not be the result; and what was then prophesied, what was then simple apprehension, is now history. It is now shown that the law is inoperative.

But my distinguished colleague takes another position which I think the history of the country does not sustain. He says you cannot by draft procure an army which will ever conquer Lee's army. Every single soldier that Lee has in the field has been brought there by draft and conscription. From the beginning of the rebellion there is no man there that is not there by draft and conscription; and if that argument be true it goes to this extent, that a man drafted in the North is not equal to a man drafted in the South. That is the whole of it, for their army is an army of conscripts. Does not my distinguished colleague remember that the Army of 1812 was filled in a great degree by drafted men; that many of those who fought that second war of independence and closed in glory at New Orleans that second contest for independence and nationality were drafted into the Army? I suppose simply because you draft a man, you do not change his nature, you do not change the free current of his Anglo-Saxon blood which makes him the representative of the conquering race of mankind upon the whole earth.

Another position assumed by my distinguished colleague was in answer to the few desultory remarks which I made yesterday, in which I expressed the opinion that this contest was to be fought out to the bitter end, that this fiery and bloody ordeal through which the country was passing should lead to a nation's redemption; and if I understood aright his position to-day, it is that at the present the people are not for peace, but if the war be prolonged for more than one year then the people will be for peace, because of the drain caused by the war upon the industrial interests of the country and the blood of the country. I dissent utterly and entirely from that whole position. Would my distinguished colleague send commissioners to-day to treat with rebels in arms? Would he favor an amnesty proclamation of peace to the rebels to-day? Would he say to the condemned traitor felon, trembling under the gallows with a halter around his neck, that he shall dictate terms to the judge and to the executioner? I am for no peace except a peace which shall come at the end of a successful war, whether that war lasts one year, two years, five years, or one hundred years. Let gentlemen make up their minds to it. I hope the war may be closed and closed speedily; I hope much from this present campaign; but even though your armies shall be unsuccessful, I still fall back upon those eternal, God-given, liberty-loving instincts which warm the human heart, and I will rally by draft, by conscription, by volunteering, another army. This is the conflict of ages, and the battle for all ages to come; and I contemplate no time when I shall be willing to lay down our arms short of the entire submission of the people of the South to the laws and Constitution of the United States. I know of no terms short of those which will satisfy the American people; and with great respect to the opinions of my distinguished colleague, I cannot for a moment believe that the people will tire of this contest simply because it is protracted. Is there anything in the history of the loyal, true-hearted, noble men of the country that authorizes an inference like that? Whenever your President has made a call for troops it has been promptly responded to. Again and again the people have answered the calls of the President, and more than answered them. Is there any evidence that the people are relaxing in their determination to suppress the rebellion? Are the grand interests at stake less now than they were three years ago, when the contest began? They are infinitely higher and greater and beyond what any man contemplated at the beginning of the rebellion. The whole interests of mankind are now involved in it, the whole interests of free government and free institutions, and I ask you to rise to the dignity of the grand argument before you, rise above the murky mists which surround the base of the mountain, get up to the patriotic view in the bright sunshine of freedom, and recognize what the people expect in this crisis and what God demands.

Shall there be a relaxation in our efforts simply because the struggle has been prolonged and has been protracted? That is the argument. We hear it again and again. It crops out at every point in newspapers and platforms and speeches and joint resolutions in this body, and I wish once and forever to put the seal of condemnation upon any such thing. I would carry this war on if in order to subdue the rebellion you make a pathway of desolation from the Potomac to the Gulf of Mexico. Do you believe the people will tire of the war in one year? No, sir; the whole history of the past forbids it. More than a million of men have gone forth to battle in this controversy, and my distinguished colleague asks how many men are now away from the workshops and the fields, how many men are now in your Army, and he seems to find fault with the Secretary of War because he cannot answer that question. No power of intelligence this side of God in heaven can now answer it. You know how many you have called into the service; but how many languish in your hospitals, how many have found graves upon the battle-field, how many have been disabled, the grand roll-call of eternity will alone disclose. How many men we have now at this moment in the service of the country is not known. But because these great sacrifices have been made is that a reason why we shall now abandon the contest? The greater reason why we should prosecute the contest successfully. If we were even inclined to be recreant to what I conceive to be our duty, a voice of rebuke would rise up from the hundred thousand graves dotted all over the battle-fields of the South. Is this contest an idle sport, or is it a contest for a great principle—the grandest principle for which men have ever contended? Have you called out your million of men in vain? Have you lost one hundred thousand soldiers in vain? Have your fields been wasted in vain? And if you now accept an ignoble, and what to my mind would be a disgraceful peace with rebels with arms in their hands, it seems to me that the whole fruits of the contest will have passed away.

Three years ago gentlemen told you upon this floor that if you suspended the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus the people would rise and rebuke the Administration, a reaction would come about, and the war policy would fail. Three years have passed away, and yet, thank God, the people's nerves are strung to a yet higher tension, and the great heart of the nation yet beats more hopeful of final triumph. Then you were told that arbitrary arrests were to work the great reaction; and what is that reaction? A reaction against loyalty, against truth, against patriotism? A reaction that will put one party in power and another out of power? I, upon an occasion like this, love my country more than party. I am intent upon saving the country and not looking to the interests or behests of party.

You were next told that if the emancipation proclamation was issued, that would produce a reaction, and make the people wonderfully tired of the war. Has such been the effect? Have the people shown any greater disposition to abandon the contest since that? No, sir. That grand decree has but nerved the hearts of the loyal patriots of the country, for when they felt that it was necessary, in order to save free government, to free an oppressed race, they accepted with alacrity the alternative, and Abraham Lincoln—I ask your pardon—the President of the United States, is now an instrument in the hands of God, writing the grandest decrees that have ever revolutionized human society or changed the grand current of human history. That then did not bring about a reaction and make the people tired of the war.

Next, you were told that the arming of slaves was to make the people abandon the contest and abandon the war; that it was nothing for you or your sons or your brothers to die in the defense of the country, but when you touched the slave you must lay your hand gently upon the lion's mane; that was a species of property sacred above all other property. It was nothing that your sons bleed, nothing that your brothers bleed, but the moment you called a slave into the service of the country, that very moment you heard this cry of "reaction" and "peace upon any terms!" I am for arming the free negroes, for arming the slaves, for arming every one upon the continent; and I tell gentlemen that the war will not cease until slavery is extinguished, until the sun in heaven at noonday does not look upon a slave on earth. That is written, and written irrevocably, in the book of fate, and all the waters of another deluge cannot wash it out. To save the nation it is necessary that slavery should die, and die it will. And a man who has once served in the armies of the country should be a free man, and free forever. The poor, trembling slave who seeks a city of refuge under the broad folds of your national banner, who lays hold of the altar of freedom, is free, and free forever; and the man who would dare to return him to slavery will cover his name with an eternity of infamy.

These things have not brought about the reaction that was spoken of, nor will they bring it about. I hope, as I before said, that the war is not to be prolonged; but whether it is or not, I look to no peace brought about by truckling to rebels. Peace and the blessings of peace carry benefactions everywhere; but there are some things more desirable even than peace, and some of those things, as I understand, are liberty, manhood, nationality, free institutions, and a Christian civilization which shall outlive the fleeting and temporary scenes that surround us.

A few words now in reference to the present position of the question. I shall vote for the report of the Committee on Military Affairs simply repealing the $300 commutation clause. If that report shall not pass, then I shall vote with great cheerfulness for the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, which amendment, it seems to me, is most aptly calculated to effect the objects intended, first, to limit the draft to one year, and secondly to credit the States in arrear with that draft in the proportion of one to three. Take, for instance, his own noble State of Vermont, the north star in American patriotism which never sets; there is no danger of a draft there; she has filled her quota; he proposes to credit these drafted men for one year in the proportion of one to three against her three years' drafted men. It seems to me that is perfectly fair, just, and honest. That far I go.

I will vote for his amendment provided the report of the committee fails; but I shall first vote for that, believing that the draft is an arbitrary thing, and that it will bring men into the field for three years precisely as soon as for one year, and believing that short enlistments have been the bane of all armies from the Revolution down to the present time. Every single commander has always complained of it. The staple of General Washington's letters during the whole Revolution was a complaint against short enlistments, and it was the same with every officer commanding in the war of 1812. Give us men for three years, and if necessary then fill your Army again. For every veteran who dies with the flag in his hand upon the battle-field even at the end of three years more send another noble soldier to take his place.

Let not gentlemen "lay the flattering unction to their souls" that the war is to end short of the entire subjugation of the rebellion. When that shall have been accomplished, in one month, or one year, or two years, or one hundred years, then the patriots may felicitate themselves upon a triumph which will be permanent; then they may know that they have added more than a thousand years to the lifetime of the grandest republic upon earth.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter at large into the discussion in reference to this subject, but only to refer briefly to some of the views which have been discussed here. The Senator from Indiana who has just taken his seat and the Senator from Oregon have held up the example of the so-called southern confederacy as one that we should follow—

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Senator will pardon me: I simply referred to a historical fact in reply to my colleague, showing how they raised their armies.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was going on—if the Senator had permitted me to finish the sentence—to say that he held up to us their example in reference to the mode of getting men for the Army. Sir, they may do a great many things down there that we cannot do here. They started at the outset by placing in their army soldiers during the war, as I understood. They first raised volunteers, many of whom reenlisted for the war, and then they commenced a conscription of soldiers during the war. We did not adopt that policy. We adopted a different policy. We followed the policy that we had pursued from the foundation of the Government up to that time; and at this period of time we should not change our policy unless the United States Senate is prepared to indorse the entire doctrine laid down to-day by the Senator from Indiana, that this war is to be continued until the last man and the last woman upon our side and theirs shall perish if you do not conquer them. I am not prepared to indorse that doctrine. I had fondly hoped, until this discussion arose here, that with the million of men we have in the field, seven hundred thousand of them having come in since the 1st day of last October, this campaign would scatter and destroy the armies of the southern confederacy. I had hoped and believed so. Senators, however, have now stated that probably this campaign will not accomplish that end. I regret very much to hear it. I regret very much that it will not terminate the war.

But, sir, it strikes me that this is probably the worst time to appeal to our passions for the purpose of guiding our deliberations. If it is true, as is stated by Senators, that this campaign, with a million of men on our side, will not result in scattering the organized armies of the southern confederacy, we are brought to a position where we ought gravely to deliberate as to the best mode of carrying on the war hereafter. If, sir, a million of men, or if seven hundred thousand men, to state it at that number, are not enough in the field, I do not know what you would do with three or four hundred thousand more, and that is all I believe that it is proposed to call out. The question is presented to the Senate, and we have to determine it, whether we shall adhere to the policy we have heretofore adhered to, or whether we shall repeal all commutation and place the men who are drafted in the field for the period of three years or more to carry on the war.

The Senator from Indiana is mistaken as to one historical fact. The men who fought the battle of New Orleans were not drafted men. Some of them were men who had not been in the service twelve months. Those men who displayed there such valor as reflected the highest credit upon us, who conquered the heroes of Wellington and the conquerors of Europe, were volunteers, and many of them had seen less than twelve months' service. They fought, and fought successfully, men who had gone through nearly all the battle-fields of Europe.

But gentlemen tell us now that one veteran is worth five or six raw recruits. Let me say that you can make as efficient soldiers in five months where you have experienced officers and enough experienced men to act as guides as you can in three years. The Senator from Vermont was entirely correct when he said that you may take the men who are conscripted or who volunteer this fall, place them in your Army, and if you place them in an old regiment with one half experienced men you will have by spring as efficient soldiers as those who have been in the Army for three or four years. There is a great deal of equity, too, as has been shown, in taking men for twelve months, and when they are done taking others for twelve months more, giving the winter season for the purpose of drilling them. If we are going to conduct this war for a period during the lives of all of us, all our people will have to become soldiers and inured to arms, and I do not know but that they will have both my friend from Indiana and me. We might do very well at a stand, but I do not think we should do very well at a retreat, because we could not run; we should have to stand up and fight; we are too old to run. [Laughter.] For this reason I shall favor the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

I am opposed to the provision of the bill to repeal the commutation clause; and I will state very briefly why I am opposed to it. After you have allowed the men in the States where a draft has taken place to pay out, I do not think it is exactly fair to force our people in Illinois, who, up to this time, have sent to the field all that were called for, to fight out. I do not think that is even-handed justice; and if we are going to repeal the commutation clause I am for going back and taking those men who have paid out and forcing them to fight out also, as well as forcing our people to fight when you come to lay a draft on them. I am for drawing no invidious distinction between the soldiers of one part of the country and of another. Before you are entitled to call upon Illinois for another soldier, in fairness, in common honesty you ought to furnish the men that you owe in the States where you have not furnished them. If you repeal this commutation clause now, although we have furnished more than we were required to furnish by voluntary enlistment, you will take our men and place them in the field, keeping up that inequality, and you tell us, "We paid for our men, but we will not let you pay for yours."

At the beginning, like other Senators, I was opposed to the commutation clause. I believe it has worked well, however; it has popularized the conscription; and gentlemen may talk as much as they please about not popularizing these measures. I know they and I depend very much on the popular will as to the positions we have occupied in the past, and I suspect that we shall have to do it in the future. Is it not acceptable to the people? You have tried it for twelve months; it has worked your machinery along very well; you have placed in the field five hundred thousand men under it; and now you turn around and tell me, "We cannot get any soldiers at all;" and the Department send here the returns from a few districts throughout the United States, some of them where half the people were sick; and in some of those places I imagine they will be sick again. It is a sickly season, the Senator from Oregon suggests; probably it is a sickly country. [Laughter.] I am in favor of the amendments of the Senator from Vermont, and opposed to the original bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have but a very few words, sir, to add to what I have already said in the course of this discussion. The question before the Senate is whether we shall repeal the law which allows a man when drafted to pay $300, and for the time being to be discharged. That is the question before the Senate. I am opposed to the bill, but in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, to allow the draft under existing laws to be for one year if the President so desires, instead of three years.

My colleague has said in reply to what I suggested to the Senate, that the judgment of the Senate last January in voting down the present proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts was guided by the fact that the Senate was assured that a draft under that law would bring men into the field. My colleague did not receive that assurance from me. I did not then believe, I do not now believe, that a draft will bring an army into the field. I recollect, sir, in the course of debate to have produced from the Provost Marshal General's office a statement of the number of men that had been drafted, the number of men that had been excused or discharged from the draft because of sickness, the number of men discharged for other causes, the number of men that had paid their commutation money and thus been released, and from that array of facts and figures I attempted to show to the Senate during that debate that the draft would not fill the army, but that the volunteering system encouraged by bounties would fill the army, and the figures then produced from the Provost Marshal General's office, accompanied by the statement of the Secretary of War that the commutation money had been used in paying bounties and bringing men into the field, supported the proposition which I then advocated that the volunteering system was the right system when a Government was attempting to maintain its existence. Has it come to that point in supporting the Government that we may not rely upon the voluntary efforts of the people? Has this war become so odious that men will no longer volunteer? We know that at one time they would volunteer. We know that in 1861 and in 1862 the calls were no sooner announced by the Governors to their people than the regiments were full. They sprang up from the farms in Indiana and other northwestern States like the Highlanders upon the mountain sides of Scotland at the sound of the bugle of their chieftain. And why, sir? Because my colleague and other Senators had voted this sentiment, that this war was not a war of subjugation, that it was not a war to break down the institutions of any of the States, but that this was a war to restore the Union and to maintain the authority of the Constitution and laws.

My colleague supported that resolution, but now he says to the Senate that this war is not to stop until the institutions of one half the States of the Union are prostrated, until one half of the Union is subjugated. If there is a difficulty in raising men it is not because of the original policy of the Government as declared by Congress; and I say to my colleague that it is known to him as well as it is known to myself that the earnestness with which the men of Indiana volunteered did not abate until the President's proclamation was announced to the country, and then for long months no regiment was raised in Indiana. Why, sir, why? Because the war-making power of this Government, the power that had the right to declare the purpose and policy of the war, had said that it should be for one purpose, and the President had undertaken to say that it should be for another purpose.

But I do not intend, sir, to be drawn off into a discussion of that sort. I did say last winter, and I believed then as I believe now, that a drafting system will not secure the army that is to restore the Union, if war is to restore it at all. If we are to have an efficient army it must be raised as it was in 1861, as it was in 1862; and now let my colleague say why there was no need of a draft in 1861, no need of a draft in 1862, and why a draft is necessary now.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Does my colleague desire an answer now?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. My colleague asks why a draft is necessary now and was not in 1861 and 1862. If my colleague will pardon me for a moment I will endeavor to answer him. After the firing upon Fort Sumter, the whole country was a unit in the suppression of the rebellion; but early in 1862 a knot of Democratic politicians got together in Washington and organized a systematic opposition to the Government and discouraged enlistments and volunteering and held out to the people that the whole character of the war had changed, that instead of a war for the suppression of the rebellion it was a war for the abolition of slavery, and I believe the only reason why we may not rely upon the volunteering of the people is that they have been taught to believe that they have been mistreated and misled by their representatives in Congress and by the President of the United States. The reason why a draft is now necessary and was not then necessary is further shown in this fact, that the loyal people of the United States, the patriotic people of the United States, have volunteered to fill the ranks of your Army, and the disloyal, those who sympathize with treason, have remained at home, and, instead of looking to the grand boon of universal freedom, nationality, the supremacy of the laws, and the vindication of the Constitution, have been looking and pleading for petty partisan triumphs.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am very glad that my colleague has announced the fact that when Sumter was fired upon the country was a unit. The country was a unit when my colleague voted for the resolution that this war was to be prosecuted for a restoration of the Union and for the maintenance of the authority of the Constitution and laws. A change came round. My colleague says that a knot of politicians in the city of Washington announced to the people that the policy of the Government had changed. A knot of politicians in Washington! And who were they, sir? I recollect an address sent out to the country by some Democrats in the city of Washington, and I recollect the glorious sentiment in that address, "The Union as it was and the Constitution as it is." That was the sentiment that was sent out by the knot of politicians to whom my colleague refers. Does my colleague object to that sentiment, "the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is"? It is that sentiment of devotion to the Union upon the basis of the Constitution that has given to the Democratic party the power that it now has in this country, and a power that it will exhibit to the astonishment of my colleague and other Senators in November next.

Sir, the first announcement that was made to the country that the declaration of Congress was not to be respected, the first announcement that was made to the country that Congress had not the war-making power, at least so far as to control the purpose and policy of the war, was by the proclamation of the President. I called my colleague's attention to the fact that after that proclamation was issued volunteers ceased to present themselves upon the fields of Indiana. It was known to him; it was known to myself; and why was it, sir? Not because somebody communicated to the people that such a proclamation had been issued, but because the purpose of the war was no longer solely and exclusively to restore the Union and to maintain the authority of the Constitution, but because another purpose was interposed. Then the people began to hesitate and to doubt whether the war could be successfully prosecuted for any other purpose than to maintain the Union of the States and the authority of the Constitution. That doubt my colleague cannot charge to the Democracy. That doubt he must charge to the President whose reelection he will advocate.

But, sir, the question that I asked my colleague was why a draft is necessary now, when it was not in 1861 and 1862. He says a knot of politicians announced to the people that the purpose of the war was changed. Let me tell my colleague that the sentiment of that address, "the Union as it was, the Constitution as it is," was responded to by one hundred and thirty thousand Democrats in Indiana and by every Democrat in every loyal State. That is not the difficulty; that is not the reason. My colleague mistakes when he attributes so great a result to so small a cause. No address of politicians can control the public mind as my colleague has supposed. It is too considerable a power. There must be some great impression made on the public mind by a startling fact that will bring about such a change.

But, Mr. President, the question is whether there shall be a draft without the right of commutation. My colleague has said that nothing has abated the ardor of the people. He repeated that twice in his speech. He said that the proclamation of the President was issued, and the ardor of the people was not yet abated; that the negroes were brought into the Army, and the ardor of the people did not then abate; and several other instances of the conduct of the Administration were alluded to by my colleague, and at each reference he said that the people were still as earnest as ever for the prosecution of the war. If he is right in that let me repeat the question, why is it necessary to have a draft now when it was not in 1861 and 1862, if there is the same zeal, the same earnestness? Mr. President, let it be made known to the people of the United States that this war is prosecuted for the restoration of the Union, and not for the destruction of the liberties of the people, and they will spring up to save this Union as they did in 1861 and 1862. To make that known to the people, to satisfy them that that is the honest purpose of the party in power, is not within my power; it is within the reach of my colleague and the politicians with whom he acts.

My colleague has said in the course of the argument that the draft of 1812 brought men into the field that fought as well as volunteers. I was not aware that there was a draft then in the sense that we have a draft now. We have a draft now by the law of the United States bringing the people directly into the field. As I understand, it is claimed that this law is authorized by the provision of the Constitution which empowers Congress to raise and support armies and to make rules for the government and regulation of the armed forces of the United States. I understand that the men who fought in the war of 1812 were called for under the provision of the Constitution which gives Congress power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;" that the appeal was made to the States, and that the States brought the men into the field.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Does not my colleague know that the States had a draft system and that men were brought into the Army by draft?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very likely; but there was no draft by the United States Government; the States furnished the men and turned them over to the Government, as was done in 1861 and 1862 when the President issued a call to the States; the Governors of the States repeated the call and furnished the men. The Senator from Illinois has answered my colleague in respect to his reference to the conscripted army of the South, so that I have no occasion to allude to that.

My colleague, going outside of the subject that is before the Senate, has asked if I, to-day, would send commissioners to the South; if I would not respond to his sentiment that this war is to be prosecuted till the last man is called out, and that then it shall be handed over to the women and children of the country. Mr. President, I will tell you when I shall be willing to send commissioners to the South. Whenever a peace can be secured which will restore this Union upon the basis of the Constitution and save our liberties, a peace honorable to the North, fair to the South, and that will restore to us our former prosperity. I am ready to meet any foe upon that proposition. Whether the Senator calls them "felons" or "rebels," it is a war now upon such a gigantic scale that all over the world among all civilized nations they are recognized as belligerents, and with them, or with any foe of my country, I would treat whenever I could get a fair adjustment of the difficulties between us. Has the Senator a difficulty with his friend, a difficulty with his enemy, the bitterest foe he has upon earth, and he can adjust that difficulty upon terms that secure his just and legal rights, and that do not sacrifice his honor and his pride, will he not accept them? As a Christian gentleman, I know he would; and what is right in respect to the conduct of an individual, is it not right for a Government?

My colleague would never treat for terms, never receive or send propositions, I suppose, but it must now be "subjugation!" He would leave one pathway of ruin and desolation from the Potomac to the Gulf! And then what Union does he restore? A union with the dead South, a union with the carcass of that which once contributed so much to the prosperity of the people whom my colleague so ably represents here. Sir, I am ready for adjustment, ready for peace, ready for compromise whenever and at the very earliest day we can restore this Union upon the basis of the Constitution, upon terms honorable to us and that will restore to us our prosperity. In Indiana we cannot well consider the question of separation. Our life, the life of our prosperity, depends upon the Union. Our trade is upon the great rivers of the west. Our market has been with the people of the South. My colleague's neighbors and constituents have been made rich because they traded with the people of the South, because they sent their corn, their wheat, their flour, their bacon, and their beef upon the friendly waters of the Ohio and the Mississippi, and found all along the shores a friendly people who were ready and willing to buy from us and pay us with the proceeds of their slave labor. No constituent of my colleague and myself ever objected to finding a market there because the productions of that country were the result of slave labor. Sir, I do not want the brand to go all over the South; I do not want the plowshare of destruction to leave naught there which will again furnish us that market. Will my colleague not respond to the sentiment that when we can restore the Union and renew our trade with the South, so that we shall pour wealth into her lap, and in return she shall pour her wealth into our great lap in the Northwest, we ought to do so? Is he not content with such a result? Would he not pray for it?

But my colleague has gone yet further and said that this war is not to stop until slavery shall cease to exist. Sir, more than two years ago it was my duty to address the people of Indiana in a very important political convention. In that convention I said just what I now believe, that with slavery, according to the almost unanimous declaration of Congress in this war, we have nothing to do, that with the slave we have nothing to do. I said then, as I now repeat, that if our commanders as they make their march toward the South can use the black labor so as to relieve our white soldiers from the burdensome part of their duty I should acquiesce in it and support such a policy; but I am now as much opposed as I was then to shedding our blood and wasting our northern treasures for an end which we cannot arrive at except we do it over a broken Constitution and violated law. The institution of slavery exists by virtue of the laws of the States, not by virtue of the laws of the United States, and the validity of those laws, their supremacy and authority is guaranteed by that Constitution which my colleague as well as myself took a solemn oath to support as long as we hold seats in this body. If slavery shall disappear during the progress of the war as an incident of the war, as a necessary consequence of the war, let it take its fortunes like other property. We see the house of the southerner disappear, we see his fences disappear, his improvements disappear. This is the consequence of the passage of great armies over any country. If slavery disappears so, it takes its fortune in the chances of war; and the men of the South who inaugurated this war, as I believe without a sufficient reason, brought their property thus in danger. But as Senators we have no right, in my judgment, to make this war for the purpose of destroying the institution of slavery except (as the Senator qualifies his argument) it be necessary to restore the Union; and now, if it were anywhere else, I would say that that argument—I have heard it so often—is a jesuitical one. It is never, in my judgment, politic or right to do wrong. To save the Constitution it is never necessary to violate the Constitution. The Constitution has guaranteed to the States their institutions and the validity of their laws, and if these laws create distinctions in society, give to the black man a certain status and condition, with these laws we have nothing to do, and it is not for us to shed blood and waste treasure to strike them down. That part of my colleague's argument I certainly cannot agree to. While by my votes I shall support appropriations of money to sustain the Army in the field, I shall never support that policy which looks as a purpose to the destruction of any institution whatever which is guaranteed by the Constitution I have sworn to support.

A word or two now, Mr. President, on the measure before the body. The draft is a dreadful measure upon the people. I know how they feel about it. When a neighbor is drafted who is in such poor circumstances that he cannot pay his commutation money, and it is destructive to him and his family for him to go into the field, his neighbors cheerfully make up the money to modify what they regard as the hard fortune under which he is placed. This does mitigate the severity of the measure. It encourages volunteering, because it places in the coffers of the Government an amount of money which can be used to pay bounties and get volunteers. It is safe to the Government, for it secures the services of volunteer soldiers instead of drafted soldiers. Neither my colleague nor any other Senator will question that the volunteer soldier is as good, to say the least, in the field as the drafted man. He goes cheerfully; his pride, his honor become involved from the very day that he writes down his name as a volunteer soldier. Then I think the policy is, if you have a draft, to let those who cannot go pay their money in, and let that money be used to encourage volunteering. It has so far filled up the Army. But I wish to repeat to the Senator who has this measure now in charge, the Senator who supported the views I now present on the particular measure (not my other views) last winter, the question which I put a little while ago. I thought my colleague could have answered it, inasmuch as he was upon the committee, and was attempting to make an argument upon it.

The question I asked was, what are the facts that justify a departure from the policy adopted after mature deliberation last winter? and in the course of that inquiry I asked what was the number of men in the field. I can look at the list of men that have been called for and that have been drafted in the past, and I see that it foots up to two million two hundred thousand men. More than two million men have been brought into the field when you add up the different calls that have been made by the President. I do not know whether all the States have filled up all these calls; I know Indiana has. Two million two hundred thousand men have been called for in the different proclamations of the President; and where are they? Some of them have been discharged, some discharged at the expiration of their term and reënlisted. When the Secretary of War makes a demand upon us to change our policy, have we not a right to ask of him, to ask of the chairman of the Military Committee, of my colleague, a member of that committee, to know how many men there are in the field now? If we are to resort to this hard measure, which the President of the United States I believe denominated as "dragging the bullock to the slaughter pen," have we not a right when such a hard vote is called for from us as against our constituents to know the necessity of it? The Senator representing the War Department last winter told us to what extent the Army ought to be filled up, to how many hundreds of thousands. It was provided for. The response has come from the country. The regiments have passed through here like a deep and broad river until now Richmond is approached by a mighty host. Are there enough of them? If not, where are the men, and upon what service are they engaged? We have a right to know this, and the Secretary of War may not demand of the Senate a change of its policy without a reason. It is a fair question that I put to my colleague and to the chairman of the committee, how many men are in the field? My colleague says that can only be answered at the great call of the muster-roll when the dead respond. Sir, that is a long roll. That roll is responded to by many a sad and weary heart in the North. Before we send more men, let us know what is the necessity for doing so. Does my colleague wish it to be understood in the Senate that when men are killed in battle the number is not known at the War Department? Is our system so loose and inaccurate that the War Department is not informed of the number of killed and wounded men and the state of the regiments after each battle?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Does my colleague wish an answer now?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator desires to give one.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Those statements are made out on the pay-roll at the end of each two months, as I understand. In the interval no one can tell how many have been killed, how many have been furloughed, &c. The reports are made, as I understand, at the end of every two months, or sometimes, when payment is delayed, not for three or four or five or six months.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not agree with my colleague that the payment of the soldiers is the only way in which we know of the number of dead and wounded men. As I understand, in every well-regulated army a return is daily made by the captain of each company to the proper regimental officer of the number of men fit for duty, how many men have dropped out by the way-side foot-worn and weary, how many are sick, how many are in hospital, how many are in green graves. Those returns are then made to the commander of the army, and so on till they reach the Department here. At the end of every battle a return of that kind goes with the reports to the War Department. I think my colleague's answer is not a sufficient one in response to the fair question put by me to him and to the chairman of the committee, and the proper answer to which is necessary to guide a vote on this matter. When we are called upon to draw the bullocks up to the slaughter pen, in the language of the President, let us know the reason of it, if there is to be no exemption from the horrible draft. When a man volunteers, he goes voluntarily, cheerfully; his neighbors flock around him; he has their support and their encouragement; but when he is drafted he has not that support, he has no friends around him except the few that are related to him; it is a very different thing. When we are called upon now to exercise so high a power, we have a right to demand of the War Department to know the number of men in the field and the number of men required. Shall we never know? Are we never to know, but simply to legislate upon the call of the Department? It is a reasonable question; but without reference to that information, my mind is made up that volunteering encouraged by the bounties which the Government may well pay from the commutation money, is the best system to secure an army readily, and an efficient army, and in that view the chairman of the Military Committee concurred last winter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, in the course of this discussion two or three questions have arisen, one of which is—and to that I will refer first—whether conscripts, or men who are drafted into the Army, make good soldiers. Sir, what is our experience in the course of this war? I will not undertake to speak for other States; but from my own State some men have been drafted who have gone into the service and into the field; and generally speaking the drafted men have been fully as able-bodied men, and perhaps more so, comparatively, than those who volunteered; and they have proved themselves to be as good soldiers when they have fought by the side of volunteers. There are some in one of the new regiments of Wisconsin that have lately gone to the front. I refer to the thirty-sixth Wisconsin regiment, which, on the 17th of May, went under fire, and was under fire almost every day until it joined in the charge under General Hancock that took the intrenchments of the enemy. They were new soldiers, too, Mr. President, and new men, and some of them conscripts. And what does the history of all wars show; what do the wars of Napoleon show but that his conscript soldiers were the best soldiers he ever had?

Mr. President, that is enough on that subject for my purpose. Another question arises whether it is wise now to repeal what is called the commutation clause. It is believed by the War Department, upon the evidence before them coming up from the provost marshals all over the country, that in the present state of the currency and the present state of the country, in view of the high price of labor and the great demand for labor in all the walks of life, if men can be excused from going into the service for $300, very few soldiers will be obtained; and in fact the returns of the provost marshals show that only seven per cent. of the men called for are forthcoming under the operation of the present law. If, therefore, we are wise men, and are satisfied that we must have men to fill up the ranks of the Army, let us repeal the commutation clause; and for myself, I do not know but that I am prepared to repeal what is called the substitution clause; but that question is not now before the Senate, and I will not discuss it at the present time.

But another question arises, and that question is perhaps the most important one, whether in the present state of the country it is wise for us to authorize the War Department to draft men into the service for any period of time less than three years or the war, whether we shall allow them to be drafted for a single year. I shall give my support to the proposition offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, not because I do not fully understand the benefit of having veteran regiments; I know that very well; but we have the veteran regiments, a thousand of them, I suppose, with all their organization, with their officers, colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains, and, what is of equal importance, with their sergeants and their corporals, all men who have seen service and have gone through many a battle during the present war. I remember very well a conversation I had with one of the ministers of the great Powers of Europe here in Washington directly after the Bull Run defeat of 1861, when he said to me: "The fault is not in your men; I will tell you where the fault is; it is in your officers of the line, your captains, your lieutenants, your sergeants, your corporals, that have not seen service and do not know how to hold a line firm and strong in the face of an enemy." But, sir, when you have a veteran organization, when you have officers that have seen service for two or three years, and have gone through many a bloody battle and have faced danger and death in every form, when you have sergeants and corporals and some of the veteran men themselves standing in the ranks, and put new men into the ranks by the side of them, those new men in six weeks will fight as well as they ever will fight. That is the real truth, and such is the proof growing out of our experience of this war. Why, sir, refer to that very thirty-sixth regiment of Wisconsin to which I have alluded, and what does its history show? When it led under Hancock in the charge upon the intrenchments of the enemy, it was a new regiment. Colonel Haskell fell at the head of the regiment, but the men did not falter; and it was an entirely new regiment, without the advantage of having even an old organization. But, sir, when under the operations of your draft you call upon the men and put them into the old regiments side by side with veterans, and under the command of sergeants, corporals, lieutenants, captains, majors, and colonels who have seen service, officers that will not shrink, the men will never shrink. When you have veteran officers throughout, down through the companies, when there is a sergeant or a corporal that stands within reach of every man, that can put his hand upon him and say, "Steady, boys, steady," there will be no shrinking on the part of the men.

Mr. President, let me refer to a few instances in history. Let me take the instance of Napoleon, the great warrior of modern times. When he was defeated and overthrown in Russia, not by the valor of the Russians nor the armies of his adversaries, but by the frosts and snows of Russia, when his whole army became utterly demoralized so that they were mingled together, infantry, cavalry, and artillery, pell-mell without distinction, when the generals and marshals of his army were walking side by side in an indiscriminate mass with his privates, hungering and starving on their way homeward, Napoleon on the 18th of October, 1812, was persuaded to leave this retreating mass and to go home to Paris. On the 12th of January, 1813, Napoleon called together the Senate of France, and by what was denominated a decree of the Senate three hundred and fifty thousand conscripts were raised. On the 15th of April Napoleon left Paris at the head of his young legions. On the 1st of May he was at Lutzen, where he attacked the combined army of the Russians and Prussians and overwhelmed them, with fifteen thousand killed and wounded on the field of battle, and captured more than two thousand prisoners. His army was composed of young recruits. The law authorizing their being raised passed on the 12th of January, and on the 1st of May with his young conscripts he conquered the combined armies of Russia and Prussia. In his order of the day addressed to these soldiers after the battle, he said:

"Soldiers: You have fulfilled my expectations. The battle of Lutzen stands beside the battles of Austerlitz, of Jena, of Friedland, and of Moscow."

Sir, those who say that young recruits are not good men to fight when you take them and put them into old regiments under old organizations by the side of veteran soldiers, under veteran sergeants and corporals and lieutenants and captains, it seems to me, overlook the teachings of history altogether, and overlook our own experience in this war, and overlook our own knowledge of human nature.

Mr. President, one or two other questions have arisen here to which I beg leave to call attention for a moment. It seems to be assumed by the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HENDRICKS) and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. RICHARDSON) that Senators on this side of the Chamber concede that the present campaign will not result in the dispersion or capture of the army of General Lee. Sir, I have listened to this debate with great attention, and I have heard no Senator on this side of the Chamber say any such thing. I believe we can all say with confidence that if we sustain General Grant properly in this present campaign he will crush the army of General Lee. I believe it; I think all Senators around me believe it also. No man can foresee the eventualities of war, it is true; it is possible that we may not succeed; and therefore I do not believe it is wise for us to say that we know the war must close with the present year. But that is not at all involved in the proposition that we draft fresh men for one year at a time and put them into the old regiments. We draft, if you please, one or two hundred thousand men and put them into the old regiments to fight for one year. We believe that the war will be finished within the year, or at all events that the great armies of the rebellion will be crushed and broken in that time. But suppose they should not be, and the men whom you draft to fight for one year are permitted to go home, and you draft other men to take their places, what harm is there in that? I do not see any. I agree that if you were to begin from the beginning to raise new regiments with new and inexperienced officers as well as new and inexperienced men, I should not be willing to raise them for a single year; but if you take men now and put them into old regiments by the side of veteran soldiers and under veteran officers of the company and the line, I believe they will fight in six weeks as well as they ever will in the world. That is my belief, and therefore I shall join with the Senator from Vermont in support of this proposition.

But, Mr. President, one other suggestion has been made. It has been said by some Senators that there is a determination to fight this war even if it should desolate the whole South from the Ohio to the Gulf. Sir, I believe there is a determination on the part of this people which will not give over this controversy, never give it over until we succeed; but I do not believe that any such result will come, or if desolation comes it will be but temporary, upon that region of the country. I believe that we shall have a union of all the States, a union of the United States, and of all the States united and free as the result of this great contest, and that union will be a better union than any we have had. Sir, I believe that when the system which has cursed Virginia, as it has cursed the other States south of the Potomac, shall have passed away, Virginia will come to be settled up with a population such as has settled up Ohio, broken into small farms, covered with villages, all her water-falls turned to account in turning the wheels of industry and manufactures, with her harbors and all her elements of wealth equal, if not superior, to New York itself; and the time will come resulting beyond this period of gloom when Virginia will rise regenerated, rejuvenated, and instead of having a population of one million of white men and five hundred thousand black men, Virginia, like New York, will have three, four, or five million inhabitants, and will be to the Union by far a more powerful State and a better State than she has been in her whole history. And what is true of Virginia will become true of Kentucky, of Tennessee, and of the other States of the South; so that my confidence is unabated that we are to have a Union, and a better and a more glorious Union, and a more profitable Union, than we have ever had in the history of the country.

Mr. President, allow me for one moment to speak of Wisconsin in comparison with Virginia. Wisconsin was born of Virginia, like the other States west of the Ohio. She is one of the youngest born. She was admitted into the Union in 1848-49, scarcely fifteen years ago. Virginia had at the close of the American Revolution twice as much white population as the State of New York. She was the Old Dominion, the mother of States and of statesmen; but now, while Virginia has but about one million of white population, including the whole district of West Virginia, New York has four millions. Virginia, though you include West Virginia with her, has sunk down to the seventh or eighth rank among the States of the Union. How is it with Wisconsin? Though but fifteen years a State within this Union, Wisconsin has a white population more than three-fourths as numerous as Virginia herself. Wisconsin can raise as many troops and more bread to feed them than Virginia. And why all this difference between young Wisconsin and old Virginia? No answer can be given to it but one, patent to all the world: Virginia clung to the institution of slavery and hugged it to her bosom, though she abolished it for Wisconsin and all the States west of the Ohio. Had she abolished it for herself when she abolished it for the north-western territory, Virginia this day would have been the empire State of this Confederacy. Sir, I look upon the time as coming, though there are clouds and darkness around us, though there is gloom and agony and blood before us, when we may look beyond these dark clouds to the bright day which is yet to dawn upon Virginia, when regenerated, redeemed, rejuvenated, republicanized, Virginia shall be in this Union what she was in the beginning, only the more glorious, when no stain or plague-spot will rest upon her escutcheon.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Salisbury, and Sprague—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Foster, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howe, Pomeroy, Riddle, and Wright—13.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire particularly to say that from the commencement of this war it has been my opinion that we should bring forth our strength by exact rules of law. I had thought that persons well-advised in our own country, who had charge of Federal legislation understood the lesson that had been taught by the French Revolution when after volunteer force failed under the Directory, the consular power came in the ascendancy, and conscription became the law, and France became powerful.

It is the duty of every man who has been bred beneath the shelter of our laws to yield his prompt assistance in maintaining them, whether they be the laws of town or village or county or State, or the great laws that shelter the entire Republic. That was a duty taught to the young men of my time, taught to those of older time, and should have been taught always. I am afraid that that teaching has not impressed itself firmly upon the opinions of those who have now the authority to conduct affairs, otherwise we should have had no $300 provision, we should have had no $500 bounty in towns, $200 in counties, $100 in villages, robbing the wealth of the old men and the old ladies to buy foreign force to go into the field, for the whole aim and purpose and object of it is to bring out a force that does not belong to us. Sir, your sons, your kindred and mine, ask no invitation to the field. They go there free-hearted and strong-armed, and go willingly, and these are the men who must maintain our flag and must reestablish this Republic in its integrity if it ever shall be reestablished. The system to which I have alluded and to which I object has been false from its commencement and is false now. I have been against it from its early start. I have been against it here in a national assembly. I have been against it in all the departments of Government where I have had a voice. It is wrong, radically wrong, and ignores the idea that lies at the foundation of a great republic.

Who was it that won the battle of Marathon? I understand, if I read history aright, that they were Athenian citizens, not slaves, not bondsmen, but the citizens of Athens, who went out there, and under Miltiades won a triumph with ten thousand men against all Persia. So it was through all the legends of the ancient Greeks; and that is what was always put by Demosthenes in his philippics against Macedon, that Athenians should fight, not hirelings, not men bought from foreign States, not men hired to do their offices in the islands of the Ægean, but men who belonged to the city, and who were free citizens of Athens. Sir, there will be no triumph for us until we shall exact of the rich man as well as of the poor man service to his country; until we shall require all men who are able to bear arms to bear arms in defense of the country when occasion may require. I say all men, although they may have the reverend quality of Senators or the dignified position of Representatives, or hold other offices, and can be paid to stay at home. I say all men who owe the State service should be required to render service.

What said the great master, not the greatest, but the great master? After having been imprisoned at Athens, accused of crimes that enemies had produced against him, that he was not loyal to the gods and not true to the system of government of the Athenians; friends met about him after he had been condemned and ordered the hemlock. They said to him, "We have a ship at the Piræus; you will be safe; we will carry you into one of the islands of the Ægean sea, where you will be received as a great teacher." "No," said he, to his friends, "I was born under Athenian laws; I have enjoyed the benefits of those laws; I have enjoyed their protection; I have grown to be a man of many years; I am now an old man; I have raised up children, and I have taught divine philosophy—all these things have I done, and I have done them because I have been protected by the laws of Athens; otherwise I would not have done them. I, who have taught obedience to laws, will not violate them; therefore I remain; therefore I do not escape."

It is that principle which was taught in the early days in Sparta and in Athens among the old Greeks, and which was taught too among the old Romans in their better days, that made them great peoples, and they continued two centuries. We have not yet ourselves accomplished a single century. This idea of hiring vassals, hirelings, to fight our battles instead of making the individual citizen fight, is a thing that they ignored, and it was ignored by the men of the nobler days of the old republic, and must be ignored by us if we undertake to maintain ourselves as a republic. I say that the rich man is more bound to fight. What to him is $300? Nothing. Take the lawyer, the artisan; what is $300 to him if he does not want to fight? Nothing. In this great war, while we have sent from the West particularly our young men, our best blood, from the North and the East they have sent hirelings, men bought to fight and who cannot fight. The great difference between our battles in the West and in the East has resulted from that difference in the soldiers. The young men of the West dare not go home to see their wives and sweethearts if they have not been gallant in battle, and hence in the West we have triumphed generally, and in the East we have had to a large extent, with many exceptions—I do not wish to make an invidious remark—men who have received bounties of from $300 to $1,000 to induce them to fight. Sir, the man who does not fight because he is willing to maintain the flag is not fit to follow the great standard of the Republic. I would pay not one of them a cent, I would conscript them all.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I hope we shall now come to a vote upon the amendment that has been offered. There are many things that have been said this afternoon that I should like to notice, and especially the remark which is made by the Senator from California in regard to the fighting East and West. After what has transpired in the last thirty days, I think that thing ought to be dropped.

Mr. McDUGALL. Allow me to say that I mean to make no invidious distinction between the East and the West. I mean simply to say that these large premiums have induced persons who do not belong properly to Massachusetts or New York or anywhere else to join the Army. I am a northern and eastern man to some extent myself. I mean no invidious remark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the first section of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.]

Mr. BROWN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. As the yeas and nays are to be taken, it becomes necessary for me to say one word. My colleague [Mr. HENDRICKS] has been called away; and after what has transpired to-day it is unnecessary to say that we are on different sides of this question, and therefore I have agreed to pair off with him, and I shall not vote unless my vote may be necessary to make a quorum.

The Secretary commenced the call of the roll; and Mr. ANTHONY responded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish simply to move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "shall" and inserting "may," and that will present a question which I think is important. The amendment now compels future calls and drafts to be for one year. I wish to leave that discretionary with the Government. I think it probable that the exigencies of the service now would be satisfied by one year men; but I do not wish to make that peremptory. I hope the amendment will be amended as I propose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment can be entertained only by unanimous consent. The call of the roll was commenced, and one Senator answered.

Mr. JOHNSON. The mover of the amendment is not here at this moment, and I do not think he would agree to the modification.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to it.

Mr. WILSON. I think it had better stand as it was framed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I shall vote against it.

The call of the roll was concluded, and the result announced, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Powell, Richardson, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Conness, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, and Trumbull—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Wright—10.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The remaining sections of Mr. COLLAMER's amendment were agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to amend the first section of the bill by adding these words to the proviso, "or to apply to drafts ordered to fill the calls already made."

I desire simply to explain the effect of this amendment. The first section of the bill repeals the commutation clause. We are short in the whole country on former calls about sixty-two thousand men divided among eight or nine States. We are drafting for these men now for three years, and we have provided in this bill in the amendment already adopted that the one year provision shall not apply to them. We already provide in this first section that it shall not affect the right to get substitutes. I propose to add to it that it shall not affect the drafts now making on the old calls, that it shall not affect the commutation. Let that go on and be finished; it will probably be finished in the course of the next two or three weeks. The States, then, will all be full; and those that are in excess will have their credits by the provision already adopted. We do not want to disturb or interrupt what exists and is already going on.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know whether I understand the purpose of this amendment. If I do understand it, the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is to declare that of the sixty-two thousand now in arrears not drafted, all such persons can be either liberated or exempt themselves from going into the Army by the payment of $300.

Mr. WILSON. We do that for this simple reason—

Mr. GRIMES. Is that it?

Mr. WILSON. I will state what it is precisely. We have provided in the amendment already adopted that drafts hereafter shall be made for one year. We have provided, however, that that shall not apply to any State that is short now. Those States have got to draft for three years, to go on and fill up their quota for three years. This amendment provides simply that in executing the draft for the old calls that is now going on in eight or nine States of the Union, this repeal of the commutation provision shall not apply, but that it shall apply when we make a new call. It puts the whole bill in harmony.

Mr. GRIMES. Now, Mr. President—

Mr. McDUGALL. I rise to a question of privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California.

Mr. McDUGALL. I am advised that gentlemen are on the floor of the Senate who have no right here. I should like to inquire whether the rules have been obeyed, and I should like the President to be informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no information on the subject.

Mr. McDUGALL. I give the Chair information that there are gentlemen on the floor who have not the privileges of this body.

Mr. GRIMES. I hardly think that is a question of privilege.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is my privilege that nobody shall be here who has not the right.

Mr. GRIMES. It is my privilege to occupy the floor. It occurs to me that if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts—

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask if that is a question of privilege or not. I should like to have that settled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is rather a question of order than a question of privilege.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is a question of privilege. It is my privilege to be on the floor of the Senate with those persons who have a right to be here, and without being disturbed by those who are foreign to the Hall.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not recognize it as a question of privilege, but a question of order; it is a question of observing the order of the Senate.

Mr. McDUGALL. I say to the President that I am informed that persons having no privilege on the floor are here.

Mr. GRIMES. I think I am entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator rises to a point of order, the Chair will recognize the Senator from California.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that if the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs shall be adopted, we may as well abandon all efforts to replenish the Army with fresh men. He told us yesterday that there were sixty-two thousand men now in arrears from the various States and Territories upon which calls have been made for men. Now, in order to fill up the Army, to replenish it in a time when he says the public exigencies very much demand that we should use every effort in our power, he proposes to abolish the commutation clause, and yet the same bill that abolishes the commutation clause is to contain a provision that that repeal of the commutation clause shall not apply to the States that have been so unpatriotic as to let an arrear of sixty-two thousand men accumulate against them.

Mr. WILSON. I would not use the word "unpatriotic."

Mr. GRIMES. If any other term is more acceptable to the Senator, I am willing to adopt it; but there are sixty-two thousand men in arrears against certain States. The Senator comes here with this bill and insists that we shall pass it, and pass it immediately, without an adjournment, because it is absolutely necessary that the Army should be filled up; and yet, although we propose to go on with the draft and fill up these arrears of sixty-two thousand men, he also proposes in the same bill that abolishes the commutation to declare that the commutation as to these sixty-two thousand men shall be continued.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator pardon me while I suggest to him a question? Would it not be more profitable, and should we not get more soldiers, and get them more rapidly, by abandoning the sixty-two thousand, the debt owed the Government, repealing the commutation, and going on under the new law?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir, in that way we should get more soldiers, but probably not so much money. I introduced a proposition yesterday, but it seemed to be scouted from all sides of the Chamber, declaring that all persons who had been drafted and paid commutation money under previous drafts, should be subject to any future drafts that may be made. These sixty-two thousand men whom the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to except from the performance of military duty by the payment of $300 each are to be excluded from any future draft for one year at least.

Mr. WILSON. They will come into the next draft.

Mr. GRIMES. They will come into the next draft, provided the amendment I proposed be adopted; not otherwise. First we cut the Government out virtually of the possibility of getting any of the sixty-two thousand men that are now in arrears from these States, because we agree that notwithstanding we have abolished the commutation as to all others, these particular men may come in and discharge themselves from their liability by the payment of $300. I cannot conceive of a more suicidal proposition that could possibly be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I must certainly express my surprise that the Senator from Iowa or any other Senator should oppose this amendment. It is in perfect harmony with the bill we are framing. What do we propose? How are we situated? We have called, since the 17th day of October last, for seven hundred thousand men. We have raised them all within about sixty thousand. We here ordered drafts in the States that have failed to fill their quotas; and here let me say that New England, as a whole, has more than filled her quota. The drafts which have been ordered are going on in the States which are deficient, and the men are responding by paying money, getting substitutes, or going themselves. The drafts are nearly all completed. They have been ordered in nearly all the States; and executed in most of the districts, and in a very few days will be entirely completed. Now, we propose to abandon the commutation clause, and to provide that on future calls men may be drafted for one year, but that the States which have failed to fill their quotas under former calls shall go on and fill those quotas for three years. Now I propose that in filling up those delinquencies, the States which are behind-hand shall stand just like the States that have filled up their quotas, and that the law under which the calls were made shall not be changed until the quotas have been filled up. You have been called for a given number of men. Go on and finish the calls under the existing law, but change the law if you choose for new calls. That recognizes the right of every State and gives credit to every State and creates no trouble.

But suppose you refuse to agree to this proposition; what then? You have called on one State for so many men, and it has responded and filled up its quota under the pressure of an impending draft by which the men could have paid money or got substitutes. There is another State a little short, a State perhaps equally in earnest, and where perhaps greater exertions have been made, but where it is more difficult to raise men because labor is better rewarded or because a great many have been sent into the Navy as some States have sent several thousand for which they received no credit; and now you say to it, "We called on you for so many men, you have not furnished them, but if they were drafted they would have had the right to get substitutes or pay their commutation; now the time is out, you are now drafting to fill up your quota, but we will take away your right to pay the money."

Mr. JOHNSON. How many men in Massachusetts?

Mr. WILSON. Massachusetts is less than four thousand behind, and she has put into the naval service not less than ten thousand sailors for whom she has no credit.

Mr. WILKINSON. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator if in his estimate of the amount that Massachusetts and other States are behind he counts the three months' men that were raised at the commencement of the war.

Mr. WILSON. The three months' men, the nine months' men, the twelve months' men, the three years' men are all counted in all the States and all equalized. A three months' man makes so much of a three years' man; a nine months' man makes one fourth of three years; a twelve months' man one third; &c. The adjustment at the War Office is perfect. It gives credit for every man raised.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to ask the Senator how many clerks Massachusetts has in these Departments?

Mr. WILSON. I have not the slightest idea. This is a very plain proposition, and a very just one. We execute the drafts already ordered under the law as it now stands; and the Government proposes to make a new call; we have fixed the time at twelve months for the new call, and the men who have paid the money are liable to be drafted again.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not see that we are going to take a vote on this question, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TEN EYCK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Foot, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Harlan, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Sumner, Ten Eyck, and Wilson—13.
ABSENT.—Messrs. Cowan, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Ramsey, Riddle, Trumbull, and Wright—11.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 9, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INCORPORATION OF RAILROAD COMPANY.

THE SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the unfinished business of yesterday, being House bill No. 186, to incorporate the Baltimore and Washington Depot and Potomac Ferry Railroad Company, reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia with amendments.

The amendments, having been severally read, were adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does this bill contain a clause providing for commutation tickets similar to that reported yesterday?

Mr. WHEELER. It does.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and to be read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEWERAGE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to report from the Committee for the District of Columbia House joint resolution No. 89, as to the sewerage and drainage in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If it does not consume time, I will not object.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. It will not.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was reported back. The resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to cause surveys to be made and plans and estimates to be prepared and submitted to Congress for such additional facilities for sewerage in the city of Washington as in his judgment are necessary for the introduction of the Potomac water into the city, and for the health of the city; also for deepening the channel of the Potomac in front of Washington so far as may be necessary for the purposes of drainage; and also for furnishing an adequate supply of water for the insane asylum.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

NEW YORK AND WASHINGTON RAILROAD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, from the select committee on that subject, reported a bill to provide for the construction of a line of railway communication between the cities of Washington and New York, and to constitute the same a public highway and military road and postal route of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the bill may be printed and recommitted to the committee, with leave to report at some particular time—I will say one week from to-day.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I object to granting the committee leave to report at any particular time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I cannot have a particular day assigned, I shall be compelled to ask for the previous question on the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER. I rise to a question of order. I understand the chairman of this select committtee to say that he reports a bill to be printed, and that he has been instructed by the committee to have it recommitted to the committee, and not to have it put on its passage. My point of order is that under these instructions the gentleman cannot have it put on its passage.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not intend to put it on its passage now, nor have I asked it at this time.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair understands the chairman of the committee to have properly reported the bill to the House. The bill has been read a first and second time. The gentleman from Connecticut or any member of the House has the undoubted right to demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from Connecticut to have reported a bill which is prevented from having a particular time fixed for its consideration by an objection which has been made. I therefore suggest to the gentleman that the bill be considered now, not with a view of moving the previous question at once, but of allowing gentlemen on the other side to state their objections to it.

Mr. BROOKS. That bill was not here considered in committee at all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether that bill was reported from a committee.

THE SPEAKER. It was reported from a committee.

Mr. BROOKS. I understand this bill to be reported by the gentleman from Connecticut, the chairman of the committee, to be printed and recommitted to the committee. Am I right?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So far.

Mr. BROOKS. Now, will the gentleman state the other point?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, I have not been present at the meeting of the committee during the last week, having been called home by sickness in my family, but I have been informed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] who presided in my absence what are the facts. I am authorized by that committee, as I understand, to report this bill to the House for the purpose of having it printed and recommitted to the committee, and to have a day assigned by order of the House for its consideration. Gentlemen on the other side of the House object to the bill being printed. If they object to the House ascertaining what is its character, if they are willing to put the bill on its passage without knowing what it is, I am ready for the proposition; and I demand the previous question and trust that the House will sustain me.

I submit to the gentlemen who seem to oppose action on this bill that this is an important measure, and that it ought to be printed. I believe that no one disputes that the bill ought to be printed.

Mr. BROOKS. No one objects to that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest to the House that a day be fixed for the consideration of this bill. This every man knows is necessary in reference to the business of the session which is now near its close. I suggest that some day be fixed when a hearing can be had, so that the House may dispose of it as it pleases. If the House vote it down, well; if they pass the bill, so much the better. All I want and all I am authorized to ask is that the bill shall be recommitted to the special committee with leave to report it back at some designated day for consideration. I will hear any suggestions that gentlemen may have to make.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not believe that we shall differ as to the understanding of the committee. But a small portion of the committee have seen or read the bill. It was agreed that it should be reported to the House and ordered to be printed, with instructions that it should go back to the committee when it was printed to be fully considered. The question has not been settled until it goes back to that committee. It is not certain that they will not amend it; it is not certain that they will not change it in one form or another, or altogether, or lay it on the table in the committee.

Mr. SLOAN. Was it not a part of the instructions to the chairman that the committee should ask the House to fix a day when the bill should be again reported and considered?

Mr. BROOKS. I will not deny or affirm that, because I am not positive.

Mr. SLOAN. I affirm that that was a part of the instructions. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] will remember it.

Mr. ALLEY. If my friend will yield a moment I will state the case as I understand it. And I must say I am surprised that any proposition should be made here to-day to put this bill on its passage when the distinct understanding of the committee was that no such action should be taken, but that it should simply be reported to the House, ordered to be printed, and recommended with the understanding that some future day should be assigned for its further consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order, that it is not in order to refer to what has occurred in a committee-room.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ALLEY. I will say nothing further on that subject.

The parties in interest expect to have a hearing before the committee on this bill. I know that was the express understanding, that they should be heard before the committee previous to their final report. No objection was made to its being reported that it might be ordered to be printed. Therefore, I cannot understand why my friend from Connecticut should insist on the bill being put on its passage.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I have been so understood, I have been misunderstood. I have only moved the previous question on the motion to print the bill, recommitting it with the understanding that it shall be again reported on a designated day and considered.

I moved the previous question upon that, and not upon the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could not move the previous question upon the latter part of the motion, as that part requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then the previous question is called upon that part of the motion which is pertinent. Now, as I believe I have the floor, for all these gentlemen have occupied it only by my consent, I will state to the Chair, and through the Chair to the House, what I do propose, and which I think is a fair proposition. It is very evident from the state of feeling which has been manifested here that this is an important question, so considered both by gentlemen who are opposed to it and those in favor of it. If it is a question of such importance either to public or private rights it is desirable that it should be settled one way or the other, and all I ask of this House is that the matter should be put in such a shape that it shall be considered and settled by this Congress at this session, as it ought to be.

Now, here is the bill; the House does not know what it is; some gentlemen of the committee say they do not know what it is. That is their fault, not mine, as it has been before the committee. I do not desire, upon the floor of the House, to refer unparliamentarily to the action of the committee. The bill is here, and I am instructed by the committee to ask the House to have it printed. That is a proper request. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] will concede that; the gentleman from New York does. It should be printed, and it should then be recommitted to the committee for the purpose of having it considered again in a more solemn manner, if necessary. Then I ask further—and I submit to every gentleman that it is a fair request—that the bill should not be consigned to the tomb of the Capulets by referring it to that committee without leave to report at any time, for that committee will not be called again during this session, in all probability.

Now, what I ask of this House is, that they shall designate some particular day, within the probable existence of this session, when we shall be allowed to report it back. If you are not willing to do that, then I may ask action upon the bill as it stands, trusting this House will consider it from day to day until they understand it, and are ready to vote either for it or against it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not know anything about the character of this bill other than by its title, except I am informed that it may very seriously affect the local interests of Maryland. How that may be I shall not know until I can consider the bill. I desire to have it printed; whether it be recommitted to the committee or not is immaterial to me. I shall object to the designation of any day for its consideration. Whenever the bill shall be reached regularly, and the House shall be ready to consider it, I shall be ready to give a vote upon it. At present I am ignorant of its provisions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. After the statement of the gentleman from Maryland that he shall object to the bill being printed and recommitted to the committee with power to report it to the House on a day designated, I shall, under what I consider to be a very imperative sense of duty, feel myself constrained to consider the bill now during the morning hour, and from day to day until the matter is determined.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I rise to a point of order. It is that it appears from the statement of all the gentlemen upon the committee that there has been no order of the committee to report this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The bill has been reported and read a first and second time; and the House can do something with the bill. It is for the House to determine what they will do, debate it, postpone it, or recommit it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Cannot the House act upon the statement of the chairman of the committee, so as to see that he had no authority to report the bill except to have it recommitted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Maryland how the gentleman from Connecticut can compel the House to recommit it if they do not see fit to do so?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The question is whether the gentleman has authority to report the bill. He has not, according to his own statement. The committee ordered him to report it, ask to have it recommitted, and have a day assigned. The order is upon all three points, and if any one fails, there is no order to report the bill.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair should recognize that usage the House would often find itself in a very serious dilemma. When the chairman rises and reports a bill he states what he desires to have done with it. When that is done the House can do as they choose, whether it suits the committee or not. Committees sometimes report in favor of a bill being rejected, but the House passes it. The gentleman was authorized to report the bill with a further recommendation. That recommendation was frustrated by objections and by the rules. The bill was, however, before the House, and the House can do what they see fit. After the gentleman from Connecticut surrenders the floor the gentleman from Maryland can move to lay the bill on the table, or make any other legitimate motion; but until then he cannot.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not wish to take any such course, for it is palpable that the House has not the judgment of the committee on this bill; and that is the meaning of the report.

Mr. ALLEY. I wish to say that it appears to me that the bill is before the House by order of the committee. The committee instructed the chairman, as he has stated to the House, to report this bill for a certain purpose; that it should be printed and recommitted, and that it should be postponed for further consideration till some future day. Now, if the House is unwilling to do this, and objections are interposed, I would submit whether it is fair, under the circumstances, to the parties in interest who have not had a hearing, and to whom we promised a hearing, to put this bill upon its passage now. I do not know what may be the view the chairman of the committee may take, but it seems to me that in view of the understanding and promises of the committee, and of the pressing business before the House, it would be well, as the committee proposed, to recommit, print, and postpone its further consideration to some day within the limits of the session; for that is the only way in which justice to all parties can be done, and the bill reached and considered by the House at this session. I appeal, therefore, to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS], as having charge of the interests of the State of Maryland and of gentlemen connected with corporations in that State, that he withdraw his objection, and allow the bill to go back to the committee, to be further considered and reported at some future time for the action of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. So far as the application to me is concerned, I am not charged here with the especial interests of any railroad corporations or even the interests of the State of Maryland. I am here charged simply with the interests of the United States, and, in subordination to the interests of the United States, the interests of my district. This measure is one of no more importance than another which I had the honor to ask leave of the House to report on Monday last, which leave was refused by the whole of this side of the House with but three exceptions. So far as I am concerned, this bill must take the regular course.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I understand aright the appeal of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] it is to me as chairman of the committee charged with this subject to proceed on what he claims is the principle of fairness; he appeals to my liberality and courtesy to allow the bill to be recommitted to the committee on a motion to print, without any further order relative to the day when the committee shall have leave to report. Now, if I was acting here simply as a member of the House no man could exceed me in matters of courtesy, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, I think, will readily admit; but I stand here charged by the committee to do a certain thing. I stand here charged by the committee of which I have the honor to be a member to ask of this House a certain thing, to wit, that this report shall be printed, recommitted to the committee, and a day assigned by the House for the reception of the report. I stand here, also, in another capacity, and that is as the person who originally introduced a resolution upon this subject. I stand committed before the country to this House that this question shall be decided by this Congress in one shape or another. I am not willing, therefore, to have the bill sent back to the committee, where everybody knows it must, under the rules of the House, be smothered during the rest of this Congress, because everybody knows the committee will not be called again.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] says that he stands here charged with the interests of the American people, and especially the interests of his constituents. Let me say to that gentleman that he will consult the interests of his State if he will allow this measure to come up at a proper time, after the bill has been printed and spread before the House. If he will not do that, I shall have to ask that the bill be put upon its passage under the previous question. If the gentleman will designate a day when the committee shall be permitted to report this bill, I will agree to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, courtesy and coercion are altogether incompatible. My honorable friend from Connecticut says that I alone stand in the way of fixing a day for the consideration of this bill, and that the interests of my constituents would, perhaps, be better consulted by my allowing him to fix a day. If it were an appeal to my courtesy I might possibly so consider it, but if the gentleman says that otherwise he will move the previous question, I say, then come.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee, I of course feel considerable interest in this bill. The chairman of the committee has very properly said that he was acting here this morning not in his individual capacity as a member of the House, but as chairman of the committee and its mouthpiece. That is the fact, sir. He has rightly said that as the mouthpiece of this committee he had been instructed to report this bill in order to have it printed and recommitted. That is the only purpose for which he was authorized to report the bill. And I put it to that gentleman, as the mouthpiece of the committee, how can he ask that any other action shall be taken by the House than that authorized by the committee? That is the point for him to decide. There is not a member of the committee present who will not say that the committee simply authorized the reporting of the bill for the purpose of having it printed and recommitted, and having some day assigned for its consideration by the House. The committee is bound by that action; but my colleague, [Mr. Davis,] having nothing to do with the committee, is not bound by its action. And because he takes a different course, does that excuse the chairman of the committee, or any other member of it, in disregarding the instructions of the committee? I hold that it does not. I hold that the chairman of the committee is bound by its action, whatever my colleague or any other member of the House may do on the subject.

There is not a member of the committee present who will not say that this bill has not been determined upon at all in committee. It has not been read in the committee. It has not been considered in the committee. It was in order that it might be considered in the committee that the chairman was instructed to ask the House to have it printed and recommitted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask the Chair a question, whether this bill cannot be postponed to a day certain by a vote of the majority of the House.

The SPEAKER. Certainly it can be. A majority of the House has the right to postpone the bill without sending it back to the committee, if it see fit to do so.

Mr. WEBSTER. Would the House take a bill out of the hands of a committee which has not considered it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot tell whether the House would do it or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEBSTER. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask the gentleman from Maryland if the chairman of the committee did not state fully and fairly the instructions given him in reference to this bill.

Mr. WEBSTER. I will allow my colleague on the committee [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to state his instructions. I desired to state them fairly and fully, and if I have not done so my colleague can do so.

Mr. SLOAN. While the committee did instruct the chairman to report this bill and ask to have it printed and recommitted, with leave to report back at a certain day, it was the desire of the committee that action should be had on it before the close of this session. I venture to say that all the friends of the measure are willing to have the instructions of the committee carried out. They are willing to have this bill printed and recommitted, with leave to report at a certain day. That delay is asked on behalf of those whose interests are adverse to the bill.

The gentlemen who desire this delay, and who are opposed, object to having the bill printed and recommitted, with authority to report it back at a given time. I undertake to say that, so far as expressed, it was the desire of the committee to have the bill considered at this session.

Now, if members who are opposed to this measure are not willing to have the instructions of the committee carried out, it seems to me that the chairman of the committee can do no more than he is doing. The bill has been reported, and is in possession of the House. The committee have lost control of it, unless the House chooses to carry out their wishes, and if those who are adverse to the passage of such a measure prefer to compel the consideration of the bill now, if it is to be considered at all during this session, it seems to me the friends of this measure are not responsible for the result. On the contrary, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] and others who are opposed to the passage of this bill, and who object to its being considered on some day named, which would prevent it from being considered at all during the present session, are responsible for the action of the chairman of the committee in bringing up the bill for consideration at the present time.

Mr. WEBSTER. When the gentleman speaks of the gentleman from Maryland objecting to the assignment of a particular day for the consideration of this bill, he does not, of course, refer to me.

Mr. SLOAN. Not at all. I refer to the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. Davis.]

Mr. WEBSTER. I have not made any such objection, and I am not speaking as an opponent of the bill at all. I am merely speaking as a member of the special committee on this subject, and I am only demanding that the directions of the committee shall be carried out. As a member of this House I have not stated to-day, and I do not intend to, whether I am for or against this bill. I only ask that the chairman of the committee shall comply with the instructions of the committee, nothing more.

Mr. SLOAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to suggest that the chairman has tried to carry out those instructions but was prevented by the objection of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. WEBSTER. He was prevented not by any member of the special committee, but by the objection of a member of the House, who had a right to object if he saw fit. And that, I think, does not give the chairman of that committee the right to put this bill on its passage. He very well knows that this bill could never have been reported from that committee for any such purpose. He very well knows that the bill could not have been reported for any purpose except to have it recommitted, so that the committee could consider it. And it is but right, fair, and proper, under the rules which govern the action of members of this House and members of committees, that that bill shall be recommitted, so that it may be considered by the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How many minutes of the morning hour still remain?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-eight.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In answer to my excitable friend from Maryland—

Mr. WEBSTER. Not at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And who still seems to retain the spirit of the Baltimore convention where I had the pleasure of seeing him yesterday, [laughter,] I will say that so far as my action on this bill is concerned, I think I have followed the instructions of the committee specifically. Now, if the gentleman will give me his attention for a moment, I will state fairly what were my instructions and what I have done.

I state in the first place that I was instructed to report that bill to the House. Is that so? I was then instructed by the committee to ask that the bill be printed. Is that so? I was then further directed to ask that a day be assigned for the consideration of that bill, and upon that day being assigned, to ask that the bill be recommitted to the committee. Is that so?

Mr. WEBSTER. Not precisely in that way.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In what respect is it not so?

Mr. WEBSTER. The committee was directed to ask that the bill be recommitted, and then to ask the House to fix some day for its consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was instructed to ask that the bill be recommitted if a day was assigned for its consideration, but not otherwise. I ask the gentleman from Maryland if those were not the instructions of the committee?

Mr. WEBSTER. I will answer the question with a great deal of pleasure. He has stated the facts to a certain extent correctly. When the committee was called the gentleman reported the bill, as he had the right to do, and asked to have it printed, recommitted, and a day fixed for its consideration; but I submit that it was only to be reported on condition that it should be recommitted. The committee could not determine that. The committee never authorized him, if the House refused to set a day, that he should ask the bill to be put on its passage. On the contrary the committee would have refused any such thing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The House have not decided whether they will assign a day or not. That is what I ask them to do. The gentleman insists that I should send the bill back into the committee before the House determine whether they will fix a day or not. It is my duty to ask the House shall fix a day. If the House shall refuse to designate a day, then the House is all-powerful, and can take the whole question out of my hands. I will be satisfied if the gentleman will be as calm as I am, and let me take the sense of the House on the motion I have made that the bill shall be ordered to be printed, recommitted, and that a day shall be designated on which it is again to be reported and disposed of.

I notify the gentleman from Maryland and other gentlemen that in twenty-five minutes the morning hour will expire, and that if this question be not determined before then, the bill, by parliamentary law, will go over until to-morrow, and be considered from day to day as unfinished business.

Mr. COX. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. COX. Has that given rise to this extraordinary debate?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I think that I can make a suggestion that will obviate all objection. It has been decided that the last part of the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut is not in order except by unanimous consent. I propose that he shall divide his proposition. I think that in that way we may arrive at a rightful understanding and proper action. Let the bill be ordered to be printed and recommitted to the committee for the purpose of considering it. Then we can act on the question of fixing a day for its future consideration.

Now, as the action of the committee has been more than once alluded to, and if permitted for a moment, I propose to encroach on the rule of the House. I was not present when this action was had, but I was at the previous meeting when this bill was presented. It is a long bill, and there was not time to consider it. When printed the bill ought to be referred to the committee for its action, as it has not yet been fully considered by that committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. JENCKES. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion which I submitted yesterday to reconsider the vote by which the bankrupt bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. I withdraw that motion, and move that the bill be put on its passage.

Thereupon, the bill having been actually engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time under the order of the House of yesterday.

Mr. JENCKES called for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 39.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. CRAVENS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 65, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, Brownell, James S. Brown, Chamber, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farusworth, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Griswold, Herrick, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McDougal, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Shannon, Sloan, Spaulding, Starr, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, William B. Washburn, Webster, Wheeler, Wilder, Windom, and Woodbridge—64.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailey, Baxter, Blaine, Jacob B. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Francis P. Blair, William G. Brown, Clay, Creswell, Dening, Dumont, English, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Philip Johnson, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Law, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Nelson, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radiator, William H. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scofield, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Williams, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—53.

So the bill was rejected.

During the roll-call,

Mr. GRIDER stated that Mr. HARDING, who would have voted in the negative, was detained from the House by illness.

Mr. SCOFIELD stated that he was paired with Mr. GRINNELL, who would have voted in the affirmative, while he (Mr. SCOFIELD) would have voted in the negative.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CRAVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRAVENS withdrew the motion.

Mr. BOUTWELL, at a subsequent period, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected.

The motion was entered.

ENROLLMENT LAW.

Mr. FARNSWORTH asked unanimous consent to report a bill to amend the enrollment law, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANCONA objected.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has, and reports are in order from the Committee on Commerce.

OCEAN STEAM NAVIGATION.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. In accordance with the directions of the Committee on Commerce, I report back the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York in reference to ocean steam navigation, and ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The committee was discharged accordingly, and the memorial laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My colleague, from the minority of the committee, desires to present a minority report, and have it printed.

Mr. WARD presented a minority report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PASSENGERS ON STEAMSHIPS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 510) further to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels.

The bill was read.

Mr. BROOKS. This is a very important bill, and though I have no doubt that it has been very well considered, yet I would like to have from the gentleman from Illinois some little explanations on points which I am not able to reach without reference to some older legislation. The first section provides

That the term "contiguous territory," in the first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, shall not be held to extend to any port or place connecting with any interoceanic route through Mexico.

I would like to have the gentleman explain that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have sent for the volume of laws which contains the provision referred to. It is the act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels, and, among other things, it provides

That no master of any vessel owned in whole or in part by citizens of the United States, or by a citizen of any foreign country, shall take on board such vessel, at any foreign port or place, other than foreign contiguous territory of the United States, a greater number of passengers than in proportion of one to every two tons of such vessel, &c.

That clause has been held not to apply to steamers sailing from New York to Panama, and the object of this section is to declare that it is not to be held to extend to any port or place connected with any interoceanic route through Mexico.

Mr. BROOKS. The tenth section provides

That all steamers and other vessels belonging to a citizen or to citizens of the United States, and bound from any port in the United States to any other port therein, or to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to any port in the United States, shall, before clearance, receive on board and securely convey all such bullion, coin, United States notes and bonds, and other securities as the Government of the United States, or any Department thereof, or any minister, consul, vice-consul, or commercial or other agent of the United States abroad shall offer, and promptly deliver the same to the proper authorities or consignees on arriving at the port of destination, and shall receive for such service such reasonable compensation as may be allowed by the head of the proper Department.

What is the "proper Department?" spoken of?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Treasury Department.

Mr. BROOKS. Do I understand that the bill provides that those vessels may take bullion or coin only for the United States and not for individuals?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. They may take from individuals as much as they please, but when they take it for the Government they shall not be permitted to charge their own price, as they have been doing, but the compensation shall be settled by the Treasury Department.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the section compel them to take the bullion for the Government and then allow the Treasury Department to settle the compensation? Is that fair and equitable?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I presume there will be no difficulty at all. I think it proper and right, in return for the privileges these steamers receive from the Government, that they should transport the coin, bullion, and other property of the Government at a fair and just price to be determined by the proper Department, which is the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BROOKS. I would suggest that this section applies as well to European and other steamers, which receive no privileges or benefits from the Government, and over which the Government has no power. Would it not be fair to provide in the bill that the same amount shall be paid them that is paid to express and other transportation companies for similar services?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman will shape an amendment to that effect, I will not make any objection to it. This is a report from a committee and I am not authorized to accept the amendment, but I will not object to it.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I move to amend the tenth section by striking out in line fourteen the words "by the head of the proper Department," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "to other carriers in the ordinary transaction of business."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend section five of the bill by striking out in line twenty-one the words "exceeding $3,000 nor less than $1,000," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "less than $10,000," so that the last clause of the section will read:

And if such master or commander shall refuse or neglect to comply with the requirements of this section, he, together with the owner or owners of said vessel, shall be subject to a fine of not less than $10,000, and such fine shall be a lien upon the vessel until paid.

I offer that amendment for the purpose of enforcing this provision of the law. It is a very simple one and yet a very important one, and if it is not conformed to I think this penalty ought to be enforced. It may be considered a very large and heavy one. Gentlemen from California say that it is not too high, and that the bill as reported by the committee imposes a penalty so light that the profits from a very few passengers would pay the fine, and hence that it would amount to nothing whatever.

Mr. GANSON. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois what he means by inserting in the fourth section a provision that before a vessel shall be allowed to depart the master or other person in charge of such vessel carrying passengers shall file with the collector or other officer of customs granting the clearance a list verified by oath of all the passengers, &c.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That question goes to the very gist of the bill. It is in order to erable the number of passengers to be fixed. The great thing which we want to provide against by this bill is the over crowding of these steamers, and this provision in the fourth section is intended to require a list of passengers who are going upon a steamer to be returned to the custom-house and sworn to.

Mr. GANSON. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois to what class of vessels this fourth section applies. Does it apply to any vessel on our inland navigation?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It does not. That is expressly provided against. The section refers back to the steamboat act of 1862.

Mr. GANSON. Does it apply to vessels on the sounds?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It does not.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the fine of $10,000 which he now proposes is an enormous fine to impose upon the owner of a vessel the master or commander of which neglects his duty. It strikes me that the fine of $3,000, originally proposed in the bill, is amply sufficient. I know there is a warm feeling on the California coast about these steamers, but we ought not to impose excessive punishments; for excessive punishments defeat themselves. A fine of $3,000 is an ample punishment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The answer to that suggestion is that the passage money of half a dozen passengers will pay this whole fine, and the steamboat companies can afford to violate the law and make a great deal of money by it. I am certain that the gentleman from New York is in favor of the spirit of this bill. I do not wish to put anything in it that would be unreasonable.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that a fine of $10,000 for this violation of the law would be a great inducement, almost a bribe, to get up fraudulent lists of passengers. It strikes me that the sum first fixed by the Committee on Commerce was quite high enough. I do not believe that this penalty of $10,000 would produce any practical result. It would only lead to frauds and to attempt to evade the law.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The simple remedy for that is for the master or commander, or party in charge, to make a fair return. Let him comply with the law, and he is not fined anything.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, there is no difficulty in finding out at all times the number of passengers on board a ship. It is well known by all who have been in the habit of going back and forward between New York and San Francisco that the passenger laws are constantly violated. We are determined, if possible, that there shall be such restrictions imposed upon steamboat proprietors as will make them pay more attention to this matter. A penalty of $3,000 is a matter of no consideration for them, if they can set the law at defiance. It is a very easy matter to make up that fine from the profits of overloading a ship. But where the penalty amounts to $10,000 it will require a large number of extra passengers to permit the fine to be paid; and such an increase of passengers it will be easy to detect.

It is remarked by the member from New York that it seems to be a great burden that the failure of the commander of a ship should be visited on the owner. I do not think so. It will put the owners of ships on the alert to see that they have proper commanders, men of responsibility as masters of vessels. The penalty is not too severe, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SIANNON. Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that if the penalty of $3,000 originally reported be retained in the bill the bill will not be worth the paper on which it is written, or worth a moment's consideration in the House. Ten passengers additional will make the ship-owner even, after the payment of this penalty. The law can be violated with impunity every time that a steamer leaves New York with passengers for California. If the penalty be increased to $10,000 that will be a different matter. That is the gist and quintessence of the whole proposition. Unless the penalty be so high as to make it the interest of these steamship companies to obey the law, it will be entirely nugatory. I undertake to say that there is no nation in the world which is so imposed upon and has such loose laws in regard to passengers as the United States. The law relating to passengers leaving the United States in these vessels is simply no law at all. It is violated with impunity every day that a steamer leaves one of our ports. Thousands of lives have been sacrificed, and thousands are daily subjected to being sacrificed, in consequence of the law not being enforced. The law as it now exists does not impose such heavy penalties as are necessary in order to compel parties to obey the law. If the penalty in this bill be left at $3,000 there will be no good accomplished by its passage.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I have heard what the gentlemen from California have had to say. I am aware of the old fight that has been going on with these steamboat companies. I do not sympathize with that quarrel on either side; and I am quite as anxious as they can possibly be that the travel between New York and California shall be well regulated. But it seems to me that in this respect they overshoot the mark. It is a law of the Government, and a law of society, that when revengeful penalties are inflicted the laws are violated more frequently than if the penalties be just. The penalty for forgery in England was for a long time that of hanging. The consequence was that juries seldom or never convicted anybody of forgery, because the punishment was too severe for the offense. Here is a fine of $10,000 to be inflicted on the owner of the vessel for the violation of a simple rule by the master or commander. The Committee on Commerce, after a careful consideration of the subject, considered $3,000 amply sufficient. The amendment of the gentleman from California making the penalty $10,000 is revengeful; it is not intended as a remedy; it is a punishment, and as such is not proper to be adopted.

Let me tell the gentleman from California that he vastly mistakes when he supposes the overcrowded state of the steamers from New York to California is greater than in any other part of the world. When he shall have gone all over the earth, when he shall have visited the Mediterranean and gone from one port to another, he will be able to say there the steamers are crowded three or four times over beyond what the California steamers are under the present regulations.

Now, I tell the gentleman from California that by this mode of fighting these California steamship companies he will gain nothing as the result, unless he can succeed in placing an additional number of steamers on the route. The only effect will be to unite the companies for the purpose of resisting this attack upon them, and induce them to increase the rate of fare between New York and California. If he could enforce his $10,000 fine he would enhance the cost of travel between New York and California. The proper remedy for overcrowding the steamers is to increase the facilities of travel between the two oceans; it is to strengthen the overland mail route. The natural route to California is not by steam; it is overland; and the proper course of regulating this difficulty in respect to the steamship company is to increase, by the cooperative action of the Government, the facilities of travel directly across the continent. The gentleman will not accomplish his object in this way; and he must not exaggerate the evils under which he labors. A growing country like California, Oregon, and Washington Territory will always attract a large number of immigrants, and no law can relieve the disadvantages of overcrowding while so large a number of passengers desire to travel over the route, unless the facilities of travel are increased.

Mr. HIGBY. I can answer all the gentleman has said by stating a single fact. It is the city of New York that he in part represents that is to blame in this matter; let them put as good steamers, as large steamers, with as fine accommodations on the route between New York and Aspinwall as we have running between San Francisco and Panama; and the whole evil is remedied. The steamers running between Aspinwall and New York are a disgrace to the great city of this continent; they are nothing but tubs, miserable, scumy, lousy things, in comparison with the palaces that float on the Pacific. That statement disposes of the whole argument.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, resumed the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, asked the gentleman to yield to him for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not think we ought to occupy a longer time with this matter. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for tellers on his amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Brooks, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty, a further count not being demanded. So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move another amendment in line nineteen. I desire to insert the words "or shall knowingly make false returns of the list of passengers."

There being no objection, the amendment was received and adopted.

Mr. ODELL. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois a single question, with the consent of the House. Does this bill provide the same penalties for carrying an excess of passengers provided for in the original law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The original law imposed a fine for carrying excess of passengers. The object of this law, as the gentleman will perceive, is to define that expression, "contiguous countries," under which they claim the right to be exempt from the operation of that law.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 487) to provide for the execution of treaties between the United States and foreign nations respecting consular jurisdiction over the crews of vessels of such foreign nations in the waters and ports of the United States.

An act (H. R. No. 422) to amend an act entitled "An act to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico."

SEAMEN.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill regulating certain provisions of law concerning seamen on board of public and private vessels; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that so much of the act entitled "An act for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States," approved 3d March, 1813, as makes it not lawful to employ on board any of the public or private vessels of the United States any person or persons except citizens of the United States or persons of color, natives of the United States; and so much of the thirty-fifth, thirty-sixth, and thirty-seventh sections of "An act concerning the navigation of the United States," approved 1st March, 1817, as concerns the crews of vessels therein named; and so much of the first section of an act entitled "An act to repeal the tonnage duties upon ships and vessels of the United States, and upon certain foreign vessels," approved 31st May, 1830, as makes discrimination in favor of vessels a certain proportion of whose crews shall be citizens of the United States shall be repealed, provided that officers of vessels of the United States shall in all cases be citizens of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back Senate bill No. 266, to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, with the following substitute:

That, from and after the passage of this act, all goods, wares, and merchandise, and all baggage and effects of passengers, and all other articles imported into the United States from any contiguous foreign country or countries, except as hereafter provided, as well as the vessels, cars, and other vehicles and envelopes in which the same shall be imported, shall be laden in the presence of and be inspected by an inspector or other officer of the customs, at the first port of entry or custom-house in the United States where the same shall arrive; and to enable the proper officer thoroughly to discharge this duty, he may require the owner or owners, or his, her, or their agent, or other person having charge or possession of any trunk, traveling bag or sack, valise, or other envelope, or of any closed vessel, car, or other vehicle, to open the same, or to deliver to him the proper key; and if such owner, agent, or other person shall refuse or neglect to comply with his demand, the said officer shall retain such trunk, traveling bag or sack, valise, or whatsoever it may be, and open the same, and as soon thereafter as may be practicable examine the contents; and if any article or articles subject to the payment of duty shall be found therein, the whole contents, together with the envelope, shall be forfeited to the United States, and disposed of as the law provides in other similar cases. And if any such dutiable goods, article or articles, shall be found in such vessel, car, or other vehicle, the owner, agent, or other person in charge of which shall have refused to open the same or deliver the key as herein provided, the same, together with the vessel, car, or other vehicle, shall be forfected to the United States, and shall be held by such officer, to be disposed of as the law provides in other similar cases of forfeiture.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That to avoid the inspection at the first port of arrival, required by the first section of this act, the owner, agent, master, or other officer of any such vessel, car, or other vehicle, or owner, agent, or other person having charge of any such goods, wares, merchandise, baggage, effects, or other articles, may apply to any consular officer of the United States, duly authorized to act in the premises, to seal or close the same under and according to the regulations hereinafter authorized, previous to their importation into the United States; which officer shall seal or close the same accordingly; whereupon the same may proceed to their port of destination without further inspection: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to exempt such vessel, car, or vehicle, or its contents, from such examination as may be necessary and proper to prevent frauds upon the revenue and violations of this act: And provided further, That every such vessel, car, or other vehicle shall proceed, without unnecessary delay, to the port or place of its destination, as named in the manifest of its cargo, freight, or contents, and be there inspected, as provided in section one.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to make such regulations, and from time to time to change the same, as to him shall seem necessary and proper, for sealing such vessels, cars, and other vehicles, when practicable, and for sealing, marking, and identifying such goods, wares, merchandise, baggage, effects, trunks, traveling bags or sacks, valises, and other envelopes and articles; and also in regard to invoices, manifests, and other pertinent papers, and their authentication.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if the owner, master, or person in charge of any vessel, car, or other vehicle, sealed as aforesaid, shall not proceed to the port or place of destination thereof named in the manifest of its cargo, freight, or contents, and deliver such vessel, car, or vehicle to the proper officer of the customs, or shall dispose of the same by sale or otherwise, or shall unload the same or any part thereof, at any place, than such port or place, or shall sell or dispose of the contents of such vessel, car, or other vehicle, or any part thereof, before such delivery, he shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, pay a fine not exceeding $1,000, or shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court; and such vessel, car, or other vehicle, with its contents, shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized wherever found within the United States, and disposed of and sold as in other cases of forfeiture: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent sales of cargo, in whole or in part, prior to arrival, to be delivered as per manifest and after due inspection.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any unauthorized person or persons shall willfully break, cut, pick, open, or remove any wire, seal, lead, lock, or other fastening or mark attached to any vessel, car, or other vehicle, crate, box, bag, bale, basket, barrel, bundle, cask, trunk, package, or parcel, or anything whatsoever, under and by virtue of this act and regulations authorized by it or any other act of Congress, or shall affix or attach, or in any way willfully aid, assist, or encourage the affixing or attaching, by wire or otherwise, to any vessel, car, or other vehicle, crate, box, bag, bale, basket, barrel, bundle, cask, package, parcel, article or thing of any kind, any seal, lead, metal, or anything purporting to be a seal authorized by law, such person or persons shall be deemed guilty of felony, and upon conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction shall be imprisoned for a term not exceeding five years, or shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or both, at the discretion of the court. And each vessel, car, or other vehicle, crate, box, bag, basket, barrel, bundle, cask, trunk, package, parcel, or other thing with the cargo, or contents thereof, from which the wire, seal, lead, lock, or other fastening or mark shall have been broken, cut, picked, opened, or removed by any such unauthorized person or persons, or to which such seal or other thing purporting to be a seal has been wrongfully attached as aforesaid, shall be forfeited to the United States.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the eighth section of the act of the 3d of March, 1799, be amended so as to include all goods, wares, and merchandise taken from any bonded warehouse and placed on board any vessel for exportation under bond.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the penalty for violating any of the provisions of the first section of the act entitled "An act to further provide for the collection of the revenue upon the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontier, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1862, shall be a fine of $100, and the same shall be disposed of and applied as herein provided for the distribution of fines and penalties recovered by virtue of this act; and so much of the said first section as conflicts herewith is hereby repealed.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, whenever he shall think it necessary, additional inspectors of the revenue for the districts named below, as follows, to wit: Passamaquoddy, Maine, four; Portland and Falmouth, Maine, eight; Boston and Charlestown, Massachusetts, fourteen; Pembina, Minnesota, two; Chicago, Illinois, eight; Michigamackine, Michigan, two; Sandusky, Ohio, one; Cayahoga, Ohio, three; Erie, Pennsylvania, one; Dunkirk, New York, one; Buffalo Creek, New York, six; Niagara, two; Genesee, two; Oswego, five; Oswegatchie, two; Champlain, four; Vermont, four.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority to remit, in whole or in part, and upon such terms as he shall judge right, the fines, penalties, or forfeitures incurred or accruing under the provisions of this act or of said act approved July 14, 1862, if in his opinion the same shall have been incurred without willful negligence or any intention of fraud in the person or persons incurring the same; and he shall have authority to ascertain the facts upon applications for remission under this act in such manner and under such regulations as shall be by him prescribed. And all fines, penalties, and forfeitures recovered by virtue of this act shall, after deducting all proper costs and charges, be disposed of and applied as provided in the ninety-first section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved on the 2d of March, in the year 1799.

The substitute was adopted.

Mr. ELIOT. I propose to call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary that this law should be passed. It makes another country of the United States. A stranger now comes to a different country from that we had a few years ago. The tariff bills and the internal-revenue laws we have passed, I suppose render it a dire necessity to which we must submit with all European nations.

But I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to the provision for the increase of the number of officers. I want to know whether the committee has inquired whether they are necessary. I suppose they are, or he would not introduce the provision. It provides for sixty additional inspectors of the revenue. We have provided in the tariff bill for additional officers. We have provided in the internal revenue law for additional officers. I wish to know whether these are necessary in addition to those provided in other bills. I also wish the gentleman to inform me what is to be the salary of these officers, for it does not seem to be fixed in the bill.

Mr. ELIOT. I will reply to the last question put by the gentleman from New York. The compensation to be paid will be that fixed by law for inspectors of this class, which, I think, is $2 50 per day.

In reply to the other question which he has propounded, I will say that it has been ascertained to be necessary to provide for these additional officers. How many will be necessary it is not possible to say now. Hence the provision leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury to make the appointments when they are needed.

As the gentleman has said, the necessities of the time demand this legislation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that I cannot consent under any circumstances to any increase of offices except upon the showing of an absolute necessity. When the bill was first sent to the Committee on Commerce, I was opposed to it upon the ground that it created new offices and increased the salaries of officers already existing. But upon an examination of the question, and ascertaining the immense amount of smuggling going on, and frauds upon the revenue, amounting to hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of dollars, I was constrained to give my consent to the reporting of this bill. I think it is demanded imperatively by the Treasury in order to prevent smuggling.

Mr. ELIOT. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the substitute was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOREIGN COASTING TRADE.

Mr. ELIOT, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 223) to regulate the foreign and coasting trade of the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts as to the effect of this bill. Does it increase or diminish the salaries of the officers mentioned in it?

Mr. ELIOT. It does not bear upon any officers except the collectors of the customs. It regulates the collection of the customs on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, and repeals the act of March, 1831, under which the mode of compensating those officers is ascertained. It is a very crude and uncertain mode, and provides that "in lieu of fees now allowed by law, collectors shall receive annually, in full compensation for services, an amount equal to the compensation received by the officer during the last year;" that is, 1830. And there is no way now of ascertaining the compensation of those collectors, except by referring back to the statistics of 1830, and determining from them the amount. Since that time the changes have been so great that confusion has been occasioned, and it is almost impossible now to determine what the compensation is. The effect of this law will be to enlarge the amount received in some cases, and in other cases it will not enlarge it. The salaries will all be made uniform, and the collectors upon the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers will be put upon the same footing with the collectors who are upon the Atlantic coast. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL BEASTON.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Beaton, master of the schooner George Harris; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The bill appropriates $500 to reimburse Samuel Beaton for a fine of $500 collected from him as master of the schooner George Harris by the collector of the port of New Orleans on the 16th of August, 1858.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there a report accompanying this bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I have some papers which I desire to have the Clerk read. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which states the facts in the case.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 25, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th instant, inquiring on behalf of the Committee on Commerce into the propriety of refunding to Captain Samuel Beaton a fine of $500 imposed upon him by the collector of customs at New Orleans, on the 16th of August, 1858, and paid by him under protest.

It appears from the papers on file in this office that, on the 16th of August, 1858, a fine of $500 was imposed on Captain Samuel Beaton of the schooner George Harris for a violation of the fifty-seventh section of the general collection act of March 2, 1799, in not having on board the said vessel one hundred bundles, containing twenty-five thousand cigars, called for by the manifest.

On a summary examination before the judge of the United States district court for the eastern district of Louisiana, it appeared that the entry of the cigars in question on the manifest was made in error by the shippers, the cigars having been refused on board for want of room.

On this showing, my predecessor issued a warrant of remission on the 3d of January, 1859. The warrant was canceled, it appearing from the report of the collector at New Orleans that the fine of $500 had been paid into the Treasury before the said warrant was issued.

I inclose copies of all the papers in the case.

I am, very respectfully,

S. P. CHASE,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. JOHN P. NIXON, of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

E. F. AND SAMUEL A. WOOD.

The next business in order was the consideration of joint resolution of the House (No. 85) reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, repealing an act for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood.

The resolution was read. It provides for the repeal of the act for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicate bonds of the United States for the Oregon war debt, amounting in the aggregate to $7,350, claimed to have been lost, approved March 28, 1864.

Mr. STEVENS obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. I have some papers relating to this claim which I wish to submit to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I think he will not then press the consideration of the resolution. I ask that it be postponed until he can examine those papers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who reported this bill, what the facts are in this case.

Mr. STEVENS. I have received a communication from the Register of the Treasury, which I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read presently. It seems that these bonds were in the mail on board the Golden Gate when she was sunk. It appears from the letter of the Register that the mails have all been recovered from that vessel, and that several bonds which were known to be in the same mail as these have made their appearance. I will ask now for the reading of the letter of the Register together with a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 24, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor of herewith transmitting copy of a communication from the Register of the Treasury, dated 20th instant, relative to a recent enactment of Congress for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood, by which the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue duplicates of certain Oregon bonds to the amount of $7,350, with coupons attached.

Your attention is respectfully invited to the statements of the Register, in order to such further action in the premises as you may think proper.

With great respect,

S. P. CHASE,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. T. STEVENS, Chairman Committee of Ways and Means, United States House of Representatives.

REGISTER'S OFFICE, May 20, 1864.

SIR: Congress has passed at the present session a bill for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood. It directs you to issue duplicates of certain Oregon bonds, amounting in all to $7,350, with coupons attached. The act does not state upon its face any reason for its passage; but I understand it is claimed that the original bonds were deposited in the mail which was sent by the steamer Golden Gate, which steamer was sunk on her passage, and that the bonds so sent had never been received by the parties to whom they were addressed.

This Department has already paid a considerable number of Oregon bonds which were sent in the same mail and upon the same steamer, and the evidence is on file in this bureau establishing beyond question the fact that said mail has been recovered. I think there can be no doubt that the original bonds are still in existence and outstanding as obligations against the Government. And it seems scarcely probable that Congress would have passed the act referred to if they had been aware of the existence in this Department of such evidence.

I address you this note in order that, if you think proper, the attention of Congress may be called to the subject.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. E. CHITTENDEN,

Register.

Hon. S. P. CHASE, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. STEVENS. I will now hear anything my colleague has to say.

Mr. HALE. I have in the first place an affidavit of Mr. E. F. Wood, who is part owner of these bonds. He resides in Boston, while his partner resides in California. Since the introduction of this resolution repealing the former law Mr. Wood, of Boston, who is a very respectable merchant in that city, has filed an affidavit that he has never received or heard of the recovery of any of the bonds lost in the Golden Gate, and his agent in New York, to whom they were addressed, also swears that they have never been received. I have also a certificate from gentlemen in Boston in regard to the respectability of Mr. Wood, to which I call the attention of my friend from Boston, [Mr. RICE.] I have, then, the statement of Mr. Chittenden, that these bonds have never been received or heard of, and also the statement of the chief clerk of the Treasury Department, that a satisfactory bond has been filed by Mr. Wood amply sufficient to cover any loss the Treasury could sustain in consequence of the reissue of these bonds. I ask for the reading of Mr. Chittenden's letter.

The Clerk read, as follows:

REGISTER'S OFFICE, June 9, 1864.

SIR: Your letter of this date, inquiring whether this Department is in possession of evidence showing that certain bonds of the United States alleged to have been lost on the steamer Golden Gate, and said to have belonged to E. F. Wood & Co., have been received, is received.

In reply I have to say that there is no evidence to my present knowledge concerning said bonds, specifically, on file in this Department, except such as relates to their issue. I should state further, however, that shortly after the reported sinking of said steamer, certain parties, claiming to be the owners of similar bonds, made application to this Department for relief, and produced proof that their bonds were duly deposited in the mail which was sent by said steamer from San Francisco, that said steamer was sunk on the passage, and that the parties to whom the bonds had been addressed had never received them. According to the practice in such cases, the application was suspended in each of these cases, in order to give a reasonable time to ascertain whether in fact said bonds were lost. While the cases were so suspended, the bonds were produced at the Treasury for redemption and redeemed, and are now in the possession of this bureau. Proof was furnished and is now on file that the mail containing the bonds embraced in those applications had been recovered from the said steamer Golden Gate by the California Diving Company.

Yours, respectfully,

L. E. CHITTENDEN,
Register.

JOHN A. WILLS, Esq.

Mr. HALE. That shows that the bonds have never been heard of. I now ask for the reading of the letter from the chief clerk in the Comptroller's office, showing that this claim was made eighteen months ago.

The Clerk read, as follows:

COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, June 9, 1864.

An application was made at this office and at the Secretary's office some eighteen or twenty months ago for the issuing of certain duplicate drafts and bonds in lieu of others alleged to have been lost by the burning of the steamer Golden Gate on the Pacific, the property of E. F. Wood & Co.

These gentlemen were advised that under the proof furnished, the drafts might be duplicated upon the filing of a proper bond of indemnity, but that it would be necessary to procure an act of Congress to authorize the reissue of duplicate bonds.

Accordingly a satisfactory bond having been furnished, the Secretary directed the issuing of duplicate drafts, which was accordingly done.

The drafts and bonds were lost at the same time, and in the same mail.

The act of Congress recently passed, requiring a bond of indemnity prior to the reissue of duplicate bonds, has been complied with by the Messrs. Wood, and the bond approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM HEMPHILL JONES,
Chief Clerk.

Mr. HALE. I now ask for the reading of the affidavits of Mr. Wood and of his agent in New York.

The Clerk read, as follows:

POLICE COURT OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.

State of Massachusetts, County of Suffolk, ss:

I, Seth Gobeze, clerk of said court, hereby certify that A. Kingsbury, before whom the within proceedings were had, is and was at the time thereof a justice of the peace, duly commissioned and sworn, and acting in his official capacity; that his signature thereto is genuine; that said court is a court of record, and that I, as clerk thereof, have custody of its seal.

Witness my hand and the seal of said court, at [u. s.] Boston aforesaid, this 6th day of June, A. D. 1864.

SETH GOBEZE,
Clerk of said Court.

I, Ezra F. Wood, of the firm of E. F. Wood & Co., of Boston in the county of Suffolk and State of Massachusetts, being first duly sworn on oath, depose and say: that I am one of the claimants for duplicates of United States bonds which were lost in the steamer Golden Gate, in 1862; that the deponent and Samuel A. Wood, of California, are the only members of said firm; that I have never recovered said lost bonds or any of them, and have no knowledge that any of them have ever been recovered, and I have every reason to believe that they are irrecoverably lost. I never received any information from the Diving Bell Company, or any other company, or person or persons, that such bonds, or any of them, had been recovered.

EZRA F. WOOD.

JUNE 6, 1864.

State of Massachusetts, County of Suffolk, ss:

Personally appeared the above-named Ezra F. Wood, and made oath that the foregoing statement by him subscribed is true. Before me,

A. KINGSBURY,
Justice of the Peace.

State of New York, City and County of New York, ss:

Nathan A. Rogers, of the said city, being sworn, says: that none of the Oregon war bonds lost on board the steamer Golden Gate, in regard to which this deponent some time since made an affidavit, have been recovered to deponent's knowledge or belief; that deponent has never seen any of said bonds, and has never heard from the said E. F. Wood & Co., or from any other person, that the same, or any of them, have ever been found upon or recovered from the wreck of said vessel, or that there was any probability that they would or could be recovered.

N. A. ROGERS,
68 Pearl Street, New York.

Sworn to before me, this 6th day of June, 1864.

JOHN H. WILSON,
Notary Public, New York City.

Mr. HALE. I will ask the Clerk now to read the indorsement of Mr. Wood.

The Clerk read, as follows:

It having been represented to us that the Finance Committee of the Senate contemplates a recommendation for the repeal of the special act of Congress authorizing the Treasury Department to issue to Messrs. Ezra F. Wood & Co., of Boston, duplicates of the United States bonds held by them, and which were lost in the Golden Gate, in August, 1862, we, the undersigned, respectfully request that, before final action is taken in the matter, the committee will consider the high character and standing of the claimants as merchants of Boston. And we would respectfully represent that the firm of E. F. Wood & Co. is well known as having for many years conducted an extensive business in the shoe and leather trade, adding much to the manufacturing interests and prosperity of Massachusetts. By the energy, high-minded and honorable dealing of its members the firm has acquired a position of the first rank as honorable merchants, possessing the entire confidence and respect of the mercantile community.

CHAS. G. NAZRO,

President North Bank.

S. R. SPAULDING,

Geo. W. THAYER,

President Exchange Bank, Boston.

WILLIAM CLAPLIN,

FRANKLIN HAYEN,

FOSTER & TAYLOR.

I know personally each of the parties whose names are annexed; they are all persons of high integrity and ample pecuniary responsibility.

ALEX. H. RICE.

Mr. HALE. I will call upon my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Rice] to say whether the individuals who signed that paper are worthy of credit.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that my friend from Pennsylvania desires me to state to the House what I know of the character and standing of the gentlemen whose names are appended to the document which has just been read. I take great pleasure in saying that I believe I know each of those gentlemen personally, that they are gentlemen of the highest integrity and responsibility, and that I should have entire confidence in any statement that they might make. I know nothing, sir, of the case now under discussion, I have no acquaintance with the parties who are the claimants, but I have such confidence in the gentlemen whose names are affixed to the paper to which the House has listened that I have no doubt whatever of the entire respectability and integrity of any person whose character is certified by them.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, it seems, then, that the fact that the bonds were lost is not disputed. The allegation, however, is that some portion of the bonds mailed at that time in the steamer Golden Gate has been recovered. But the Register of the Treasury, whose letter I sent up to the Speaker's table, says he has no knowledge that any of the bonds alluded to in the claim of the Messrs. Wood have ever been recovered. None have ever been presented at that office. Some bonds that were sent at the same time by the steamer Golden Gate have been recovered; but it is a well-known fact, I suppose, that these mails are in numerous bags. Some of the bags may have been recovered, and some not. From the character of the Messrs. Wood, and from the fact that they have filed a bond with the Treasury Department indemnifying it in case the lost bonds should ever turn up, there can be no injury arising to the United States Government from the reissue of these bonds. I have a letter here which I wish to be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Boston, May 28, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Messrs. E. F. Wood & Co. lost $7,200 in United States coupon bonds on board the steamer Golden Gate. A law has been passed by Congress to issue duplicates. As some portion of the contents of same mail has been received, we understand the Treasury Department refuse to issue the duplicates to Messrs. Wood & Co. This refusal may have arisen from the Department not feeling entire confidence in the indemnity bond given by them. If any question of the kind is raised, we wish you would be good enough to interpose in behalf of these gentlemen on being called upon to do so by their agent. The responsibility of the parties to the bond given by them is beyond a question. If further names should be thought necessary, both members of our firm would gladly sign the bond. Anything you can do to secure to Messrs. Wood & Co. the duplicate bonds will be serving the ends of justice, and obliging.

Very truly, your obedient servants,

FOSTER & TAYLOR.

Hon. ALEXANDER H. RICE, M. C., Washington, D. C.

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to state the responsibility of the gentlemen who have signed that letter.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. They are very wealthy men; men of large fortune.

Mr. HALE. I now submit to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether, under the circumstances, he will press this resolution. The Government of the United States is in no danger of being a loser by this transaction. It is beyond question that the bonds were sent by this steamer, and that they were lost. So far as is known they have not been recovered. There is no evidence that any portion of the bonds claimed by the Messrs. Wood has ever been recovered. Other bonds of the same kind have been. I submit that the gentleman ought not to press his resolution under the circumstances, which might do injustice to these gentlemen. Additional security is proffered here to indemnify the Government.

I think there should be some evidence that the bonds claimed here have been recovered before we undertake to repeal the law allowing duplicates to be issued. The allegation that some of the bonds have been recovered by the Diving Bell Company is no proof that these bonds or any portion of them have been recovered. Unless it is affirmatively shown that the bonds claimed by the Messrs. Wood have been recovered, the bill should not be repealed. I submit that to the fairness and justice of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I have no other motive in the matter than to do justice to the claimants. Their character is above suspicion. They have given all the security that was asked, and are prepared to give any further security that may be required. I have done my duty in the matter, and will leave it in the hands of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I do not see that any injustice can be done by passing this resolution. If it finally turns out, on further investigation, that these bonds are irrecoverably lost and destroyed, Congress will, at a future session, do these men justice. At present I do not feel satisfied that they are lost or destroyed. The evidence is that they were in the mail on board the Golden Gate. The evidence is just as clear that those mails were all recovered, and that a portion of the bonds in the same mail have been already presented at the Department and paid. These bonds are negotiable by delivery.

Mr. HALE. No, sir; they are not. That was established on the former hearing of the case. They are Oregon war bonds, which are specially made payable to the holder. That was stated by the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know about these bonds in particular. I know that most of the United States bonds are made payable to bearer and pass by delivery.

Mr. HALE. Coupon bonds are; not registered bonds.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know whether the party in California has made his affidavit.

Mr. HALE. No, sir, he has not; and for the very good reason that there has not been sufficient time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will recollect that the proof on the former hearing of the case was that these bonds were mailed in San Francisco. They were sealed up and delivered by an agent of the Post Office Department, and were put on board the steamer Golden Gate. That ship was destroyed by fire.

Now, before disposing of this subject, I desire to say one other word. The gentleman says all the mails have been recovered. There is no proof at all upon that subject. A portion of the mails have been recovered; some of the bonds known to have been in the mails on board the Golden Gate have been received. The gentleman will recollect that Mr. Chittenden says, in the letter I sent up to the Clerk's desk, that none of these particular bonds have been presented to the Treasury.

Mr. STEVENS. Still I do not see the propriety of passing this law, and arresting the action of the Department for the present. I do not recollect the proof on which the original bill was reported. I did not know that it had passed. It came from a committee with which I was not connected, and I did not pay much attention to it.

Mr. HALE. The bill first passed the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. Perhaps that was it. At any rate I have no proof on which it was passed, except that which is now before us. The facts I understand to be these: the steamer Golden Gate, on her way from California on the Pacific ocean, took fire, and I think she was scuttled and sunk.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. She was run ashore.

Mr. STEVENS. The evidence shows that all her mail has been recovered. A portion of these bonds have been presented at the Treasury. If these particular bonds had been taken out there, they would of course have been delivered to the partner in California. Now, there is no evidence before the House that these bonds have been destroyed. The presumption is that they were recovered with the other mail. There is no evidence that the partner in California did not get them. I think it is proper, therefore, to suspend the action of the Department until further evidence be had; this bill does nothing more. I suppose the claimants of these bonds will come here now and ask the immediate action of the Department, unless Congress shall decide that no action shall be taken by the Department until further evidence is obtained.

Mr. HALE. I will say to my colleague from Pennsylvania that if the bill is postponed until the meeting of the next session in December, while of course I cannot control these parties, I am quite confident that they will not call for the bonds until that time; They want nothing from the Government that is not right.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no doubt at all that the gentleman would attempt to prevent them from applying at the Department, but there is no law that will prevent their application.

Mr. HALE. There is the character of the parties to prevent it.

Mr. STEVENS. If, however, they should happen to change their minds, as men of character sometimes do in this world, they might go to the Department with their applications notwithstanding the protest of the gentleman.

Mr. HALE. I submit that the evidence is sufficient to show that these are men above reproach, they are honorable men.

Mr. STEVENS. They are honorable men and I do not want anything to occur to tarnish their honor. I do not want to give them an opportunity to tarnish their honor by obtaining these bonds from the Treasury. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENDLETON. My attention has just been called to this resolution and to the proofs upon which it is sustained. I find among the papers of the case a letter from the Register of the Treasury. I have not been able to examine all the proofs that are here, but this letter states that application was made for bonds to be issued in place of the lost bonds; but while the application was pending in the Department some of these lost bonds were received and redeemed at the Treasury Department.

Mr. HALE. Not these bonds.

Mr. STEVENS. Bonds that were in the same mail.

Mr. HALE. But not these particular bonds.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, I see no harm in authorizing the Department to withhold these bonds until it shall be ascertained whether they have been recovered or not.

Mr. HALE. I have just read the letter of the Register of the Treasury, in which he says that he never heard of these particular bonds.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to read the explanation which the Register of the Treasury gives.

Mr. HALE. The letter has already been read to the House.

Mr. PENDLETON. Very well. Now, if that relates to this compensation, it is a clear case that this law ought to be repealed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I only wish to say a word. I think that the passage of the original proposition for the relief of these parties reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HALE] illustrates the consequences of hasty, ill-considered, and improvident legislation, and under all of the circumstances I am somewhat surprised to see that he resists the passage of this repealing law. The original law was objected to by many gentlemen upon the ground that it was not sufficiently apparent to the House, by the evidence, that these bonds were destroyed, which was said to be the case, and urged as the reason why the law should be adopted. We were repeatedly told that these bonds were destroyed, that they were no longer in existence, and would, therefore, never again come to light. That was the sole ground, as I understood, upon which the application was made; and one of the parties, whose respectability has been vouched for, and I will not undertake to question it, one of these Messrs. Wood, made an affidavit, on which this House acted, and in which he swore that the mails of the Golden Gate had been destroyed by fire. Mr. Wood made that oath; and on that oath came before Congress, and Congress passed the law on the supposition that what he had so solemnly declared was true. He distinctly declared "that said steamer, with said mails and Oregon war bonds on board, sailed from the city of San Francisco to Panama about the 1st of July, 1862, and that said steamer, these mails and their contents, were destroyed by fire on the voyage to Panama."

Now, it is not contended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any gentleman here, that these mails were destroyed by fire as alleged by Mr. Wood. It is not denied that they have come to light, and that, although these particular bonds have not been presented to the Treasury, other bonds which were sent by that same mail have been.

In some remarks which I submitted I used this language:

"It is alleged, and perhaps may have been proved, that these bonds were lost on the steamer Golden Gate and now it is proposed to issue duplicates of them, with a proviso that a bond shall be taken to hold the Government harmless."

"There are two reasons why I think this sort of legislation should not be adopted. In the first place, we are establishing a precedent, and no man can tell where it will end. How many bonds out of the $100,000,000 of the national debt may have been or may be lost, or may be alleged to be lost? If we pass this bill parties will come in and, on the allegation that they have lost bonds, ask Congress to authorize the issue of new bonds."

In reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLER] I further suggested that, if there were to be any legislation, there should be a general law introduced; and I find by the record in the Congressional Globe that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] moved that the subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to report some general provision to cover not only this but all other like cases.

The debate proceeded as follows:

"Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let some general law be passed. But as the matter stands now I am utterly opposed to having special legislation on the subject. It is said that these bonds have been lost on board the Golden Gate. I understand that divers are at work fishing up valuables from this wreck every day. It may not be long before the safe in which these bonds were will be found, and the bonds put on the market."

"Mr. HALE. These bonds are all numbered."

"Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Suppose they are! They can be passed from hand to hand. The gentleman from Pennsylvania might purchase one of these bonds to-morrow, and would never think of going to the Treasury to see whether there was not a duplicate of it issued."

"Mr. SCHENCK. Are these coupon bonds transferable by delivery, or are they registered bonds? They may be good in the hands of the holder without any assignment or indorsement."

"Without inquiring, however, further into the case, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think it proper, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has suggested, that, if any provision should be made in regard to this case, some general law should be framed in reference to bonds alleged to have been lost. If there be any legislation needed it ought to be general, covering the whole subject."

I have no doubt that these bonds to-day have been recovered, and thrown upon the market. And will gentlemen pretend that the Government is to be an insurer for every man who puts bonds in the mails, and they fail to reach their destination? Are we to indemnify every man who comes here and shows that to be the case? Yet that is the case now presented to this House.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] was almost prophetic in what he said during the previous discussion. He said that he was opposed to this kind of legislation; that he distrusted all such cases, and referred to the case of an express company which was sued for gold that was conclusively proved to have been lost. I will quote his words:

"Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I do not know this special case, and I only look to the principle involved. I think it unsafe for the Government to legislate for the security of these parties without knowing all of the facts. I know nothing of these parties, but I do know if we establish this sort of legislation we will have a good many cases of the same character before us. When it comes to be known that such claims are allowed, men will lay their plans for the purpose of committing great frauds upon the Government and the public Treasury. I have in my mind an action brought against an insurance company in New York for the recovery of insured specie lost coming from San Francisco. That company resisted the claim, because they believed the claim was founded on fraud, though the loss was established by affidavit after affidavit of persons belonging to the vessel. Pending the investigation the insurance company took the precaution of sending down and finding the sunken vessel. On reaching the hold and bringing up the boxes said to contain gold, they found nothing but old rusty iron nails. If we act upon the principle of allowing men to receive pay upon bonds which they pretend to have lost, and which they may in this way prove to have been lost, we will expose this Government to great depredations. I protest against such action."

This case has fully proved the truth of what the gentleman from New York then said. This bill was passed under the circumstances which I have recounted. It was put upon the ground that these bonds were destroyed by fire. Mr. Wood swore that they were destroyed by fire. It now turns out that this mail was not destroyed by fire, as bonds which were sent in it have been presented at the Treasury.

The Secretary of the Treasury in the exercise of a just vigilance ascertained that fact, and the Register of the Treasury wrote the letter which has been read at the Clerk's desk, and which was transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the Committee of Ways and Means very properly reported this bill. I do not see, under the circumstances, how any gentleman can refuse to vote for this resolution, and I should think that the committee which reported the bill would be the very first, when they ascertained the circumstances, to come in and ask that the bill might be repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will allow me to make an inquiry. I infer from the letter of the Register of the Treasury that the practice of the Department is to issue duplicates where the proof is conclusive that an instrument has been lost, as he simply states that the application for this particular duplicate was suspended until the fact was established that the bonds were lost. If that be so there was no necessity for the passage of this bill in the first instance, and the repeal of it can do no possible harm.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to a portion of the letter of the Register. He says:

"This Department has already paid a considerable number of Oregon bonds which were sent in the same mail and in the same steamer, and the evidence is on file in this bureau which establishes beyond question the fact that said mail has been recovered. I think there can be no doubt that the original bonds are still in existence and outstanding obligations against the Government."

That is what the officer of the Treasury Department says. He has no doubt from the evidence they have upon their files that these bonds are outstanding obligations against the Government.

And now a word in relation to the manner in which these bonds were made negotiable, whether by indorsement or without indorsement from hand to hand. I have looked through all the papers and I cannot find it stated anywhere that they were specially indorsed. It seems to me that if such were the fact—a fact so important to these parties—they would not have failed to show it. I think, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested, that these bonds are generally issued to bearer, or to a particular party who indorses them, and that then they pass from hand to hand. That is the case with many bonds issued by our Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of inquiry was this: giving full effect to the statement of the Register of the Treasury as to the suspension of the application to issue duplicates until the fact of loss could be fully ascertained, suppose the proof is that the bonds were lost, is it not the practice of the Treasury Department to issue duplicates?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know. I think the Department ought to have no power to issue duplicate bonds unless specially authorized by Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. When the Committee of Ways and Means had the question before them in regard to notes proved to have been lost, they inquired into it, and they found that unless there was an act passed, the Department did not take it upon themselves to supply duplicates. My colleague on the committee [Mr. PENDLETON] prepared a general law upon the subject which we expected to pass, but did not. I call upon my colleague to know whether it is not so.

Mr. PENDLETON. The committee did prepare a general law, and the reason why it was not offered was that it was not in order to offer a general law as a substitute for a special bill. But I would remind the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that the rule of the Treasury Department is different as to lost bonds which are not negotiable from what it is in reference to lost notes which are negotiable. Where bonds which are not negotiable are lost, duplicates are issued, and substituted for them after the lapse of a certain time, enough to justify the idea that they are lost; but where notes, payable on delivery, are lost, duplicates are not issued except in accordance with a special act of Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to say that the act which we now seek to repeal makes it imperative upon Congress to issue duplicates. If they had the right to do so previous to the passage of the act then there would not be no necessity for the passage of this repealing act. I think, therefore, it is proper to repeal that law, and leave the matter to stand upon their usage.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I was not present when the bill which is now the subject of discussion was passed. I confess I heard of its passage with surprise and some alarm. I think the rule applicable to the administration of justice between individuals has been applied very unwisely to dealings between the Government and citizens with reference to its bonds. In the case of a lost obligation between A and B the facts can be judicially established. But before A can secure such remedy against B he has to furnish judicial proof of all the facts, with all the deliberate modes of examination which exist in courts of justice, and which we here cannot possibly apply. Why, sir, an affidavit before Congress can be made to prove anything. As many affidavits as anybody wants can be gotten for any purpose. The great motive for the establishment of the Court of Claims was the perpetual passage by Congress of fraudulent claims sustained by overwhelming and conclusive proof. If this House were to attempt to hold the Government as the insurer for the existence and ultimate payment of every negotiable note or every note passing by delivery, it would open the door to more fraud than any Government in the civilized world was ever subjected to. It is impossible for this House to judge with the accuracy of a jury, still less with the accuracy of a chancellor, the weight, force, and validity of affidavits drawn from every quarter of the country, and in regard to the truth or falsehood of which they have not one judicial test which they can possibly apply.

Then, sir, in the administration of justice between individuals, their obligations are usually of short date; they run out in three or five years, or, if bonds, in ten, twelve, or twenty years. Collateral security has some relation to private obligations; but in reference to the bonds of the Government to talk about collateral security in this country of ephemeral fortunes and shifting property is an absurdity, as I think. We have got to make up our minds that when a note is issued by the Government and is in the hands of the holder, it must rest there on his risk and responsibility, payable only when it is produced; and I am willing to apply that rule not only to negotiable instruments passing by delivery or assignment, but also to those which cannot be transferred. The question to be decided in such cases as this is as to the validity of the proof, and that we never can decide. I am, therefore, equally opposed to the proposed general law as I am to this measure.

Mr. HALE. I am somewhat surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the extraordinary zeal manifested by gentlemen to defeat this bill. It is not necessary to protect the interests of the Government, because the Government is already abundantly protected by the bond, which has been filed, and if that is not sufficient the parties are willing to pledge themselves for an additional amount. Why, then, should there be this extraordinary zeal manifested here?

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] is mistaken in saying that the collateral security would run out in five or six years; the bond is given to the Government to protect it against loss, whenever these lost bonds may be brought forward, and it may be twenty or twenty-five years.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Let me call the gentleman's attention to one very practical consideration, and that is, that in this country fortunes are ephemeral.

Mr. HALE. That is another point of view.

That is not the question the gentleman started. It may be true that fortunes are made to-day and spent to-morrow, but we have to deal with facts as they now are. This Government may not be in existence twenty-five years hence. We do not know that it will, though we all hope that it will last for all time to come. This bond protects the Government against this liability, whenever it may arise; it never expires.

I ask gentlemen to put themselves in the position of these men. Suppose you, sir, were in possession of $7,000 of the obligations of this Government, and sent them by mail, and the vessel in which you sent them was wrecked or took fire or sunk?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] raises an imputation against the character of these men, because they made an affidavit that the mails were burnt in the Golden Gate. Now I submit whether that is fair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not wish to do any injustice to these men. I only read what Mr. Wood stated in his affidavit. He swore in that affidavit that this ship and the mails were destroyed.

Mr. HALE. I know what he said, and I know what the gentleman from Illinois said, and I know what the inference he drew was. It was that this gentleman in Boston had sworn what was not true. That was the allegation, and nothing else. I submit to any fair-minded man whether, when he heard that the steamer Golden Gate had taken fire on the Pacific coast and had gone to the bottom, he would not naturally have made an affidavit that the property had been destroyed by fire? Would not any one do so? Would not the gentleman from Illinois do so?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; the gentleman from Illinois would never do it.

Mr. HALE. I think he would.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman must judge me by himself. I do not desire to be judged by that standard in this respect.

Mr. HALE. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that no just, fair-minded man could object to letting this joint resolution be postponed for the present. The Government is amply secured. According to the statement of the Register, these bonds have not been found—have not been heard of. The affidavit of the owner is produced that he had not heard of them. Now, what objection can there be to letting this joint resolution be postponed? I can see none. As I said before, the Government is amply protected. These duplicates need not be issued for some time, until the Government is satisfied that the bonds are lost. I will therefore move, if it be in order, that the resolution be postponed till the second Tuesday in December next.

Mr. STEVENS. Are the merits of the question open on the motion to postpone?

The SPEAKER. The motion is only debatable as to the propriety of postponing the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I will let the vote be taken on that, and then I will say a single word.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman wishes to say anything now, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to say this: the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has asked what was the custom of the Department in reference to lost bonds. The custom is this: in one year after the maturity of a negotiable note—for instance a seven-thirty bond—upon clear proof of its being destroyed, and upon indemnity being given to the Government, the Treasury will pay the amount. But new notes are never issued for lost ones. They are paid when they have matured, or one year after, giving sufficient time to have them presented by the holder. I think that is the true rule. If the bond or note of an individual is lost he cannot be sued for the amount until it is due. I think that is a very good rule in regard to the Government.

It appears that these Oregon bonds fall due in 1881. Before 1881 these lost bonds may be presented, but they cannot be paid until they fall due. If within a year, or a reasonable time, after 1881, it be proved to the Government that they are lost, the Government will without any new law, without any imperative law, pay them. But the Treasury never issues duplicate bonds without an imperative law. Hence it is that this act was passed. I think it better to repeal it, and to leave the matter to the ordinary action of the Government and to the rule which applies to individuals, of paying at maturity. I think that a better rule. Although I was once in favor of a general law on this subject, I have changed my views altogether.

If my colleague [Mr. HALE] now wishes to move to postpone I will let him make that motion; and then I will move the previous question.

Mr. HALE. I will yield to my colleague, [Mr. SCOFIELD].

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understood my colleague [Mr. HALE] to claim, when this matter was last up, that these bonds were lost beyond hope of recovery; I now understand him only to claim that they are beyond the control of the owner. They may be in somebody else's hands; but there is no evidence of their destruction.

Mr. HALE. This bill passed the Senate and came to the House. The Committee of Claims on examining the case reported the bill back with the recommendation that it do pass; the fact appeared—and if my colleague had been attending to what had been stated he would have known it—that these bonds were sealed up and registered at the post office, after which they were deposited in the mails which were placed on the Golden Gate. The Golden Gate, as is well known, took fire upon the Pacific coast and was destroyed, with everything therein. Now I submit that it could not have been properly inferred that these men were there and saw the mail burnt up; they could not testify from their own personal knowledge that the Golden Gate sank to the bottom of the ocean; but from the facts presented I submit that as reasonable men they were authorized in making the statement that these bonds were destroyed.

Mr. SCOFIELD. They state positively in their affidavits that the mails were destroyed.

Mr. HALE. I think they were justified in taking it for granted that the bonds were destroyed. I think almost any man would have taken that for granted. We have now no evidence that they were not destroyed. We have evidence that some portions of the bonds in the same mail have been recovered; but the proof of the Register of the Treasury is that these bonds have never been heard from. I call the attention of the House to that fact. Mr. Chittenden says that while the mails have been recovered, there is no evidence that these particular bonds ever have been. Now, if you are to take any part of Mr. Chittenden's statement, you must take it as a whole. If you take his statement that all the mails have been recovered, you must also take his statement that these bonds have not been heard from. All the mails were sunk with the ship in the bottom of the ocean; and gentlemen know very well that so large a quantity of mail matter is put into a large number of mail bags, and a portion of these mail bags may have been recovered and others not recovered. I submit, therefore, that the presumption is that these bonds have not been recovered, especially when that presumption has been sustained by men whose character is above suspicion. It is not to be supposed that men of known character and wealth would indorse these claims and give security to the extent of five times the amount of the bonds for the protection of the Government against loss should they ever be recovered hereafter unless they were known to be men of honor and integrity.

I repeat, therefore, that under no circumstances can the Government suffer in reference to these bonds should they be recovered; they are registered bonds and cannot be used until properly indorsed, and the Government has an additional protection in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose taking up the time of the House further in this discussion. These bonds have been lost; if they are never recovered the Government ought in fairness to issue new bonds. If they are recovered, ample security has already been given, and if not, the parties are ready to add to it to any extent required to insure the Government against any possible loss. There can be no possible harm done by a postponement of this bill, and I now move to postpone it till the second Tuesday of December next, and on that motion call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

On the motion to postpone 39 voted in the affirmative and 46 in the negative; no quorum.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered. The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. DAVIS, of New York, and WADSWORTH. The House again divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 44, noes 54.

So the joint resolution was not postponed. Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question on the engrossment of the joint resolution. The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported back Senate bill No. 265, to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, and for other purposes.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman that as this is an important bill it be ordered to be printed and recommitted. It will not lose its place, for the Committee on Printing can report it back at any time.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS, from the select committee on the subject, reported back House bill No. 438, to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS. The bill I have just reported will come up as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. It will come up the first thing on Saturday morning as unfinished business.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to.

And then (at five minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Friday, June 10, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read, containing the following entries:

"Mr. DAVIS asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce, without previous notice, a joint resolution to restore peace among the people of the United States, which, having been read by its title, Mr. GRIMES called for the reading of the resolution; and the resolution having been read at length by the Secretary, Mr. SUMNER objected to its reception.

"The President pro tempore decided that, objection being raised to the reception of the resolution, it could not be received.

"From this decision Mr. DAVIS appealed; and "On the question, 'Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?'

"It was determined in the affirmative.

"So the Senate determined that the resolution should not be received."

Mr. DAVIS. The Journal does not recite the facts as they took place in relation to the joint resolution which I offered yesterday; the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] stated the facts just as they occurred; but it is a matter that I feel no interest about. I therefore do not choose to move to have the Journal corrected; I will merely remark that it does not correctly recite the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No correction being suggested, the Journal stands approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of pilots of gunboats in the service of the United States on western waters, praying that the rank of officers may be assigned them; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of wool-growers of Licking county, Ohio, praying an increase of the duty on foreign wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a petition from the Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Progressive Friends, in session at Longwood, Chester county, Pennsylvania, signed by their two clerks, sixth month, 3d, 1864, in which they respectfully but earnestly entreat Congress to pass a law abolishing slavery in every part of the United States; and they add, "In time of peace we could not conscientiously ask you to enact such a law; but slavery being now in open revolt against the Government, we hold that under the powers incident to a bloody struggle for the national life you have a clear constitutional right to destroy it, root and branch, as a nucleus of treason and rebellion." I move the reference of this petition to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SPRAGUE, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Margaret A. Lawrie, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 453) to increase the pension of Isaac Allen, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommended the bill (S. No. 150) for the relief of Jesse Gould, widow of Daniel Gould, of Portland, Maine, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the auditor of the State of Minnesota, praying for an appropriation to reimburse that State for the expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 209) for the relief of Mary Throckmorton, reported adversely thereon; and on his motion it was postponed indefinitely.

PRINTING OF INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed one thousand copies of all Indian treaties, one hundred copies to be deposited in the Library, two hundred for the use of the Senate, and the remainder for the Interior Department.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILKINSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 61) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the protection of overland emigration to the States and Territories of the Pacific," approved March 3, 1864; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILKINSON. I should like to have the resolution put on its passage now. I can explain it in a moment.

Mr. GRIMES. Let it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The original bill came from that committee.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 62) for the recognition of the free State government of the State of Arkansas; which was read the first time, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, announcing that on the 7th instant he had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (S. No. 217) for the relief of Warren W. Green;

An act (S. No. 236) to provide for granting an honorable discharge to coal-heavers and firemen in the naval service;

An act (S. No. 250) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes;"

A joint resolution (S. No. 35) to compensate the sailors on the gunboat Baron de Kalb for loss of clothing; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 51) authorizing the acceptance of a certain testimonial from the Government of Great Britain.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. No. 223) to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes; and with amendments the bill (S. No. 26) to provide for the public instruction of youth in the county of Washington, District of Columbia; and the bill (S. No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 510) further to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels;

A bill (No. 519) repealing certain provisions concerning seamen on board public and private vessels of the United States;

A bill (No. 520) for the relief of Samuel Beaton, master of the schooner George Harris; and

A joint resolution (No. 85) repealing an act entitled "An act for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood."

JUAN MIRANDA.

On motion of Mr. CARLILE, the bill (S. No. 238) to ascertain and settle certain private land claims in the State of California was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The original bill, as introduced by Mr. McDUGALL, proposed to allow within four months after the passage of the act any person claiming lands in California by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government to present his claim in the name of the original grantee or claimant under Spain or Mexico (unless the validity of the claim of such original grantee or claimant had already been passed upon by the courts of the United States) to the district court of the United States for the district in which the land claimed is situated, together with such documentary evidence and testimony of witnesses as he relies upon in its support. The district courts were to adopt rules for the presentation and hearing of the claims, to render judgment upon the pleadings and proofs of the claimants and of the United States, and to enter such decrees, confirming or rejecting the claims, as may be just, and to grant an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in behalf of any party, if applied for within six months thereafter.

The Committee on Public Lands, through Mr. CARLILE, reported an amendment to strike out the original bill, and in lieu of it to insert the following:

Be it enacted, &c., That the district court of the United States for the northern district of California be, and hereby is, authorized and required to hear and determine upon its merits the claim of any person claiming title under a Mexican grant to Juan Miranda for the place known as the "Rancho Arroyo de San Antonio," situate in the county of Sonoma, State of California, who shall present his claim to said court within six months after the passage of this act: Provided, That any testimony heretofore taken before the board of land commissioners under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," approved March 3, 1851, in cases numbered forty-five and eight hundred and twelve, may be filed by the claimant or by the United States, subject to all just exceptions to its competency, and that further testimony may be taken by either party under the order and direction of said district court.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said district court, upon the pleadings and proofs, to enter its decree, confirming or rejecting any claim presented under the provisions of this act as may be just, and to grant an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States if applied for by any party within six months from the entry of the decree.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That for any claim finally confirmed a patent shall issue to the confinee or his legal representatives in the manner prescribed by the thirteenth section of said act of March 3, 1851.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CONNESS. Before that be done, I should like to get the attention of the Senate to this bill, as it is one of great consequence. This is a bill to authorize the alleged grantees of a very large and valuable tract of land in California, upon which the city of Petaluma, in the county of Sonoma, is situated, to go into the United States district court for the northern district of California, and have the privilege of attempting there to establish their claim to the land in question. Before I say anything about it I should like to be preceded by the Senator who has reported the bill to the Senate. It is a bill very much at variance with the interests of the people of California, and, as I believe, with justice. I should like first to hear the Senator from Virginia who reported the bill say what can be said in its favor, and then I will present some views and some documents in regard to it.

Mr. CARLILE. There is a report accompanying the bill giving the views of the Committee on Public Lands, which I send to the Secretary and ask to have read.

The Secretary read the following report, which was made by Mr. CARLILE on the 9th of May:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred bill S. No. 538, "to ascertain and settle private land claims in California," have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report:

That the mischief designed to be remedied by the bill had better be corrected, and relief, where justice demanded it, afforded by special acts rather than by a general law, and have therefore reported an amendment by way of substitute for the bill, to the end that justice may be done and the nation's faith, under our treaty with Mexico, maintained in the only case which, in the opinion of the committee, called for the action of Congress.

It appears from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered at the term commencing in December, 1859, and again in 1863, in the case of the United States vs. E. E. White, administratrix, &c., and of E. E. White vs. The United States, that the title to the tract of land known as the "Rancho Arroyo de San Antonio," is not in the United States, but in the heirs or legal representatives of one Juan Miranda, who settled upon the land in the year 1837, under a provisional grant made by General Vallejo, as director of colonization, and so continued in possession, residing upon the land until his death in the winter of 1845-46, leaving his children in possession, who remained in possession thereof and held the same when the country was ceded to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The archives of the Government of Mexico which contained the evidence of the final grant to Miranda for the land named, which was ordered on the 30th May, 1844, and which, on the 8th October, 1844, was confirmed by formal decree or grant, were not discovered until Mr. Stanton, the present Secretary of War, reached California as agent of the United States Government under the Administration of Mr. Buchanan.

In 1859 the Supreme Court clearly expressed the opinion that the claimant of the tract of land under the Miranda grant, who was no party to the suit, had a right to intervene in the district court and assert his claim to the land in question, but the district court decided otherwise, which decision of the district court was affirmed by the Supreme Court after argument upon application for a mandamus. The Supreme Court thus reversing its own opinion as expressed in 1859.

With the admission of the highest court in the land on the record, that the United States have no claim or title to this land, the committee cannot conceive that we should adhere to a rigid, technical construction of the law of 1851, which was doubtful in words and character, and acting under which the party, by a common error of the profession in its construction, and which was subsequently sanctioned by an opinion of the Supreme Court, did not proceed in time under that law, which, by its own limitation, has now expired.

It seems to the committee that the Government of the United States cannot take advantage of the provisions of that law and claim this land as public land, which is the necessary result if the party claiming under Miranda is not entitled to be heard.

All that the bill now reported by the committee provides for is, that those claiming under the Miranda grant shall have a hearing. If he or they can establish his or their claim, well and good; if they cannot establish it, the land will then belong to the Government of the United States. That is the whole effect of it.

The land is claimed under a sale made by a decree of a probate court in California; but as there may be objections to that sale, the committee have so drawn the substitute for the bill as to allow the heirs of Miranda to obtain title to the land if they have not, by their own act or that which binds them, divested themselves of the title. If they have, their vendee, or whoever claims the land under a valid purchase and is of right entitled to the Miranda grant, will, under this bill, obtain the land.

Mr. CONNESS. I move at this stage that the bill be indefinitely postponed. I prefer that the question be taken in that way. The reason why I offer that motion rather than to have the question taken on the engrossment or passage of the bill is this: the attempt to get this case into court has been made again and again before Congress, and as long as these attempts are simply put over from session to session, no matter what degree of pretense, whether it be little or much of title there is in behalf of these parties, it constitutes a cloud upon the title of one of the most thriving and important towns in California; and therefore I desire, if it shall meet the sense of the Senate when they have heard the facts in the case, that the vote shall be to indefinitely postpone the bill so as to allow these people to enjoy their property in peace hereafter. I make that motion.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think I understand the facts in this case, having been once counsel adverse to the present applicant, and thinking that I do understand the question of title; the facts in the case of which my colleague speaks should be understood by the Senate. If he has any facts in the case that I am not advised about, I should like to be informed before I say anything; but if he cannot advise me I will say now what I have to say.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will proceed. It belongs to the affirmative of this proposition to state what they have to state in advocacy of the bill.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Certainly, I will oblige my colleague.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senator from California will allow me to make an inquiry as to the fact in this case. Was there ever a title to this land emanating from the Spanish Government or from the Mexican Government?

Mr. McDOUGALL. There was.

Mr. HOWARD. Was it a perfected title?

Mr. McDOUGALL. It was as perfected as any of our grants; but there was a dispute between two grantees, Ortega and Miranda.

Mr. HOWARD. The question which I put is whether it was a mere concession, a mere inchoate, imperfect title involving the necessity on the part of the grantee of performing some act in order to perfect and mature his title, or whether that proceeding had been completed and the title had become perfect.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I will answer the Senator exactly. The first concession was to one Ortega, but before the—

Mr. CARLILE. Allow me to interrupt the Senator from California for a moment, to inform the Senator from Michigan that if he will read the opinions of the Supreme Court in 1859 and 1863, which I now send to him, he will obtain the information he desires.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It happened as an occasion of my business as a lawyer in California to be employed by the parties adverse to this claim. I studied the question carefully as counsel. My opinion, as it was the opinion of the bar generally in California, was that the question was fairly put so as to be brought up for judgment by the Supreme Court. It was not, however, so considered by the judgment of the court of final resort, and they only expressed an opinion affirming that the interest I represented had not the right, but that the Miranda title had the right. That was expressed in clear and distinct language in the judgment of the Supreme Court. All that is sought for now is simply the bare privilege of asking the judgment of that court as to the validity of the title. To deny that would be to deny a right. While I am not with these claimants except in the sense of wishing to see right done, and while all the interests with which I have been connected at home have been hostile to their claim, I say that it is our duty to give them the opportunity to maintain their right. It is no grant of land that they ask. They ask the bare privilege of appearing in our courts. Here I will be bold enough to say that I think the Supreme Court when it laid down the ultimate rule that they had not the right to interplead made a mistake. It is possible for the court to make mistakes. The Supreme Court, however, has said that these persons have a just right, and this proposition is simply to authorize an appeal to the courts now to have their rights determined.

Mr. CONNESS. I will detain the Senate but comparatively a little while, if I can get their attention, in regard to this measure. This is a case where parties, a man named T. B. Valentine, and another named Brooks, profess to hold a title to a grant of land located in the county of Sonoma, upon the site now known as the town of Petaluma, one of our largest interior towns; a grant alleged to have been made to a native Californian or Mexican named Juan Miranda or John Miranda.

There was another pretended grant for the same land to a party named Ortega, who was also a Mexican, and who was the son-in-law of Miranda, having married Miranda's daughter.

It will be remembered that under our treaty with Mexico, by which we acquired the title to California, we bound ourselves to inquire into and ascertain the rights of Mexican citizens to lands in California. To that end, in 1851, the Congress of the United States established what is known as the land commission; created a board of three commissioners, who were authorized to receive petitions from all claimants of that character to land within the bounds of California; and the act, which I have before me, provided that that preliminary court or board should be opened for the period of three years for that purpose. The period of existence of that board, as created in 1851, was finally extended to 1856, making a period of five years. During the period of the existence of that board, the claimants under the pretended or alleged Ortega title presented their case. It was known by a given number on the docket of that court. The heirs of Miranda, namely, Valentine and Brooks, presented their claim to the same land also, in the name of Miranda. The two claims were for the same ranch or parcel of land.

Mr. DAVIS. How were they Miranda's heirs?

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator asks me how they happened to be heirs of Miranda. "Thereby hangs a tale." I did not intend to go into that and occupy the attention of the Senate too long. After Miranda died, which was at a very early period, these parties entered into some arrangement with the heirs, and the will of Miranda was probated in the county of Marin in California, which is the county next adjoining Sonoma, not the county in which the property was located. The county judge, who was the probate judge under the laws of California, appointed a special administrator, and that special administrator ordered a sale of this real estate or the title of these parties in it, at which the present pretended owners of the title were purchasers. That was how they obtained their title. It subsequently turned out that the probate judge who ordered this sale in this eminently legal way became at the same time an owner of one half the title, which he passed over to other parties and they passed back again. Suffice it to say that how they came into possession of the title is not very creditable to the parties concerned. I do not wish to go into that longer at the present time. But it was clear that two parties in the board of land commissioners could not establish their claim to the same piece of land. They knew that; consequently they entered into a contract each with the other which I have here before me.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Will the Senator please read it? I should like to hear it.

Mr. CONNESS. I have here before me a copy of the contract entered into by the two parties by which they agreed, each with the other, that Valentine and Brooks, the parties who now ask the passage of this bill to let them into court again, would withdraw their claims from the board of land commissioners, and engaged to give their efforts to the confirmation of the Ortega claim, they agreeing when the Ortega claim was confirmed to sell the land and divide the proceeds between them. The document is not a very long one. If it is desired I will read it or send it to the desk that it may be read; this is from the original records in the case.

Memorandum of agreement made this 29th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1855, between James F. Stewart, G. B. Post, George T. Upham, Joseph A. Post, Volney E. Howard, and E. O. Crosby, presenting and prosecuting claim No. 538, [the Ortega claim], before the United States land commissioners for settling private land claims in California, parties of the first part, and Thomas B. Valentine, claimant, and Benjamin S. Brooks, Esq., attorney of record in cases Nos. 45 and 812 [the Miranda cases] on the docket of the said United States land commissioners, parties of the second part.

The said parties of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar, to them in land paid, and of divers other good causes and considerations thereunto moving, have covenanted, promised, and agreed, and by these presents do covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said parties of the second part, their executors, administrators, and assigns, in manner and form following: that upon request, after the execution of this indenture, they will appoint an agent to make sales of land described in said claim, and, after deducting expenses, all moneys received for said land shall be divided as follows: for the sale of that portion of the claim known as the lower half of the Miranda claim, one third of all moneys received shall be paid over to Thomas B. Valentine for the benefit of whomsoever it may concern, and for the sale of the balance of the claim No. 558; [the Ortega claim.] one half of the proceeds shall be paid over to Thomas B. Valentine for whomsoever it may concern. And we, the parties of the first part, agree with each other that we will each deduct from our interests, which we now have or may have in consequence of a confirmation of said claim No. 558, that proportion which our interest bears or may bear to the amount which may be paid over to Thomas B. Valentine under and in pursuance of the foregoing agreement.

It is further agreed that in the appointment of the above agent and in the prices to be fixed for the sale of the land above described, Thomas B. Valentine shall be consulted according to the interest he may have and may represent in the matter, and if any disagreement shall arise as to the appointment of said agent, or as to the prices to be put upon said land, then the same shall be settled by arbitration.

In witness whereof, the parties to these presents have hereunto interchangeably set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

This agreement, made this 20th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1855, between Thomas B. Valentine, claimant in cases Nos. 45 and 812 before the United States board of land commissioners, and Benjamin S. Brooks, Esq., attorney of record for said claimant therein, of the one part, and James F. Stewart, G. B. Post, George T. Upham, Joseph A. Post, Volney E. Howard, and E. O. Crosby, of the other part: Witnesseth that the said Valentine and Brooks, for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar to them in hand, and of divers other good causes and considerations then thereunto moving, have covenanted, promised, and by these presents do covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said James F. Stewart, G. B. Post, George T. Upham, Joseph A. Post, Volney E. Howard, and E. O. Crosby, their executors, administrators, and assigns, in manner and form following, that is to say: That the said Valentine and Brooks will withdraw and discontinue the said claims Nos. 45 and 812 before said board, at the next public session of said board, and will also cause to be withdrawn the depositions of Theodore Miranda and Francesca Miranda, taken before Commissioner Lott, January 17, in said case No. 558, and will use their best endeavors to procure the confirmation of said claim No. 558.

In witness whereof, the said Thomas B. Valentine and Benjamin S. Brooks have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

This was the agreement under which this case got out of court, and now they ask the Congress of the United States by special act to put them in court again. Why do they want to get in court now? They were out of court but a comparatively short time, a year or thereabouts; I will not undertake to be accurate in that. It will be remembered that the date of this agreement is 1855, and the commission finally ceased in 1856. There is an old homely adage that when rogues fall out honest people get their rights. The parties very soon quarreled; and the Ortega men, finding the Miranda men out of court, and being fully satisfied that they could get their claim confirmed, refused to carry out their part of the agreement; whereupon the Miranda men, as I shall call them, the parties now asking the passage of this act, engaged counsel, went into the courts of the United States, and up to the last term of the Supreme Court held during this session of Congress, in this Capitol, have had special counsel engaged from the day they quarreled until the Ortega claim was finally rejected, as it was at the last term of the Supreme Court. The Miranda men engaged special counsel to secure its rejection. They knew very well that if the Ortega claim was confirmed, of course they had no chance of claim at all; if the Ortega claim was rejected then their next resort was to come to Congress and get it by special act to put them back into court again, and then use the experience of many years to find where their title was defective, and make that defect up. It is not hard to make up defects when certain classes of witnesses are required, particularly in connection with some of these claims in California.

Now, sir, without going any further, I should like to ask what equity these parties have in coming before Congress to put them in court. They voluntarily withdrew from court, took their cases off the docket, put themselves out of court to engage in a corrupt bargain for money, for a division of spoils, to confirm a corrupt claim to a very large portion of valuable land in California.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I should like to ask the Senator from California why he uses the term "a corrupt claim?" Will he inform me? I think I know more about it than the Senator himself does.

Mr. CONNESS. My colleague is doubtless well informed about some things; perhaps he is about this; but if my colleague will perform his simple duty here, before I get through I think he will vote with me for the indefinite postponement of this bill.

Why do I call the Ortega claim a corrupt claim? Is that question asked me?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I asked that question.

Mr. CONNESS. The Supreme Court of the United States have determined that it was not a correct claim, that it was not a claim that deserved consideration, and they have rejected it. Now, if the Miranda claim was a good claim when it was withdrawn by these persons voluntarily, why did they withdraw it? I will show you that they did not regard it as a good claim. I cannot occupy the time of the Senate by following the whole history of this case, but I will turn immediately to the testimony of the main party in this cause, who is doubtless in the Senate now, T. B. Valentine. He appeared as a witness in a case where Benjamin S. Brooks, his copartner in this title, sued a man named Luning for professional services. Luning was mixed up in this claim; he was induced at one time to loan a very large amount of money and take a mortgage upon it. As mortgagee he was not consulted when they withdrew the claim, nor was he made a party to the withdrawal or to the bargain upon which it was founded. A lawsuit grew up between them, and Valentine, who asks the passage of this bill, came into court and testified thus to save his partner from paying money, to save him harmless in this suit, and to establish that Luning lost nothing by the claim being withdrawn from court.

"The plaintiff then called as a witness T. B. Valentine, who being duly sworn, said: 'I am the claimant under the Miranda grant which was before the land commissioners. I know the defendant's interest in the claim and his agreement with Brooks to prosecute the claim. I searched everywhere for testimony at that time, and four witnesses were examined by Brooks and their testimony taken. Brooks likewise went with me to the Mission to search for evidence. The result of all the investigations was that we ascertained that the Miranda grant was never signed by the Governor, and was worthless. This I ascertained from De la Rosa, who took the grant down to get it signed. Ascertaining this, we—Brooks and myself—made a compromise with those interested in the Ortega grant and claim.'"

"I told him [one of the claimants under Miranda] of the proposals we had made to Stewart, and he said it was perhaps the best that could be done with it, as the Miranda grant was not good, we had better get something out of it in this way; that is, that the Miranda claims should have part of the rancho."

This is Mr. Valentine's testimony in regard to his own title, after years of examination and after he had withdrawn it from court. He may have found some testimony since, but my opinion is that he should not be let into court to try it or to use it. At the session of Congress of 1863, it may be remembered by some Senators that a bill passed this body of a similar character to the one now before us. While it was pending it created a great degree of excitement in California. The Legislature of that State were then in session. Remember, sir, that it affects the title to most valuable property, one of our largest towns. Resolutions were introduced in the Legislature asking Congress not to pass the act. They were debated fully for about a week; and I send now to the desk the concurrent resolutions of both Houses of the California Legislature on this particular bill and question, and ask that they be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, William H. Weeks, secretary of State of the State of California, do hereby certify that the annexed is a true, full, and correct copy of original resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, adopted February 24, 1863, now on file in my office.

Witness my hand, and the great seal of State, at office, in Sacramento, California, the 21st day of March, A. D. 1863.

WILLIAM H. WEEKS,
Secretary of State.

By A. A. H. TUTTLE, Deputy.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 2. Concurrent resolutions relative to the Miranda claim to Rancho Arroyo de San Antonio:

Whereas an attempt is being made to revive, by an act of Congress, the Miranda claim to the Rancho Arroyo de San Antonio; and whereas the reviving of said claim would be an act of great injustice to the people of Sonoma county; and whereas the public interest requires that land titles in California should be settled as speedily as possible, and which once settled should not be disturbed: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate, (the Assembly concurring,) That our Senators in Congress are instructed, and our Representatives requested, to oppose the reviving or opening of said claim, and also to oppose the opening of any Mexican grant claim in California which has been settled by law.

Resolved, That his excellency the Governor be requested to forward a copy of the above resolutions to each of our delegation in Congress.

Adopted, February 24, A. D. 1863.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I have but a very few words more to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot.) The morning hour having expired, it is incumbent on the Chair to call up the special order of the day.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall be allowed to vote on this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that all previous orders be dispensed with for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I think we shall get through with this bill in a few minutes. I have no more to say, and I should like to get a vote on it. It is a matter of great consequence.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to take up the appropriation bill, and then by common consent it may be laid aside for a few minutes to dispose of this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON. This bill cannot get through for an hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. Several Senators around me mean to speak on it, I know.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I give way.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill which has been under discussion during the morning hour is already superseded by the expiration of the morning hour, and the consideration of the special order of the day now comes up under the rules of the Senate, and the Senator from Maine moves to postpone all special and prior orders with a view to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON. There is a bill upon which we adjourned last night that I think we ought to finish, and it seems to me it is very important to act upon it now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we can finish the Indian appropriation bill to-day. If the Senate think there is anything of more importance, of course I must yield. It is a question for the Senate to decide.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely wish to remark, as my colleague has remarked in regard to himself, that I have a bill also which was under consideration and on which I desire to get a vote. I doubt whether there will be much more debate upon it. It is a bill to create a Freedmen's Bureau; I am very sorry to see it got out of place; and if I allude to it now, it is not to interpose any objection to the motion of the Senator from Maine, but, as I have said on another occasion, by way of continual claim, as I want to get the bill before the Senate that it may be in condition to be acted upon just as soon as possible.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I feel bound to bring the Indian appropriation bill to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. On reflection I will yield to allow that bill to be taken up, in the hope that we may be able to get through with it to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we can get it through to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. There was a special order made for to-day: the bill (H. R. No. 421) in regard to the Congressional Globe. I do not propose, however, to press it against the Senator from Maine, because I know that I should fail if I attempted to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there are two special orders for to-day, one by special vote of the Senate and the other the unfinished business of yesterday. The House bill (No. 421) to pay in part for publishing the debates of Congress, and for other purposes, was assigned for to-day at one o'clock as a special order. The unfinished business of yesterday, however, supersedes the consideration of that bill, as it takes precedence among the special orders, and that unfinished business is the bill (S. No. 286) to prevent the discharge of persons from liability to military duty by reason of the payment of money.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to ask what becomes of the other special order, the bill in regard to the Congressional Globe? Does that lose its place entirely?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That depends on whether it is thrown over beyond this day by the consideration of other business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to take it up and make it the special order for some time when we can consider it. I suppose if it be made the special order for any day at one o'clock, it will then always be superseded by the unfinished business of the preceding day. If it should be made the special order for any later hour, say two o'clock, would it then come up regularly in its order at the proper time in preference to the bill at that time under consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such a motion would hardly be in order at this time, as there is a motion pending, that made by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Maine insists on his motion, I shall as a matter of course vote for it, although I know the importance of taking a vote on the bill reported by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] I think we ought to dispose of that bill, and I think we can do it this morning without further debate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If I thought it could be done without further debate, I should have no objection; but I know we cannot do that. I hope Senators will allow me to take up the Indian appropriation bill and the fortification bill which stand in their way; the fortification bill will take but a very short time, and then I shall consent to let them have next week for other business, and they can battle for what business shall be taken up free from the appropriation bills entirely. I expect to be engaged all next week in a committee of conference, and it will be impossible for me then to give any attention to the appropriation bills. It is important to pass them here and let them go back to the other House for action on our amendments. It is important for the public business, I think, that the Indian appropriation bill should be disposed of promptly, and therefore, with great deference to Senators, I insist on my motion, and I should like to have the sense of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to postpone all prior orders and to take up for consideration the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOWE. Before proceeding with the bill which has just been taken up, I ask the consent of the Senate to allow me to make a report from a committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the report, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th June, 1865, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their amendment to the seventh amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, and the Senate agree to the same: strike out all after the enacting clause (being section four) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That all persons of color who were free on the 19th day of April, 1861, and who have been enlisted and mustered into the military service of the United States, shall from the time of their enlistment be entitled to receive the pay, bounty, and clothing allowed to such persons by the laws existing at the time of their enlistment. And the Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized to determine any question of law arising under this provision. And if the Attorney General aforesaid shall determine that any of such enlisted persons are entitled to receive any pay, bounty, or clothing in addition to what they have already received, the Secretary of War shall make all necessary regulations to enable the pay department to make payment in accordance with such determination.

That the Senate recede from their ninth amendment.

T. O. HOWE,
L. M. MORRILL,
C. R. BUCKALEW,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
THADDEUS STEVENS,
THOMAS T. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin how that leaves the case, for instance, of the colored troops enlisted in South Carolina?

Mr. HOWE. It makes no provision for the pay of colored troops unless they are persons who were free at the breaking out of this war.

Mr. SUMNER. But the Senator is aware that there are two regiments, very faithful and noble regiments, that were gathered together at Hilton Head and at Beaufort, mainly freedmen from South Carolina, and the claim has been made for them to be put upon the same footing with the other colored regiments who receive thirteen dollars a month.

Mr. HOWE. It was, I believe, the opinion of the committee that if the law gives any class of these colored persons any more pay than they have already received, they will at some time get it; but just now, in order to settle the controversy arising upon this appropriation bill, it was not thought best to go any further than to provide for adjusting the dispute which arises on a question of law, as I understand it, as to the amount of pay that that class of colored people who were free at the breaking out of the war are entitled to.

Mr. SUMNER. But the Senator, it seems to me, has not covered the whole case, that is assuming that the Senator is, as he doubtless is, a party to this amendment. As I understand, there are two regiments in South Carolina and also four in Louisiana, a large number of the soldiers in which were once slaves, who were enlisted under a promise of thirteen dollars a month, but they have never received it. So far as they were slaves, they will be excluded from the thirteen dollars a month under this amendment, as I understand it. The amendment is limited to those who were free on the 19th of April, 1861; and of course, therefore, it embraces the Massachusetts regiments, and so far as I am a Senator from Massachusetts that contents me; but then as one interested in the adjustment of this question on principles of justice, and in securing the rights of all enlisted men in every part of the country, which I am free to say I have at heart not less than securing the rights of those enlisted in Massachusetts, the amendment is not satisfactory, it is not complete, it does not go far enough. I think it had better lie on the table for the present, that we may have an opportunity of looking into it, especially as my colleague is not in his seat, and I do not know that he is aware of it.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know that he is.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I think it had better be passed over for the moment. I suppose there is no objection to that.

Mr. HOWE. I have none.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires a motion for that purpose, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope by unanimous consent it will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have the Senator who has made the report explain it. I do not understand, for instance, whether the regiment which was raised in my State is to be paid, according to the report which has been made.

Mr. HOWE. If the men were free on the 19th of April, 1861.

Mr. POMEROY. We have no means of knowing that. They were raised in a free State, and were the first regiment of colored troops raised. We have no means of knowing whether they were free or not; we never asked that question.

Mr. HOWE. The Secretary of War is authorized to establish regulations for the execution of this law if it is agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we had better look into it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is suggested that the report be passed over for the time being.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to its going over, but I want a modification of it before we agree to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will lie on the table for the present, to be called up at any time by any member.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 240) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1865.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was in the appropriations for the Wingabagoes, in line seven hundred and fifty-seven of the bill, to strike out the words "one hundred thousand" after "million," so as to make the clause read:

For interest on $1,000,000 at five per cent., &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line eleven hundred and twenty-nine to insert the following items:

Eastern bands of Shoshonees:

For first of twenty installments, to be expended under the direction of the President in the purchase of such articles as he may deem suitable to their wants, either as hunters or herdsmen, per fifth article treaty 2d July, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, $10,000.

For second of twenty installments, to be expended under direction of the President for same object, per fifth article treaty July 2, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $10,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to amend that amendment of the Committee on Finance before it is adopted, and will do so now, or pass it over until the reading of the bill is finished.

Mr. SHERMAN. What does the Senator propose?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I propose to strike out the word "four" in line eleven hundred and thirty-six, and insert "five," and then to strike out from line eleven hundred and thirty-eight to line eleven hundred and forty-three. The present fiscal year is so near its end that the Committee on Indian Affairs, upon looking into the matter, are of opinion that it will be as well to begin these installments in 1865, which will save an appropriation for the present year of $10,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to strike out "four" and insert "five" in line eleven hundred and thirty-six, so as to make the year "1865" instead of "1864."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move to strike out from line eleven hundred and thirty-nine to eleven hundred and forty-two that whole paragraph.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was to insert after the preceding one:

Northwestern bands of Shoshonees:

For first of twenty installments, to be expended under the direction of the President in the purchase of such articles as he may deem suitable to their wants, either as hunters or herdsmen, per third article treaty 30th July, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, $5,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to strike out "1864" and insert "1865."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was:

For second of twenty installments, to be expended under the direction of the President for same object, per third article treaty July 30, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $5,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to strike that out from the amendment of the Committee on Finance for the same reason.

The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the one previously adopted:

Goshop bands of Shoshonees:

For first of twenty installments, to be expended under the direction of the President in the purchase of such articles, including cattle for herding, or other purposes, as he shall deem suitable for their wants and condition, either as hunters or herdsmen, per seventh article treaty October 12, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, $1,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to amend that by striking out "1864" and inserting "1865."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was to insert:

For second of twenty installments, to be expended under the direction of the President for same object, per seventh article treaty October 12, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $1,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to strike that out. The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the preceding amendment:

Creek nation:

For interest on $200,000, at five per cent. per annum, as permanent annuity, to be paid them in money, or for such mechanical labor, or useful articles as the Secretary of the Interior may from time to time direct, per third article treaty September 3, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, $10,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to strike out "1864" and insert "1865."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before the amendment of the committee is adopted I desire to add at the end of the word "dollars" in line eleven hundred and seventy-seven the words "payable on condition that the said nation ratify the amendments made by the Senate."

The treaty has been ratified by the Senate, and it is wise the appropriation should be made, but whether the Creek nation will ratify the amendments of the Senate or not has not been proclaimed. The amendments are very important amendments.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert:

For interest on $200,000, at five per cent. per annum, for same object, per third article treaty September 3, 1863, for fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $10,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to strike that out. The motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert:

For payment of first installment, to be expended for their benefit in the purchase of stock, horses, sheep, clothing, and such other articles as the Secretary of the Interior, with the council of said nation, may direct, per fourth article of treaty September 3, 1863, as amended by the Senate, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, $40,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to change "1864" into "1865" in that clause.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move the same words in addition, "payable on condition that the said nation ratify the amendments made by the Senate."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was to insert:

For second of five installments, to be expended for their benefit, for same object, per fourth article of treaty September 3, 1863, as amended by the Senate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $20,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that that be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "agents," in line eleven hundred and ninety-nine, should be "agent." There is but one now in California.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have some amendments on that subject to conform the bill to the law which we passed. Let that be passed over for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. I withdraw the amendment now.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert after line twelve hundred and seventy-five the following:

Cherokee nation:

For interest on the "abstracted bonds" belonging to the national funds, $14,385.

For interest on the "abstracted bonds" belonging to the school fund, $3,270.

For interest on the proceeds of sales of school lands in Alabama, sold at different times from and including the second quarter of the year 1850, to December 31, 1860, computed to March 1, 1864, $16,758 04.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to offer two or three other amendments to the bill. In lines eleven and twelve, on page 1, I move to reduce the general appropriation "for the pay of superintendents of Indian affairs and of Indian agents," from $101,200 to $98,800. This reduction is made necessary by the changes in the system in California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line eighteen, on page 2, I move to strike out "temporary" before "clerks," to strike out the letter "s" at the end of the words "clerks" and "superintendents," and in lines nineteen and twenty to strike out "one for the northern and one for the southern district," and to reduce the appropriation from $3,000 to $1,800; so as to make the clause read:

For pay of clerk to superintendent of Indian affairs in California, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line twenty-one I move to strike out "five supervisors" and insert "four agents;" and in line twenty-two to strike out "$9,000" and insert "$7,200."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think it will be more simple to strike out the twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, and twenty-fourth lines, and to insert:

For pay of four agents, $7,200.
For pay of one blacksmith, one assistant blacksmith, one farmer, and one carpenter, $2,400.

That will carry out the law of the present session in regard to the Indian service in California.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will answer the purpose, and I accept it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I observe that as the bill is printed, the appropriation of $1,000, which should be at the end of the fifty-seventh line, is omitted. I move to add it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I move the following amendment, to come in after line two hundred and eighty-three, on page 12:

For the salary of an agent for the Kioway, Apache, and Comanche Indians, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $1,500.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have some explanation of that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The bill was passed by the Senate some time since providing for the establishment of an agency for the Kioways, Apaches, and Comanches, which are wandering tribes, and it is necessary in the estimation of the Department that there should be an agent for them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there no provision in the bill as it stands for them?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, because this is a new agency, established at the present session by a bill we have recently passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is another amendment necessary after line thirteen on the 1st page of the bill to carry out a bill which we passed some time since, giving an additional salary to the agent at the Green Bay agency:

For the salary of the agent at the Green Bay agency to make the sum $1,500, an additional sum of $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. By the Committee on Indian Affairs I am instructed to offer the following amendment, to come in after line seven hundred and sixty-four, on page 32:

For deficiencies in subsistence and expenses of removal and support of the Sioux and Winnebago Indians of Minnesota during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, $137,293 40: Provided, That the portion expended in behalf of the Winnebagoes shall be reimbursed to the Treasury upon the sale of their lands in Minnesota.

This is a pretty large appropriation for a deficiency, and I desire to state to the Senate the facts upon which the Committee on Indian Affairs felt called upon to recommend the adoption of the amendment. It will be remembered by the Senate that growing out of the Indian hostilities in Minnesota, not only the Sioux who were engaged in those hostilities but the Winnebagoes were also removed from the State of Minnesota to a reservation upon the upper Missouri. It will be remembered that Congress in the action which it took confiscated to the Government of the United States the annuities in the hands of the Government belonging to the Sioux. The Winnebagoes, however, not having been engaged in hostilities, provision was made for the sale of their lands in the State of Minnesota and for their removal. The Sioux and the Winnebagoes have been removed, and in consequence of that removal expenses have been incurred which have created this deficiency, and it is necessary that it should be provided for. It is one of those necessities which have grown out of the Indian hostilities in Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have the expenses been paid in point of fact?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The expenses have been paid and incurred.

Mr. JOHNSON. The expenses have been incurred of course, but I want to know whether they have been paid by the Government, and if so, out of what fund.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will read the letter of the superintendent of Indian affairs:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 14, 1864.

SIR: Under your instructions of September 28, 1863, I have had delivered, and being delivered, at their agency, provisions for the Sioux and Winnebago Indians for their subsistence until the 1st day of May next. These provisions were, under your instructions, purchased partly on credit. The time has expired in which they were to be paid for, and I have not received the balance of the estimate, $33,763 40, which amount is required to meet my engagements. I wish respectfully to call your attention to this subject, and ask that a requisition may be drawn in my favor for that amount.

In this connection I would further state that there is no provision made for subsisting those Indians for the months of May and June, (the balance of the fiscal year.) This must be provided to avoid anticipating the regular appropriations. I estimate as follows, to wit: three thousand two hundred Indians, sixty-one days, at fifteen cents each per day, $29,280.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
CLARK W. THOMPSON,
Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

HON. WILLIAM P. DOLE,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

These Indians were removed last year to this reservation on the upper Missouri, but there was in all the western part of Minnesota and Iowa and all that region of country, such a drought as has not been experienced for years and years before, and actually nothing was raised for their support, and in consequence of that provisions had to be purchased to prevent them from starving, and transported from Iowa and Minnesota to the Missouri river for their support. They have been purchased from necessity, and these liabilities have been incurred by the superintendent of Indian affairs, and it is believed to be a necessity that this appropriation should be made. The Senator from Minnesota is now in his seat, and he is more familiar with all the facts, as the matter transpired in his own State, than I am; and if the Senate desire any further explanation, I have no doubt he can give any explanation which is needed. The committee have regarded it as a matter of necessity.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not yet understand how the full amount is made up.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to inquire whether when we ordered this removal last year, there was not an appropriation made to meet the expenses of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There was something of an appropriation.

Mr. POMEROY. How much?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe it was $50,000 last year and $50,000 the year before.

Mr. POMEROY. And this is in addition.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is to make up a deficiency for liabilities actually incurred.

Mr. POMEROY. I really do not understand this matter; I presume it must be right; but I have noticed that in addition to the $100,000 already spent, we appropriated last year $250,000 to pay the State of Minnesota for depredations committed by these Indians; and then they have a claim before our Committee on Claims now of $125,000 for deficiencies, and here is an item of $137,000 for deficiencies. It is a most remarkable state of facts. That is all I can say about it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I see nothing remarkable in it. We confiscated to the Government of the United States the property of the Sioux nation which was in our hands to the amount of between two and three million dollars, and by the legislation of Congress in special acts which we passed we assumed out of that property in our hands belonging to the Sioux nation to make some reparation to the citizens of Minnesota for the damages committed by those Indians during the Indian war. We first appropriated $200,000, and put the money into the hands of commissioners to go to the State of Minnesota to inquire into the facts and to distribute that amount of money among those who were most needy, and who had suffered most in consequence of the war. The same commission were also authorized to inquire into the amount of damages which had been incurred by the people of Minnesota, and they reported the amount of those damages to Congress through the Secretary of the Interior, and a bill was passed by the House of Representatives, was referred in this body to the Committee on Finance, and has since been passed by the Senate, appropriating nearly eight or nine hundred thousand dollars more to pay those damages.

These are the facts; but all that has nothing to do with this question. That was legislation to pay the damages which were inflicted by these Indians upon the citizens of Minnesota. Now, as the Government determined upon the removal of the Indians and we did remove them, the question was, should we let them starve upon our hands, or was it the duty of the Interior Department to keep them from starving? That was the necessity which compelled the incurring of these liabilities.

Mr. POMEROY. It was no part of my purpose in the inquiry I suggested to raise any question in regard to letting the Indians starve. I of course am willing and anxious that the Government should do everything in the premises that it is its duty to do. But I notice that efforts have been made to secure payment for losses sustained in my own State, and the committees have generally reported that all such payments are to be made, if ever, after the war. The losses to which I now refer were not losses sustained at the hands of Indians, but from Quantrell's and other bands of bad men, as bad as Indians at any rate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. Certainly, as a member of the Committee on Finance here, he ought not to put himself in antagonism to the Committee on Indian Affairs, when it is that committee of which he is a member that reported the bill to pay those very damages in Minnesota. The Indian Committee had nothing to do with it.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator is mistaken if he supposes that I am a member of the Committee on Finance. His remarks may apply to somebody, but they do not apply to me. I do not happen to be on that committee.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, it was thought wise by Congress to have these Indians removed from Minnesota, and such was the necessity of the case that an appropriation was made of I think about one hundred thousand dollars to remove the Sioux and Winnebago Indians from that State. That was done last summer. They had to be taken upon boats and carried to St. Louis, and from St. Louis up the Missouri river. The Senator from Kansas is well aware of the difficulties of navigation in the Missouri river last year. The amount appropriated was actually consumed in the removal of the Indians. A part of the money now asked for has been expended, first in building some houses, building a stockade and protection for these Indians, for on the north and on the west of them there were hostile Sioux Indians. The Department of the Interior authorized the expenditure of $54,240, anticipating an appropriation which had been made for other purposes, and directed the superintendent to expend it immediately for the subsistence of these Indians. In addition to that sum, late in the fall, it having been very dry and nothing having been raised, the Secretary of the Interior authorized the superintendent to enter into a contract to supply them with beef and pork. That contract amounted to $53,763 40, not one cent of which has yet been paid, but all the supplies under the contract have been delivered to the Indians. I will state here that a large portion of that contract was for cattle, and that the contract price for those cattle to be delivered on the Missouri river was but four cents a pound.

The remaining $29,280 of the amount now proposed to be appropriated is the estimate which is made for the subsistence of these Indians for the months of May and June, in addition to the expenditures I have already stated. The total amount is made up in this way: $53,763 40 is a debt due under a contract entered into under direction of the Secretary of the Interior; $54,240 has been actually expended; and $29,280 is the estimate of the amount necessary to be expended in order to carry them to the end of the present fiscal year. In settling down upon this item of $137,000, the committee concluded to strike out all the other estimates which were made for these Indians amounting to eighty or ninety thousand dollars for other purposes. It was the judgment of the committee that we would pay up all claims which were actually due, and appropriate $29,280 in addition, and that that would be enough, and then we could leave out the other estimates which had been made for them.

It will be observed that the $53,763 40 and that $54,240 Congress is in honor bound to appropriate. I think we have no reasonable discretion in regard to allowing those two sums, because the Government is bound to pay them; it has entered into a contract under which the property has been delivered. Then the additional $29,280 is a reasonable estimate, and it takes the place of nearly $80,000 which the Indian department had estimated, as will be seen by the printed estimates on the tables of the members of the Senate. This is really cutting down those estimates more than one half. The Indian Committee now is not allowing in this bill over one half what was estimated to pay up the obligations of the Government to these Indians.

I will say in answer to the Senator from Kansas, who seems to feel rather bad because Congress has seen fit to pass an appropriation to pay the sufferers in Minnesota, that that appropriation was made in pursuance of a law, or to carry out a law, which was passed a year ago, and Congress had no discretion about it. The United States confiscated over two million dollars of the Sioux money and appointed commissioners to adjust the damages. Those commissioners made their report, and the Finance Committee reported the appropriation in pursuance of the existing laws.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not desire to make any particular opposition to this measure; we are now acting as in Committee of the Whole; but I desire to reserve the right to have a separate vote on it when we come into the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. The truth is, that the money has been spent to support these Indians. I do not know whether it has been rightfully expended or not; but the presumption is that it has been rightly expended. It is a debt incurred. The office in their statement of the case have not given the whole of it. They state that they have expended $53,763 40, and they estimate that $29,280 will be necessary to support the Indians for the months of May and June of the present fiscal year; but they do not include in this statement the anticipation of the entire appropriation as named in the bill for the coming year of $54,240. They had intended to wait until that appropriation should fall due to these Indians under the present appropriation bill, and use it to pay the back debts that have been incurred. The committee thought it better to meet the entire deficiency at once, to meet it squarely in the face, and to allow the appropriation which the bill provides for to be used the coming year in buying goods that may be needed. If that amount of $54,240 were diminished, the result would be that they would go on credit for the coming year, and anticipate the appropriation of the following year. Then, to come to the facts of the case, they have incurred a debt of $137,000 in the support of these Indians which was not provided for in any law heretofore enacted, and the question is whether we shall pay it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the statements of fact made by the committee are to be relied upon, as certainly they are. The Interior Department, as I understand, anticipated the wants of these Indians, rendered necessary by our determination to remove them, by applying to that purpose, as far as it would go, $54,000 which had been by Congress appropriated to some other purpose. Whether the Department had a right to appropriate a sum given by Congress for a different purpose to this, is a matter perhaps about which there can be no difference of opinion; but still they applied it to an object which Congress would have promoted if they had been in session. There is great danger in suffering the Department to resort to one fund which Congress has appropriated for a specific object, to carry out some other object for which Congress either has made no appropriation or has made an inadequate appropriation. But it never would have done for the United States to suffer these Indians to starve; and rather than to have that happen, the Interior Department, I think, under the circumstances, did right in providing some mode by which such a result as that should be avoided. But that was not enough; and having no other fund to which they could resort under their control, they contracted a debt of some fifty-three thousand dollars more for provisions furnished the Indians, and now they tell us that in addition to the $54,000 which they have taken from the purpose for which it was given and applied to this purpose, and the $53,000 of debt which they have incurred, it will be necessary to incur a debt of some twenty-nine thousand dollars more; and they ask that an appropriation shall be made, amounting in the aggregate to the $54,000 which they have applied, the $53,000 debt which they have incurred, and the $29,000 which they will be obliged to incur, provided the Indians are to be supported during the two months up to the termination of the present fiscal year, and the aggregate of these sums amounts to the sum proposed to be appropriated, $137,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps I ought to say one word further. It will be remembered by the honorable Senator from Maryland that by the act of February 21, 1863, after these hostilities in Minnesota, Congress directed the President to set apart a new reservation for the Winnebagoes outside of the State of Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It was substantially imperative on the Executive Department to do it, and we appropriated not money out of the Treasury of the United States, but from the funds of the Winnebagoes themselves what was supposed to be enough to pay for their removal. They were removed. It is now nearly two years ago, and the extreme drought, as I mentioned to the Senate, prevented their raising anything for their support, and it has compelled the department to the necessity of allowing the superintendent to run in debt to get things to save the Indians from starvation. It has been compelled by necessity to do what has been done.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator certainly does not understand me as finding fault with it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move, also, the following amendment, to come in after the one just adopted:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to take charge of certain stray bands of Winnebago and Pottawatomie Indians now in the State of Wisconsin, with a view to prevent any further depredations by them upon the citizens of that State, and for provisions and subsistence, $10,000: Provided, That the proportion of annuities to which such stray bands of Pottawatomies and Winnebagoes would be entitled if they were settled upon their reservations with their respective tribes shall be retained in the Treasury to their credit from year to year, to be paid to them when they shall unite with their said tribes, or to be used by the Secretary of the Interior in defraying the expenses of their removal, or in settling and subsisting them on any other reservation which may hereafter be provided for them.

For the salary of a special agent to take charge of said Indians, $1,500.

I desire to explain to the Senate facts which perhaps have not come to their knowledge in regard to this matter. About the same time with the troubles in Minnesota there were some bands of Winnebagoes and Pottawatomies, about one thousand in number, stray bands that really belonged to the Pottawatomies in Kansas and to the Winnebagoes in Minnesota, which were wandering about in the State of Wisconsin through five or six counties. Shortly after the outbreak in Minnesota it was believed that an outbreak or something of a massacre would occur in the State of Wisconsin. One woman, a Mrs. Salter, was massacred by an Indian, and one or two other murders were committed at the same time. The result was to produce a great state of excitement on the part of the people of Wisconsin, and it looked so alarming that some military force was called out at one time, and there was an appearance of an uprising of the people, and perhaps an indiscriminate slaughter of all the Indians that were remaining in the State of Wisconsin. But some of the public men in that section of the State, among whom was my honorable colleague in the other House, [Mr. McInnes], were active in taking the matter in hand, striving to keep down the excitement, and looking to some mode of taking care of the Indians with a view to their ultimate removal, and the people of the State became satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, and that these Indians should be provided for in some way.

The House of Representatives, acting upon this subject, have passed a bill, which is now before the Senate, providing for their removal, the Winnebagoes to join the Winnebagoes that were removed from Minnesota to the valley of the Missouri, and the Pottawatomies to join the tribe of Pottawatomies in the State of Kansas, and appropriating for that purpose the sum of $30,000. When the question came before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs it was believed by our committee that this sum of $30,000 would be found inadequate if we should attempt the removal of these Indians in the present state of things in Wisconsin, as they are scattered about in small bands. It was thought that it would be more advisable to make a small appropriation of $10,000, and appoint some one as an agent to look after these scattered bands, to prevent their making depredations on the whites, and with a view to their ultimate removal when they should come under the control of an agent, and the proper time shall arrive, as it undoubtedly will, when peace shall be restored and affairs in the Indian Territory shall resume their normal condition. The policy of the people of Kansas, and so far as I know the policy of the Government, is that the Pottawatomies in Kansas shall be removed, when peace comes, to the Indian Territory, and to try and gather all the Indians we can within the limits of that Territory. We shall then expect and hope to have the Pottawatomies removed from Wisconsin to the tribe of the Pottawatomies to which they belong, and the Winnebagoes from Wisconsin to the Winnebagoes on the Missouri. But in the present state of affairs, owing to the fact that the Pottawatomies are still in Kansas, and that the people of Kansas have been overrun by Indian refugees from the Indian Territory, we thought it would be unwise, and was asking more of the people of Kansas than we would desire to ask, to have another band of Indians removed to that State at the present time.

It was with this view that the committee recommended this appropriation of $10,000 to gather these Indians together, and for the appointment of an agent whose duty it shall be to look after these stray bands and prevent any disturbance of the peace in Wisconsin. If such a thing should occur, the expense would be very much greater, of course, as is always the case.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 36, after line eight hundred and fifty-nine, I move to insert:

For the erection of a saw and grist-mill, in accordance with the provisions of the fourth article of the treaty of June 9, 1855, $10,000.

This relates to the western coast, in the State of Oregon. There is a treaty with the Walla-Walla, Cayuse, and Unatilla tribes, by the fourth article of which we bound ourselves to build a mill. I regret that the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] is not in his seat; but the facts which we learned from him and from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are that the mill has never been erected, and it is with mortification that I am called upon to state, but the truth compels me to say, that the agent who was appointed as long ago as 1856 or 1857, instead of using the money to build the mill, actually appropriated it to his own private purposes. At all events the money is gone, and the mill has not been erected.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did he not give bond?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know that I can answer the question.

Mr. POMEROY. As this provision is in the treaty, I do not know that we have any right to refuse to erect the mill. I will merely say that in regard to all cases where we have made provision in Indian treaties for the erection of a mill, I have never known one erected that was good for anything. I believe there is a provision for a mill in the treaties with almost all the tribes in my State; I know that we appropriated $10,000 for a mill for the Sacs and Foxes and then $10,000 more, and I do not know how much that mill finally cost, but it never amounted to anything, and you cannot make a saw-mill among Indians amount to anything. They do not want a saw-mill; they will not use the lumber. I do not know how we can avoid making the appropriation if the treaty requires it; but it has been neglected so long that I do not think it will hurt to neglect it a little longer.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is not only a saw-mill, but it is a flouring-mill attached. Certainly that is in the treaty, and that is the purpose of the amendment. I do not know but that what the honorable Senator from Kansas says may be true in many instances, but I believe that the agent who has just been appointed for these Indians, Mr. Wilbur, from all the recommendations we have of him, and from what we know of him, will faithfully apply the money, if appropriated, to the purposes for which it should be applied.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no doubt in regard to the agent. I only say that in the Indian country, away from facilities to keep a mill in repair, I have never known one kept long in repair, and I have seen a great many that have been built. I do not know whether this is intended to be a water or a steam mill; but if it be a water mill the first thing we shall hear will be that the dam has gone off, and then there will have to be an appropriation to rebuild it. If it is a steam mill something about the machinery will get out of order; and there being no machine shop perhaps within a thousand miles, it will never be repaired. I only speak of the facts as I have known them to exist wherever there is a mill among the Indians. It is hardly ever a thing which is of any use. It is nearly always out of repair so as to be of no advantage. I do not know of an instance where any benefit has been received from it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Oregon is not at this moment in his seat. I understand that this is to be a water mill. There is good water power at the place where it is proposed to build it. If there is any objection to the proposition, let it lie over until the Senator from Oregon comes in.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall not object.

Mr. JOHNSON. The treaties generally do not provide that the mill shall be kept in repair by the Government, but only that the mill shall be built. I do not know how it is in this case.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will read the article:

"In addition to the consideration above specified the United States agree to erect at suitable points on the reservation one saw-mill and one flouring-mill, a building suitable for a hospital, two school-houses, one blacksmith shop, one building for a wagon and plow maker, and one carpenter and joiner's shop and one dwelling for each, two millers, one farmer, one superintendent of farming operations, two school-teachers, one blacksmith, one wagon and plow maker, and one carpenter, and to each the necessary buildings and outbuildings, and to purchase and keep in repair for the term of twenty years all necessary fixtures and mechanical tools, medicines, and hospital stores, books, stationery for schools, and furniture for employes."

Such is the provision, that we are to keep the fixtures in repair, and those are the machinery.

Mr. POMEROY. Has there been any estimate? As it is supposed that $10,000 will build the mill? Why make the appropriation unless there is a reasonable certainty that a mill can be built for that money in that country at this time?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator is disposed to resist the amendment I shall ask that it shall lie over until the Senator from Oregon is in his seat, because he can explain the particulars, and the committee relied very much on his statement of facts and on other facts which they ascertained. I understand it to be an excellent water power, and the sum of $10,000 I have no doubt will build a saw-mill with a run of stones attached sufficient for the purposes of the Indian tribes to grind their corn and saw their lumber.

Mr. POMEROY. If there is any reasonable prospect that that sum will build a mill, I shall make no objection at this time.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am also instructed by the committee to offer this amendment to come in after line eleven hundred and eleven, page 46:

New Mexico superintendency:

For deficiency in the appropriation for the Indian service in New Mexico for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. After line eleven hundred and sixty-three, page 48, under the head of "Goship Bands of Shoshonees," I move to insert the following:

To pay James Duane Doty for services rendered as commissioner to negotiate treaties with the Shoshonee or Snake Indians and treating with them and with bands of the Utah and Goship nation for peace, commencing on the 19th day of June, 1863, and ending on the 30th day of August, 1863, being one hundred and sixty-five days, at eight dollars per day, $1,320.

I will explain this amendment to the Senate. The gentleman who was employed by the Department to negotiate this treaty was Governor of the Territory of Utah, but not, by virtue of his office, superintendent of Indian affairs. The Department having confidence in his experience and capacity employed him to go into the Territory adjoining to negotiate those treaties at an expense probably less than would have been incurred by employing and sending a person from here to negotiate them. The committee thought that this amount was but reasonable, and that it was economical on the part of the Government to employ him rather than to send another commissioner there.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit whether that is not a private claim and not in order upon this bill. I should like in making that suggestion to ask a question if it is to be considered, where was the superintendent of Indian affairs for that Territory that it was necessary to appoint another officer to make this treaty? I suppose there is a superintendent of Indian affairs there. But, sir, the 30th rule of the Senate provides:

"And no amendments shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation."

This, I should think, under that rule was clearly a private claim.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is certainly not to carry out an existing law, because there is no law authorizing it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And I suppose there is no treaty providing for it.

Mr. HARLAN. I suppose the money has been paid really by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to this party as his agent to negotiate the treaty.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then let him pay it out of his own salary.

Mr. HARLAN. In most cases the Governor of a Territory receives a separate salary for acting as superintendent of Indian affairs within the Territory. In this case, however, there is no salary paid to the Governor as superintendent of Indian affairs.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Was there no superintendent there?

Mr. HARLAN. There was no superintendent of Indian affairs in the Territory at the time, as I understand it, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs here appointed Governor Doty to act for the Government, and I suppose he has paid him.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the second time I have heard the remark made by gentlemen on the Indian Committee that the money is already paid. If I believed that that was absolutely so, that the money had been paid, I certainly never would vote for it under any circumstances. If it was paid at all, it was paid in plain violation of law, and in disregard of the constitutional obligations of the oath taken by our officers which forbids the payment of money from the Treasury of the United States except in pursuance of law and in pursuance of an appropriation made by Congress; so that if, as the Senator supposes, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has paid this money, I for one would insist, whatever may be the amount, that he should pay it out of his own pocket and lose it, as an example to every other officer in the Government, because no money can be paid from the Treasury of the United States except in pursuance of law and in pursuance of an appropriation made after the passage of the law.

Notwithstanding the declaration of the honorable Senator from Iowa, my impression is that it is simply a debt incurred, and not money yet paid. If it is money paid, I certainly will insist upon the person who paid the money without law losing it; but in either event it would be a private claim. In the one case it would be money due to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for money illegally paid, or paid without authority of law; in the other case it is money due to Governor Doty for private services, not in pursuance of any law. It is not a recommendation made to us in the ordinary way, through the ordinary channel of communication. I think, therefore, it ought to rest on its own merits as a private bill, and be sent to the committee over which you, sir, have the honor to preside, so that its merits and legality may be examined.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not perceive anything in the point raised by the Senator. We have just agreed to an amendment making an appropriation of $137,000, which is entirely similar in some respects. There was no law authorizing the payment of $137,000 to prevent the Winnebagoes from starving, none whatever.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I looked at the report on that very point, and I found that the money was not paid; it was simply a debt incurred. In that case I will further state that there was an existing appropriation, but the amount having been exhausted, the agent wrote that the amount was not sufficient, that he had incurred a liability of $53,000, and that he wanted the money to make it good.

Mr. HARLAN. The principle, if I comprehend it, is precisely the same. They contract to pay the money, and a debt is incurred. If it is without authority of law, of course it is a liability incurred by the party himself as an individual, and if he applies to Congress for an appropriation to meet it, it is a private claim; it was not authorized by law, and of course must go by the board; so that in every case where an officer of the Government exceeds an appropriation, if the Senator's idea should be carried out, he must present a private claim to Congress. It seems to me that that principle has never been acted on here. An emergency arises, and the officer of the Government believing the emergency justifies him in making provision for the case, either incurs a debt or takes the money from some other appropriation and meets it, expecting that Congress will approve what has been done, and make the appropriation when Congress shall again convene. I do not doubt myself that this money has been paid; that is, informally paid. I do not perceive how the party could proceed to negotiate this treaty without the expenditure of either his own money or the money of the Government. The presumption is that he drew on the Commissioner and the Commissioner sent him an amount of money sufficient to defray the expenses. It may not have been charged to any account; it probably has not been; but it is a liability incurred by the officer in carrying out the duties of the office for the Government, and not for any individual. It seems to me it does not involve the principle stated by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I requested the chief clerk of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to sit by my side while we were acting upon this bill in order that if any difficulty arose I might inquire of him and get information as to some particular facts. He informs me that the expenses of Governor Doty were paid. He also presented to the Department his account at eight dollars per day for his services; but the Department could not allow it, and it rests in that way. In their estimates for deficiencies the Department have estimated this among the deficiencies to enable them to meet what is a just claim. I will state to my honorable friend from Ohio that I do not look upon this as in the nature of a private claim. It is a deficiency incurred by the Department in the performance of its duty as such and in the negotiation of these treaties.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have we authorized them to make those treaties?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir; they were authorized to make them; the treaties have been confirmed; and as this amendment provides for a deficiency I think we had better allow it to go on this bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to say in reply to a remark made by the Senator from Ohio, that if this is a private claim the examination and investigation of it certainly do not belong to the Committee on Claims. By a law of Congress, all claims growing out of contracts, either express or implied, go to the Court of Claims. It could not be considered by the Committee on Claims unless there was a special resolution passed giving that committee jurisdiction of it.

I wish to say in addition, that I consider this as one of the most economical appropriations to make a treaty in that part of the country that could have been made. If you had sent a man from the Indian office out there to make the treaty, his expenses, his stage fare and railroad fare in going across the continent would have consumed half this amount. This is one of the most economical measures, at any rate, that could have been conceived of to make a treaty in that section of the country. If there was a law of Congress authorizing that treaty to be made, this is a legitimate expense growing out of a law of Congress. I do not know whether there was or not; but if there was, it was a legitimate expenditure of the Indian office, and the Commissioner had the right to make it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If this is not a private claim, I do not know how you can get a private claim. Here is a person who claims pay for services that he has rendered. He was employed without any authority of law. The Senator from Kansas knows very well that a law is not passed to make a treaty. The treaty itself comes here and is ratified by the Senate. The Senate may or may not ratify the treaty.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator is aware that no treaty can be made unless the party making it is authorized to do so either by a law of Congress or by the decision of the Department.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not aware that a treaty cannot be made without a law being passed to authorize it. I suppose all or nearly all our treaties are made without consulting Congress. The executive authority takes it upon himself to negotiate a treaty with some foreign Power, and that treaty—

Mr. POMEROY. In reference to Indian treaties there is a special law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And when the treaty is concluded or agreed upon by the parties it is submitted or rather sent for ratification to the Senate, and unless it is ratified it amounts to nothing. These agreements that we enter into with the Indians we call "treaties." I think it a misnomer myself. They are little more than enactments of Congress. We change and alter them pretty much as we please after we have made them. But I think this is a private claim. I submit the question to the decision of the Chair, whether it is not a private claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no any doubt that it is a private claim.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it is not in order on this bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I will state that I believe this case is not unlike some that have occurred in connection with our foreign relations, and they have been treated as private claims. There are one or two instances that come to my mind now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I can only say that if it be a private claim I believe it is a good one. I shall not raise any question on the decision of the Chair.

I now offer an amendment for the purpose of carrying into effect the late treaty which was ratified between the United States and the Red lake and Pembina Indians of Minnesota in that large purchase. The amendment includes several appropriations to carry out the several articles of the treaty.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert after line eleven hundred and ninety-five, page 49, the following:

Chippewas of Red Lake and Pembina:

For this amount as annuity to be paid pro rata to the Red lake band of Chippewas, during the pleasure of the President, per third article of treaty of October 2, 1863, and second article supplementary to treaty April 12, 1864, approved April 25, 1864, $10,000.

For this amount to the Pembina band of Chippewas, per same article and treaty, during the pleasure of the President, $5,000.

For the first of fifteen installments to be expended annually for the purpose of supplying them with gilling twine, cotton matter, calico, linsley, blankets, sheeting, flannels, provisions, farming tools, and for such other useful articles, and for such other useful purposes as may be deemed for their best interests, per article of the supplementary treaty April 12, 1864, $15,000.

For the first of fifteen installments for same objects for the Pembina band of Chippewas, per third article of the supplementary treaty April 12, 1864, $4,000.

For the first of fifteen installments for the pay of one blacksmith, one physician who shall furnish medicine for the sick, one miller, and one farmer, per fourth article supplementary treaty of April 12, 1864, $3,500.

For first of fifteen installments for the purchase of iron and steel and other articles for blacksmithing purposes, per fourth article supplementary treaty April 12, 1864, $1,500.

For first of fifteen installments to be expended for carpentering and other purposes, per fourth article of supplementary treaty April 12, 1864, $1,000.

For this amount to be expended in building a saw-mill with a run of mill-stones attached, per fifth article supplementary treaty April 12, 1864, $5,000.

For this amount to be paid to the chiefs of said bands through their agents, per fourth article treaty October 2, 1863, as amended March 1, 1864, and modified by the sixth article supplementary treaty April 12, 1864, $25,000.

For this amount for the payment of claims of injured persons for depredations committed by said Indians on the goods of certain British and American traders at the mouth of Red lake, and for exactions forcibly levied on the proprietors of steamboats plying on Red river, to be paid in full and the remainder to be paid pro rata upon the debts of said tribe incurred since the 1st day of January, 1859, to be ascertained by the agents in connection with the chiefs, per fourth article treaty October 2, 1863, as amended March 1, 1864, and modified by the sixth article supplementary treaty April 12, 1864, $75,000.

For this amount to defray the expense of cutting out a road from Leach lake to Red river, per fifth article of treaty October 2, 1863, $5,000.

For the first of fifteen installments to defray the expense of a board of visitors to consist of not more than three persons to attend upon the annuity payments of the said Chippewa Indians, whose salary shall not exceed five dollars per day, nor more than twenty days, and ten cents per mile traveling expenses, and not to exceed three hundred miles, per sixth article of treaty October 2, 1863, $390.

For insurance and transportation of annuity goods and provisions and material for building mill, including machinery, iron, and steel for blacksmiths, &c., for the Chippewas of Red lake and Pembina tribe, $10,000.

For this amount to defray the expense of bringing on the delegation of Chippewas of Red lake and Pembina tribe, and to defray their expenses while detained in this city in making treaty, and their return to their home, $17,500.

For this amount to defray the expense of a board of visitors, to consist of not more than three persons, to attend upon the annuity payments of the Mississippi and the Pottawamie and Lake Winnebagoish bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, whose salary shall not exceed five dollars per day, and not to be employed more than twenty days to attend upon any one payment and the duties connected therewith, and ten cents per mile for travel, not exceeding three hundred miles, per Senate amendment to seventh article treaty of March 11, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, $390.

Same for fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $390.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Are all those appropriations to carry out the treaty?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is one item in that amendment which is not in the treaty, and about which I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WILKINSON,] whom I do not now see in his seat. I had supposed that each of the provisions of the amendment was to cover something contained in the treaty. I will ask, therefore, that the matter stand open for the time being, by unanimous consent, until I can see the Senator from Minnesota about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that if it should be adopted now, it will come up again in the Senate, and then it can be amended, if necessary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well. Let it be passed now, and I can move to amend it, if necessary, when the bill shall be reported to the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 49, lines eleven hundred and ninety-eight and eleven hundred and ninety-nine, I move to strike out the words "superintending agents," and to insert "superintendent and agents;" so that the clause will read:

For the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in California, including traveling expenses of the superintendent and agents, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 50, line twelve hundred and two, I move to strike out the words "for the northern district of," and to insert the word "in;" and in the same line to strike out "35" and insert "55;" so that the clause will read:

For the purchase of cattle for beef and milk, together with clothing and food, teams and farming tools, for Indians in California, $55,000.

The bill as it stands appropriates for the northern and southern district of California, whereas there is but one district in conformity with existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move to strike out from line twelve hundred and four to line twelve hundred and seven inclusive, in the following words:

For the purchase of cattle for beef and milk, together with clothing and food, teams and farming tools, for Indians for the southern district of California, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is no provision in the bill as it stands for the expenses of the Indian service in Dakota. On the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the necessity of an appropriation for the Indian service in that Territory, I send the following amendment to the Chair to be inserted after line twelve hundred and fifty-one, on page 51:

For general incidental expenses of the Indian service in the Territory of Dakota, including the purchase of goods and other articles, with a view to the preservation of peace, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is one other amendment in relation to the deficiencies in the Indian service, and that is for the Territory of Utah, and then I believe I am done on that subject. It is to insert after line twelve hundred and fifty-nine, page 52, the following:

For deficiency in the appropriation for the Indian service in Utah Territory for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, $15,000.

For the transportation and necessary expenses of delivery of provisions, &c., to the Indians within the Utah superintendency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $22,500.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have here a letter from the acting Governor and ex officio superintendent of Indian affairs of the Territory of Utah, which I will read:

SUPERINTENDENCY INDIAN AFFAIRS,
GREAT SALT LAKE CITY, February 24, 1864.

Sir: Some time since I wrote to Governor Doty asking him to explain to you the necessity of my having funds for the Indian service, and ask you to place to my credit with the United States Assistant Treasurer in New York city ten thousand dollars, ($10,000.) He telegraphed to me to send you a bond in the penal sum of $10,000 approved, which I herewith inclose, and which I hope will be satisfactory to you.

This has been the most severe winter we have had in this country for many years; very severe on the Indians; and it has been more laborious to attend to them than any season we have been here. They have given signs of disturbances in various parts of the Territory, especially in the west, on the overland mail route. It is of the utmost importance that they should be kept quiet, not only for general peace and the safety of the overland mail line, but in view of the extensive development anticipated for the coming season of the immense mineral wealth of this Territory, which you will readily understand is of the greatest importance in every respect. It has been necessary to feed and clothe the Indians quite extensively. I need this money immediately, and trust you will have it placed to my credit as soon as possible, and inform me by telegraph, addressing me by the title under which you deposit it, that I may know how to draw drafts, as I shall need to draw immediately. I wish it so as to keep it distinct from my funds as acting Governor, and also my funds as secretary of this Territory, in the same depository.

I cannot get along with less than $10,000, and it really ought to be $15,000; otherwise I will probably be obliged to call on you again early in the next quarter.

From the great press of current and necessary business of the three departments that I have to attend to that is crowded upon me constantly, together with an illness for the past three weeks, I have been unable thus far to forward my accounts for the 31st of December. I trust circumstances will excuse this delay. I shall forward them now in a few days.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

AMOS REED,
Acting Governor, and Ex Officio Superintendent Indian Affairs.

Hon. WILLIAM P. DOLE,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Upon this and other statements the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs estimated for and recommended the appropriation of $15,000. They also estimate for the transportation of supplies the amount stated in the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move to insert at the end of the bill the following section, which in effect confiscates the annuities of those Indians who are in hostility to the United States for the benefit of the friendly Indians:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend such part of the amount herein appropriated to carry into effect any treaty stipulation with any tribe or tribes of Indians, all or any portion of whom shall be in a state of actual hostility to the Government of the United States, including the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminoles, Wichitaws, and other affiliated tribes, as may be necessary to support such individual members of said tribes as have been driven from their homes or reduced to want on account of their friendship to the United States, and enable them to subsist until they can support themselves in their own country: Provided, That an account shall be kept of the sums so paid for the benefit of the said members of said tribes, which account shall be rendered to Congress at the commencement of the next session thereof; and all purchases of articles for the purposes above set forth shall be made of the lowest responsible bidder after sufficient public notice by advertisement in appropriate newspapers: Provided, also, That the said Secretary shall not be required to accept any bid which is, in his judgment, unreasonable in its character.

This is substantially the same provision contained in the last two or three Indian appropriation bills, having reference particularly to the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Wichitaws, and those Indians who are in hostility to the United States, allowing the use of their annuities to support the friendly and suffering Indians who are loyal to the United States.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Congress of the United States, in providing for the subsistence of the refugee Indians, inserted a proviso that no portion of the funds should be expended until the Indians had arrived in the Indian country, or in connection with their removal. I want the same provision added to this amendment. I presume the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will not object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can reduce his amendment to writing and send it to the Chair.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following proviso. I have not the verbiage used in the other bill, but it is the sense of it:

Provided further, That no part of said annuities shall be expended outside of the Indian country, or in connection with their removal to that country.

Mr. HARLAN. I think it would not be safe to adopt that amendment. The superintendent for that district is removing the Indians; he is on the way down with them to their own homes; but the condition of the country is unsettled; they might be driven back. A part of those Indians are not being removed, on account of their condition. One whole tribe is down with the small-pox, and they cannot get them off. It would not be right to withhold the application of this money if a contingency of that kind should arise. I would have no objection to it if the country was at peace and there were no impediments to their removal and the Indians were in a condition to be removed. I have a letter on my desk now that I received in the morning mail, stating that a majority of one of those tribes cannot be removed on account of their condition; they are down with the small-pox. I think the Senator from Kansas had better not insist on the adoption of his amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do insist upon my amendment, and it covers the case put by the Senator from Iowa by the words "or in connection with their removal." The medicating them preparatory to their removal can be provided under my amendment. After a full discussion of the proposition such a provision was attached to the appropriation of $153,000 to the refugee Indians. I desire to have the Senate understand how this matter is, so far as the State which I in part represent is concerned. The refugee Indians are in our State. They live upon our people. They are a nuisance among us. If the citizens of Kansas are to feed them I want them to have the claim for feeding. I do not want a set of heartless speculators to draw the Government money and put it in their pockets and compel our people to feed them in addition.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, it seems to me it will be worse for his people if this amendment should be adopted than if it were not. The amendment is to prevent the use of the money outside of the Indian Territory. If rebel guerrillas should drive back the loyal Indians from the Indian Territory into Kansas, which is nearer to them than any other State where they would be likely to live in peace, and you cannot apply this appropriation in aiding their support, of course the people of Kansas would have to provide the entire amount necessary for their support.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. They will have to do that anyhow, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HARLAN. They would be relieved to the amount of this appropriation if the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin should prevail.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Not by any means. The speculators who pretend to feed the refugee Indians would put the money in their own pockets and we should still have to feed them. These Indians are being removed; and they are as safe at Fort Gibson or in any portion of the Indian country as they are in our State. The same army that protects Kansas protects the Indian country. Fort Smith is the strategic point with which we defend Kansas, and that protects the Indian country. I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the terrific misfortune that it is upon our people to have these refugee Indians among us. I believe the Indian department are doing their utmost now to remove the Indians. I want to hold that department where the proviso to the $153,000 appropriation placed them. I appeal to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Wisconsin that it would be better not to appropriate this money at all unless my amendment be adopted; keep it in your vaults or wherever it is and not allow one dollar of it to be expended upon the refugee Indians in Kansas. Our people have to feed the Indians, and the creatures who are preying upon the Government are putting your money in their pockets.

Mr. POMEROY. I can very well conceive of a condition of things in which it would be very necessary to have this appropriation expended in my State. These Indians have been down once into the Indian country, and a portion of them have come back again. The Government are now making an effort to take down all of them that can be removed. A great many of them are sick and not in a condition to be moved. They cannot all be moved this year. Besides it is so late in the season there would be but little use in taking them down, as they could not raise a crop, and if we take them down we shall have to feed them from the commissary stores of the Army or in some other way. If they must be fed it will be vastly cheaper for the Government to feed them in my State. If you take them down to the Indian country, the goods furnished to them will have to be transported from the Missouri river by land to the Indian country, and it will cost just about twice as much to feed them down there as to feed them in my State.

I am as anxious as my colleague is to have them removed; but it is out of the question to remove them all at present. As the Senator from Iowa has very well said, a large portion of one of the tribes is not in a condition to be removed; it is utterly impossible to move them, and the department ought at least to have an appropriation to sustain them while they are in the State. These Indians are on a reservation. I am not informed whether they mingle very much among the settlements of the whites or not. They are on the Sac and Fox reservation, which is somewhat removed from any white settlement. I am not so well informed, perhaps, as I ought to be; but I certainly think this amendment of the committee should not be put in such a way as to prevent the department, in case some portion of these Indians are obliged to remain in the States, from taking care of them there.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The result of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be to retain all of the refugee Indians in Kansas. Where they can be fed by the Government, they will remain among the white people. If the Government consents for them to remain on the Sac and Fox reserve, there they will remain in the very center of our State within ten or twelve miles of the town where I live and surrounded by four or five other towns.

The statement that they cannot raise a crop in the Indian country I cannot indorse.

Mr. POMEROY. It is too late in the season to raise a crop this year.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. We plant corn in Kansas about the middle of July. I planted a crop of corn last year in the bottoms of Kansas after the 15th of July, and raised a fine crop. That is further south than we are. So far as a crop of vegetables is concerned, they can raise a crop of vegetables after the 1st of July with ease.

But here is a nuisance inflicted upon our State; and not only that, it is a political corruption fund in our State; and I propose as far as I can to remove that. I ask to have the provision attached to this proposition that was affixed by Congress to the other appropriation. I hope it will be granted.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there cannot be a doubt of this fact: if the Indians who are now sick in my State and are not removed have to make the journey to the Indian country and then prepare their land after they get there for a crop, this season will certainly be gone. It is now almost the middle of June. They cannot be got down there before the middle of July.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. They are on their way there now.

Mr. POMEROY. I am speaking of that portion who are not in a situation to be moved, and I think Senators will certainly see it is very clear they cannot make a crop this year. In the first place they are not there; it will take them half the season if they were there, and it is hardly worth while to talk about it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of my amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] is now in his seat, and if there is no objection I should like to postpone this bill for a moment to take up the report of the committee of conference on House bill No. 195.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin desires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at the present time the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 195) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1865. The Chair hears no objection, and it is before the Senate. The question is on concurring in the report.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have it explained, so that we may understand what the committee have agreed upon.

Mr. HOWE. The House recede from their disagreement to the seventh amendment of the Senate, and we recede from our ninth amendment. The eighth amendment was the one about which the controversy arose, and we have agreed to a substitute for that section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the substitute?

Mr. HOWE. Perhaps the Secretary had better read the section we agreed upon as a substitute for the fourth section of the bill.

The Secretary read a portion of the report of the conference committee, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, and the Senate agree to the same: strike out all after the enacting clause (being section four) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That all persons of color who were free on the 19th day of April, 1861, and who have been enlisted and mustered into the military service of the United States, shall from the time of their enlistment be entitled to receive the pay, bounty, and clothing allowed to such persons by the laws existing at the time of their enlistment. And the Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized to determine any question of law arising under this provision. And if the Attorney General aforesaid shall determine that any of such enlisted persons are entitled to receive any pay, bounty, or clothing in addition to what they have already received, the Secretary of War shall make all necessary regulations to enable the pay department to make payment in accordance with such determination.

Mr. WILSON. I desire an explanation of this report. The fourth section of the Senate amendments provides that colored persons—not free persons, but colored persons—who have enlisted into the service, if they were promised that they should have full pay, shall receive that pay, and the Secretary of War shall determine the question. It was thought that under that section, two Massachusetts regiments, two or three raised in South Carolina under General Hunter who had authority to raise them at full pay, and one or two regiments raised by General Butler at New Orleans, perhaps in all some ten regiments in the country, would receive the back pay of thirteen dollars a month; that the question would be left to the Secretary of War; and there would be no difficulty about their payment. It also provided that the pay of these other colored regiments, more than one hundred in number, raised by the Government with the distinct understanding that they were to have only this sum of money, that is, ten dollars a month, should not be interfered with; but after the 1st of January of the present year they should have full pay.

If I understand the substitute reported by the committee of conference, it is simply this: all colored soldiers who were free on the 19th day of April, 1861, are to receive the pay that the law allows them; and the Attorney General is to decide what that pay is to be. Why limit it to those who were free in April, 1861? These South Carolina men were not free at that time. The men enlisted in Colonel Higginson's regiment and Colonel Montgomery's regiment, who were enlisted under the authority of General Hunter and General Saxton, and those enlisted by General Butler at New Orleans and mustered into the service were not free men. They were mostly, certainly in South Carolina, slaves. I think in Louisiana many of them were free men; but they were mixed. There is no doubt that those South Carolina regiments ought to have this pay; and I think it is very wrong in the Government to quibble about it. Some of the men in those regiments have absolutely worked for the Government for nearly two years, and have not received pay enough to pay their expenses for clothing. The Massachusetts regiments have never received any pay at all. Several of these regiments have been almost in a state of mutiny. It is with the greatest difficulty that mutinies are kept down in some of those regiments on account of the feeling in regard to their pay. The fifty-fourth Massachusetts regiment has lost more than half of its men in killed and wounded in the war. It seems to me to limit this provision to men free in 1861 leaves out the men who were slaves at that time, and who ought to have equal justice done them. If that is the understanding of the report, certainly I am opposed to it; but it may be that the committee can explain it so that it will be satisfactory.

Mr. POMEROY. I am certain that this report of the committee of conference is very unjust to one or two regiments in my State. It provides that if a man was free on a certain day in April, 1861, he can be paid. There are two regiments of colored men raised in my State who are now in the service. They have no means of proving that they were free at that time. We never heard any questions asked whether they were free or not. This committee of conference now propose to say that if they were free on a certain day they can be paid. It throws the burden of proof on them to show that they were free, when it ought to be the other way. I want the Government, or somebody else, to prove that they were slaves if they can. Under this proposition a colored man may be in the Army, perhaps in front of the enemy, and yet when the paymaster comes along he says to him, "If you can prove that you were free on the 19th of April, 1861, I can pay you." The poor man will reply, "I cannot prove anything about it; here I am in the enemy's country; here I am for the flag; for the cause; I cannot prove anything about that; that is making me prove what I cannot prove." I do not suppose there is a colored man in my State who can prove that he was free on any given day. He concludes that he is free. We conclude that he is free. Nobody has ever been after him. We found him in the State, like the rest of us. We came from various States and got together there, white and colored. We have not asked them where they came from. It may be the presumption that they were all runaways from Missouri or Arkansas, because they are black; but that we do not know. But, sir, they were taken into the service of the United States; were mustered into that service, and have not been paid, I am sorry to say; and under this report of the committee of conference they cannot be paid, because they are unable to prove either that they were free or slaves on any given day.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to hear some reason for this, as it seems to me, most unreasonable and unjust discrimination contained in this report. I have no speech to make further than to say, in addition to what I have now said, that of all the propositions that have been submitted to the Senate on this subject of the payment of colored troops, the one contained in this report seems to my mind the most ridiculous, the most extraordinary, the most inconsistent, and the most difficult to be applied. Pay a man who is carrying your arms and fighting your battles because he was free on a certain day, and not because he fights! Pay a man because he was free by chance or accident, and refuse to pay a man who is made free by the proclamation of the President! Pay a man who was free, who perhaps has made a very poor soldier indeed, and refuse pay to a man who was a very hero when heroes were needed! Of all the forms this proposition has assumed from the beginning, I think it has finally succeeded in this form in assuming the most ridiculous one. I should like to know how it came in such a shape.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I feel rather flattered by the comments of the distinguished Senator from California. I hardly know how to make my acknowledgments of the fine terms in which he has spoken of the humble efforts of the last committee of conference that undertook to reconcile the two belligerent Houses of Congress. I think I may say, however, on behalf of this committee, that if they had undertaken to reflect the views of individual members, certainly if they had undertaken to reflect my views, or if they had confined themselves exclusively to an effort to reflect the views of either House of Congress, they probably would not have produced precisely such a report as they have; but it will be borne in mind by the Senate that there was a collision here between the two Houses, a collision of opinions which it seemed to be a little difficult to get out of. I think this is the third committee which has been convened to consider these difficulties.

Upon this one point the House of Representatives and the Senate, by their respective action, seemed to concede that the law made a difference between the pay of soldiers with color and soldiers without any color to speak of; but the House insisting that with or without color they were worth just about so much proposed to put colored soldiers upon the ground of a quantum meruit, and to provide by law for the payment of colored soldiers at the same rate as white soldiers are paid upon the same very plain ground that they are worth just as much. The Senate, seeming to deny that they were worth as much on the whole, proposed to pay them upon the ground of a special contract, not made with the Government, but made with some officer of the Government with or without authority.

The committee found some difficulty in agreeing to the proposition that negroes were worth as much as soldiers as white men, and then fore they were not willing to agree to the House proposition. Other gentlemen were disinclined to agree to the proposition that they would pay a man more than he is worth simply upon the ground of a contract which was made without any authority, and therefore they were unwilling to agree to the Senate proposition. In the mean time this committee, or at least a majority of them, were of the opinion that the law was at the time these men were enlisted that they should have the same rate of pay as white troops; that the law made no distinction between the payment of white and colored troops; and they were willing to submit that question to the Attorney General of the United States. Those who thought that the negro was not worth as much as a soldier as a white man still had no very good reason for refusing to pay them what the law gave them, and therefore had no very good objection to offer to this proposition. They agreed to it. They agreed to that sort of arbitration.

But there was another difficulty to get along with. There were those who, although they were willing to refer the question whether negroes who were free at the breaking out of the war should receive this amount of pay, were so firmly of the opinion that the men who had been made free in the progress of the war had received a very large compensation for their services as soldiers, that they were not willing to refer the question to the Attorney General as to whether they should have this back pay or not. That was the case with some. That was one of the opinions that we found.

If I may be allowed to speak for myself I will say that I did anticipate, and do now believe, that if the law shall be settled that black men who were free before the 19th of April, 1861, were entitled to thirteen dollars a month, it will be settled that those who were made free afterwards were entitled to the same rate of pay; that the disputed question, if there is any as to the question of law, is as to whether the law made a distinction between the pay of black and white troops, but there can be, I think, no pretense that there is a discrimination made in the law between the pay of those black troops who were free before a certain date and those who were made free afterwards. Whether there ought to be such a discrimination is another question. I do not think there is any such discrimination now made in the law.

There was another difficulty in undertaking to regulate this matter upon the ground of a contract. It raised a question of fact which I understand is going to be a very ugly one to settle, upon which the controversy is, I understand, a little violent, and it was desired to avoid that. I think, however, if the Senate see fit to adopt this report they will save the bill, which is an object of itself, and they will obtain an adjudication from the law officer of the Government upon the question, as to what the legal rate of pay was for these persons. If it should be adverse to the claims of these persons, still the law will be settled, and they will have nothing to say except that the law did not give them the pay which they ought to have had; and they can come in hereafter as claimants, not upon the ground of contract, but upon the ground that the law did not do them justice. If it is settled in their favor, then they will get just what they claim, and you will have the principle settled. You will not have it settled upon the principle of special legislation, but the pay will be given to them upon an adjudication of the laws as they now stand.

Mr. SUMNER. The last chapter of Rasselas is entitled "a conclusion in which nothing is concluded," and I think that title may be properly given to the report of this committee. It surely does not settle any of the questions which have been in discussion here in this Senate relating to the pay of colored troops, and which have been in discussion between the two Houses.

Mr. HOWE. I have just simply one favor to ask of the Senator from Massachusetts, and that is, that he will leave the humor of this debate to my friend here from California. Let him give us the logic.

Mr. SUMNER. That I gladly do.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope you will leave no more of it to me; I have done with it.

Mr. SUMNER. However, the Senator will allow me to observe very plainly that the report does not seem to settle the question in issue. It does settle the question with regard to two Massachusetts regiments, the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Massachusetts regiments, and that is all. As I said before when this report was first called up, if I were here merely to look after the interests of my own constituents, I might rest satisfied; but there are certainly two regiments enlisted in South Carolina, and I have reason to believe, also, four regiments enlisted in Louisiana, with regard to which there has been a question in this Chamber, and also in the other House, whose cases are not touched by this report except unfavorably; that is, those regiments that have been claiming compensation during all this session get none under this report. Now, sir, I am unwilling to sanction any such report. Much as I desire to have the case of the Massachusetts regiments settled, I do not want to see them settled except in company with those other cases. They are all to a certain extent on an equality, and they ought to be settled at once by the same statute, or, if you please, by the same report.

It seems to me, therefore, that we ought to cut this question short by rejecting the report of the committee, and then by a vote to insist upon the Senate amendments, and ask for another committee of conference. The Senate amendments, as it seems to me, are an ultimatum on this question. I do not see how we can substantially depart from them without a gross and crying injustice. I will not use language quite as strong as that of my friend from California, but I must say that I do think this whole subject under the report of our last committee has dwindled down to the little end of nothing.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that this report of the committee of conference, as I understand it, does not settle even the cases of the Massachusetts regiments. We did not propose to settle any cases. We proposed to refer all these cases. We did not propose to pay any portion of the Army, white or black, anything in addition to what the law gives them. We proposed to pay them that. Inasmuch as there is a dispute between different authorities as to what the law does give them, whether one rate of pay or another, we propose to refer that to the law officer of the Government to say what it gives them. If the Senate are willing to make that reference I see no objection to the adoption of this report. If they are not willing to make that reference I think the Senate ought to reject the report.

It will be seen, therefore, that the claims of the Massachusetts regiments are to be settled as other claims are of the same class of troops. But I wish to make this remark: if the report be rejected it will be very easy to have another committee of conference; but I think our experience has demonstrated that if you insist upon a law now putting all colored troops from the time of their enlistment upon the footing and upon the pay of white soldiers, you cannot carry the bill through both Houses with that provision in it. If you insist, on the contrary, upon a provision paying only colored troops who have been promised a special rate of pay to the exclusion of those of equal value who have not been enlisted under a special contract, you cannot carry that through both Houses. I think our experience has demonstrated that; and if I am right in these conclusions it is for the Senate to say whether they will accept the other alternative.

Mr. JOHNSON. The report of the committee of conference really does settle nothing, and it is not intended to settle anything except contingently. The amendment of the Senate applied to all persons of color who may have enlisted in the military service of the United States, and provided that all such persons should be paid the same amount that is paid to the white soldiers. The difficulty which has existed between the Government here, and particularly the Governor of Massachusetts, has been, whether under the laws in force, and the only laws that are now in force, there was any authority to enlist people of color. The Governor of Massachusetts supposed, and that view has been taken by the Senators from that State here, that under the acts of Congress under which enlistments have taken place there was no distinction drawn between persons on account of color, and that all persons, therefore, who were enlisted in the armies of the United States are entitled to be paid alike.

The Senate, in order to guard against the doubt and to remove the difficulty which was the result of a different interpretation of the law in force made by Massachusetts and made by the Government, provided that all persons of color in the military service of the United States shall be paid alike, provided there was as between such persons and the representatives of the United States enlisting them an understanding that they were to be paid alike. So far as that limitation upon the authority to receive is concerned, the committee of conference decide favorably to these people of color, because they provide that in the absence of any understanding between the person enlisting and the officer enlisting him, he is to be paid the same amount under the laws in force whether those laws in force considered by themselves embrace persons of color or not. In that respect it places all persons of color who are free and who are now in the service of the United States upon the same footing, making no difference between those who have gone into the service under any special agreement and those who have come in without any agreement.

But the other limitation, which is not found in the Senate amendment, is for the first time incorporated in the amendment as proposed by the committee of conference; for while they provide that persons of color who have been enlisted shall be entitled to payment under the acts of Congress if the Attorney General shall so decide, they limit the right of persons of color to those who have come into the service who were free at a particular date. The Attorney General is to decide, therefore, two questions, under the proposition of the committee of conference: the first is, which of those persons of color were free at the designated date; and the other is, whether persons of color are embraced at all by the acts of Congress.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that the Attorney General would have jurisdiction over the first of those questions. The proposition submitted by the committee, I think, gives jurisdiction over that to the Secretary of War. The Attorney General is authorized to decide what was the law regulating the pay of this class of soldiers, not to determine who were or who were not free on the 19th day of April. That is to be determined under regulations to be provided by the Secretary of War.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator may be right, that that particular question is not submitted to the decision of the Attorney General. Then to whom is it submitted? Who is to decide it?

Mr. HOWE. I have just stated; it is to be determined under regulations to be provided by the Secretary of War.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand, I was going to say, it is to be decided by the Secretary of War, and under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War. Has the Senator thought for a moment what questions will arise upon which the Secretary of War is to decide conclusively the status of those who may be entitled to be paid under the acts of Congress, if the Attorney General shall decide affirmatively in their favor the question submitted to the Attorney General? Nobody is to be paid except those that were free at the designated date. Who were free at the designated date? Slavery existed in South Carolina, in Maryland, in Tennessee, in Kentucky, in Virginia. The presumption in those States, the legal presumption in those States—whether it was a humane presumption, whether it originated in error or not, is immaterial, it was the legal presumption in point of fact—was that all persons of color were presumed to be slaves.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HOWE. I do not speak for the committee of conference now but for myself when I say that if such be the presumption of law in the State of South Carolina, I submit to the Senate and to the Senator such is not the presumption of American law nor of the statutes of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. With due deference to the honorable member, I should say he is mistaken about that; but it is not necessary to dispute that. About one thing I am sure there can be no difference of opinion between my friend and myself, and that is, that whether the slaves in South Carolina and Maryland, and the other States in which slaves may have been enlisted, were free or not at the designated period, will bring up for the consideration of the Secretary of War, if he is to decide it, the legal efficacy of the proclamations of the President.

Mr. HOWE. They have been issued since the date named.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know, but it relates back; and then it will bring up for consideration this question: does a slave who enlists into the service of the United States become by virtue of that enlistment a free man? I have always held, and have more than once so stated in the Senate, that the United States were under an obligation, as between the slaves and themselves, to treat him as a free man; that they should never permit him to return to bondage after having used him as a soldier; but whether he is free in point of law by the mere fact of enlistment is a legal question which may be decided either way by different persons. And the whole question, therefore, as it seems to me, is as the honorable member said was the purpose of the committee in a great measure left open. It does not settle the Massachusetts question. The honorable member from Massachusetts seemed to think that the decision provided for the Massachusetts regiment. It is not so. He was correctly told by the honorable member from Wisconsin speaking for the committee of conference, or his understanding of the view of the committee of conference, that it decides no such thing. They will be paid or they will not be paid, not because any engagement was entered into between the soldier and the officer of the Government, but as the Attorney General may decide whether the acts of Congress on the subject as they existed at the time of the enlistment, and as they will exist now unless they are changed, embraced soldiers of color. If he decides that they do not, (and that has been the decision of the Government up to the present time,) then they get nothing. When I say it has been the decision of the Government, I say it because of the fact that the Government have refused to pay, and they have refused to pay because the Government must have been of opinion that, whether with or without an understanding, as the law stands existing there is no authority to pay those soldiers as white soldiers are paid.

I do not know how the Senate is to accomplish its purpose, clearly expressed in its amendment, except by adhering to the amendment, and if the body does adhere to the amendment it does not provide for very many other cases in which there was no understanding at all, inasmuch as the amendment includes only cases in which there was an understanding.

I have been of opinion that there ought to be no difference. A soldier of the United States fighting to maintain the very existence of the Government, even more than to vindicate the honor of its flag, ought to be the peer of all other soldiers; and he should be especially considered the peer if at our instance, we being white men, to save ourselves from the dangers of the strife, we should invoke him to come to our aid and stand the hazard of the battle; call upon him to save our blood by running the hazard of pouring out his own blood in defense of our institutions. But that object is not accomplished by the proposition of the committee of conference, not accomplished to any extent, provided the Attorney General shall give the opinion upon which the Government has all along acted in relation to the question; and it is not to be supposed that the President of the United States and the Secretary of War have, in opposition to the advice of the Attorney General, refused to liquidate these demands. The legal presumption, the charitable presumption, is that they were all honestly of opinion that under the statutes as they now stand upon your statute-book unmodified in that particular those soldiers could not be paid. In my view you are just as likely to attain the object which the Senate had in view, even in relation to the class of soldiers of this description embraced by their amendment, by submitting the question of law again to the Secretary of War and the President as by submitting it to the Attorney General. I do not know, Mr. President, what the practice of this Administration is; but having had some experience in other Administrations personally, and a knowledge of the practice which governed all Administrations up to the inauguration of the present Administration, I say that no question of this kind ever was decided without taking the opinion of the Attorney General. It was not always observed; it was not binding; but he is placed there for the very purpose, when called upon by the President or either of the heads of Departments, to advise them upon all legal propositions which may be involved in the duties of their respective offices; and I can hardly believe it possible that Mr. Secretary Stanton, with or without the knowledge of the President, has pronounced a decision which has cut off from these Massachusetts troops the compensation which was specially promised them without taking the opinion of the Attorney General in writing, or at least without consultation with him; and if so, of course if you refer it back as the committee of conference propose to do to the Attorney General to decide, Massachusetts will be where Massachusetts has been, unable to recover the amount which she thinks she ought to receive for the benefit of these her soldiers.

Mr. HOWE. I shall only occupy the floor a moment, and principally to tender my thanks to the Senator from Maryland for the very noble sentiment he just now expressed when he declared that a soldier, though ever so black, wearing the American uniform and fighting for the American flag, and fighting for the life of the American States, is the peer of the soldier of any other color. When he said that he simply gave very eloquent expression to a sentiment which I have always entertained. But I did not propose to incorporate that sentiment into the report of the committee of conference, for two reasons: first, at the time we were deliberating upon this difficulty into which the two Houses are involved, that particular sentiment did not occur to me; and secondly, if it had occurred to me, I should not have had faith to believe that it could be carried through the two Houses of Congress. What is or is not due to these soldiers is a question not only upon which the two Houses are divided, but it is a question upon which there is a great variety of opinion in each of the two Houses; it is a question upon which there is a great variety of opinion among the different officers of the Government; and we had a measure pending, the salvation of which was thought to be very essential and important. Some provision ought to be ingrafted upon it for the solution of this difficulty. To the last committee of conference which had the matter under consideration, this seemed to tend toward a solution of it, not being a solution of it as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr.

SUMNER] rightly observed: it was not intended to be, but it was intended to open up a way which would lead to a right solution of the whole question.

Mr. SUMNER obtained the floor.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me I will move an adjournment.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we may settle this question now. I merely wish to observe that it seems to me this debate to-day shows that we have got to proceed still further before we can reach a conclusion. Everything that has fallen from every Senator, as well from the Senator from Wisconsin as from the Senator from Maryland, all tends to one conclusion—that nothing is settled. Now let us settle something by our vote. I hope, therefore, without taking up any further time, that the Senate will unite in rejecting the report of the committee of conference, determine to adhere to its own amendment, and ask for another conference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the first place the original amendment had no business in the bill. We had passed originally the bill of which the amendment was a copy, and sent it to the House of Representatives and it is there yet. The Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. WILSON,] to make all sure, insisted upon putting it into this bill, the Army appropriation bill; a thing that the Senate ought not to have permitted; but I know perfectly well at the time that it was of no sort of use to object to it under the steam that was got up in reference to paying these soldiers. I knew it must go anywhere, but I apprehended difficulty from it. I repeat that, in my judgment, it ought not to have been put there; it was extraneous legislation with reference to other matters which the Senate had already legislated upon, and its legislation was before the House of Representatives, and which the House could settle.

Now, on this Army appropriation bill, which perhaps in the present existing state of affairs is the most essential bill, the one of all others that we must pass, we have had, because of this extraneous question, outside question, three committees of conference; and the dispute is with reference to paying a very small number of troops. Two of the committees agreed. The first committee did not agree. Two have agreed. The House of Representatives rejected the report of the second committee, and now it is proposed that the Senate shall reject the report of the third. All I have to ask on a question of this sort is when a conclusion is arrived at, is it not very much better that we should adopt the report, and settle the Army bill and have that passed? Shall we be quarreling all the session, and hazard a bill so essential, on this question, which to be sure is an admirable one for eloquence, and upon which we have had a great deal, speech after speech, which has rung through the country and through the newspapers; but out of it I think gentlemen have got all the glory that they can get by any possibility. If they try a month longer and speechify continually on paying the negro soldiers, I do not believe they will be a bit better off in the way of glory than they are to-day. If this report is not satisfactory to gentlemen, the bill of the Senate now before the House of Representatives can be taken up, and they can pass another law to pay these soldiers. Is it worth while for us because we do not have our own way this time, and the House does not have its way that time, when a conclusion for the second time is reached by a committee of conference of both branches who have deliberated long and carefully upon the subject and tried to save the Army bill, is it wise to keep quarreling and dividing upon a question of this kind, which there is abundant time to settle by itself if the House and Senate are disposed to do so? I really do appeal to Senators, and ask them whether it is not better, instead of expending more eloquence upon it, to just adopt the bill as it is and let it go.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Maine tells us that this amendment ought not to have been put in the bill. I think the necessity ought not to have been imposed upon us to put it upon this bill; but it was expected, and justly expected, that Congress, early in the session, would pass a bill to pay the colored troops who had been enlisted with a promise that they should be paid the same as other troops. The Senate passed a bill to that effect, but it remained in the House of Representatives, to the amazement of everybody, for many weeks in the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs. While that bill was lying there, great dissatisfaction grew up in the regiments that had not received the pay which they had been promised; and in one of those regiments we had a mutiny, and the leader of the mutiny was shot. Officers in the field told us that it required every exertion to prevent a mutiny because the men had not been paid what they had been promised. They believed the Government had broken its plighted faith, and, smarting under the wrong, they demanded their full pay or a discharge from the military service.

The amendment of the Senate to carry out this object was put upon the Army appropriation bill, not to make speeches or to gain glory, but to do justice to brave men fighting for the country; and if the House of Representatives had taken the amendment which we put upon the bill, the question would have been settled; and from the 1st day of January of this year all our troops would be put upon the same pay, having the same rights.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is settled by this bill.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that. By that amendment if it were agreed to by both Houses, another point would have been settled, that all colored men enlisted under the call of October 11, 1863, and subsequent calls liable to draft should receive the same pay as other men; and we should have settled one other point, which is the disputed point, that the regiments that were enlisted under the promise to receive thirteen dollars a month should receive that compensation, and the Secretary of War should determine the question. That provision would have covered at most some ten or twelve regiments. Most of the other regiments were filled up by men who enlisted with no expectation of receiving more than ten dollars a month.

But the House of Representatives put on an amendment which provided that all free colored men who enlisted should receive the same pay, and the same bounty as other soldiers. That is to say, colored men who were freed by the proclamation of the President were to receive bounty and full pay, but the men who were enlisted by General Hunter and General Saxton and General Butler under the promise of full pay were not to get anything, because they were slaves. The House amendment really discriminated against the very men that we had been struggling to give their rights to, and gave the increased pay to the men who were enlisted with the expectation of receiving no more than ten dollars a month. We could not agree to that, and we did not agree to it.

Now we have this final proposition, and, as I understand it, it does not settle the case of the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Massachusetts or the first South Carolina or the Louisiana regiments raised by General Butler. It settles nothing, but it refers the whole matter of back pay to the Attorney General of the United States. The Attorney General has given a legal opinion applicable to a colored officer, holding that he is entitled to the same pay that he would receive if he were a white man. The Attorney General has not settled the question that colored soldiers are entitled to full pay, but the logic of his opinion, I think, goes that way, and I do not see how he can avoid coming to that conclusion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then why not trust it to him?

Mr. WILSON. I am inclined to do it in view of the entire debate here and of the difficulty in which we find ourselves, and of the fact that stands patent before the country, that the men in the House of Representatives who are opposed to employing or paying the negro at all have insisted upon paying the highest pay to regiments who were enlisted without the expectation of having more than ten dollars a month. If the question is referred to the Attorney General, I think that according to his previous decision he must logically hold that these men are all entitled to full pay from the beginning. If the Senator from Maine is ready to refer the whole question to the Attorney General, let it go to the Attorney General and let him decide it. But if he shall decide against allowing them this pay, I shall regard the question as an open one, and I shall insist upon it at all times and on all occasions, and press it upon Congress that the Massachusetts fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth, the South Carolina first, and the Louisiana regiments shall be paid thirteen dollars a month.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do not insist upon it on every appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON. I will insist upon it at all times and on all occasions and wherever I can, for I say a great wrong has been done these men. After the correspondence that I had had with the officers, knowing the feeling among the men, when the Senate passed the bill giving them the back pay, I sent word to the men, and my letter was read in the regiments and understood by the men that we had passed in the Senate a bill that would become a law which would give them their full pay of thirteen dollars a month which they had been promised. Now, if I did not believe that the Attorney General would decide promptly that they were entitled to that pay, I should vote against this proposition to the last; but I am willing to trust him, and I hope that his decision will be made immediately; and that if it shall be against these troops, we can before the adjournment of Congress pass a special act doing justice to the men who were enlisted under the pledge that they should have full pay. I shall therefore run the risk of it for the reason that the bill as it now stands settles the question of equality from the 1st of January last, and in the next place it settles the question of bounty to colored men who are liable to be drafted in the loyal States, and it puts their matter in the control of the Attorney General, whose opinion, I think, cannot be anything else than that these men have the right which they claim.

Mr. HENDERSON. In July, 1862, Congress passed an act enabling the President to receive into the service negroes. Previous to that time, I believe they were not received into the service at all; but Congress passed an act on the 17th of July, 1862, the twelfth section of which reads as follows:

"That the President be and he is authorized to receive into the service of the United States, for the purpose of constructing intrenchments, or performing camp service, or any other labor, or any military or naval service for which they may be found competent, persons of African descent; and such persons shall be enrolled and organized under such regulations, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws, as the President may prescribe."

Under that provision I understand that the President did receive into the service not only free negroes but slaves. When the Army appropriation bill was before the Senate, in order that we might get a proper understanding of it, the Senate adopted a provision of this character, that all persons of color, not all free persons of color, because that would not include the regiments which Massachusetts had enlisted in the southern States, but "that all persons of color who have been enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States, shall be entitled to receive the pay and clothing allowed by law to other volunteers in the service, from the date of their muster into service; provided, that the same shall have been pledged or promised to them by any officer or person, who, in making such pledge or promise, acted by authority of the War Department; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to determine any question of fact arising under this provision."

Why was that provision put upon this bill? As the Senator from Maine very properly remarked, the provision ought never to have been put upon the bill. What was the object of it? It was simply to pay some two or three regiments of troops that had been enlisted into the service at the instance of Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, and which I understand were received as Massachusetts troops. It did not include the slaves from my State that went into Kansas and enlisted. Those slaves went there in 1861. The Senator from Kansas spoke of them a little while ago. They went from Missouri and enlisted into the service, and have been in the service from that day to this. Under that provision they could not be paid. They were as much entitled to payment as the negroes enlisted by the Massachusetts Governor. They were runaway slaves from our State, enlisted in Kansas; but notwithstanding they had run away they were just as much entitled to pay as those slaves that were enlisted at Port Royal. No discrimination ought to have been made, but the discrimination was made. Who had the authority to make any such pledge or promise as this? The President had no authority to receive these troops except under the law. What was it? When you turn to the law of 1862 you will find this provision:

"All persons who have been or shall be hereafter enrolled in the service of the United States under this act shall receive the pay and rations now allowed by law to soldiers according to their respective grades: Provided, That persons of African descent who under this law shall be employed shall receive ten dollars per month and one ration, three dollars of which monthly pay may be in clothing."

The President had no authority to receive them except under that law, and I care not who may have made the pledge at Port Royal or elsewhere that they were to receive thirteen dollars a month, I say no officer had authority to do it. But we permitted this amendment to go through on the bill; we permitted it to be adopted here merely because it was desired by the Massachusetts Senators, and I myself made no opposition to it, although I regarded it as unjust at the time.

But, sir, when we sent this bill to the House of Representatives providing for the pay of the Massachusetts regiments, what did the House do? There were some gentlemen from Pennsylvania and other States that said, "The provision as it comes to us from the Senate only allows payment to the Massachusetts soldiers, and we object to that; we intend now that the free negroes who were enlisted in the States of Pennsylvania and New York and other northern States shall be paid also according to the provision adopted in the Senate."

Mr. WADE. I ask the gentleman if he will not give way to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate. I merely wish to state the case as I understand it, and I will get through in five minutes. The House of Representatives adopted this provision:

"That all free persons of color who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States, shall from the date of their enlistment receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipment, camp equipage, rations, &c., and bounty, as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the United States of like arm of the service."

When the provision was thus amended the free negroes of the northern States, those enlisted in Iowa, those enlisted in Kansas, were put upon the same footing exactly with the negroes enlisted by the Governor of Massachusetts. That was altogether proper; but what effect does it have? When this provision is adopted, it excludes, of course, all the slaves that were enlisted, and leaves the slaves to the pay of the law of 1862, which was ten dollars a month.

The committee of conference have adopted a different provision from either. They say that "all persons of color who were free on the 19th of April, 1861, and who have been enlisted and mustered into the military service of the United States, shall from the time of their enlistment be entitled to receive the pay, bounty, and clothing allowed to such persons by the laws existing at the time of their enlistment; and the Attorney General is authorized to determine any question arising under this provision; and if the Attorney General shall determine that any of such enlisted persons are entitled to receive any pay, bounty, or clothing in addition to what they have already received, the Secretary of War shall make all necessary regulations to enable the pay department to make payment in accordance with such determination."

This is dodging both the provision of the House and the Senate, and leaving the whole matter to the Attorney General. If the Attorney General decides that any of the persons of color who were free on the 19th of April, 1861, shall be entitled to the same pay allowed to white persons who are enlisted, the Secretary of War must make arrangement to pay them; otherwise they will not be entitled to pay, except the ten dollars a month which we understood at the time they would be entitled to under the law.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I desire to pay each and every negro in the Army, whether he was a slave or a free negro, the very same amount. We had a law, and these negroes were enlisted under the law. We had a law paying them ten dollars a month. It was distinctly understood that if a negro was enlisted he was to receive ten dollars a month. Now the proposition is brought up here to allow them more than that. Why shall we do it? I do not desire that we shall allow any more. I am willing in the future to allow them the same pay as white soldiers; but for the past I am unwilling to do it, and I go back to the original principle and oppose all propositions whatever that will pay them one dollar more than they were entitled to at the time. Is the condition of our Treasury such that we can afford to go back and pay more money to the white soldiers? We have recently raised their pay to sixteen dollars a month. Are we able to go back and pay them sixteen dollars a month ever since they entered the service? It is equally just to do so, and we ought to do so if we pass a measure of this character. If we go back and pay to these negroes, whether slave or free, an amount of money that we did not contemplate at the time, it will be an immense drain upon the Treasury.

Now, let me say in reference to the slaves in my State, they do not expect any such pay, they do not ask it, and they understood perfectly what their pay was to be at the time they went into the service; and I apprehend that those negroes who were enlisted for Massachusetts understood perfectly well at the time what they were to receive. I am unwilling to say that because A, B, or C, who enlisted slaves, made a false promise, one not justified by the laws of the land, we shall go back and allow them a pay not justified by the law. It is perfectly unjust to ourselves, it is unjust to the Treasury in our present condition to do it.

I have as much sympathy for the negro soldiers as have many other Senators, and I say now as a matter of justice that if the free negroes of this country are to be paid thirteen dollars a month, the slaves of my State ought to be paid the thirteen dollars a month. But what is this proposition? It does not come up to that; it does not cover their case, as has been justly remarked by the Senator from Kansas. I therefore come back to the justice of the thing, which is to pay the negroes, slave or free when they entered the service, the amount allowed by the law as it then stood; and as to the future I am willing to join Senators in saying their pay shall be the same as that of white soldiers. We have already made that provision for the future; but I am unwilling to go behind this date and pay them more than they agreed to receive at the time they enlisted. I do not think it is just.

Mr. WILSON. The interpretation put by the chairman of the Finance Committee on this report is such that I am willing to take it; but if the doctrine maintained by the Senator from Maryland and by my colleague as to what is referred to the Attorney General be correct, of course I cannot take it, and I understood the explanation of the Senator from Wisconsin to concur with them. If the case of all the troops, slave and free, those from South Carolina and Louisiana as well as those from Massachusetts, was to be referred to the Attorney General, I was willing to accept that arrangement, because then if the Attorney General should decide improperly we could correct the error by legislation at this session. But it is said by my colleague and by the Senator from Maryland that that is not the proper interpretation: lawyers disagree in regard to it. I am therefore in some doubt as to what I should do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All I have to say is that if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is willing to lose the Army appropriation bill on a matter of this sort, because he cannot have it exactly his own way, be it so; he must take his own course about it.

Mr. COWAN. I think the report of the committee of conference will settle the question quite as effectually as if we were to debate it till the 4th of July.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 10, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved. The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

KNOX vs. BLAIR.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I move to take up the case of Knox vs. Blair.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That Francis P. Blair, jr., is not entitled to a seat in this House as Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the first congressional district in Missouri.

Resolved, That Samuel Knox is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the first congressional district in Missouri.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, neither the sitting member nor the contestant is present in the House this morning. I consider that from some quarter the views of the minority should be presented, and if necessary I desire to do so; but I am not prepared to-day. Nor do I think that the case is in a condition in which it should be debated. Mr. Blair, the sitting member, is now with the army under General Sherman, and is utterly unable to attend. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this case be postponed for four or five days.

Mr. GANSON. I also join in the request made by the gentleman from Wisconsin that there be a postponement of this case. As already stated, neither the sitting member nor the contestant is present. The sitting member left town a day or two before any report was made or any decision reached by the Committee of Elections. I understand that the majority report was signed by five members and the minority report by four members of the Committee of Elections—as I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky concurs in the opinion of the minority. A gentleman relied on to present the views of the minority left yesterday for his home. He had prepared himself fully to give the views of the minority. Under the circumstances I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts will agree to the postponement of this case.

I do not think that any public interest will suffer by a postponement. Mr. Knox, I understand, is not in a condition to take his seat now, and will not be for four or five days. I believe that the postponement would be gratifying to members on the other side of the House as well as on this.

Mr. DAWES. Can the gentleman fix any day when the sitting member is likely to be here?

Mr. GANSON. I do not ask it on account of the contestant. The gentleman from Massachusetts who made this report will present his case.

Mr. DAWES. I inferred from the remark of my friend from New York that he had some day in his mind when the sitting member would be present to submit his case. But the fact that the sitting member is absent does not amount to anything.

I would also inquire whether my friend can indicate any day when the contestant will be present if we agree to postpone the case.

Mr. GANSON. I only desire that the views of the minority may be presented properly and fairly to the House.

Mr. DAWES. I will go as far as possible to aid my friend in doing that. I only wanted to know whether he could fix a day when the sitting member or the contestant could be present, and to which this case might be postponed. As he cannot do so, then he must speak for the gentleman who left yesterday, in view of the order of the House setting apart this day for this case. Can he state when that gentleman will be present?

Mr. GANSON. I will inform the gentleman that it is out of regard to those who are left here.

Mr. DAWES. Then leaving out of consideration all the remarks of both of my friends that pertain to anything except themselves, they will allow me to say that some two weeks ago, while the gentlemen were here, I indicated a day when this case would be called up, and, knowing they are industrious men, I supposed they would prepare themselves at once. When the case came up on that day I postponed it another week, and gave notice of the particular day when I would call it up. When the case came up on that day my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. GANSON] interposed a minority report, which I supposed must have been the result of deliberation. I do not know how that may be, but I supposed it was the result of preparation. Then the House postponed the case until to-day.

Now, so far as I am concerned I have not the slightest objection to its being postponed until next week or any other time. The only difficulty which occurs to me about its being postponed until next week is this, that every day next week has been appropriated, by the unanimous consent of the House, to other business, and even a question of privilege could not come in. That is an obstacle which, so far as the House is concerned, is in the way. That does not trouble me, and if the House thinks the public business requires that this case should be postponed I will not object. So far as I am concerned, I would be most happy to accommodate the gentleman, but I regret to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] say in the House, after having put in a minority report of sixteen pages, which is very elaborate, and, as I hope to be able to show to the House, learned besides, that he is not prepared to go on now.

Mr. GANSON. I am surprised that my friend from Massachusetts should not know that that would exhaust anybody. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. While I did suppose it would exhaust my friend, I supposed that in the course of a week he would be able to fill up again. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I merely desire to say that I hope neither the gentleman from Massachusetts nor the House will consent to have this matter postponed any longer. If there should be any further delay in the matter I should deem it my duty, as a member of this House, as a question of privilege, to ask that the name of the so-called sitting member shall be stricken from the roll, as upon the evidence he must be utterly incapable of occupying a seat here. I hope, therefore, the matter will be taken up at this time and disposed of, and that we shall not have our ears shocked by hearing every day the name of a major general in the field called to answer yea or nay on questions before this House.

Mr. DAWES. I am in the habit of trying men before hanging them. If my friend is in the habit of hanging them first, it is a new rule to me and I do not propose to adopt it. I propose to proceed with this case and give this man a hearing, whatever may be my convictions upon the subject, and they are very clear and decided. I do not propose to postpone this case myself, for I do not feel that it is such a courtesy as my colleagues upon the committee can properly call upon me for.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this day belongs to the consideration of private bills. It is objection day, too, and we have had scarcely a Friday during the last six weeks which has not been taken up by a special order or a privileged question. I ask him, at any rate, to postpone it for a short time.

Mr. DAWES. Those are considerations for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to submit to the House upon the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to postpone, which I understand is now pending. I would be very happy to accommodate the gentlemen from New York and Wisconsin, but really as this matter has been postponed from time to time with my acquiescence, I do not feel at liberty to consent to a further postponement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in regard to a question of fact, that the whole of next week, with the exception of Friday, has been assigned, by unanimous consent, to various matters of business, which a question of privilege will not override.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. One word further. I am very sorry that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] should be so much troubled by the name of a major general being called here. The sitting member is not here, and the report of the committee involves the question of his original election; and it involves, likewise, the right of this House to do what it is asked to do in this case, to seat a man who has not received a sufficient number of votes. I do not propose to criticise the claim of the sitting member, who is actually in the field, and who, I believe, does not desire to hold the seat; but his name is upon the roll, and I think it due to the House that the matter should be fully investigated. I trust, therefore, that the House, in justice to itself, will postpone this question until Friday next.

Mr. UPSON. This case has already been postponed several times, once by consent of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, and another time by a vote of the House. It seems to me that it is not asking too much of the House at this stage of the session that the matter should be disposed of. A postponement now would be equivalent to a decision not to determine this question until the next session of Congress.

Mr. GANSON. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the sitting member in this case is now in the field with General Sherman, and that the contest is not as to whether his right to the seat has been invalidated by virtue of his military commission. An effort was made to dispose of the case on that ground, and the gentleman from Michigan opposed it. I desire to say further that the contestant is not here, and is not in a condition to take his seat probably during this session. Under these circumstances I do not think it is asking too much that the case be postponed. It will not take up more time hereafter when it comes up than it will now, and no injustice will be done either to the sitting member or the contestant.

Mr. DAWES. I demand the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. GANSON demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 72, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Baily, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clifford, Cole, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Fluck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kaldelsch, King, Knapp, Lazaar, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, James R. Morris, Morrison, Odell, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Thomas, Tracy, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Winfield—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Cobb, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McDuffie, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Ellihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—72.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Brooks, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Creswell, Deming, Dumont, Eckley, English, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Hubard, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Law, McAllister, McBride, Middleton, William H. Miller, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perry, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, Strouse, Sweet, Thayer, Voorhees, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—53.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

Mr. COX stated, during the roll-call, that Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, was paired with Mr. VOORHEES.

Mr. GANSON. I desire to state to the House that one of my colleagues upon the Committee of Elections, who desires to be heard upon this case, is necessarily absent from the House. I therefore move that the case be postponed until a week from Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for that purpose?

Mr. DAWES. I must decline to do so.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will my colleague yield to me to call up the privileged question of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bankruptcy bill was rejected yesterday?

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection, if it will cause no delay.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will move the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I will yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, if the contested-election case be waived for the present, the motion to reconsider cannot be called up and decided if there be any private bills called up. These would take precedence of all other business, excepting a question of privilege affecting the right of a member to his seat.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If there be no objection?

The SPEAKER. It can be done, of course, by unanimous consent.

Mr. BOUTWELL. My colleague [Mr. Dawes] yields, that I may ask unanimous consent to call up the question of reconsideration of the vote by which the bankrupt bill was rejected.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not propose any debate of the question, but simply to offer a motion to postpone.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see why the motion to reconsider cannot as well be made at any other time as it can be to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that to-morrow the gentleman can call up the motion to reconsider as a matter of right.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that the objection to calling up the motion to reconsider is withdrawn. With the understanding that it is not to cause debate, I will yield for the purpose of having the vote taken.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I object.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] that it is merely for the purpose of moving to postpone the bankruptcy bill till next session.

The objection was not withdrawn.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the reading of the resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Francis P. Blair, jr., is not entitled to a seat in this House as Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the first congressional district in Missouri.

Resolved, That Samuel Knox is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the first congressional district in Missouri.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, it will be seen by the House at a glance that the question heretofore raised, and alluded to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] a moment ago—namely, the effect, on the right of the sitting member to his seat, of holding a commission as major general in the Army—is not involved in this case. Whatever conclusion the House may come to as to the effect of his holding the commission of major general, still the petition of Samuel Knox and the evidence on which this claim rests depends upon the question whether at the election in St. Louis Samuel Knox or Francis P. Blair, jr., received a majority of the votes cast. Therefore the investigation, both in the committee and in the House, would necessarily proceed in the same manner as if the question of the major generalship had never been raised. Samuel Knox, of course, could not have received a majority of votes if a majority had been cast for Francis P. Blair; and no question that can arise on the consideration of this case will be waived or disposed of by any conclusion that the House may come to on the question of the major generalship. It may not be improper for me to state that the Committee of Elections has had that matter referred to it, and in due time I doubt not it will present a report on that question which, I trust, will be satisfactory to the House.

The question now before the House is, which of these two gentlemen received a majority of the votes cast at the election held, according to law, in the State of Missouri on the 4th of November, 1862. The first district of Missouri is composed of seven wards of the city of St. Louis and three small townships called St. Louis township, St. Ferdinand township, and Central township. At that election there were three candidates. The votes as between the two highest, Blair and Knox, were returned and canvassed by the proper authorities, giving to Mr. Blair 4,741 votes and to Mr. Knox 4,588 votes—the official canvass giving Mr. Blair a majority over Mr. Knox of 153 votes. Mr. Knox, within the time prescribed by the statute, served a notice on Mr. Blair of his intention to contest Mr. Blair's right to the seat. The notice contained very many specifications, and, in due time, it was answered by as many and as curious ones on the part of the sitting member.

The specifications of the contestant and sitting member are contained in Miscellaneous Document No. 16. They are very numerous, very much involved, very complicated, and it is hardly worth while for me to consume the time of the House in reading them. I assume in the discussion of this case that the members of the House have read the report, and not only this Miscellaneous Document No. 16, but the views of the majority and minority submitted to the House on this question. Therefore, assuming that to be the fact, it is hardly necessary to go further, certainly at the present time, than to state the conclusions to which the committee came, and the principles on which those conclusions were founded.

The committee submitted their report to the House on the 5th day of May. On the 2d day of June following, the minority of the committee submitted their views. I do not know whether it is the intention of the minority to offer any remarks to the House in support of their report or not. If it be their desire I am ready to yield to them at any time in order that they may be made. Otherwise, at the conclusion of the statement I shall make I shall perhaps call the previous question. I would inquire of the gentlemen who represent the minority if it is their desire to submit any views upon this question.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I have already informed the chairman of the Committee of Elections that I was not prepared to discuss the questions involved in the case to-day; that other members of the committee had intended to do it, or at least one member of the committee whom I supposed desired to discuss the report was absent, and I asked him, for the purpose of giving me the opportunity of making a reexamination of the testimony, to postpone this case for one week. It has pleased the members on the other side of the House in the high appreciation they have of what is due to a soldier in the field to refuse the request, and to insist on going on in this case without any preparation made to present our reasons for not concurring in the majority report.

I do not now intend to occupy any time in the discussion of this matter. I shall, however, listen to the remarks of the honorable member from Massachusetts, and it is possible may say a few words in reply. At any rate, it will be but a few moments that I shall occupy of the time of the House on this question, if any at all.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he did on the 8th instant approve and sign bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 293) to provide for the payment of the second regiment, third brigade, Ohio volunteer militia, during the time they were mustered into the service of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 426) to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 455) to punish and prevent the counterfeiting of coin of the United States.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. DAWES. The majority of 153 reported by the canvassers in favor of Mr. Blair is made up among other votes of those cast for Mr. Blair in what is called the Abbey precinct within the city of St. Louis, at which precinct there were cast for Blair 424 votes; for Knox 41 votes; for Bogy 11 votes. The qualifications for voters by the constitution of Missouri require citizenship of the United States, and a residence in the State of one year, and in the precinct where the vote is cast for three months. There is a special provision of law, however, permitting a man to vote out of his own precinct within the district, provided he then and there make oath that he has not and will not vote in any other precinct at that election.

The Abbey precinct is a small one out of the thickly peopled part of the city proper, but within the charter limits. It contains very few inhabitants, and they well known to each other. It is a portion of the city which indicates from year to year no particular change. The inhabitants there are for the most part permanent residents, and are well known to everybody there, and can easily be recognized at all times. It has cast heretofore a very small vote. At the congressional election in 1858 93 votes were cast. At the next election only 138 votes were cast, and at the one subsequent to the election under consideration, 141. At this election, I have already stated, there was the astonishing result of 424 votes cast at this poll for Mr. Blair, 41 for Mr. Knox, and 11 for Mr. Bogy, making an aggregate vote of 496 votes cast at that precinct, although at the very next election it fell down to 140, and at the immediately preceding election it stood at 138. There were about four times the number of votes cast at this poll that were ever cast before in that precinct; more than four times what were cast at the election for Congress in 1858, only a little less than four times the number cast in 1860 and 1863.

It is very obvious, Mr. Speaker, if there were four times the number of legal votes cast in this precinct it must be a large precinct, or so situated for some reason or other that this importation of inhabitants into this district for the space of three or four months must be a matter which could not have failed to arrest the notice of the residents, could not have failed to have been recognized, and there would be no difficulty in showing it, and showing the cause for it. Such is the peculiarity of voting in the city of St. Louis that every man who approaches the polls has his name recorded and a number affixed to it, and also put upon the back of the ballot, so that every man who votes at any election has his name recorded, and there is no difficulty in telling particularly from year to year who votes at any precinct, and for whom he voted. In comparing this poll list of 496 with the poll list of 93, cast at the preceding election of 1858, there are only found 19 who had voted at the preceding election for Congress in 1858, 13 of those who had voted at the congressional election of 1860, and 36 of those who had voted at the election a year afterwards. So of these 496 voters, they were all strangers to the polls except from 19 to 36.

We have also the testimony of the residents there. The oldest inhabitants appear and testify that, although they went frequently to the polls on this occasion, they found very few voters there that they had ever seen before. One of these witnesses lives near the polls, and he has testified that he could see but two faces there that he had ever seen before, besides the judges. They were mostly persons in the uniform of soldiers, and that those who were not soldiers were strangers to the inhabitants. There were situated about a mile and a half from these polls the Benton barracks, and at that place there were quartered at that time from fourteen to fifteen hundred paroled prisoners, United States soldiers who were prisoners on parole, coming from Iowa, Illinois, and the State of Missouri, outside of the city of St. Louis. It is shown that there were fourteen to fifteen hundred paroled prisoners there from the various States outside of Missouri. Belonging to other States, they of course had no right to vote in the State of Missouri. They had no sort of right to cast their votes at these polls. There were also employed some two or three hundred teamsters and others at a corral near that place. An officer of a regiment from the seventh congressional district examined the names which appeared upon this poll-list and found that there were fifty-six members of his own company, which was stationed at the Benton barracks, who had voted almost in a body at this election. There were other United States soldiers at Jefferson barracks on the opposite side of the city, and about fifteen miles distant from this point. Some of these, together with the soldiers at the Benton barracks, voted at these polls. They were shown by the testimony to have started with the avowed purpose of casting their votes for the sitting member, saying, as they started, that they "voted for Blow down here and for Blair up there." Thirty of their names are found recorded among the four hundred and ninety-six to which I have referred.

It is also shown that one of the judges of the election, getting tired of the discharge of his duties, and being more interested in the voting than in receiving votes, changed places with a bystander and went into the crowd to electioneer for the sitting member. The judge changed places with a bystander against the provisions of the law, leaving him, an unqualified judge appointed without authority of law, to officiate, and thereby vitiating the whole proceeding. The question is submitted to the House whether under the circumstances and with this evidence, and with nothing by the sitting member to control it, whether this is not one of those cases of which the precedents are very numerous, and particularly in this very district, in former contests, where the polls should be rejected entirely. The committee were of opinion that this was one of those cases in which fraudulent voting was carried to such an extent that it implicated the officers of the election, and which led the committee to believe that it could not have been done against their will, if the polls had been properly guarded by them. Such was the extent to which the fraud was carried that it was impossible to ascertain truly how many legal votes were cast at these polls either for the sitting member or the contestant. I quoted a precedent, and I believe no one questioned the precedent, and least of all the sitting member; for upon his claim four years ago to have votes rejected under similar circumstances, the votes of four precincts in that district were rejected.

The only question is whether the evidence is sufficient to bring this case within the known rule of law. Here the names of all these men were appended to the notice of contest, so that the sitting member had notice of every one of those who were alleged to be illegal voters. If they were voters in the precinct it was the easiest thing in the world for him to have shown it. It is a small precinct in which everybody who resides in it is known and in which every resident could be pointed out, with the list before him. If they came from other parts of the city, and had the right to come there and vote if they took the oath that they had voted nowhere else, it would have been an easy thing, with the list before him, to point out where they did reside. He has done no such thing; he has attempted no such thing; but has contented himself with saying that they might have proceeded from the Government corrals and from Government employes at the Benton barracks, from those who, though employed there, were still voters. And it is true they might have proceeded from those sources, but the difficulty about it is that seventy or eighty of them are traced to other quarters, and the difficulty about the rest is that nobody has showed that they did come from that quarter. The committee were able to trace eighty of them to soldiers not entitled to vote.

It is claimed now by the sitting member that it is incumbent upon the contestant to show affirmatively that the others were fraudulent voters, and that he was not called upon to show that they were legal voters. And it is true as a proposition of law. But when he has shown that there does not exist in the precinct any such names as those; that there never was cast at any time before a quarter part of the number of votes; and when he shows by the old residents of the district that they are all strangers to them, and when he shows further that a quarter part of those fraudulent votes are actually traced to men who reside in other States or districts; and when he shows still further the informality and illegality of a judge of election leaving his place and his duties and giving it up to an irresponsible and unqualified person; and when he shows still further that it was openly avowed at the polls that the voting was to be all one way, and that men were not permitted to vote who would not vote for the sitting member, the contestant has, in the opinion of the committee, shown sufficient to call upon the sitting member to do that which it was so easy for him to do, namely, to show that these are legal voters in that precinct and district, their names having been before him for sixty days. The committee were therefore of opinion that the votes returned from that precinct should be rejected.

The remainder of the case mostly depends upon the votes of soldiers. With reference to the vote of soldiers, it is claimed by the sitting member and by the contestant that there were many fraudulent votes cast on the one side and the other, and that many votes of persons not residents and not soldiers at all were cast in camp according to the provisions of law which entitles soldiers only to vote in that manner outside of the district; that many of the soldiers who did vote were minors, and were not entitled to vote at all; and that many others had their own residence in other districts of that State and in other States. It is hardly possible for me to go through with the investigation; but I desire to state to the House the principle upon which the committee came to the conclusions which are stated in their report. To support the allegation of the contestant, that men who were not soldiers voted at camp under the law authorizing soldiers to vote, and that minors voted at camps, and also men who were not residents of the first congressional district of Missouri, the contestant introduced papers purporting to be the muster-rolls of several regiments.

It was objected by the sitting member that those papers were not properly authenticated, and upon that question the evidence is that they are copies found in the adjutant general's office in Missouri, sworn to by the persons who took the copies. The law regulating contested elections permits the introduction of sworn copies. It is claimed by the sitting member that inasmuch as the law of Congress does not require copies of the muster-rolls to be kept in that office at all; these papers in the adjutant general's office are only copies, and therefore that the papers produced here are copies of copies, and therefore are not legal testimony. But these were regiments of Missouri militia, organized at first under the laws of Missouri, and after such organization mustered in the United States service. The muster-rolls of those regiments were the muster-rolls of the militia of Missouri, organized under the law of Missouri, which requires the muster-rolls to be deposited in the office of the adjutant general of Missouri; but they were afterwards mustered into the service of the United States, and consequently a copy of the papers, or you may call it an original of the papers, was deposited in the office of the adjutant general. The committee were of opinion that the one was original as well as the other, and that therefore a copy of the one was as good as a copy of the other; and the question then comes up, what does the muster-roll prove? Upon that point it was contended by the contestant that the muster-roll contained evidence of the residence of the man when he enlisted, because the muster-roll gives the names of the men and the places where they were mustered in. It is claimed by the contestant that wherever the muster-roll shows that a man is mustered in, whether at Sedalia or at St. Joseph, that is evidence that he was not a resident of this district in St. Louis when he was mustered into the service. But the committee were of the opinion that the muster-roll is no evidence of the residence of the soldier, because it purports only to set forth the point where a man was mustered in; and it is a known fact that men go from all parts of a State to a certain point to be mustered in. In Massachusetts they go to Boston, in Missouri to St. Louis, and in Pennsylvania to Philadelphia. The law in relation to the mustering in of men does not require that the residence of the man enlisted shall be ascertained; and therefore a muster-roll does not purport to be evidence of the citizenship or residence of the soldier; and, so far as the contestant introduced muster-rolls as evidence of the residence of any voters, they were rejected. The muster-roll shows the age of the man enlisted, and the law requires his age to be ascertained. It is therefore prima facie evidence of the age of the soldier, subject, of course, to be rebutted by any other evidence.

The contestant introduced muster-rolls for another purpose, and that was to show that men who voted as members of particular regiments were not upon the muster-rolls of those regiments; and it was claimed by him that because their names did not appear upon the muster-rolls presented by him, they were not members of that regiment on the day of the election.

The committee was of opinion that whether a muster-roll was evidence of the fact of the man's being a member of that regiment on the day of election would depend upon the time when the muster-roll was made out. A muster-roll made out at any particular time purports and is certified to contain the actual condition of the regiment at that time. But it does not contain any sure evidence of who might have belonged to that regiment a year before, or who might belong to it a year afterwards. Men are continually being discharged, and others are being continually added to it by recruits. Therefore the actual condition of the muster of a regiment is constantly undergoing changes. What it is to-day is very unlike what it was a month ago, or what it will be a month hence. On that point the committee laid down this rule: that all the muster-rolls offered by the contestant, except such as were made out at or about the time of the election, should be rejected, so far as they were offered as evidence of the names of those who actually belonged to the regiment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I ask the chairman of the committee whether these muster-rolls were produced before the commissioner within the time allowed to take testimony, or whether they were produced subsequently and in violation of the act of Congress.

Mr. DAWES. My friend is quite as familiar with the fact as I, having sat patiently and listened to all the evidence and the arguments. My recollection is that the muster-rolls were produced as part of the testimony of Thomas Slade. I am not certain about that, but if I am not right in it my friend can correct me.

Will the gentleman tell me at what time Thomas Slade's depositions were taken? That will determine it. While my friend is looking at this point I will assume that the testimony of Thomas Slade was taken within the time allowed by law. On this principle both the sitting member and the contestant proceeded to purge the polls, one and the other casting out all who were not entitled to be counted by this rule.

Mr. GANSON. I call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the affidavit of Slade. It was taken on the 24th of December, 1863.

Mr. DAWES. I did not inquire when the affidavit of Slade was taken, but when the depositions were taken. If the gentleman has his depositions there I would be obliged to him to give the date of them. He will find that the deposition was taken February 21, 1863, and that the affidavit was rejected by the committee.

By that rule, Mr. Speaker, the parties to this contest proceeded to examine the returns and to sift them of what both allege to be illegal votes.

There was another element which entered into this case. It was this. The canvassers rejected a large number of returns from different regiments for different reasons. There was only one reason that was claimed to have been an improper one; it was this: a portion of the returns were rejected because they did not contain an abstract of the votes. The law requires the returning officer to return an abstract of the votes. In some instances the officers returned in full the actual number of votes cast for each party, and it was considered by the canvassers that because they had not added up and abstracted—that is, given the result in figures, the returns should be rejected. But the committee was not of that opinion. The committee was of opinion that while the law of Missouri requires of the election officers to add up and give this abstract of returns, their failure to do so did not render the returns void. That is a thing which the committee could do as well as the election officers. It seemed to be absurd to claim that because the election officers had not acted with precision the returns should be rejected. The committee therefore admitted all the returns that had been rejected for that defect. The results of the vote at the election were summed up, and they showed a majority of 49 votes for Mr. Knox.

The only question before the House—and on that question I have no doubt each member has for himself examined the evidence—is to see whether the principles laid down by the committee were correct, and afterwards whether the evidence brought the case within those principles. If so, the result must be as has been stated by the committee. The minority of the committee had some objections which they desired to support, and if they desire to do so now I will yield the floor; otherwise I will demand the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I should not only do injustice to the sitting member, but injustice to myself and to the House, were I to attempt from a mere recollection of what I have read two or three months ago to discuss the merits of the proposition now before the House. I am willing to accept the past action of the House in the case of Bruce and Loan, the vote which has just been taken upon the question of giving a fair opportunity to the sitting member to be heard, as a test by which I am to judge of the effect of any argument which might be urged for the purpose of influencing the determination of this body upon the pending proposition. If gentlemen on the other side of the House are willing to kick over the ladder by which they have climbed into power, if they are willing to decide contests of this kind by these minor divisions which they have among themselves, I, as not being interested in these private or minor contests which occur among members of the same party, will not undertake to interfere with their decision. But I hold it to be due to the man whom you now propose to reject from his seat that a statement of facts should be made. As a member of the committee, having neither sympathy for him nor his opponent, having no political affiliation with either, I have not been able to find any legal testimony (as I look upon the law) by which the committee could arrive at the result indicated in these resolutions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate have disagreed to the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate (No. 55) in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. While I do not propose to discuss the merits of this case, for the purpose of showing the manner in which the reasoning faculties of the gentlemen who sustained the majority report have been perverted, I propose to call the attention of the House to one or two of their positions.

The first specification in the notice given by the contestant is that 400 illegal votes were cast at the Abbey precinct. Now, under the act of Congress, so far as the Abbey precinct is concerned, that was the only point to which the sitting member was obliged to direct his attention. And it was obligatory upon the contestant to prove that 400 illegal votes had in fact been cast at that precinct.

Now, the majority of the committee concede that these allegations were too loose in law to form the basis of any decision whatever; and while they undertake to decide upon them they do it with a protest that it shall not be taken as a precedent. Yet while the gentlemen who make this report are thus willing to abandon the act of Congress in this particular case for the purpose of arriving at a result in favor of the contestant, which the pleadings of the parties do not warrant, they still as against the sitting member press to the very letter a compliance with the act, and reject testimony presenting facts important in the case because not taken within the limited ninety days. In other words, for the purpose of establishing the claim against the sitting member, the committee were unwilling to reject allegations and proof not coming within the limitations of the act, but the very moment the attempt was made to explain the proof—if you can call that proof which the contestant presented—by positive testimony, these gentlemen then hold up this act of Congress which they had previously been willing to disregard for the purpose of excluding the testimony. Now, sir, I believe that we should abide by the act of Congress entirely or reject it entirely.

Mr. UPSON. Did we not, by a vote of the House, order the committee to reject it?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. The House ordered the committee to proceed according to the act of Congress. I do not understand by what principle you enforce the rule as to one single item of testimony and reject it in regard to all other testimony. If you reject it you ought to have rejected it from the foundation of this proceeding.

Mr. UPSON. What other testimony was taken within the time?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Some objections grow out of the time, and some objections grow out of the testimony itself. Time may be waived by the parties, but no consent can make much of the testimony of the contestant available as the foundation of a sound adjudication. In its own nature, as being mere suspicion or supposition, it is unfit to induce a conclusion in a legal mind.

Let us apply the law to this case, or let us reject it and base our action on abstract justice. In either case the resolutions submitted by the majority of the committee would be wrong.

One word further. While the committee have rejected, under the allegation of the notice, this entire and complete precinct, (the Abbey precinct,)

I deny that there is proof which under any allegation would justify this action. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections has said that as a general rule the man who alleges shall prove his allegation; but while he concedes that to be the general rule he finds an exception in this case, and insists that the sitting member must under the circumstances show that the voters named were legal voters. He states that before this election no such vote had been thrown in that precinct.

I insist that by the universal rule of law the burden of proof rests upon the man who alleges fraud, although it is here changed so that proof of innocence is shifted from the accuser to the shoulders of the innocent party. And as an answer to the deductions of the committee from the increased vote, I would call attention to the laws of Missouri under which a citizen is not forced to vote in the district in which he lives, but he may vote in any other district. It was shown that by reason of the civil war which has prevailed in Missouri and in the whole country, bodies of soldiers were stationed at different barracks, and that at Carondelet there was a large collection of workmen; that soldiers at these barracks and the workmen voted within this precinct. It was the most convenient poll at which they could vote. This was a sufficient explanation of the increased vote, and as the right to challenge existed, and each party must swear in his vote, the presumption is that each person voting was legally authorized so to do. The names of voters were preserved, so that the contestant could easily impeach the legality of the votes if, in fact, it was illegal. I therefore contend that the vote is to be considered fair and just until the reverse is shown. You cannot throw the burden of proof on the sitting member to show the votes cast at this precinct not to be illegal. Some attempt was made to show that certain soldiers were not entitled to vote. For that purpose copies of copies of muster-rolls were introduced. I must confess my surprise that good lawyers, such as I know the majority of this committee to be, should be willing to take these rolls as proofs of the allegations of the contestant. They were made for a different purpose. Suppose the chairman and myself should enter into a contract, and in it recite matters prejudicial to the rights of third parties, could it be used as proof against them? As between the parties to the contract the recitals would be binding, but I apprehend that no court would allow them to affect strangers.

But even if you admit the proof to be competent in its nature, how are these contracts proven? Did they go to the proper office and get certified copies? No, sir. They allow the clerk of the contestant to take such copies as he pleased and swear that he took correct copies, not from the office in which by law they are lodged, but from some place in which it is alleged that copies are kept.

I have not made these remarks with a view of entering into a discussion of the merits of the case, for as I stated on rising that would be doing injustice equally to the sitting member and to myself, but for the purpose of showing that the minority in their report have proceeded upon safe legal grounds, and that some strange prejudice must have influenced the minds of the majority to do, not what they thought to be wrong—I know neither of those gentlemen would do that—but to come to a conclusion alike unwarranted by the testimony and by the law under which they acted.

Some little prejudice has been excited by the present position of the sitting member. In regard to that I have to say there was no difference of opinion, so far as I could ascertain, among the members of the committee as to his present right. The very fact that he acts as a major general in the service of the United States excludes him from a seat here. He cannot act in a double capacity. The position of officer or soldier in the service of the United States, and the absolute obedience which such position requires, are inconsistent with the duties of a member of Congress, who is to judge and act independently, and freed from every improper influence. The resolutions involve only the validity of the original election. But the committee, instead of following the precedents set in other cases, that is, vacating the seat and referring the matter back to the people, have attempted to deprive the people of St. Louis of the right of electing their own member, and by the action of the House to substitute a member who never received a majority of the votes of that district.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand my colleague to state that the committee were agreed that the sitting member was not entitled to a seat at this time from the fact that he holds an office in the Army. If that be so, was it not originally so when he came here as a member? He then held an office under the Government of the United States, and the same office which he now holds. He had merely deposited his resignation in the hands of the President conditionally. Did not that prohibit his holding the office of member of Congress when he came here as much as it does now when he has gone back into the Army?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I will answer the gentleman. I stated what I understood to be the opinion of the members of the committee. So far as the question which my colleague suggests is concerned, if it was an original question to be decided by myself, I should decide that he must either abandon his military office from the moment his term here commences, or he ceases to be a member of Congress. But there are adjudications by Congress the other way, which I should be forced to respect; and beyond that, that question was not presented to the committee. It was not presented by the papers which the parties themselves made, and it was upon the issue only which the papers presented that the committee were instructed to decide.

It will be seen that my objections to the resolutions of the majority of the committee do not grow out of their effect upon Mr. Blair, because I hold that he has in legal effect vacated his seat, but out of the grave wrong done to the public.

Hard as it is for an individual to suffer under an unjust decision in a case where the injustice is palpable to every eye, his sufferings are of little consequence as compared with the scandal done to public justice. Such a case settles into a precedent and gradually weakens that innate sense of right which, natural to all minds, more guards judicial proceedings than can penal laws.

Mr. GANSON. I do not desire to discuss this question, but simply to explain the matter involved in the interrogatory put by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.] The committee had no evidence before them that the sitting member was ever a commissioned officer in the service of the United States. The question was not before them. The issue presented to them by the record was whether at the election which took place in Missouri, the sitting member received a majority of the votes, or whether the contestant did. The question as to whether the sitting member was in the military service of the United States, a commissioned officer, is not involved in the issue; and the committee have no legal evidence that he ever was; and as that question was not submitted to them, they have made no report upon the subject. Nor has this House acted upon that question at all. It is entirely foreign to the purposes of this discussion, and the decision which is to follow upon it. And being forewarned by some gentlemen who refused to postpone the consideration of this case to a future day, that one side of this House had already made up its mind, before any discussion was had, that the sitting member was not entitled to a seat, I have too much respect for myself to engage in any discussion before any body which has come to any such conclusion before the case has been heard.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to make another inquiry of the gentleman. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] that there was another question involved in the fact of the sitting member having resigned his office as major general conditionally when he came here. Now, the question of his right to the seat because of having gone back to the Army was not before the committee at all, and it is not before the House now. That question was not decided by the committee, and is not presented to the House.

Mr. GANSON. I would say in reply to the gentleman that that question was not agitated before the committee when the case was under consideration, nor when it was disposed of. The question related solely to the original election, and the question was not involved as to whether the sitting member was in the military service of the United States, either as a commissioned officer or otherwise. The committee had no jurisdiction of that subject. It is proper that the facts should be stated frankly and fully, so that the House may not act under a misapprehension. The question whether the sitting member is disqualified by virtue of holding a military commission, or whether he has, by accepting that military commission, resigned his seat, was not before the committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood my colleague [Mr. Brown] to say that the committee were unanimous in deciding that the sitting member forfeited his seat in consequence of his accepting a commission in the Army.

Mr. GANSON. I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I have no doubt, from my knowledge of the character of the gentlemen who compose the Committee of Elections, that if they had had any legal proof of the fact that the sitting member after his election had accepted a commission as major general in the Army of the United States, they would have voted to unseat him; but there was no issue of that kind before the committee.

Mr. DAWES. As I presume no other gentleman desires to address the House upon this case, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I stated in the outset of this discussion the reasons why, in the opinion of the committee, this question of the major generalship had nothing to do with the question before the House.

I desire now to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who submitted some views in support of the minority report. The minority report is of such a strange character that it is hardly proper for me to pass it by without some notice, supported as it is by the speech of the gentleman from Wisconsin. To begin with: the minority of the committee did not until long after the report was made and printed indicate their intention to make a minority report at all. It was not until the day which had been fixed for the consideration of the case arrived, and it was called up for action, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] introduced this minority report. The case has been postponed until the report was printed, and is now before the House. The minority report is of such a singular character that I can only account for it from the fact that the case has been so long delayed that these gentlemen of the minority have entirely forgotten what it is, and the position taken by the contestant and sitting member before the committee, or else that it was prepared by some one who had not been in the committee-room at all, and never knew anything about what transpired at the hearing. I think that is one of the two conclusions that must necessarily be come to by every member of the House according to these gentlemen, as I do, no intention to mislead the House, but to state this thing precisely as they understood it.

One allegation in the minority report is that the committee, of its own motion, departed from the pleadings in this case in relation to the Abbey precinct. Mr. Speaker, the committee was in the habit—and I suppose the gentlemen themselves did not forget it when they drew up their minority report—of taking a case as it is presented. And, as the testimony is taken, if neither party objects to the positions taken by the other party, but proceeds to the hearing himself upon those positions, the committee is in the habit of presuming these positions to be yielded as sound in matter of law. When one party produces testimony which the other party believes to be not covered by the allegations, it is the custom of the latter to object to the testimony; and if he does not object, he is treated by all courts of law and by the Committee of Elections as having waived the objection. That would be a sufficient answer to the position taken by the minority, for the reason that the positions taken, the arguments addressed to the committee both by the contestant and the sitting member touching the Abbey precinct, and all the testimony introduced, were without objection that the allegations were not broad enough to reject the whole vote. That of itself would be sufficient.

But there is another reason. The allegations, according to the strictest requirements of the law of 1851 governing this case, were amply sufficient; and I beg the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and of his colleagues who signed this report, to the reading of it, in order that I may invoke their review of the positions taken.

It will be borne in mind that 424 votes were cast in the Abbey precinct for the sitting member. The allegation in regard to the Abbey precinct is in these words:

"1. That at least 400 illegal votes were cast for you at a precinct known as the Abbey precinct, in said district. That the persons voting had not been citizens or inhabitants of the State of Missouri for one year previous to said election, nor had they been residents of said district for three months previous to said election. Many of said voters were minors under the age of twenty-one years. A list of the voters whose votes are contested is annexed to and made a part of the notice."

I turn to that list and find that 424 votes were obtained there. The names of the voters are given, and the allegation is made that every one of them is a fraudulent vote. Therefore the allegation is as broad as it possibly can be to cover every vote cast at the precinct. It is more particular in that regard than is customary among contestants and sitting members in cases of this kind. It is the first case I have known for many years where the parties have gone so far as to furnish the names of the voters alleged to be illegal voters. The specification has set out the facts more precisely, under the law of 1851, than any case that now occurs to my recollection. So much as to the sufficiency of the notice touching the allegations.

This minority report goes further and states that the Committee of Elections rejected the testimony of Captain Constable, which was introduced by the sitting member to controvert the testimony that had been already introduced by the contestant. It was not the committee, Mr. Speaker, that rejected that testimony. It was ordered by the House on the 11th of March, 1864, that the testimony then offered be referred to the Committee of Elections and printed, to be considered by the committee with other evidence before them taken after the time provided by law, with a proviso that the resolution shall refer only to affidavits and depositions, and that all such as have been illegally taken shall not be considered by the committee.

That was a strict inhibition against the considering of a deposition which is not taken in conformity to the law of 1851, and was so designed by the House. The question was discussed here. It was urged on the one side and opposed on the other. It was therefore the House and not the committee which rejected that deposition and the statute of the United States that required the committee to submit all such testimony to the House for direction.

The gentlemen are made to say in the minority report that the committee required the sitting member to show in the first instance that the votes for him were legal; and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] intimated that I took that position in the remarks I have submitted to-day. Said the gentleman from Wisconsin, "While the chairman of the committee concedes the legal position that he who makes an allegation must prove it, he requires in this instance the sitting member to controvert the position before the contestant is required to introduce testimony." That is an entire mistake, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman has misunderstood altogether the report and what I said.

The committee required the contestant to show that these were illegal voters. I stated in the opening of the case what the testimony was upon which the committee came to the conclusion that the burden of proof was shifted to the sitting member, and that he was required to show the thing which I said was so easy to show, was so entirely within his power to show if it existed, and that the lack of an attempt on his part to show it added weight to the testimony introduced by the contestant. But the gentlemen in the minority have permitted themselves to put their names to a statement still further wrong in reference to this subject, and to say there was testimony showing that the voters who thus cast their votes were legal voters. They have been made by this minority report to appear to quote in support of this statement the testimony of a witness named Pasquier. This is what is said in their report:

"On what principle of law or common sense is it that Mr. Blair is required to fortify the double presumption of the legality of the votes cast, arising from, first, their names being on the poll-list, and second, from the testimony of Pasquier, a witness for contestant, proving them to be qualified voters, testimony which should be decisive for Mr. Blair with every fair-minded man, not only because it is given by a witness of his opponent, who is manifestly candid and truthful, but because the contestant himself could and unquestionably would have contradicted it by the rolls of the quartermaster referred to by the committee, if the statement had not been true."

And they are made to append to their report what purports to be an "extract" from the testimony of Pasquier. I am sorry to say that they, or rather their report, has garbled that testimony.

Mr. GANSON. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that in some way in printing that report some five or six lines were dropped out. They were inclosed with the rest of the testimony in that report, and were in some way omitted by the printer.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to inquire what was left out?

Mr. GANSON. A portion of the testimony.

Mr. DAWES. Is it in the mind of the gentleman what was left out?

Mr. GANSON. A part of the direct testimony.

Mr. DAWES. To what point was it directed? What did the witness testify which the gentleman says was left out by accident?

Mr. GANSON. It was a portion of his direct testimony.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware that the gentleman stated that it was a portion of direct testimony, but my interrogatory is, what did the witness testify to that was left out by mistake?

Mr. GANSON. I leave the House to tell that.

Mr. DAWES. I am glad it was left out by mistake. I was about to tell the House what was left out. I was about to ask the gentleman to explain how it was that there appears in the testimony as printed the interrogatories an answer from the fifth to the eighth, and then skips to the eighteenth interrogatory, which is inserted with the nineteenth and twentieth, and then jumps to the fiftieth without the slightest indication that it is not a continuous statement. The eighteenth interrogatory appears as printed in this appendix to refer to what was printed immediately preceding; the pronouns are by this juxtaposition made so to refer when in fact they really referred to an entirely different matter, and thus this so-called "extract" makes the witness lie right out. I am very sorry that it was left out, but having been left out by mistake, it is a very singular fact that these gentlemen of the committee in their minority report say this witness testifies that certain men who were legal voters cast their votes there; and according to the reading of this testimony as printed it is so, but how is the testimony of the witness presented to make that out? He testifies in one place that Captain Constable had three hundred or three hundred and fifty teamsters in his employ, and then he goes on to testify further on about six wagon loads of laborers who are off in another direction by a grocery two or three miles away; immediately following that come the following questions and answers:

"Question 18. Did they state where they had been, and for what purpose?"

"(Objected to by counsel for contestee.)"

"Answer 18. I think they told me they had just been to the Abbey, and had voted, and were going home."

"Question 19. How far was the Abbey from where you met them?"

"Answer 19. I judge about two miles and a half."

"Question 20. How far is Benton barracks from the Abbey?"

"Answer 20. About a mile."

Now, the witness here is testifying about these six wagon loads of men, but they put the testimony immediately following the three or three hundred and fifty teamsters in the employ of Captain Constable, and it is made to appear that they went and voted at the Abbey precinct, while the testimony really was that the six wagon loads of men went a journey in another direction, two or three miles off, and only one witness thought these men said they voted. The witness says in another part of the testimony that he did not see any of the men vote. And that is left out "by mistake." And in another place that he was not there that day at all, and that is left out "by mistake." He is asked who the men voted for, and he answers "I don't know;" and that is left out too.

Mr. GANSON. We left out everything he did not know.

Mr. DAWES. You did more. You not only left out what he did not know, but have made him assert that he did know it. They skip thirty interrogatories in one place, and the "extract" adds, as if nothing had been left out, as follows:

"Question 50. Were most of the men employed at Benton barracks of foreign birth or not?"

"Answer 50. They were mostly of foreign birth."

"Question 51. Do you not know many of them who were unnaturalized?"

His answer to this latter question is left out altogether. The witness says before all this, "I arrived early in May from St. Pierre, where I was engaged in the Indian trade," and "was employed by Captain Constable some time during September last;" that is less than two months before election, which shows how much he knew about the matter. But this does not appear in the "extract." It is to be regretted that so many portions of this testimony in different parts of it "dropped out by accident," and that those portions which did drop out would have made the whole "extract" worthless, or mean entirely different from what it now means.

But let that pass, for there is something else here to which I wish to call the attention of the House. The gentlemen who have signed the minority report of the committee are made to say—I am sure that they would not say anything that they did not know to be so, and hence I remark that in this report they are made to say—that, although the allegation in the contestant's notice was, that he contested certain votes only upon the ground that these are non-residents, soldiers, yet that the committee, the majority of the committee, went further and permitted the contestant against the objection of the sitting member to prove that they were minors. They are made to say in a pert way, if I may use the language, that it might be supposed from this, as non-residence was the only ground upon which the votes of the companies B and K were questioned, and that as the muster-rolls which constituted the only evidence offered to establish it were declared to be incompetent for that purpose, there was an end to the controversy respecting those votes. Not at all. They are made to say further that the contestant claimed the right to impeach them for infancy, and not being members of the companies at the time they voted as such, and offered the rolls as evidence on these points. Mr. Blair objected not only because of the unfairness of making use of testimony in the record to support charges not presented there, even if competent to prove the charges had they been duly presented—it being impracticable for him to get testimony at that stage of the proceedings to meet it—but also because the muster-rolls were not, by law, evidence of the ages of the soldiers, no entry being required by law to be made in them on the subject, as shown by many of the rolls in the record before the committee.

I must repeat that whoever made those statements must either have forgotten what passed in the committee, or else never was in the committee-room during the hearing at all. I will read the tenth allegation, so far as it concerns these two companies, and see if there is not an express allegation of minority:

"10th. I contend that the officers who canvassed and cast up the votes given at the said election included in the votes allowed for you the following votes, viz:

"Company B, thirty-second regiment Missouri volunteers, Infantry."

"Company K, thirty-second regiment Missouri volunteers, Infantry."

"That the poll-books in which the above votes were entered were not legally certified, nor were they returned to the officers authorized by law to receive them, nor by the officers authorized by law to return said books; that the voters whose names are registered in said books were not legal voters; that many of them were minors; that none of them were residents of the State of Missouri for one year previous to said election, nor were any of them inhabitants or residents of said district, or of the county of St. Louis, for three months previous to said election."

There is a direct allegation that these were minors. Nor was there any such objection made by the sitting member as is here drawn from the imagination of the gentleman who made up this report.

This thing was all new to me, and was never heard of in the committee until a month after the report of the committee had been submitted and until we got up the other day to discuss it.

Then it is said that the majority of the committee lay great stress on what they say is proved, that these fifty-six soldiers from the seventh district voted in a body at the Abbey precinct. The lieutenant testified that they voted there, and he gave the names of some of them. The committee say that they voted in a body. They may not have all voted together. The minority of the committee say that they did no such thing. I mean to say that they voted near to each other, one after another, one, two, three, four, and so on. The witness gave the names of fifty-six of them. And the numbers on their ballots show in what order they voted. The minority are made to use this language in their report:

"Here it is said that these eighty-eight men voted in a body, without question, &c., when there is not a syllable of evidence given by any witness as to the manner of their voting, whether consecutively or not, or who makes any statement at all as to whether these or any other voters were questioned or not; and the only evidence of their having voted at all is the poll-book itself, which contradicts, in the most striking manner, this aspersion on the judges by showing that the men did not vote in a body. The voters are numbered in the order of their votes, and the names in question range from No. 29 to No. 478, (see all the numbers in the appendix,) showing that the votes were scattered throughout the day."

The names are given in the appendix, as testified to by the lieutenant, as follows:

368 Stewart Abbot,	266 John Johnson,
29 James L. Briggs,	603 Patrick Murphy,
326 W. Ballard,	345 Robert McMichael,
313 Alexander Black,	410 Reuben Morris,
369 Moses Burke,	393 Michael Ryan,
351 John C. Comstock,	424 William Smith,
311 David Caldwell,	314 C. A. Maguire,
307 S. C. Downey,	411 James W. Weber,
309 James Fahey,	347 Thomas Welsh,
218 C. Goddard,	384 John Anderson,
161 William Hanker,	319 T. S. Beckett,
106 Charles Meyer,	372 John Bledsoe,
312 John Markwell,	354 John Bunker,
418 William McGown,	325 P. C. Consey,
360 Marion Rouse,	367 Hugh Conner,
420 Jacob Schniteus,	375 Samuel Clemens,
336 Newton Willowford,	T. A. Finley,
348 J. S. Wilson,	276 John Frank,
323 E. D. Adams,	353 Fred. Gates,
316 James Beckett,	343 E. King,
363 Charles W. Blind,	308 Riley Manley,
342 William Beck,	359 George McMillen,
324 Richard Conroy,	373 J. S. Robertson,
369 John W. Craighead,	341 Daniel Shanley,
322 Prior I. Carroll,	347 William H. Unkerfer,
315 J. S. Edwards,	349 Peter Whiskersman,
371 Edmund Fitzgerald,	421 John Weekly,
219 Newton Galpin,	443 Thomas J. Watson.

Now it will be perceived that the minority report has gone to the poll list of the Abbey precinct and prefixed to each name the number attached to it there, not in the order found on the poll-book, which is the order in which they voted, but in the order in which I have read from the minority's appendix. For instance, it appears on the poll-book that Nos. 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, voted in the order in which I have given them. But this minority report has shuffled them up in the most approved style, making 368 come first, then 29, then 326, then 313, then 369, then 361, and then 311; then they go back to 307, and then give a half dozen more before they get to 312, which comes on the poll-book where these numbers were obtained immediately after 311, as do 313, 314, &c., which are still further mixed up. No pack of cards was ever shuffled more thoroughly when the gambler was playing for the greatest stake. Now, sir, whatever happened to Pasquier's testimony by accident, this could not have been the result of accident or chance. This parading of these names and numbers in this order as evidence that the men did not vote in a body was the work of a genius, and he should have the credit of it.

But however it occurred, or whatever it proves, the great and only important fact remains uncontradicted that fifty-six illegal votes were here cast for the sitting member, and the names are given.

As this report is just out, only in time for this discussion, I have not had time to go through it any further. I have called attention to these few points, which I think will show what confidence can be put in the positions there taken. I most cheerfully acquit the gentlemen whose names are affixed to that report from any design to mislead the House by any misstatement it contains. I beg leave to call attention to the "conclusion" of the whole, and then I will leave the matter. It is as follows:

"The contestant fails, therefore, if the House should refuse to sanction the confessedly erroneous procedure of allowing," &c.

Of course, if the House refuses to sanction it, he does fail; but I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin what is meant by the words "confessedly-erroneous procedure?" It is printed in italics, and will the gentleman tell us what it means? Who has "confessed" it?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. What procedure does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. DAWES. The procedure set forth in the majority report.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, made an inaudible reply.

Mr. DAWES. Would it not be well to wait until he had confessed it?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. It is merely a presumption from the known character of the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. It is a great presumption.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. In the report of the majority of the committee they refer to the pleadings in this case, and they concede that those pleadings are not in conformity to the act of Congress. The allegation is not that the entire vote is wrong, not that the officers had been guilty of fraud, but that certain individuals were not entitled to vote. There is no proof that those individuals were not entitled to vote. The majority of the committee do not say they were not entitled to vote; but they do say that the contestant himself does not allege that the officers behaved fraudulently, and that the entire proceedings were of such a character as to reject the entire vote of the precinct.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman did not do me the honor to listen to what I said upon that point, for I said he had omitted to take notice of the fact that there was a list made of the names of every one of those illegal voters, and that that list embraced the entire vote. The gentleman says the majority report admits that the allegations are insufficient in law and do not comply with the requirements of the statute. He cannot find that in the report. The report says "the House will not fail to notice the extraordinary character of many of the allegations," not all of them. I had the honor to state a few moments ago that the particular allegation which the gentleman alludes to was more in conformity to law than many that had come under my notice during my experience upon the Committee of Elections, because it states precisely that A B and C D voted at that precinct, and that they were illegal voters. Nothing can be more particular than that.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I ask the gentleman if there is any proof as to the right of any of these persons as individuals whose names are mentioned in connection with the vote of that precinct which shows that they were not entitled to vote. The question is whether there is any proof affecting the individuals whose names are mentioned in that notice as having voted in that precinct, and showing that they were not entitled to vote.

Mr. DAWES. I had the honor to submit a moment ago, what is set forth in the majority report, that we traced fifty-six of them as being citizens of the seventh congressional district, and thirty odd as having already voted once fifteen miles off in another district, and who declared as they went up that they voted for Blair there and for Blair here.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Then you have eighty-six.

Mr. DAWES. And I had the honor further to say a few moments ago, that so far as we could trace them they were all alike; also that one of the judges forgot his duties as judge, left his place and put an unqualified man in his place, while he went to electioneering, vitiating the whole proceeding.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I would ask the gentleman whether there is any allegation of that kind in the pleadings of the party, and whether he has been enabled to trace these illegal votes beyond the eighty-six he has mentioned; and further, I would ask whether there is any proof in regard to those eighty-six except this improper proof of copies from copies of the muster-rolls.

Mr. DAWES. It is not worth while again to go over the views I submitted to the House upon the sufficiency of these papers. If they were not satisfactory to the gentleman from Wisconsin at that time I cannot hope to make them so now. I will, however, again read to him an extract from the report:

"The House will not fail to notice the extraordinary character of many of the allegations of both contestant and sitting member, as well in the matter as in the manner of their presentation. For vagueness, uncertainty, and generality they are, in the opinion of the committee, without example, and seem to have been drawn in studious disregard both of the act of Congress and of all precedent."

Now, I will read a single allegation of the contestant and one of the sitting member among several of like character, which will show to what that remark alluded to.

Mr. Knox says:

"17. I contend that persons holding office under the Government of the United States established a newspaper for the purpose of exerting an undue influence on the election; that such newspaper was owned, controlled, and conducted by persons in the pay of the United States Government; that these officers, combining with some large contractors, deriving large profits from their contracts with the United States Government, to coerce their employers and others to vote for you at said election, did, by threatening to discharge from their employment those who were employed by them unless they voted for you, induce, through fear of being deprived of employment, many men who were legal voters to vote for you, when they preferred to vote for me, and did by the same means induce many minors under the age of twenty-one years to vote for you."

Mr. Blair says:

"11. That the political friends and partisans of the said Samuel Knox, with his privity, consent, and approbation, were, and are, guilty of each and every of the several acts of corruption, fraud, and oppression, untruly charged in his said notice against the friends and partisans of this contestant and respondent; that at many of the precincts in said district the partisans of said Knox created disturbances in the vicinity of the polls on the day of election, and by their boisterous and threatening language, and by the use of violence, deterred and kept a great number of peaceable and quiet citizens who were entitled to vote at said precincts, and who were desirous of casting their votes for this respondent, away from the polls, and prevented and hindered them from voting. The number or names of the persons thus prevented from voting not being now known to him, so as to enable him to set forth the same more particularly, but which names and the number thereof he will give evidence of, prove, and establish on the hearing of this case, if it shall seem necessary for him so to do, and he shall be able to procure the testimony of the persons so deterred or hindered from voting, or otherwise establishing such facts."

We thought it right to call attention to such vague and uncertain allegations as those here quoted.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. The gentleman refers to that cause of the allegation which consists in the charge that Government office-holders interfered in the election and exercised an influence upon the voters, and that contractors of the Government exercised the same sort of influence. I would join with him in setting aside such an election when the country is entirely filled with office-holders. When every tenth man draws his sustenance from the taxes, which the people have to pay, the only salvation that there is for the country is in adopting the principle that any such interference vitiates the election.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman talks wide of the point at issue between us. I have no disagreement with him on that point. I will not, however, discuss the matter before us further, but will demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, being upon the first resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, which is as follows:

Resolved, That F. P. Blair, Jr., is not entitled to a seat as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the first congressional district in Missouri.

Mr. GANSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 33, not voting 68; as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN stated (during the roll-call) that Mr. Cox had paired off with Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts.

The question recurred upon the second resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, which is as follows:

Resolved, That Samuel Knox is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the first district in Missouri.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 53, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Rollins, Scott, Smith, Smithers, Stebbins, Strouse, Thayer, Voorhees, Ward, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—59.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the votes by which the resolutions were severally adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DAKOTA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I now call up the contested-election case of Todd and Jayne, from Dakota Territory.

Mr. HALE. I think that one contested case ought to be sufficient for one day.

Mr. DAWES. I leave it entirely with the House. I am desirous of getting rid of these contested-election cases. The committee has seven more of them. However, if the gentleman desires to move to postpone this case, I will yield for that purpose, but will vote against the motion myself.

Mr. HALE. Then I move that this case be postponed till to-morrow.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I ask to have the resolutions that have been reported in this case read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That William Jayne is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Dakota in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Resolved, That J. B. S. Todd is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Dakota in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, by the official canvass in this case Jayne was returned as Delegate by a majority of 16 out of the astonishingly large poll of 458 votes. How many of these votes were fraudulent, and how many were true votes of legal voters, are the questions to be submitted to the House on the evidence. It was not within the jurisdiction of the Committee of Elections to consider the question whether it is worth while to maintain a territorial government over a Territory which cannot muster more than 458 legal and illegal votes, all told, at the immense cost of some one hundred thousand dollars. It seemed to the committee, however, that, if it had been within our jurisdiction, it would have been quite worth while as a matter of economy to look into the question whether you should not repeal the act organizing this Territory. The question before the Committee of Elections, however, was, how many of the votes—237 reported by the canvassers to be cast for Jayne, and 221 to be cast for Todd—were actually cast by legal voters in the Territory. In order to make up the 237 for Jayne there were counted for him the votes of Brulé precinct—63 for Jayne and 8 for Todd. I will briefly state to the House the circumstances under which this vote was cast.

This election was held on Monday the 1st day of September, 1862. At the Brulé precinct, on the Sunday night previously, and at a time not exactly defined, but between midnight and two o'clock in the morning, there was the form of an election gone through with at a private house, and on a private arrangement entered into there. The law requires that, in order to be a voter, a man must be a citizen of the United States, or declared his intention to become such, and have resided in the Territory for ninety days. There was an interesting contest going on in the county as to where the county seat should be. Brulé precinct and Elk Point had a spirited contest as to which of them would be the county seat. They were, therefore, disposed to show as large a number of votes as they could. Brulé precinct, in order to make the thing sure, held two elections—one the night previous, and the other the day of the election. The night previous they got hold of all the men who had not been in the Territory ninety days. Men were sent out about midnight, on Sunday night, to collect votes of those not legal voters, among whom were Norwegians, some of whom had been in the country only a few days and knew nothing of the language. They operated on them in a way that they called "naturalizing" them. Here is a copy of the certificate given to one of them, who had been in the country about sixty days and could not speak a word of English at the time:

I, Ole Thompson, do declare upon oath that it is bona fide my intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever all allegiance to any foreign prince, power, potentate, state, or sovereign whatsoever, and particularly to Carl XV, of whom I was last a subject.

OLE THOMPSON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 28th day of August, A. D. 1862. A. V. ECKLES, Clerk.

By JOHN B. GLAZE, Deputy.

This they called "naturalization." Those who had conscientious scruples about voting were naturalized in this way; and with those who had no such scruples the ceremony was not observed. In that way they polled 41 votes before two o'clock in the morning. They closed the ceremony by calling up out of his bed the man who owned the house. He came down and found these men around the table. They told him that all those who had not been long enough in the Territory to vote should vote then, because the next day there would be men at the polls to challenge their votes, and they could not vote. So he put in his vote then. His story is interesting, and I give it in his own words:

"Question 1. What is your age, place of residence, and occupation?"

"Answer. I am sixty-four years of age; I reside at Brulé Creek, Cole county, Dakota Territory; I am a farmer."

"Question 2. When did you first arrive in the Territory of Dakota?"

"Answer. I arrived in this Territory on the 2d day of July, A. D. 1862."

"Question 3. State, if you please, whether you have any knowledge of the voting that took place at Brulé Creek on Sunday night, August 31, A. D. 1862."

"Answer. I know of voting having been done between midnight and daylight of September 1, A. D. 1862. Candles were burning upon the table where the voting was being done. It was at my house, on Brulé Creek, in Cole county."

"Question 4. Were you present when this balloting, of which you speak, first commenced?"

"Answer. I was not. I was, at the commencement, up stairs, in bed; heard a noise below stairs, and went down to see what it was about; found a number of persons in the room; saw three men sitting at a table, with a ballot-box in front of them. One man was writing. Dr. A. R. Phillips and Thaddeus Andrews, my son, were two of the persons seated at the table. They were acting as judges of the election then going on. Mr. Gore handed me a ticket as soon as I got into the room. I took the ticket, which was a Jayne ticket, handed it to Dr. Phillips, the judge, who put it in the box. Immediately after this, Mr. Gore stepped up to Dr. Phillips and said he voted this ticket (which he handed to Dr. Phillips) for another man, whose name he mentioned, but do not remember. He observed that the man was absent from the Territory, and he would vote for him. Dr. Phillips then placed the vote in the box.

Question 5. You have stated that you arrived in this Territory on the 2d day of July, 1862, and you voted. Why did you vote at this election, not having been in this Territory, as required by law, ninety days previous to said election?

Answer. Governor William Jayne and Mr. Glaze came to my house eight or ten days before election, and Governor Jayne told me that I had a right to vote, and upon his authority I did vote.

Question 6. Was Mr. Glaze, of whom you speak, present at the balloting on that night?

Answer. To the best of my belief he was.

Question 7. Were there any other votes cast while you were present?

Answer. There was not. Dr. Phillips, when I handed him my vote, said: "This (Mr. Andrews's) vote is the last vote." And after Mr. Gore had voted, as I before stated, the crowd in the room yet remaining dispersed, and I again retired to bed.

Question 8. Were you present at the polls at Brulé Creek on the 1st day of September, A. D. 1862? And if so, state where the polls were held.

Answer. I was present at the polls on that day. They were held at the house of Dr. Phillips.

Question 9. Did you vote on that day?

Answer. I did not.

Question 10. How long did you remain at the polls?

Answer. Not longer than fifteen or twenty minutes. My son said there would be several persons to dinner, and I returned to my house to acquaint my daughter with that fact.

Question 11. Who were the judges and clerks of this election at these polls?

Answer. I noticed that Dr. Phillips, M. M. Rich, and my son Thaddeus were the judges. I do not know who acted as clerks.

Question 12. Did you not know that the voting on the night previous to the 1st day of September, of which you have spoken, was illegal and contrary to law?

Answer. I supposed it to be illegal, and made an observation to that effect; but Mr. Frisbie told me that there was no law that would set it aside.

Question 13. Had Mr. Frisbie any interest in this election; and if so, what?

Answer. He was a candidate for the House of Representatives of the Territorial Legislature.

Question 14. Did Mr. Glaze, of whom you made mention, reside at Brulé Creek at the time of said election?

Answer. He did not; he resided at Vermillion, in the adjoining county."

And then they shut this box and took it off to the place appointed by law for holding the election. At nine o'clock in the morning they opened the election; and the votes taken after that were put in on top of those taken in the night. It was held without swearing in any of the officers conducting the election, or qualifying them in any way. In the course of the day about 25 votes were taken, making in all the number returned here of 8 for Todd and 63 for Jayne.

I will not detain the House longer, Mr. Speaker, than by asking the Clerk to read the testimony of one of the judges of election at the Brulé Creek precinct, who states what occurred, and with a brazen face refuses to answer, and then in the same breath confesses it all without seeming to think there was anything wrong in it. I ask the Clerk to read the testimony of Thaddeus Andrews.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"My name is Thaddeus Andrews; I reside at Brulé Creek, Cole county, Dakota Territory. I was present at the election held at the Brulé Creek precinct on the 1st day of September, 1862. I was one of the judges of election at said precinct.

Interrogatory 1. Were the judges of election and clerks sworn at said election?

(Witness refuses to answer.)

"The polls were opened at said election at the house of A. R. Phillips, at Brulé Creek aforesaid. They were opened at about nine o'clock in the morning on the 1st day of September, 1862. The judges and clerks were present at said election. One of the judges who was appointed by the commissioners refused to serve, and A. R. Phillips nominated Milton M. Rich, who was elected by the persons present in the house; I do not recollect the number present. I think there were about 40 votes cast during the day, after the polls were opened at nine o'clock a. m.

Interrogatory 2. Was the ballot-box opened and examined before the voting commenced, after the polls were opened at nine o'clock a. m. on said day?

(Witness refuses to answer.)

"I should think there were ballots in the ballot box before the voting commenced after the polls were opened; there were about thirty ballots in the box when the polls were opened. I cannot tell for whom the ballots were cast, but I suppose that they were cast for William Jayne for Delegate to Congress. They were cast for the south half of the northeast quarter of section No. 29, township No. 92 north, for county seat. These ballots were put in the ballot-box by some person; I am unable to state by whom. The ballots were put in between Sunday evening and nine o'clock Monday morning; I think about three o'clock Monday morning. I think they were put in at A. R. Phillips's house, but I am not sure that that was the place. I was present at the time they were put in; there were quite a number around while this was going on.

Interrogatory 3. Do you not know that those ballots were put in the ballot-box at the house of Timothy Andrews?

(Witness refuses to answer.)

"I cannot state whether the ballots that were in the ballot-box when the voting commenced were all put in by one man or not. The polls were closed about six o'clock. After the polls were closed we commenced canvassing the votes publicly. We counted all the ballots in the ballot-box. We found that the number of ballots in the box did not agree with the number of names on the poll-list. There were six ballots more in the box than there were names on the poll-list. Six ballots were then picked out from the top of the ballots in the box, which were destroyed; the remainder of the ballots we then canvassed, and returned them to the office of the clerk of the board of commissioners of Cole county. The names of persons voting during the day were taken down by the clerks of the election. There are names of persons upon the poll-list who did not vote during election day. I think there are about thirty names on the list who did not vote.

Interrogatory 4. How came those names on the poll-list?

(Witness refuses to answer.)

"One of the poll-lists was returned to the clerk of the board of commissioners. The clerks of the election were Mahlon Gore and William C. Betts; the judges were myself, A. R. Phillips, and Milton M. Rich."

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question in relation to that evidence. I ask him if that return was not excluded from the count both by the majority and minority of the committee; and if so, whether it has anything to do with the decision of this House, or for what purpose he has had it read here.

Mr. DAWES. The minority report does not exclude anything. The minority report deals in technicalities altogether.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the minority report takes the evidence as its basis, and excludes all the returns excluded by the majority, and also the returns from the St. Joseph and Pembina precincts.

Mr. DAWES. The minority did not take the trouble to go through with an analysis of the testimony, adopting that of the majority in regard to most of the precincts, and basing their conclusions, as I said, upon technicalities altogether, and there is no impropriety in that; but what I desire is that the House shall understand the facts, for I do not know what positions the parties themselves may take. As I was going on to say, about nine o'clock the polls were opened and some twenty or thirty votes cast. When the election had proceeded thus far one of the judges of election directed the clerk to put on to the book the names of those who voted on Sunday night; but the clerk, not being a party to the transaction, refused to put on their names. He left the stand and another clerk was appointed, who entered the names on the poll-book.

In order that justice may be done to all parties I will ask the Clerk to read the answer of the sitting Delegate to the notice of the contestants in reference to the Brulé precinct.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"More specifically answering as to the voting at said Brulé Creek precinct, the said Jayne avers that immediately previous to said election in said Territory a panic had seized a portion of the citizens of the Territory in consequence of the reports that had just arrived of the terrible Indian massacres of the frontier settlers in Minnesota; that on the day previous to the election a proclamation of the Governor of the Territory was brought to said Brulé Creek settlement announcing the attack of the Indians upon Sioux Falls, the only settlement lying between said Brulé Creek and the scene of the Indian ravages in Minnesota, the murder by them of two of the citizens of said Sioux Falls and the flight of the rest, and calling upon the people of the Territory to arm and organize for its defense.

"Immediately upon receiving a copy of said proclamation, and toward night of the day preceding the election, the citizens of Brulé Creek precinct assembled to organize a military company and prepare means of defense, and continued their session through the night. As the night progressed the alarm of many increased, and they expressed a determination to flee to the settlement as soon as the day dawned. So many expressed their determination thus to leave that it was greatly feared that the said precinct, a new and very flourishing one, would be deprived of its own weight in the pending territorial and county election, in which its citizens felt a strong general and local interest; and thereupon, and for the purpose of receiving the honest votes of those of the legal electors who it was feared would leave, and not for any fraudulent purpose whatever, the judges of the election theretofore appointed according to law did proceed in said assembly in a public manner to receive a few votes before daylight and before the lawful hour for opening the polls. The whole number of votes so cast before the proper time for opening the polls was not over thirty, and the persons who cast them, all of whose names were afterwards entered upon the poll-book, were all legal electors of said precinct and Territory.

"This irregularity this respondent regrets and believes would not have occurred but for the cause above named, for no settlement in this Territory, or in any other State or Territory, is more orderly and law-abiding than that of Brulé Creek."

Mr. DAWES. It is to be regretted that this condition of things set forth by the Governor, who was a candidate for Delegate at the time, and is now the sitting Delegate, did not frighten anybody except those who had been in the Territory less than ninety days. The rest seemed to stand by and vote regularly on election day. The proclamation of the Governor in relation to the Indians seems to have had no effect upon the legal voters at all, nor on the illegal ones so but what they could retire to rest after voting.

I will ask the Clerk to read from the report what the committee say in relation to the election held in Bon Homme county.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"BON HOMME COUNTY.—The vote of this county was rejected by the canvassers, and it is claimed by the contestant that there should be counted from this county 26 votes for him, and 13 for the sitting Delegate. The evidence shows (pages 33, 58) that the polls were opened at nine o'clock in the morning, at the house of G. M. Pinney, United States marshal; Moses Herrick, D. C. Gross, and Jacob Kiel acted as judges. Silas G. Irish was originally appointed by the county commissioners of the county, as the law requires, to act as one of the judges. He was notified of his appointment by Harvey Hartsough, one of the commissioners, and accepted the appointment. A few days after this same Mr. Hartsough, one of the commissioners, came to him and said to him "that he didn't care a damn whether he (referring to the Jayne party) had the majority or not; we would swindle them (the Todd party) out of it anyhow." I replied to Mr. Hartsough that "You cannot carry any election that way. As a Republican, I was disgusted with this practice of the Democrats in Kansas, and that no fraudulent vote should go into that ballot-box unless it walked first over me." He turned away from me in seeming disgust at my reply. I heard very shortly after that Mr. Skinner was appointed in my place on the election board."

"Mr. Skinner was not permitted to serve, however. On the morning of the election he repaired to the polls, before nine o'clock, as the witnesses think, at any rate before any voting was commenced, and found Jacob Kiel, the servant of this same Harvey Hartsough, and known as the Dutch boy in this county, (page 38) installed in his place, and the United States marshal refused to admit Skinner into the room, declaring that Jacob Kiel should act as judge. The voting was done through a window. One witness (Snider) thereupon stationed himself at the window on the outside, and requested the voters to vote open tickets, while he took their names, and those who voted for Todd did so, numbering twenty-five in all, whose names he gives, (page 34.) And there were fourteen other voters, making thirty-nine in all. A recess of an hour was taken for dinner, and during that time Moses Herrick, one of the judges, took the ballot-box and carried it away with him into a room in his own house by himself. The balloting continued in the afternoon, and at the close of the polls, when the counting commenced, which is described by the witness, as follows, (pages 35, 36.)

"The judges proceeded to count the ballots, denying admittance to the electors at the polls. The judges first began the canvass of the votes by taking the tickets from the ballot-box and separating the same into two different piles—the Todd tickets in one pile, and the Jayne tickets in the other. The Jayne tickets were distinguishable from the Todd tickets by their blotted surface, the ink showing plainly through the ticket. It became at once apparent that a fraud had been perpetrated by the substitution of ballots during the hour had for dinner. There were at this time about twenty-five persons around the polls, and much excitement ensued. As soon as I saw the excitement I demanded to be admitted, and to have the canvass made public, which was at that time peremptorily refused by the judges, and by Mr. Pinney, who was their spokesman. During this time Mr. Johnson and myself were standing at the window, directly in front of the judges. Upon this refusal of admission into the room the excitement still increased. The judges thereupon gathered up the tickets and threw them back into the box. I then again demanded admission. After some hesitation Pinney suggested that myself and Edward Clifford be admitted; we entered together, and went up to Moses Herrick, one of the judges of election, and asked him to proceed with the canvass, which he refused to do. I then asked him to show me the tickets, whereupon he handed me thirty of the tickets to examine. I looked them over in his presence, and found that I was right in my conclusions. I then asked him to show me the other nine of the tickets, which he refused. I found fifteen tickets, among the number handed me, for Jayne. I then laid them down on the table and remarked to Mr. Herrick that there was prima facie evidence of fraud; that there had not been fifteen votes cast for Jayne; whereupon the judges and clerks jumped up, under the lead of G. M. Pinney, and left the room, leaving poll-book, ballots, and all papers connected with the election lying on the table. Great excitement prevailed. The canvass was never completed. The crowd rushed in (page 159) and took possession of the ballot box, poll books, and ballots, and proceeded then to hold a new election."

"The committee were of opinion that the conduct of all parties engaged in this transaction was disgraceful and fraudulent, and that no votes should be counted from that precinct."

Mr. DAWES. The board of canvassers, upon the facts as presented to them at the time, showing that there was a disturbance at the polls in Charles Mix county, that a large number of Iowa soldiers had voted—this county was on the borders of Iowa—decided that the irregularities were so great as to render the election invalid, and they therefore rejected the vote of that county. The committee, however, upon the evidence submitted to them, thought they were able to sift the poll and ascertain how many were legal voters and how many were not. They therefore, instead of rejecting the whole poll, rejected from it a certain number, eighty-three, I think, who were Iowa soldiers, and ten half-breed Indians. They saw no reason why the rest should not be counted; they therefore counted that poll 62 votes for Jayne and 70 for Todd. The committee also counted the Pembina vote. It was received a few days after the time required by law. This vote, according to the certificate, was 19 for Jayne and 125 for Todd. And it was on the question whether this vote should be received that there was any material difference of opinion, as I understand, among the members of the Committee of Elections. It was the opinion of the majority of the committee that it should be received and counted, and of the minority that it should not. The minority gave their reasons why it should not be received. They gave them in the views which they have reported; and I have no doubt that they will enforce them.

It seems now to be claimed that this vote should not be received because the return was not in conformity to the law, inasmuch as the law requires the certifying officer to certify to an abstract of the vote.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether there is any evidence of the votes of that county having been canvassed according to law.

Mr. DAWES. I will read the certificate.

ST. JOSEPH, DAKOTA TERRITORY,
OFFICE OF THE REGISTER OF DEEDS,
September 5, 1862.

At an election held on the 1st day of September, A. D. 1862, in the county of Kitson and Territory of Dakota, being the seventh council and representative district of said Territory, the following persons received the number of votes annexed to their respective names, to wit:

For Delegate to Congress, J. B. S. Todd had 125 votes.

For Delegate to Congress, William Jayne had 19 votes.

Certified by me, CHARLES MORNEAU,

Clerk of the Board of County Commissioners.

Sworn to before me this 13th day of September, A. D. 1862.

JOHN B. BATTIMAN,
Justice of the Peace.

DAKOTA TERRITORY, SECRETARY'S OFFICE.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original abstract returned to this office and now on file in my office; and I further certify that Charles Morneau was, at the date of said returns, a register of deeds in and for the county of Kitson, and also that John Battiman was at the said date a justice of the peace in and for said county of Kitson, and that said returns were received.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the great seal of the Territory.
[L. S.] Done at Yankton this 12th day of January, 1863.

JOHN HUTCHINSON,
Secretary.

I was about to say this, that the objection which seems to be raised for the first time is that this certificate does not set forth that this man took with him two justices of the peace to examine these votes, and then to make an abstract of them. It does not say that he took two justices of the peace, but the law presumes that every officer conforms to the law until the contrary is shown. The law does not say that that should be shown in the certificate; but the law does say that he shall certify an abstract. I think the objection was that instead of certifying the whole of the vote he ought to have certified an abstract of the vote. I think that it may be claimed that the two justices of the peace were present, for every man will agree that the law presumes an officer has discharged his duty until the contrary is shown. The question is whether the full vote is as good as an abstract. The committee have said over and over again, and my learned friends on this committee have joined in the report, that a certificate is as good without an abstract as with it. It seems to me that that decision is founded in good sense. We have the number of votes, which is the fact sought for. It is as good in one form as another, so far as the committee is concerned.

I do not propose to go through with acriticism of the whole of the minority report until it has been supported by the gentleman who made it.

There was another objection in the report of the minority to the reception of this vote; and that was that it was fraudulent. They depend on the testimony of a witness by the name of Buckman. The majority of the committee rejected the testimony of this man Buckman, as it has ascertained that it was taken in this city some considerable time after the time prescribed by the law for taking testimony in this case. In the Missouri election case passed on this morning the House directed the committee to exclude testimony taken in this city after the time had expired according to the statute for taking testimony. The question was presented to the committee whether they would reject the testimony of Captain Constable in the case of Knox vs. Blair, which the House ordered to be excluded, and receive this deposition taken under precisely the same circumstances. The committee came to the conclusion that they would treat both depositions alike. The gentlemen who have signed the minority report agreed that the deposition of Captain Constable should be excluded; and for the same reason the committee think that this deposition of Mr. Buckman should be excluded.

Excepting this, there was nothing before the committee that raised any suspicion of the validity of this certificate, except the suspicion of two or three years ago, when Pembina was in Minnesota, that there was a good deal of fraud there. I always thought there was myself. But the reason that induced the committee to reject the testimony of this witness was the same as that which operated to the exclusion of testimony taken in precisely the same way in another case, that of Knox vs. Blair. The result of this election is properly stated in the report of the majority of the committee—for Todd, 345 votes; for Jayne, 246 votes, making a majority of 99 for Todd. If the deposition of Buckman be received and taken to be true, and if the Pembina vote be rejected, Jayne would have received a majority of 7 votes according to that calculation of the committee. I think the case is narrowed down to the question whether the deposition of Buckman shall be received or not. Beyond that is the question of credibility, upon which the committee thought the evidence was against the credibility of Buckman.

Mr. SCOTFIELD obtained the floor.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman from Maryland will not press that motion. There are a number of subjects which ought to be disposed of.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Can the gentleman from Maryland submit his motion when I have the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. Cobb in the chair.) Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the motion?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I have not yielded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the motion of the gentleman from Maryland is not in order, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will say to the gentleman from Maryland if it is his wish to submit the motion, and it will not consume much time, I will yield to him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then I submit the motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 69, not voting 64; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

DAKOTA CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. SCOTFIELD resumed the floor.

Mr. BROOMALL. With the consent of my colleague I desire to offer a substitute for the first resolution, and I will assign a few reasons for it if he will extend me the time. I offer the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That the election in the Territory of Dakota for Delegate was attended with so much illegality and fraud that neither William Jayne nor J. B. S. Todd is entitled to a seat in this House as such Delegate, and the seat of the Delegate from that Territory is declared vacant.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a point of order. It was decided by the Speaker a few days ago that from the nature of the case the two must be separated—that you could not get at the right of two persons in the same resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order, as the substitute, if adopted, disposes of both resolutions.

Mr. BROOMALL. With the permission of my colleague I will give a few reasons, in short, why I have offered that amendment. It would appear from the reports of the minority and majority that they differ only in the one receiving and the other rejecting what has been called the Kitson county vote. The evidence upon that vote I have before me, and the House will see at once that while there may be some reason for rejecting the evidence, yet there is enough in the evidence and enough before the House to show that the people of that Territory should have another chance to vote upon their Delegate, and should vote the next time, as I hope, with a little more regularity. I will read the testimony, premising first that if the testimony is taken as true and as valid, then the minority is right; if the testimony is rejected, then the majority is right. It is the testimony of one Joseph L. Buckman, as follows:

"Joseph L. Buckman, of lawful age, being duly sworn, deposes as follows:

"Question 1. What is your name, age, and occupation, and where have you resided for the past year?

"Answer. My name is Joseph Buckman; age, thirty; occupation, trader; and have resided in Pembina, in Dakota Territory, during the last three years, with the exception of six months in 1861.

"Question 2. Were you generally acquainted with the people composing what is known as the Red River settlement, at Pembina and St. Joseph, in Kitson county, Dakota Territory? If so, state what opportunities you have had of forming such acquaintance.

"Answer. Well, I am pretty well acquainted with nearly all the people living in those places. I am acquainted with all the people in Pembina, and nearly all the residents in St. Joseph. I have been employed as a trader at Pembina, and also generally throughout that whole region of country, for nearly three years; and I have also been postmaster at Pembina since some time in the month of November, 1861.

"Question 3. Was there any increase of white male settlers at Pembina or St. Joseph between June, 1861, and the 1st of September, 1862? And if so, state the number of white male persons who settled at either place during the time specified.

"Answer. There was some increase. The exact amount of increase at St. Joseph I cannot state. At Pembina there was an increase of one, and that was myself. I know personally of two men who settled in St. Joseph during the time specified, and there may have been others.

"Question 4. Could there have been any considerable increase at St. Joseph during the time specified in the former interrogatory without your knowledge?

"Answer. No, sir; not very well. There could not have been an increase of more than fifteen white male settlers.

"Question 5. How many white male persons of twenty-one years of age residing at Pembina were born within the limits of the United States?

"Answer. Well, sir, besides myself, I do not believe that there are more than one.

"Question 6. How many white male persons of twenty-one years of age residing at St. Joseph were born within the limits of the United States?"

"Answer. To the best of my knowledge, there are but two there who were born within the limits of the United States."

"Question 7. How many foreign-born residents of either of these places were naturalized citizens, or had filed their declarations to become naturalized citizens, at the time of the election on the 1st of September, 1862?"

"Answer. I know that there is one naturalized citizen in Pembina, for I have seen his papers; and there are two residents of St. Joseph that I suppose are naturalized citizens, from the fact that they have held offices under the United States Government. And further than this I have no knowledge on the subject."

"Question 8. Do you know any other residents of either of said places who are reputed to be naturalized citizens, or who have filed declarations of intention to become such?"

"Answer. I know of but the two named in my previous answer."

"Question 9. Are Pembina and St. Joseph situated in what is known as the Indian country, or in a district of country which has been ceded by the Indians to the United States Government by treaty?"

"Answer. It is Indian country, and has never been ceded to the United States Government."

"Question 10. Will you state whether the people comprising the settlements at Pembina and St. Joseph, in Dakota Territory, are white persons, or are mainly Indians and half-breeds?"

"Answer. A large majority of them are Indians and half-breeds."

"Question 11. Were you present at an election held, or alleged to have been held, at St. Joseph, Kittson county, Dakota Territory, on Monday, the 1st day of September, 1862?"

"Answer. Yes."

"Question 12. Will you state the names of the persons who acted as judges and clerks of election at that time and place, and whether they were white male persons, who were themselves legal voters, or whether they were aliens, Indians, or half-breeds?"

"Answer. Well, their names were, first, James Grant, N. Laronts, and another man, popularly known as Brother Timothy, who, as I believe, acted as judges. Edward Hay and J. Baptiste Bottineau, I believe, were the clerks. James Grant was of mixed blood, of a class who are generally known as half-breeds. N. Laronts was a half-breed. Brother Timothy is a Frenchman, from France, and claims to be a naturalized citizen. Edward Hay is an Englishman by birth, and was not a naturalized citizen on the day of election. J. Baptiste Bottineau is a half-breed."

"Question 13. How many persons voted for a Delegate to Congress at St. Joseph on the day referred to?"

"Answer. It is my impression that just 46 votes were cast; not exceeding 48 I know."

"Question 14. Of the number of persons who voted there for Delegate to Congress on that day, how many were white male persons twenty-one years of age?"

"Answer. There were not over twenty white persons present on that day, and I do not believe there were more than ten or twelve such persons."

"Question 15. Of the number of white male persons twenty-one years of age who were present at St. Joseph on that day, how many were citizens of the United States, either native or naturalized?"

"Answer. There were just three there who were native-born citizens of the United States, and there were three other persons who claimed to be naturalized, viz: H. S. Donaldson, Charles Morneau, and Brother Timothy."

"Question 16. Were there any present who had made declarations of intention to become citizens?"

"Answer. There were none that I know of."

"Question 17. If more votes were cast at said election than there were legal voters present in the town of St. Joseph, please explain who cast them, and how it was done, and all the circumstances connected therewith."

"Answer. It was the general understanding with a clique of five persons on the day of the election that there should be a certain number of votes returned, whether they were cast or not. The excess of votes over the number of legal voters present were cast by illegal voters, mostly half-breeds."

"Question 18. Were more votes returned than were cast at that election; and if so, how many more, and when and by whom were the names added to the poll list?"

"Answer. There were about 150 votes returned. The excess were added by Edward Hay and J. Baptiste Bottineau after the closing of the poll on the evening of the day of election, and were a little over 100 votes."

"Question 19. How many votes were returned for William Jayne?"

"Answer. It was about 20 votes."

"Question 20. Please state, if you know, how that number of votes came to be returned for Mr. Jayne."

"Answer. They were returned at my request, I suppose. I made the request of Edward Hay, one of the clerks. I knew that they, the clerks, were about increasing the list of votes, and that they contemplated returning them all as cast for Mr. Todd, when I told them that it would look better if they returned a portion of the votes as having been cast for Mr. Jayne."

"Question 21. In the district of country composed of the counties of St. Joseph, Stevens, Chippewa, and Kittson, commonly known as the Pembina district, are there any settlements except at Pembina and St. Joseph?"

"Answer. There are no permanent settlements at any other place, unless you call Fort Abercrombie a settlement, but there is nothing there but the fort."

Well, now, the vote in that district which is in dispute amounts according to the majority report to 125 votes on one side and 19 upon the other. I have said already that if this testimony is taken as valid and believed, the minority is right, and the sitting member is entitled to the seat. The argument in favor of rejecting this testimony is that it was not taken within the time prescribed by the act of Congress. The answer to that argument is, first, that that act of Congress does not apply to the Territories, and, secondly, that no one Congress can prescribe the mode by which a future Congress shall test the legality of the election of its members. We are as independent as the Congress which passed the election law, and we might as well undertake to decide for them backwards as they for us forwards.

Now, although under the act of Congress this testimony would be rejected, yet we cannot deny the fact set forth in the testimony. They are not denied on the other side, and in face of that fact I do not see how the majority of the committee could make a report in favor of the contestant.

Mr. SCOFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I trust the gentleman will allow me to say a few words. I will not interfere with his line of remark. It does seem to me that the House should commit itself to some rule upon the subject. It seems to me that when Congress says it will not admit depositions taken under certain circumstances it departs from all consistency when it admits such depositions. Now, this man received the very vote which has been read; whether fortunate or not, he served his time as a member of the Legislature of Dakota, and then he came on here to Washington to get an office, and for that purpose he circulated around here, and he is now back in the Territory as an officer under the United States marshal.

Mr. SCOFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. TODD. I desire to reply to the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not propose to occupy more than five minutes myself, and then the gentleman can have as much time as he wants.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to make you acquainted with St. Joseph, irreverently called in the hurried speech of the West "St. Jo." You think, perhaps, you had an introduction to this saint in the case of Bruce and Loan, but you are mistaken. You are thinking of "St. Jo." of Missouri, where they nobbed the Massachusetts emigrants a few years ago, and more recently tore down the American flag, about the time that Massachusetts soldiers were murdered on their way to defend the national capital; the same St. Jo. whose bad cause was so tenderly pleaded a few days ago by the forgiving eloquence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] This is a saint of another canon; a hermitical saint; a saint of the woods, located more than a thousand miles, by any traversable route, beyond the extreme fringe of western settlement; full a thousand miles beyond where the mule path ends and the Indian trail begins; crowded close under the Canada line, and so deeply buried in the shadows of sunset as to have escaped the observation of American map-makers altogether. Well, sir, this young saint has had an election, and, like its older namesake of Missouri, has thereby got into trouble. But they were not alike in their misfortunes. The complaint from the Missouri St. Jo. was that they had a great many voters, but owing to the mobocratic prejudice against rebels in that locality they got but very few votes; while the complaint from this St. Jo. is that, having but six legal voters, they get 144 votes. I will tell you how it happened. They have but few amusements up there, and, for lack of other excitement, sometimes celebrate the day of the election. They do not call it, however, by that name. It is generally known as Indian day. Well, sir, on that day, in the fall of 1862, a few trappers for furs, a few clap-trappers for politics, a great many Indians, and a gallon or two of whisky got together to exercise the great American privilege, the right of voting. The law of Dakota requires an election board to be composed of three judges and two clerks, who are themselves voters. But these assembled sovereigns did not stand for forms. They selected two Indians and a Frenchman, known as "Brother Timothy," for the judges, and one Indian and an Englishman, named Edward Hay, for clerks. The board being thus organized, six white men, claiming to be citizens, though three of them were foreign-born, deposited their votes for Mr. Todd. Forty Indians and Canadians did the same thing. Forty-six votes were thus cast for Mr. Todd; but this was not supposed to be enough to make the election certain. Not another Indian could be found, and so the clerks added names enough to make the tally 125 for Mr. Todd. A white man suggested that it would make a better-looking record if a few votes were put in for Mr. Jayne. The Indians acknowledged the superior cunning of the pale-face, and immediately added 19 votes for Jayne.

A Scotch divine was once asked by an incredulous fox hunter how it was possible for Samson to catch three hundred foxes so easily, when a whole bevy of sportsmen, aided by the best dog-blood in the realm, were often unable to bring in a single trophy from a whole day's chase. Shrewdly accommodating his scriptural exposition to the weak faith of his interrogator, he replied that Samson probably had only half a dozen foxes and all the rest were skunks and woodchucks. So with this election. There were half a dozen legal votes and all the rest were myths and red-skins. These votes, thus supervised and thus made up, were forwarded to the proper authorities at the capital of the Territory, but they were not allowed by them. The case now comes before us and the contest for the seat will be settled by the allowance or rejection of this vote. If rejected it leaves Mr. Jayne with a majority of 7 as settled by the report of Mr. Todd's friends on the committee. If allowed, Mr. Todd will have a majority of 99. The majority of the committee concluded to allow the vote. Why? Was the evidence of the fraud conflicting? No, sir; there was not a witness nor a circumstance to contradict the full and clear evidence of Mr. Buckman, who witnessed the pretended election, and who was one of the real citizens who voted for Mr. Todd. On the contrary, he was sustained by the territorial census of 1861, which shows that only a handful of white people reside at this place. Was the character of the witness impeached? No, sir. Nothing worse could be said of him than that he was once a member of the Dakota Legislature; that he was recently intrusted by Judge Blair with an important clerkship in the Post Office Department in Washington, and had been indorsed by a member of the United States Senate, who, amid all the detraction and scandal of American politics, has always been said to possess a clear head and a pure heart. This testimony was taken March 11, 1863. Mr. Todd has thus had one year and three months in which to disprove it. If there had been 144 voters in St. Joseph, surely he might have furnished us some evidence of it in that great length of time. But not a line of evidence to contradict the statement of Mr. Buckman has been presented.

Why, then, did a majority of the committee allow it? Because the deposition of Mr. Buckman was not taken within sixty days according to rule. It was impossible to do so. The election was held on the 1st day of September, but the returns were not sent in until about December, and then the winter made communication with that distant settlement extremely difficult. It was the 11th of March of last year before the evidence was finally obtained. The majority of the committee thought it was better to allow this glaring fraud than to vary a hair's breadth from the sixty-day rule. You might know, sir, that such a decision could only come from a jury of lawyers. There are nine of us on the committee, all lawyers, I think; certainly all but one, and if he is not, he is just as good or bad as a lawyer. It takes nine tailors to make a man, it is said, but it takes nine lawyers, accustomed to follow a rule at all hazards, to conceal a fraud as big as a camel under a rule as small as a gnat. The legal mind can do that and then exclaim without intending it as irony, "Let justice be done if the heavens fall." For the benefit of any one who does not understand English, I ought perhaps to give the Latin, Fiat justitia, ruat cælum. And so the untimely evidence was excluded and this great fraud admitted.

This House of Congress may admire such rigid enforcement of a more technical rule, but pause a moment before your approving eyes seek the stern faces of this Roman majority, for they were not always so sternly legal. They could unbend if the desired result required it. Rather than have the heavens fall they would sometimes relax a rule. The law requires the notice of contest to be served after the result of the election is declared; but Mr. Todd, in his haste, served his notice before, and the majority waived this error.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN O. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, JUNE 13, 1864.

NEW SERIES... No. 180.

The law requires the depositions to be taken before a judge of the Territory, a recorder of a county, or the mayor of a city, if such officers can be had. Judge Williams and Judge Bliss were both in the Territory, and every county had a recorder. But Mr. Todd took his depositions before justices of the peace, and the majority waived this error. The law requires the election returns to be made within fifty days, and it was nearly one hundred before the returns came from St. Joseph, and the majority waived this error. The law requires the returns to be jointly certified by two justices of the county and the clerk of the commissioners, but the St. Joseph returns had the certificate of the clerk only, and the majority waived this error.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does the law require that the returns should be certified by two justices, or simply that the canvass shall be made by them?

Mr. SCOFIELD. They must not only canvass the votes but certify to the result. It would be an idle thing to require them to count the votes if they were not also required to make a memorandum or certificate of the facts as they found them.

A common man, unacquainted with the habits of the professional mind, might naturally suppose that such conflicting rulings were made with reference to a predetermined conclusion. But you, sir, can readily see that it is susceptible of a more charitable interpretation. The firm adherence to a technical rule for the admission of the St. Jo. fraud—the greatest perpetrated in territorial history since the Cincinnati directory voted in Kansas—may be only a sublime triumph of legal justice over acknowledged but unofficial truth and right. Fiat justitia, ruat cælum. And again, when the rule is four times relaxed in favor of Mr. Todd, it may be impulsive honesty breaking through the trammels of professional education. It is strange, to be sure, that Mr. Jayne's cause is injured when the rule is adhered to, and Mr. Todd's always benefited when the rule is relaxed. But that may be one of those singular coincidences that often occur in the mysterious affairs of human life.

Mr. TODD, (contestant.) I shall occupy but a very short period, and shall address myself strictly to the merits of the case, and in reply to the gentlemen of Pennsylvania who have just preceded me. Evidently there is very little known by the members of the House of the manner in which this election in Dakota has been conducted, and I propose to detail a few of the facts touching the manner of holding it and the transactions that occurred. We are a far distant Territory, two thousand three hundred miles from the city of Washington, and but little is known of it. It has seemed, from the remarks of the gentlemen of Pennsylvania who last addressed the House, that they have but a single point upon which to base their argument, and that is technicality. The facts in the case are not touched, and surely they have not looked at the evidence clearly, which has been printed and laid before the House. Now, sir, I desire to call attention to a few of them in connection with this election in our Territory.

This election was held under the auspices of the sitting Delegate, then the Governor of Dakota; and to show the opinions he held on the organization of the Territory, I will read a few extracts from his message transmitting the census returns to the first Legislature of the Territory at its first session, but will first read the returns. This message informs us that in the "western district" (now Charles Mix county) there were, "white population, fifty-three; half-breeds, one hundred and twenty-eight; total, one hundred and eighty-one." And the Governor remarks:

"I also deem it proper and obligatory upon me to state that, in my opinion, the returns of the western district taken by Mr. Morse cannot be relied on as correct; he having, in my opinion, returned more population than there was in that district."

Nearly all of the half-breeds here enumerated held tribal relations to the Yankton Sioux Indians, and participated in their annuities; yet counting the entire population of this district in the summer of 1861, and allowing the usual ratio for the males, there will be found only thirty-six persons entitled to vote. In the following year this district cast a vote of 145, although it is well known that there was no material increase of population. This same census return shows a population of fifty-one white males, twenty-five females; mixed males, two hundred and sixty-four; females, two hundred and sixty; total, six hundred in the Pembina district.

In regard to this return, the Governor remarks:

"In transmitting the census returns, I deem it proper to state that from information received from gentlemen living in the Red river district, and also from the fact that many of the residents were absent on the usual summer hunts when Mr. Betts was taking the census of the district, I am satisfied that the population returned is underrated."

Upon these returns the Governor districted the Territory into council and representative districts; and in the apportionment erected Pembina into a separate district, thus plainly recognizing the right of that people to a voice in our councils. I present these facts in relation to Charles Mix county and the Pembina district to show how absurd and inconsistent the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in supporting the sitting Delegate, who as Governor inaugurated and has had the advantage of those stupendous frauds which have so disgraced our young and beautiful Territory, and whose interests had been confided to his hands. In reference to them, we come to this House and ask you to wipe the stain away from us by rejecting the pretensions of the sitting Delegate to a seat in this House. We ask you to countenance nothing of the frauds of the chief executive of our Territory, or any other, and to set the seal of your disapprobation by righting the wrongs we have suffered at his hands. I will allude to him further at the proper time.

How stands it with this much-abused, much-vilified district of Pembina? What are the facts touching her material interests, population, and prospects?

I propose to offer a few proofs in regard to these, and in the first place call your attention to the fact that you have created ports of entry, opened custom-houses, established post routes and post offices, &c., thus showing the interest the Government felt in this district, and the desire she had to foster and promote the welfare of that interesting portion of our Territory.

The great Red River of the North constitutes the main artery of the northern portion of this continent, trending to the Hudson's bay, and through it to the Pacific. The head of this great river is but five miles from the sources of the Mississippi, and, diverging upon the water-shed of the continent, they each pour their mighty torrents into the two great oceans that wash the shores of our common country.

The Red River of the North drains one of the fairest portions of the Northwest. For four hundred miles it forms the boundary between the great State of Minnesota and the embryo State of Dakota. Passing the line that separates us from the British possessions, for six hundred miles it pursues its course to Hudson's bay, and thence finds its final outlet on the shores of the Pacific. Upon its banks is found a hardy, rugged, pioneer people, who have opened up the wilderness and caused it to blossom as the rose. The Government has sent its agents to that distant country to ascertain its interests and what amount of commerce was there, and it has been reported to this House over and over again. Steamboats ply upon its waters, indicative of enterprise, and the people upon its banks ask but your fostering care to warm them into life.

There is the great fur trade of the Northwest; and from this region do you receive those beautiful furs which are alike sought after for comfort and ornament. But this is not all. The merchants in the British possessions are now transporting their merchandise along this very route, thus leaving the old and long-pursued lines of travel from Quebec to their ports upon the Hudson's bay and Pacific. Nor is this all. The trade of this much-abused people of Pembina with St. Paul is immense. It follows a line across the western half of Minnesota from St. Paul to Sauk rapids till it reaches the boundary of Dakota and pursues its course to the town of Pembina, and thence diffuses itself to the Selkirk and other settlements throughout that vast extent of the northern portion of the American continent.

It is true that it is a difficult route, and to reach these far-distant, remote regions requires spirit and enterprise, and in these people you have an example of what can be accomplished by a people who will to do and dare perform.

Now, sir, a few words in regard to the census taken at Pembina by the agent selected by Governor Jayne. He went there an entire stranger, from the capital of the Territory, knowing no one and caring less for those whose interests and status he was about to report upon. He went to the house of Mr. Charles Bottineau, one of the heaviest traders and enterprising men in that distant settlement, and one of those men in whose veins is to be found a small trace of Indian blood, but who has been classed by this witness Buckman as a half-breed. From his lips he took down the names of those persons only who were then present in the district which he remembered, and omitted all those who were on their hunts or their long journey to St. Paul on their annual trading expedition.

It is well known to gentlemen from Minnesota on this floor that the commerce between St. Paul and Pembina amounts annually to more than two hundred thousand dollars, and that in the early days of that State, when a Territory, this city was largely indebted to that reviled district for much of the prosperity which has made her a name to be envied in the valley of the upper Mississippi. These people travel a distance of six hundred miles from Pembina to St. Paul, and it consumes four months to make the round trip. There are three hundred carts and three hundred men engaged in this business at this season of the year; and all these men were absent from their homes when the agent of the Governor took this census, and are not enumerated in it. Let us see if we cannot discover something more real, more tangible, more accurate than this bogus census, taken by an instructed agent of a corrupt, designing Governor.

In 1860 the eighth census of the United States was taken in accordance with law, and the Government sent its chosen assessor to perform this duty, and surely his report ought to be the best criterion of the number of people in that district and the material interest they represent. I proceed now to show an abstract of the population of the Red River or Pembina district, carefully collated from the original returns made to the accomplished superintendent of the Census Bureau, and which has since been published and laid upon the desks of members of this House. From this abstract I find that there are in this Pembina district five hundred and forty-six white males, three hundred and eighty-nine mixed bloods, commonly known as half-breeds, and thirty-eight Indians who live as white men, all over the age of twenty-one years, making a total of nine hundred and seventy-three persons. They represent a capital of $395,295, divided as follows: real estate, $123,000; personal estate, $272,295; and in the whole district along the Red river and west of it, a capital of $412,735, or an average of $375 for each person thus enumerated.

These persons are the representatives of ten foreign nationalities, and of our own country twenty-three different States and Territories, and follow the pursuits incident to their respective professions and associations, such as traders, farmers, merchants, masons, carpenters, clerks, boatmen, brickmakers, blacksmiths, millers, millwrights, and missionaries, lawyers, lumbermen, and laborers, priests, plowmakers, pilots, surveyors, shoemakers, tailors, wheelwrights, and woodcutters. About one hundred of these men are now in the military service of the United States, composing company C of the Dakota cavalry, and were called to this honorable duty for the protection of their homes and that portion of our northern frontier. Surely men representing this interest, and whose brothers and sons are in the service of our country, may well claim the privilege of citizenship, and be entitled to all the immunities that attach to that proud title; and yet it is attempted to be denied them on the testimony of a suborned witness.

Mr. UPSON. I would inquire of the gentleman whether that is under the territorial or United States census?

Mr. TODD. The United States census.

Mr. UPSON. Has a census been taken since then?

Mr. TODD. Yes, sir; and I have already spoken of that and submitted it.

In regard to the election in Pembina district I have to say that I have listened with much pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.] If not instructive they were at least amusing, and while I do not profess to be a judge of wit, (and coming as I do from so remote and untitled a Territory where the fanciful is compelled to yield to the practical it will not be expected of me,) yet I can truthfully say that his attempt was decidedly better than his statement of facts, while neither was of a very superior order. The palm of excellence is due the witicism. A comparison that fails to discover any difference between a full-blood Indian and one who has but a sixteenth of that blood coursing through his veins is excusable for any errors of fact which a lively imagination may commit when in search of something to dwell upon, and a case which needs in its support the utmost stretch of it. These people of whom I have been speaking are partially educated, many of them well educated, who have never had any tribal relations with Indians on earth; they live there at their homes with their wives and children, their stock and merchandise, upon their farms and at their places of business, following the usual avocations of white men, and enjoying all that makes life dear to us.

I will not pursue this point further, or lengthen my reply to the facetious remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but will content myself by saying that all of his argument is based upon the testimony of the man who was elected upon the same ticket with myself and by the same vote at Pembina.

He came to the capital of Dakota and sat as a member of the Legislature throughout the session of 1862-63. In his evidence he says there were but six persons in this Pembina district, native or naturalized, who were legal electors. I have presented you the two census returns, one that of the United States, the other territorial, taken by direction of the Governor, now the sitting Delegate in this House, from which it is shown that there were more than forty times that number. Be you the judges between the two.

But how came this testimony before the committee and the House? When the commission was sitting in the Territory, at its capital, this witness was there, occupying his seat in the Territorial Legislature as the member from Pembina, and the sitting Delegate, then the Governor, was also present. This testimony could have been taken then and there. But it did not suit his (Buckman's) purpose; for he could not return home after betraying the confidence reposed in him by a confiding constituency any more than he could go to the new Jerusalem. We in our country, plain, old-fashioned people as we are, detest traitors, find them where you may. This person was afterwards brought on here to the city of Washington, not certainly within the congressional district of Dakota, and for his evidence incorporated in this book of testimony received his quid pro quo. Upon that evidence is based the report of the minority of the Committee of Elections.

I did not expect, sir, to have addressed the House as long as I have when I arose, yet all the points in this case have not been presented; but the report of the committee is so clear, so conclusive, and the evidence so full and overwhelming, showing the frauds perpetrated in the very heart of our people and by whom committed, that I feel that further comment is wholly unnecessary.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The resolution was not agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 11, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

On motion of Mr. CARLILE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution, which were yesterday received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 510) further to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (No. 519) repealing certain provisions of law concerning seamen on board public and private vessels of the United States—to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (No. 520) for the relief of Samuel Beaton, master of the schooner George Harris—to the Committee on Commerce.

A joint resolution (No. 85) repealing an act entitled "An act for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood"—to the Committee on Claims.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes; and

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the amendment be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and be printed.

EDUCATION IN WASHINGTON.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (No. 26) to provide for the public instruction of youth in the county of Washington, District of Columbia; and it was Ordered, That the amendment be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 276) to secure to persons in the military or naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FOOT presented eleven memorials from citizens of Vermont, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented a petition of citizens of Florida, praying for an increase of the salary of the United States judge for the northern district of Florida; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 406) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to provide for the widows and children of the colored soldiers massacred at Fort Pillow, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, as the committee had made provision for their cases in the amendments just reported to House bill No. 406. The motion to discharge the committee was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 392) for the relief of Edward Williams, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 467) for the relief of Mary A. Hyde, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William W. Thayer, guardian, praying that a pension may be granted to Charles A. Hichborn, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 303) for the relief of Charles A. Hichborn; which was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying that a bounty may be granted to Benjamin F. Spafford, of company F, twenty-fifth regiment Iowa volunteers, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 247) granting lands to the State of Wisconsin to build a military road to Lake Superior, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a petition of George F. Nesbitt, praying for relief from a contract with the Post Office Department to furnish envelopes and newspaper wrappers for the use of that Department, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 305) for the relief of George F. Nesbitt. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CARLILE. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 238, to ascertain and settle certain private land claims in the State of California, upon which the Senate was engaged yesterday morning. We came within a few minutes of disposing of it, and I trust we shall be able to dispose of it in a very short time this morning.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to introduce a bill with a view to its reference.

Mr. CARLILE. My purpose is not to interfere with the morning business. If the Senator will allow the bill to be taken up, I will then give way to morning business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If we can get through with the morning business, I was going to say something in opposition to taking up that bill and one or two others that have prevented our doing any morning business for days and days.

Mr. CARLILE. I appeal to the Senator from Illinois to allow us to dispose of it this morning.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that motion is to be now considered, I want to get rid of a mere formal matter, the introduction of a bill with a view to reference.

Mr. CARLILE. I will give way for that purpose.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 304) in relation to the circuit courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FREE STATE GOVERNMENT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to the Senate copies of all correspondence, orders, and documents on file in the Departments in relation to the organization by the loyal people of Arkansas of the free State government of that State.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following amendment, which he intends to propose to the joint resolution (S. No. 62) for the recognition of the free State government of the State of Arkansas, which was ordered to be printed:

And be it further enacted, That this joint resolution shall be in force from and after the acceptance of its provisions by the people of the said State and proclamation of the same by the President of the United States.

JUAN MIRANDA.

Mr. CARLILE. I now move to postpone all prior orders, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 238.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for a division of the question on that motion, if it is susceptible of division. I want to have prior orders suspended, but the Senate ought surely to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill, the most important bill we possibly can have before us.

Mr. COLLAMER. The most important bill of the session.

Mr. GRIMES. The most important bill of the session, as my friend from Vermont very well says; and we ought not to allow one moment to elapse without disposing of it.

Mr. CARLILE. I concur with the Senator from Iowa as to the importance of the bill which he desires should be considered by the Senate; but he knows that that bill can be taken up after the expiration of the morning hour. It is only within the morning hour that there can be any hope of the bill which the Senate had under consideration yesterday being considered and disposed of. It will take but a very few moments, I think, now to dispose of it.

Mr. GRIMES. There were three other men on the floor wanting to proceed with other business.

Mr. CARLILE. In my humble opinion the whole three would not have consumed more than fifteen minutes. We could have got through with this bill yesterday morning in fifteen or twenty minutes more but for the expiration of the morning hour.

I will say one thing further. Senators will bear me witness that I have probably occupied less of the time of this body this session than any member of it. There is scarcely a Senator here who has not occupied more of the time of the body than I have. This is a matter in which I have no more interest than other Senators on this floor. It was a subject, however, which it was made my duty by the Committee on Public Lands to consider; and they have instructed me to report it and to see that the bill has the action of the Senate. A similar bill was considered by this body at its last session, and it passed, I believe, without a dissenting voice. It was then considered by the Judiciary Committee and reported favorably by Mr. Bayard, who was then a member of that committee, and the Senate passed it, I believe, without a division. I am anxious to have the bill disposed of. As was told us yesterday by the Senator from California, it is a matter of interest to his State. It involves the settlement of a considerable quantity of land within his State, which is important, we all know, to the interests of the State. I trust that it will be disposed of this morning, and that I shall not again have to trouble the Senate by a similar motion to that which I have to make now in order to get it considered.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to say a word in reply to the Senator from Virginia. I do not wish to stand in his way at all. He knows very well that I have been struggling here in reference to a measure in which the State of Wisconsin is very much interested; but I did not—

Mr. CARLILE. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I have struggled on one or two mornings to get up this bill; but I believe the only time I have thrust myself before the Senate this session was to promote the interests of the Senator's State.

Mr. HOWE. I am very much obliged to the Senator for doing it. I made that remark simply as a preface to the remark I am now about to make. I did not feel authorized to move in that matter, deeply as the State of Wisconsin is interested in it, while this Army appropriation bill was undecided. It was the business on which the Senate was engaged at the hour of adjournment yesterday, and I thought it ought to be the first business to be resumed by the Senate this morning, and I was on the floor to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of it when I was anticipated by the Senator from Iowa. It is only because I believe it to be of such urgent importance that I venture to move an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Virginia, unless he will withdraw it, as I wish he would; and that is, to substitute the unfinished business of yesterday for the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CARLILE. That is not in order. I made a similar motion the other day, and the President pro tempore decided that it was not in order.

Mr. HOWE. I submit to the Chair whether it is in order or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) In the impression of the Chair it is; but if the permanent Presiding Officer has decided otherwise, the Chair will follow that decision.

Mr. CARLILE. When the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] was struggling the other day to take up the resolution in regard to the Wisconsin five per cent. fund, I moved to amend his motion by substituting this bill for the resolution that he proposed to take up, and the President pro tempore of the Senate decided that the motion was not open to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule as it has been ruled by the permanent Presiding Officer, which is no doubt correct.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Chair rule my motion out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does rule it out of order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I have only one word to say. The issue in this case is between a private bill, a bill confirming the titles to some land in the State of California, on the one hand, and on the other the general Army appropriation bill, the most important and necessary bill that has been under the consideration of the Senate during this session, or which can possibly be under consideration; a bill upon which we have already had three committees of conference, and which we are in danger of losing unless we expedite a conclusion upon it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The business of the Senate cannot be expedited if we have to take up the same question three or four times in the morning hour instead of disposing of it at once when taken up. This bill has been before the Senate for some time. In the first place, the Senator from Virginia has sought to obtain the floor many times in order to call it up, and this is the third time that the question has been brought before the Senate. It can be disposed of I think in ten or fifteen minutes. We could pass many bills in the hours and hours that are consumed in this kind of debate upon the order of business.

Mr. CARLILE. I desire to say in reply to the Senator from Iowa that the bill to which he refers will come up at one o'clock as a matter of course; it is an appropriation bill, and there will be no objection to its consideration at any time after the expiration of the morning hour. It is only within the morning hour that this bill can be disposed of, and, in my opinion, it involves something more than a mere private claim—it involves nothing more nor less, in my opinion, than the faith of this nation.

Mr. CONNESS. I think the "faith of this nation" is very largely in favor of its defeat.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Conness, Cowan, Doolittle, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Hendricks, Bicks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wiley—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Collamer, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Sumner, and Wilson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Hale, Harding, Howard, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wright—16.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 238) to ascertain and settle certain private land claims in the State of California, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. CONNESS that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have but a very few remarks to trouble the Senate with upon this bill; but according to my understanding of the case for which it provides it presents a very simple inquiry to the Senate.

The act of March 3, 1851, to which reference has been made, provides for the manner in which all private claims to land are to be ascertained and settled, and directs that all such claims as shall not be presented within a limited time, or which, being presented, shall have been rejected finally, shall be considered as a part of the public domain. It applied the provision to what are called consummate as well as inchoate titles. Some doubt has been expressed whether it was in the power of the Government under that treaty to take away by such a provision, because of the laches of the claimant in presenting his claim, his title, if it was a consummated title according to the Mexican laws. But in the case of Frémont and the United States—I speak now from recollection, but I am sure I am right—the opinion of the court, which was given by the Chief Justice, states that it was in the power of Congress to pass that provision, because the provision was in the nature of a statute of limitations; that they had a right to say within what time all who should be entitled, or claim to be entitled, to lands under Mexico should present their claims for examination and ultimate decision; that however good the title might be, however clear it was that if presented it would have been confirmed, and however clear it would have been that independent of the particular term of the act of 1851 there would have been no necessity on the part of the claimant under any law which the United States might pass to present his claim for adjudication, still, as the law was passed, he who did not present his claim, although it was a legal, absolute title, and not an inchoate or equitable title, would lose his land. That act of 1851 contained a proviso, which is stated in a report of the opinion given by the Supreme Court of the United States in a case involving the title to this land. That proviso is in these words:

"That if the title of the claimant to such lands shall be contested by any other person, it shall and may be lawful for such person to present a petition to the district judge of the United States for the district in which the lands are situated, plainly and distinctly setting forth his title thereto, and praying the said judge to hear and determine the same; a copy of which petition shall be served upon the adverse party thirty days before the time appointed for hearing the same. And it shall and may be lawful for the district judge, upon the hearing of such petition, to grant an injunction to restrain the party at whose instance the claim to the said lands has been asserted, from suing out a patent for the same until the title thereto shall have been finally decided; a copy of which order shall be transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and thereupon no patent shall issue until such decision has been made," &c.

The land in dispute is claimed under two original or alleged original grantees, the one of them named Ortega and the other Miranda. Ortega's claim was presented. Miranda's claim was presented, but was afterwards withdrawn; but the party who held Miranda's title, Mr. Valentine, did what he supposed he had a right to do—he intervened in the case between Ortega and the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. When was that?

Mr. JOHNSON. Intervened at this time, or rather thought he could intervene. I do not know that he interfered in point of fact. He thought he could intervene. But there were differences of opinion whether a party claiming adverse to him whose claim had been presented could or could not intervene under the authority of the act of 1851. Ortega's title was brought up to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it was contested upon the ground that in point of fact the title was in Miranda, the Attorney General who represented the United States admitting that the title was in Miranda, if in anybody, and not in Ortega. He admitted that there was no interest in the United States. The court did not exactly know what to do with the case as it stood. They could not well have declared in favor of Ortega, because in their judgment Ortega's claim was an invalid one. They could not decide against Ortega in that case by deciding in favor of the United States, which was the only mode in which they could have decided against Ortega, because that would have been to hold by the Supreme Court that the title was in the United States, and, as the Attorney General admitted that the title was not in the United States, it became necessary for the Supreme Court to avoid both consequences of either of the alternative decisions. They did it by returning the case to the district court to be disposed of; and in the opinion of Mr. Justice Grier, a copy of which I hold in my hand, he cites the provision in the act of 1851, to which I have adverted, and under which it was supposed by some that Miranda, or any third party claiming title to the land claimed by the individual claimant before the court, could have intervened, and after referring to that proviso the court proceeded to say:

"It appears from the record that Valentine, who purchased the title of Miranda at sheriff's sale, had filed his claim before the board of commissioners for confirmation and afterwards withdrew his petition. Now, if Miranda or his assignee makes no claim, if he admits the tenancy and does not allege that Ortega has fraudulently overreached him, the Government surely has no right to claim that the land shall be considered as part of the public domain. It cannot set up Miranda to defeat Ortega, or the contrary, admitting it is must that either of them can show a claim worthy of confirmation in the absence of the other. Nor can third persons be admitted to interfere, to use the claim of one to defeat the other.

"If the heirs or assigns of Miranda object to the issuing of the patent to Ortega or his assigns their remedy is clearly pointed out. They can have their rights tried where the witnesses are known, where they may be examined ore tenus before the court or before a jury, if the court chooses so to do. They have a far better tribunal to settle this question than if they were permitted to appeal to this court to guess out the truth from conflicting depositions.

"Now, if this court should enter a judgment affirming that of the district court it would appear as if we had decided the title of Ortega to be superior to that of Miranda, and that Miranda was the tenant of Ortega. This we are unwilling to do, for if there be bona fide claimants of the Miranda title such a judgment might seem to conclude them. Nor can we reverse the judgment, for this would imply that we considered Miranda had the better title, and that he or his assigns might be justified in attempting to get the judgment of this court in their favor in this oblique and irregular manner under the protection of the Attorney General.

"We have concluded, therefore, to remand the record to the district court."

And it was done. The case came up again. The Senate will discover that the view taken of the act of 1851 by the court upon that appeal was that there was ample remedy for Miranda to have his title recognized and affirmed; that although upon the appeal of the United States he could not be permitted to intervene in the Supreme Court for the purpose of contesting the question there as between himself and Ortega, yet he could proceed under the authority of the proviso in the act of 1851 by presenting to the district court a petition with the particularity required by that act, in which the question could be decided whether the title ever passed out of Mexico, and, if it did pass out of Mexico, whether it was vested in Miranda.

The case came up again, and in the second decision the court evidently took a different view from that which they took upon the first appeal. In the second case they thought there was a right to intervene, and because there had been no intervention, they decided the case against Ortega then absolutely, the effect of which was, looking to the condition of things existing after that decision was pronounced, that the land became a portion of the public domain; for at the time of that decision the time had passed within which the claimant of the Miranda title could proceed to get his title affirmed under the authority of the act of 1851.

This I believe is the second time it has been before the Senate; I have not read the first report, but only the second report, and in it the committee say—and about that there cannot be two opinions, because the language of the treaty is plain, and such would have been the law if the treaty had not specifically so provided—if you obtain by cession territory belonging to another nation, or if you conquer it by war and hold your conquest, the individual titles to the lands which may be within the limits of the territory purchased or conquered still belong to the claimants. Private titles do not change. Nothing becomes the property of the succeeding power or of the conqueror, but that which belonged to the nation from whom the cession was obtained or from whom the territory was conquered. In other words, all the private rights of property either in real estate or in personal estate go into the hands of the grantee or of the conqueror, protected to the same extent that they are protected in the hands of the original owner. There can be no doubt about that.

But this treaty makes it still more obvious, if it could be made more obvious. This treaty provides in so many words that all claims to lands in California shall be recognized; that title shall be guaranteed; and the act of 1851 was passed for the purpose of carrying out that promise upon our part. It was to give effect to the obligation of the treaty. We told Mexico, "In our hands the owners of these lands will hold them just as absolutely as they could have held them under yours;" and we passed the act of 1851 merely for the purpose of ascertaining for ourselves who were the private owners, in order that we might ascertain what portion of the land ceded to the United States by Mexico was public domain. All therefore that the treaty obtained was public domain, was that portion of the territory ceded which had not been segregated from the public domain in the whole territory belonging to the republic of Mexico.

My friend from California [Mr. CONNESS] read us yesterday some resolutions passed by the Legislature of California. It is not at all to be wondered at that the State of California and all her authorities have been very anxious to have all these titles adjudicated. The very existence of the doubts which have been hanging over a great many of these titles from the time of the cession, and to a certain extent up to the present time, impedes the prosperity of California. Our people have gone from the Atlantic and from the West, in that spirit of enterprise which characterizes the American character, in search of fortune, and as a great many of these claims covered an immense extent of territory and were not evidenced by any ostensible boundary, they settled upon any portion of the territory that they saw in point of fact unoccupied, and they obtained what is known there as a "squatter title;" but like every other man who settles upon land to which it turns out the Government has no title, that the land is not vacant but appropriated, he takes it subject to the consequences of his having committed a mistake. Those people, therefore, who may now be within the limits of this grant, provided the grant is a good one, are there without the color of right in point of fact, not only without the color of right, but without the possibility of obtaining any right from the United States colorably unless the United States were willing to violate their treaty. I think I am almost, I was about to say, as partial to California as the honorable member [Mr. CONNESS] who represents the State with so much zeal and ability; yet there is one thing which I value even more than the immediate prosperity or increase in prosperity of California: it is the preservation of the public faith. In individuals it is all-important; in Governments it is essential.

The Supreme Court having decided that there is no right to these lands in the United States and never was any right in the United States, because the lands had been appropriated before by Mexico so as to segregate these particular lands from the public domain of Mexico, if we do not pass this bill we shall take advantage of a mistake into which these parties have fallen in some measure because of a mistake into which the Supreme Court had fallen in their construction of the act of 1851.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know exactly what the Senator means when he says that these parties fell into an error or mistake. Does he mean by their voluntarily withdrawing from the court of the board of land commissioners? I should like to have the Senator explain why those parties withdrew their case from the court of the board of land commissioners under an agreement to divide the proceeds in case the opposing title of Ortega had been confirmed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I can tell you, without knowing the circumstances to which the honorable member alludes.

Mr. CONNESS. I have got the papers here.

Mr. JOHNSON. That question is not before the Senate. That does not appear in the report, and I only speak of the case as this report presents it. But if I had been the counsel for these claimants, without any such agreement as he asserts, and upon information on which he relies, was made, I should not have deemed it necessary to present the claim before the land commission, and if I had presented the claim I should have withdrawn it, because I should have thought that the parties could intervene in the case of the claim of Ortega; and so the Supreme Court in the last case held; and it was to the benefit of the United States and to the benefit of the claimant. The United States are put to considerable trouble in the prosecution of these claims. It is better for them to have one title decided in one case than to have half a dozen cases before them, or brought to the courts involving but the one title.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will excuse me now, I shall not interrupt him again. I should like to have the Senator understand that this case of the Miranda title was not withdrawn from the board of land commissioners because they believed they could intervene, but because, as the record shows, they made a deliberate contract with the parties to the Ortega title that they would aid in the confirmation of the Ortega title, and then divide the proceeds evenly between them. The withdrawal, therefore, was not because they thought they could intervene, but because they thought they could fall into possession of a portion of the property under the Ortega title, which has since been rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, admit that. The Senator from Virginia will answer as to the fact. There is nothing in the report that I have seen about it. But suppose it to be so, ought the United States to take the land? That is the question. It touches the national conscience, and in my view it touches the conscience of each individual Senator. The Supreme Court have said, and the very effort of the parties who are trying to defeat this bill—I do not mean the Senator; I mean those who are interested—

Mr. CONNESS. There are no parties here opposing this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Those who are interested and who seek the defeat of the bill—they, by opposing this bill, evidence their apprehension or their conviction that if the case is permitted to be heard, the title will be decided to be in Miranda and in those who claim under Miranda.

But, Mr. President, whether it is in the one or the other, the Supreme Court have held, irrespective of any agreement which may have been made as the condition upon which the claim of Miranda was withdrawn from the board of land commissioners, that the United States have no title; and the whole object of this bill is to ascertain which of the two claimants has title; that is all. My friend's course places the nation in the attitude of holding on to this land as their own after the highest court in the land has decided unanimously that it is no part of the lands belonging to the United States under that treaty, but belongs to individual proprietors. As between private parties, what would be the morality which would govern the decision in a case of that description? Suppose there are in the hands of the honorable member from California $10,000. My friend from Virginia claims it as his, and I claim it as mine. We submit it to the Senator from California. He decides that it is not mine, but it belongs to the honorable Senator from Virginia; "but," he says, "it becomes very convenient that I should keep it for myself; I have no title to it; it was not put in my hands as my property; but I have got it, and as he has lost," (if that should be the case,) "the opportunity of getting it out of my hands by some statute of limitations, I will hold on to it." Nobody would more instantaneously revolt from such conduct as that, which my friend will pardon me even for supposing him to have been capable of, than the honorable member from California; and yet that is the case substantially which the United States will have in foro conscientie if she holds on to these lands, or issues patents to those who are squatted upon the lands under the supposition that she has had title.

I have said all that I propose to say, Mr. President.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire to say a word in this connection. It becomes my particular duty, having—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY.) The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, the unfinished business of yesterday, the report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. McDUGALL. I shall be through in five minutes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think the Indian appropriation bill comes up regularly this morning, and we can dispose of it very soon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Indian appropriation bill was under discussion yesterday and was laid over informally, in order to take up the report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood that the Indian bill was simply laid aside informally, by unanimous consent, without being displaced, in order to consider the conference report, and therefore the Indian appropriation is really before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that my colleague, the chairman of the committee on Military Affairs, who is not in his seat, has actually gone into the other House in order to confer on this very matter, and therefore I will suggest that the Army appropriation bill be allowed to lie over for a few moments, and that the Senate should proceed with the other bill.

Mr. McDUGALL. I have no objection.

Mr. CARLILE. If my friend from California will give way, I desire to relieve the Senate from any attempts hereafter on my part to get this bill up in the morning hour, by moving to postpone all prior orders. I think Senators can now see that the bill can be disposed of in a very few minutes. The Senator from California can have another opportunity to speak on this subject. I am not willing to interfere with the appropriation bills. I will ask the Senate, therefore, in order that I may not have to trouble them again in the morning hour, that the bill which has just been under consideration may be made the special order for Monday next at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Why not finish it now?

Mr. CARLILE. Because Senators want to take up the appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOOT. The Indian appropriation bill I suppose to be the order of the day as the unfinished business of yesterday. The conference report was interposed by unanimous consent, but it left the Indian appropriation bill as the regular business of the day and unfinished. Is that the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the business now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 240) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1865, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, to the amendment offered by Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs. The amendment of Mr. DOOLITTLE was to add the following section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend such part of the amount herein appropriated to carry into effect any treaty stipulation with any tribe or tribes of Indians, all or any portion of whom shall be in a state of actual hostility to the Government of the United States, including the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminoles, the Wichitas and other affiliated tribes, as may be found necessary to support such individual members of said tribes as have been driven from their homes, or reduced to want on account of their friendship to the United States, and enable them to subsist until they can support themselves in their own country: Provided, That an account shall be kept of the sums so paid for the benefit of the said members of said tribes, which account shall be rendered to Congress at the commencement of the next session thereof; and all purchases of articles for the purposes above set forth shall be made of the lowest responsible bidder after sufficient public notice by advertisement in appropriate newspapers: Provided also, That the said Secretary shall not be required to accept any bid which is, in his judgment, unreasonable in its character.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, proposed to amend the amendment by adding the following proviso:

Provided further, That no part of said annuities shall be expended outside of the Indian country, or in connection with their removal to that country.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to state that the Committee on Indian Affairs have agreed to a substitute for that proviso to remove all difficulty. It is to insert at the end of the amendment as a further proviso the following:

Provided further, That no part of said annuities shall be expended for Indians outside of the Indian Territory, south of Kansas, except in providing for such individual Indians or families as are sick and unable to remove to that Territory, or such as may be driven out of that Territory by armed rebels after the passage of this act.

The yeas and nays were ordered upon the amendment that I offered yesterday. With the consent of the Senate I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I now withdraw that proviso, and offer this one as an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The committee offered an amendment substantially confiscating the annuities of the rebel Indians to be used by the Department for the benefit of the loyal Indians. The Senator from Kansas now moves a proviso that that money shall not be used outside the Indian Territory unless in the cases mentioned, by those who are sick and unable to go to the Indian Territory, or those that shall be driven out of the Indian Territory by the rebels. With that qualification I do not know that there is any objection to the proviso.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 53, line twelve hundred and ninety-two, I move to strike out the words "and fifty" before and after the word "thousand;" so that the clause will read:

For subsistence and clothing, and general incidental expenses of the Sisseton, Wahpeton, Medawakanton, and Wahpakoata bands of Sioux or Dakota Indians, at their new homes, $100,000.

The bill, as it comes to us from the House of Representatives, appropriates $150,050 to the support of the Sioux who made war upon us in Minnesota, precisely the same sum that used to be due to them under the old annuities which belonged to them, which we in fact confiscated to the Government in consequence of their hostilities. It is necessary that some sum of money should be appropriated, but I do not think that we ought to appropriate a sum equivalent to the interest on those annuities, for it might be claimed that such action on the part of Congress would be substantially a repeal of the law confiscating their annuities heretofore; and I think, with the amount which we allowed yesterday by way of making up deficiencies in their support, $100,000 will be enough; and I therefore move to reduce the appropriation to that amount.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have another amendment to offer from the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is to add as an additional clause to the bill:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims and carry into effect the provisions of the second article of the treaty of May 30, 1854, with the confederated tribes of Kaskaskia, Peoria, Piankeshaw, and Wea Indians, $3,164 51.

I will explain the amendment to the Senate. By the second article of the treaty referred to, it was agreed that we should survey the boundary lines of the lands of this tribe of Indians. When we came to survey them, the surveyor, in behalf of the United States, made a mistake and excluded from the reservation lands which really belonged to the Indians. We went on and sold the lands and received the pay for them. When the survey came to be corrected, it was found that the lands actually belonged to the Indians; and this is the amount, $3,164 51, which is necessary to settle that matter between the United States and this Indian tribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Committee on Indian Affairs have instructed me to move another amendment, which is a very important one. It is to strike out the following clause on page 52:

For payment of interest on $1,704,300 of non-paying stock held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for various Indian tribes up to and including the interest payable July 1, 1864, $350,220.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have not before me all the treaties made with the Indians on this subject; but I have a copy of a treaty made in May, 1854, with the Weas and Kaskaskias, the seventh article of which I desire to read to the Senate:

"ART. 7. The annual payments provided for in article six are designed to be expended by the Indians chiefly in extending their farming operations, building houses, purchasing stock, agricultural implements, and such other things as may promote their improvement and comfort, and shall so be applied by them. But at their request it is agreed that from each of the said annual payments the sum of $500 shall be reserved for the support of the aged and infirm, and the sum of $2,000 shall be set off and applied to the education of their youth; and from each of the first three there shall also be set apart and applied the further sum of $2,000 to enable said Indians to settle their affairs. And as the amount of the annual receipts from the sales of their lands cannot now be ascertained, it is agreed that the President may, from time to time, and upon consultation with said Indians, determine how much of the net proceeds of said sales shall be paid them, and how much shall be invested in safe and profitable stocks, the interest to be annually paid to them, or expended for their benefit and improvement."

A large body of valuable lands in the State of Kansas belonging to those Indians was sold by the Government for their benefit for gold and silver. That money was brought to Washington and placed in the Treasury of the United States, with the understanding and explicit agreement that it should be invested in such profitable stocks as should be determined upon after consultation with the Indians. No such consultation was had, as was in evidence before our committee, and $98,000 of the money of this tribe was invested in the bonds of northern States—good States. When the thieves of rebellion set upon the Treasury they took out those bonds and exchanged them for the bonds of Florida, Louisiana, North Carolina, and South Carolina. The interest, of course, is suspended. They require it for their subsistence, so far as this tribe is concerned, and I suppose it is the case with all the other tribes. Let me read a few words from the seventh article of the treaty to which I have referred again:

"It is agreed that the President may, from time to time, and upon consultation with said Indians, determine how much of the net proceeds of said sales shall be paid them, and how much shall be invested in safe and profitable stocks, the interest to be annually paid to them, or expended for their benefit and improvement."

This tribe lives upon the Kansas border and has been stripped of everything. This interest is necessary for their subsistence and support. So strong did the Committee on Indian Affairs deem their claims that they agreed upon a bill to give to this particular Indian tribe $5,000, not to be counted upon this interest. As we have agreed in this treaty to pay this interest, and as the money was invested without consultation with the Indians, as was agreed in the treaty, I say the honor of the country and the good faith of the nation demand that we should adopt this clause as it came to us from the House of Representatives, appropriating the money to pay this interest.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator from Kansas makes the statement a little too broad when he says that so clearly convinced were the Committee on Indian Affairs of the justice of the claim of the Indians to whom he alludes that they agreed to give them $5,000 in addition. I think it was because the Committee on Indian Affairs were not satisfied of the justice of this claim and did not wish to recognize it at all that they preferred making a temporary provision.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator from Missouri misunderstood me. I said that so strongly were the committee convinced of the necessities of this tribe that they agreed to present to them $5,000 for their temporary subsistence. The interest that would be due those Indians, if the proposition of the chairman should be disagreed to, will be, I believe, about fourteen thousand dollars. The interest that would be paid under the treaty, as agreed to by the House of Representatives and as agreed to by the Finance Committee, would only amount to $14,000; and the Committee on Indian Affairs agreed to present then, as a mere boon, $5,000 of that amount. So far as I am concerned, I think it would be best to carry out the provisions of this treaty in good faith. These people are suffering. They were not consulted with regard to the bonds. Their money was originally well invested, and really it was a theft on the part of the Government officers, it was really a felony, to exchange the bonds of the northern States, interest-paying bonds, for the bonds of these rebel States. I hope the amendment proposed by the chairman will not be agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Kansas objects to this amendment from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and bases that objection upon the facts which he states as bearing upon one particular tribe of Indians who have some $93,000 of these non-paying stocks, the interest of which it is computed would amount to $14,000, which is but a small item compared with the whole amount involved in this appropriation. As to those Indians whose case he has stated thus strongly, and whose case perhaps may stand more strongly than that of the other Indian tribes, when the matter was under consideration by the Committee on Indian Affairs, after looking into it, they came to the conclusion that it was not wise on the part of this Government to assume

But, Mr. President, the facts are these: this provision would recognize an existing indebtedness against the United States of $1,704,300, and it provides for an appropriation of $350,220 50 to meet interest which has already accrued upon that amount during some two years on some of them and on others for even a longer period. I will state the names of the tribes and the amount which was invested in these stocks for each, as appears by the Commissioner's report:

Mr. President, I admit there is a dark dispensation of Providence in regard to the Indian. He is fading before us as fast as civilization advances; but that providence can be traced, in a great measure, to the action of the Government itself; and this will only be adding to the calamities that have befallen the Indians. If you take his money and invest it so that he can get neither principal nor interest, you add another weight to the great burden that is already bearing him down. In this way you make the Indian lose entire confidence and faith in the Government. You cannot make an Indian—you can hardly make a white man—understand, if you take his money and agree to pay him interest year by year upon it, and when the year comes round and he comes and asks for it and you tell him you have invested it and lost it, that you are dealing with him in good faith. He does not believe in the Government or the individual that will take his money in good faith on his part for investment, and then, by some transaction of theirs, lose it. I say this will breed dissatisfaction among the Indians, and it will be a very just cause of dissatisfaction, too. We could hardly coax them to believe that such a Government as that was worth sustaining. I hope this question may be considered and voted upon fairly at this time by the Senate.

Thus it will be seen that the Government, in the purchase of these stocks, taking them altogether, made $100,000 for the benefit of the Indian tribes in the original investment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Is it in order to amend the original proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. POMEROY. Let us take a vote on it as it now stands.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am not prepared to take a vote upon it as it stands. I propose the following amendment to the clause proposed to be stricken out:

But no part of said appropriation shall be paid to any Indian tribe, any portion of which has been in rebellion against the Government.

I desire to state that there is but a small portion of this large amount that is held by loyal tribes. The mass of it is held by the Choctaws and Chickasaws who have been in rebellion against the Government. I wish now to ask the chairman of the committee the question that I proposed to ask when I rose before. It does not sound fairly upon my ear to have such a transaction as was had with the Weas and Kaskaskias indorsed by any member in this Senate; and I put this case to the chairman of the committee. I am guardian for a ward. I have in my possession $98,000 of good notes of solvent individuals as guardian; I make up my mind to run away; I take those good notes and sell them in the market for the money, and take that money and invest it in the hands of my companions who are about to run away with me; if any portion of my property was left behind, would not that property be liable to that debt?

Mr. JOHNSON. The United States did not run away.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. That portion of the United States did run away; the miserable hell-hounds who held these bonds ran away, but before they ran away they invested the money of these Indians, our wards, helpless men, women, and children, in violation of a plain and emphatic contract and treaty, in the property of the creatures who were running away with them; and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs stands up in his place in this Senate and says that that is an honest transaction, and that we ought not to repudiate the action of our villainous agents, and stand by our treaty made with these helpless creatures, who have by this war been rendered unable to help themselves! As has been remarked by my colleague, they are upon our border, they have been stripped of everything, and so strong a case was made before the committee that we agreed, instead of paying them their honest dues, $14,000, to present them $5,000. What sort of a transaction is that for business men? I owe a man $14,000; I say to him, "I will not pay you $14,000, but I will give you $5,000 to wait a little longer, as an act of charity."

There is but a very small portion of this amount held by loyal Indians, and under my amendment we cut off the amount held by disloyal Indians. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be adopted, and then I hope the action of the House of Representatives and the Finance Committee will be concurred in.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think the amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be found to diminish this appropriation one particle. I think it will be found just as easy to establish the loyalty of these Indians as it is to establish the loyalty of all other claimants that I have ever seen come before the United States. I do not, therefore, attach any practical importance to the amendment which he has offered.

So far as the question of recognizing the claim of these Indians in Kansas is concerned, I have only to state that the committee to which the matter was referred, after an investigation and examination of it, came to the conclusion that it was not a just claim against the Government; that it was not right that the Government should assume this debt. Therefore, as far as the question has been intrusted to the action of the committee of this body, their sentiment is against it, as has already been stated by the chairman of that committee.

Now, as this clause stands coming from the Committee on Finance, I understand it has been reported simply because the provision was in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, but that the members of the Committee on Finance concur in the propriety of having this clause stricken out. I trust the Senate will not now pass upon the validity of a claim which will set the precedent, perhaps, for we cannot tell how many claims, amounting to how many millions of dollars; but that if the question is to be decided it will be postponed, and will not be determined upon the bills which have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I trust, sir, that the Senate will concur in striking out this clause from the appropriation bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to make one remark in regard to the statement read by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. According to that statement $73,000 of the money of the Pottawatomie Indians of my State was invested the same as the $93,000 of the Weas. I should like to know how it is that the interest on that $73,000 is paid to the Pottawatomies. You commenced paying them in 1861. This same Committee on Indian Affairs—I do not mean the same members—have been able in some way, I do not know how, perhaps it was by treaty, as the Pottawatomies made a treaty—but in some way the Pottawatomies have had their payment year after year on the interest of $73,000 of these very bonds invested for their benefit; so that if this clause is allowed to remain in the bill it will be no precedent; the precedent has already been established.

Mr. SHERMAN. This large appropriation did not escape the attention of the Committee on Finance. I have not been present during the discussion this morning, and I do not know whether it was explained or not by the chairman of that committee. I do not see him in his seat. The matter was noticed; but as it came to the Senate in a House bill we did not feel it our duty to move to strike it out without a full examination of the claim. That we had not the time to make; nor was the Finance Committee the proper committee to investigate the propriety of the claim. It was therefore left in the bill without amendment; but the attention of the Indian Committee was to be called to it, so that they might examine the matter and pass upon the legality of the claim. The Finance Committee never investigated it, and certainly never gave their sanction to this claim in the sense in which a report of a committee is usually spoken of. I myself shall vote to strike it out on the general principle that I do not believe the United States is bound to guaranty the investments for the benefit of the Indians.

The United States stands toward these Indians precisely like a guardian of a ward. It is bound to use reasonable and due diligence in the care of the funds of the ward; no more, no less. The investment of this money in these bonds was not a bad investment at the time it was made. The secession of the States, and their failure to pay the interest, does not change the liability or make the United States the guarantor of those bonds. No such legal relations exist between the United States and the Indians.

I may here remark that the whole relation between the United States and the Indians is the most absurd that can probably be imagined. We treat these Indian tribes like foreign nations. We send our Governors and ex-Governors and other authorities to negotiate treaties with a people who cannot read or write, who do not know the difference between a dollar and a sovereign, without intelligence, who are dependent upon us for their daily bread. We treat them as we do the most favored nation. We negotiate treaties with them, bring them here, and have them ratified by the Senate.

The whole relation between the Indian tribes and the United States is the most ridiculous possible; and I hope some day or other a gentleman familiar with the subject will bring in a bill abolishing the whole system and providing for the government of the Indian tribes as subjects. Until we treat them as citizens and give them the right to vote, we ought to treat them as subjects to be governed, to be protected in their natural rights, to be looked after and watched over as children. We ought to protect them from our own people. The worst enemies they have got are our own people who go out there and rob and plunder them; and I ought to say further that from some information I have had, I believe the very worst enemies to these people in many cases are the men that the Government of the United States employs as agents to protect them; who rob and plunder them. That is my information; but the contact between the white and the Indian creates hostility. The white man looks upon the Indian as his natural enemy, as occupying land that ought to belong to himself. Our white people constantly encroach on them and do them great wrong. It is the duty of the Government of the United States to protect them. While we treat them as independent powers to be negotiated with, as a matter of course we cannot protect them. That matter, of course, cannot be changed now on this bill; but if the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs would report a bill to regulate our intercourse with the Indians, regarding them in the light of subjects or persons to be taken care of, he might do a great deal of good. The amount appropriated by this bill is $4,000,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator is mistaken. The whole amount of the estimates was $2,300,000. Perhaps we have added some $300,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The footing up of the clerk of the Committee on Finance, who is very accurate, is over $3,800,000. There is no doubt about the aggregate. The Indian appropriation bill, some two or three years ago, reached $3,000,000. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives contained appropriations to the amount of over $3,600,000; the Committee on Finance added one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty thousand dollars on account of new treaties, making an aggregate of about $3,800,000. The Committee on Indian Affairs have struck off a few items.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator must be mistaken. I had the estimates before me yesterday, examining them and looking into them, and they footed up but a little more than $2,300,000, less than they were last year. To be sure, the appropriations we added yesterday add something to that amount; but if this provision be stricken out it will leave the bill pretty much as it came to us so far as the amount of appropriations is concerned, about $3,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I take the footings of the clerk of the Committee on Finance, who is very careful. I have rarely known him to make a mistake of that character. The Senator says the bill appropriates $3,000,000. It has been estimated that all the Indians in the United States range somewhere between one and four hundred thousand; it is rather indefinite. We have no census of them. Even different Commissioners of Indian Affairs vary widely in their estimates of the number of Indians. The expense of taking care of them in our mode is very great indeed. The expense of taking care of the Indians per capita is much greater than the expense of managing our Government in peace times, including the Army and Navy, on the citizens per capita. We do not pay anything to the great body of the Indians; most of them are roaming over the plains of the West at no expense to the Government; and it is manifest, therefore, that those with whom we are brought in contact are the most expensive citizens or subjects of this country, and this mode of dealing with them is radically wrong. I think, therefore, before we appropriate any more money on doubtful claims in favor of the Indians, we should reconsider our whole Indian policy, reorganize it, put at the head of it some good Christian gentleman who will take care of the Indians as children, and I think with one or two million dollars we could then give them a great deal more relief, a great deal more protection than we do under the present system.

In conclusion I shall vote with the Committee on Indian Affairs in this matter, simply because the Committee on Finance have not investigated this subject; and if Senators base their votes upon the idea that the Committee on Finance have investigated and reported in favor of this proposition, they are mistaken. We did not do it, and could not have done it. We simply reported the bill back as it was without amendment, calling the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs to it. I shall vote with them to strike out this large appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the latter part of the remarks of the honorable member from Ohio perhaps have no direct application to the question before the Senate; but in relation to those remarks, when he tells us that it will be better to reorganize the whole system in relation to In-

Indians, and take them under our own charge, and govern them as subjects, I suppose he means to say that we are to take from them the right to manage their own concerns, and take from them all power of government whatsoever.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not enter into that; but to give my ideas a little more scope, I will say that I would give the right of self-government to the fullest extent, so far as they are able to exercise it, so far as they have intelligence. The Wyandottes and Delawares, and others of the Kansas tribes, would no doubt make respectable citizens; they take care of their affairs well. The Delawares have managed their affairs with such discretion that I believe they are the wealthiest people per capita in existence.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that perhaps my friend has fallen into an error when he charges the larger portion of the amount appropriated in this bill, which he says in the aggregate is some $3,800,000, to the debit of the Indians, and says that they cost us that sum or anything like it. Many of the appropriations that are found in this bill, and they are much the largest items in the bill, are for the purpose of carrying out treaties by which we have obtained from the Indians their lands, which are worth not only as much but more to us than we gave for them, and would sell for more at any time; but that has nothing to do with the particular question before the Senate. Whether the Committee on Finance had or had not this subject before them, is a matter no further important than is the weight to be attached to the opinion of that committee—very considerable, I know, and on most matters it is, as it should be, conclusive; but surely it ought to have no operation at all upon a question on which they have pronounced no decision, so that, if my friend is right, we are here without any opinion from the Committee on Finance on the question, and the matter is before us now as an original matter.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and he is followed in that view by the honorable member from Ohio, likens this case to the ordinary case of guardian and ward, trustee and cestui que trust; and yet it would seem to follow from an admission made by the honorable member from Ohio that to apply to these Indians the rules which operate as between trustee and cestui que trust, guardian and ward, would be very hard and very unjust. He has told us, and told us correctly, that these Indians are almost entirely ignorant, that they can neither read nor write, that they have no knowledge of business, and especially of such business as it becomes important that a man should be acquainted with when he is about to invest moneys in public stocks.

There are two classes of these investments, if I am correctly informed, as I think I am. Perhaps all the treaties provide that no portion of the money which the Government may receive from the sales of the land is to be invested by the Government except after consultation with the tribe. That is certainly true in reference to the treaty cited by the member from Kansas. I have the treaty before me, which relates, I believe, to a tribe upon the borders of Kansas, which contains the same provision—the treaty of the 30th of May, 1854:

"And as the amount of the annual receipts from the sales of their lands cannot now be ascertained, it is agreed that the President may from time to time, and upon consultation with said Indians, determine how much of the proceeds of said sales shall be paid them, and how much shall be invested in safe and profitable stocks, the interest to be paid annually to them or expended for their benefit and improvement."

That is, to be paid annually by the United States. Now, in relation to one of the tribes, a party to this treaty, their lands sold for $300,000 in coin. It came, of course, into the hands of the Treasury, and the whole of it was invested in stocks without consulting the Indians.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to ask the Senator whether he knows that they were not consulted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know it personally. I am not very intimate with the tribe.

Mr. POMEROY. Here is a statement of the chiefs that they were not consulted.

Mr. JOHNSON. The chiefs so state, and it has not been contradicted.

Mr. HARLAN. I think there was no evidence of that fact before the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then if the United States seek to avoid the obligation which would be upon them if they made the investment without consultation, upon the ground that they made it with consultation, I should rather think they ought to prove that they did consult. Now, in the absence of all proof the other way—

Mr. GRIMES. The question is whether we acted in good faith or not in making the investment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will come to that in a moment. In the absence of all proof on the part of the United States, and with an affirmation on the part of the Indians that they were not consulted, an affirmation not denied by the United States, the inference would be a legitimate one that they were not consulted.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the inference is directly the other way. The Government of the United States has paid officers living with the Indians, an agent living with each tribe. The Government has also a superintendent presiding over several of the tribes. It has a Commissioner of Indian Affairs to take a supervision of the whole subject, and a Secretary of the Interior who has supervision of his conduct. These are all sworn officers appointed by the Government to execute the laws, to execute these treaties. The presumption with me is that they have carried out in good faith their sworn obligation as officers of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a question of fact to be decided according to the views taken by Senators on the evidence before them, and I take a different view from that taken by the member from Iowa.

But, Mr. President, suppose it was so, suppose they were consulted, who were they? Helpless, ignorant, poor, dependent. We got their lands and we hold them. They have lost them, and they have lost the money because of the manner in which it was invested by us, either with or without their consent. Who selected the investments? The United States. What were the investments? Stocks of the States of the United States, not the ordinary stocks, but the stocks of component parts of the Government, virtually the stocks of the Government. Why are they not now paying interest? Is it because they are not able to pay interest? Certainly not. Why are they now in a state of rebellion? Why are they permitted to be or to have remained in a state of rebellion up to the present time? Is it the fault of the Indians? Under whose control were they? To whose power were they subjected? Under the control of the United States and subjected to the power of the United States, and the United States have proved up to this time unable to hold them to the discharge of their duty. Whose fault is that? It is not the fault of the Indians. The United States were bound to hold them; and the Indians consented, if they consented at all, upon the supposition that they would hold them. The United States, who know that they were so bound, who are now making efforts to carry out the obligation, tell them "These States of ours, component parts of the United States, are now failing to pay interest, because we do not make them as it was our duty to have made them, and we will not pay you a dollar." It is a hard measure of justice.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will not consider it an interruption, allow me to ask him—I am not sure that I understand him—does he state to the Senate that the Government of the United States was bound to compel the States to pay their bonds?

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator wait for an answer now?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Government was bound to keep them in the Union, and then they would have been paid. They could have been sued. That obligation the honorable Senator cannot deny, because he is raising armies by hundreds of thousands and expending money by millions for the purpose of complying with that obligation.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not perceive that the sequence follows that they would have paid their bonds if they had staid in the Union. They obligated themselves to pay their debts, but I do not know that the Government of the United States is under any obligation to compel them to pay them; and I do not know when or how we assumed that obligation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the United States could have sued them if the investment was made in the name of the United States; and if they were able to pay they could have been compelled to pay; and I never heard it doubted before that every southern State was able to pay before; like madmen, they rushed into this rebellion. If we had held them to their duty; if the man who preceded the present incumbent of the presidential chair had been faithful to his own duty, and stopped the rebellion, as I believe he might have done, and these States had remained in the Union, every dollar of these stocks would have been paid.

But there is another reason. The honorable member is not to be told, I am sure, that since the rebellion broke out these stocks would have sold, and sold for a very considerable sum. The stocks of every State in the Union, except, I believe, of South Carolina, were quoted in your market. You held them, you saw them going down from day to day, and you would not sell. As a faithful guardian, what ought you to have done? What would a court of chancery have said in a dispute between a ward and a guardian who had invested his ward's money in stocks good at the time of the investment, who did it in good faith, but who held on to the stocks from day to day, and month to month, and year to year, seeing that the stocks were falling in the market, until they became worthless? There is not a court of chancery in Christendom, governed by principles of equity, that would not have held him responsible for the loss.

Want of good faith is not the only ground upon which you hold a guardian or a trustee responsible. It is the want of reasonable care, which in the eye of a court of equity is evidence of want of good faith; not a want of good faith in the moral acceptance of those terms, but a want of equitable good faith. In other words, the guardian is bound to take care of the estate of his ward as a man of reasonable diligence and care would take care of his own estate; and if the court should come to the conclusion that a man of that description would have sold his stock, and the guardian had not sold the stock, he would be held responsible. These Virginia stocks, Tennessee stocks, North Carolina stocks, I believe are quoted yet; and for a great while after the rebellion broke out they were quoted almost as high as the northern stocks. When my friend from Iowa says that these officers are all expected as far as the investment is concerned to have done their duty, we are to go a little further than the original investment. Suppose they did; they consulted the Indians, and the investments were made in good paying investments and stocks that would now pay; those stocks were by the officers of the Government disposed of and the proceeds invested in other stocks, in southern stocks. What for? With what motive?

Mr. HARLAN. Will the Senator have the answer now?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARLAN. In some of these cases the bonds had matured, had become payable by the Government, and as the Government had obligated itself to invest the money in bonds and pay over the interest, as it became due and was collected by the Government, to the Indians, it became its duty as a guardian to reinvest the money, the paper in which they first invested having matured and been paid. Then in other cases they were able to procure a larger amount of interest by selling the bonds in which the money was first invested; in some cases, I remember, the money was invested in five per cent. bonds of the United States; the Secretary of the Interior deemed it to be for the advantage of the Indians to sell those bonds and invest the proceeds in State stocks that were paying some of them six and some seven per cent. In other cases they were able to buy the bonds at a discount and receive interest at a larger rate on the par value. Deeming the stocks good and that they would be ultimately paid, they regarded it as advantageous to the Indians to make this change and thus secure a larger amount of money to be disbursed from year to year in their support.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt about that. That is the case in very many instances, but were the Indians consulted about the change?

Mr. HARLAN. I think this is the only solitary case in all the treaties under which this fund arises in which the Government did obligate itself to consult with the Indians. It is the isolated case quoted by the Senator from Kansas and quoted by the Senator from Maryland. I know of none other; but if there are others, they are very few. The most of the treaties contain no such stipulation, and I presume that where the stipulation was made the consultation was had.

Mr. JOHNSON. A word more and I shall have done. I think of all the injustices—and I regret to feel myself obliged to say it—of all the injustice that has ever been perpetrated by man upon man the injustice perpetrated upon the Indians is the grossest. They are now reduced to some two or three hundred thousand. We have driven them away from coast to coast, from river to river, from forest to forest. As the feet of our adventurers advanced they were obliged to recede. They are now wanderers upon the earth's surface. These great western States, great now and in prospect to be still greater, have grown up as one of the results of the wrongs perpetrated upon these tribes. We have become a mighty nation, mighty now, as every day in which is continued the gigantic effort in which we are engaged to maintain the Government exhibits; and these poor creatures are houseless and homeless and penniless, the chase having proved insufficient to support them, and Christianized civility having driven them away from the lands that belonged to them. We are asked, because they are considered as not being strictly responsible, if their case could be brought into a court of justice for adjudication, to give them a modicum when compared with what we have received, to support them in the days which are yet left to them, during which their lives are to linger, and to linger in suffering and without hope; and we are told that we ought to take from them this, in the eye of the United States, miserable pittance. I protest against it for the credit of the Government. I protest against it in the name of humanity. I protest against it in the name of that higher humanity, Christian civilization. If there are any of them that have engaged in this rebellion exclude them; but those who have been faithful stand by them, and for the character of your country do naught to suffer them to starve, because you have taken from them the land which was theirs and thrown them upon the wilderness in which they are not able to live.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, by far the larger part of this appropriation has reference to Indians who have been in rebellion against the United States, joined with the traitors who undertook to destroy this Government, and I wish to suggest that in relation to the case which is particularly referred to by the Senator from Kansas, with regard to the Kansas Indians, the Weas, Peorias, and Piankeshaws, there is a separate bill pending, involving the question of their rights and equities, which, I think, had better be considered by the Senate by itself, and not undertake to have it involved in this appropriation bill and in this mass of appropriation which covers the rebellious tribes now at war with the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. They can be excluded by the amendment proposed.

Mr. POMEROY. The amendment now pending is to exclude from this appropriation all those in rebellion. That is the very amendment pending.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not satisfied to have the appropriation stand in that form; an appropriation which, on the face of it, acknowledges a debt against the United States of $1,700,000, and that we are liable to pay the interest on all these stocks. If ever we shall have peace with the Choctaws and the Chickasaws, and those Indian nations now at war with us, and engaged in this rebellion, we must make new treaties and new arrangements with them, and this very pending claim might be one of the means which could be used in making proper negotiations with those Indian tribes; and it had better not be settled now, independent of the consideration whether the Government should or should not become ultimately liable to pay the interest on these stocks. To those members of the Senate who believe that it is just that this Government should assume this debt, I appeal to say whether it is wise that it should appear on this appropriation bill. Ought it not to be stricken out and to stand by itself?

Mr. POMEROY. I reply by saying that such a bill has been before the Indian Committee all winter, and it has been impossible for us to get any report on the question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Committee on Indian Affairs did report on that bill, but they did not believe that even in the case of the Weas and Piankeshaws there was a just debt and obligation resting on the Government of the United States. That bill is before the Senate for its action. If the Senate should disagree with the committee, very well.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator proposes that we take the provision out of this appropriation bill in order that we may consider it on a bill that he reports against. That is precisely the state of the case. I intended to say that we have been trying all winter to get a favorable report and could not do it. We finally got an unfavorable report, and the chairman of the committee now proposes that we shall consider the question on an unfavorable report of his!

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not ask the question to be considered on the report, but on the facts and the justice and equities of the case. If the Senate shall think, when the question is fully discussed, that as to the Weas and Piankeshaws there is an obligation resting on the Government to assume that debt, let them discuss that question by itself, and decide it on its merits. If they decide against the committee, very well. If they decide with the committee, that will be the end of it.

But, Mr. President, I desire to say a single word in reply to the Senator from Maryland. I know that men are accustomed to speak of what are called the wrongs perpetrated by the people of the United States upon the Indian tribes. Sir, I do not deny that wrongs are sometimes perpetrated upon them, perhaps by the Government agents sometimes; but the legislation of Congress, and the treaties that have been made by the Government of the United States, have always attempted to provide for and to take care of the Indian tribes, and such has been the history of all our treaties and all our legislation from the beginning. It is true that we have not succeeded in preserving the Indian tribes; but the difficulty is not in the treaties that we have made, nor in the legislation which we have passed. The difficulty is in the case itself. We are a different race. God, in His providence, has opened this New World to the colonization of a different race from that which inhabited it when our forefathers first landed upon the shores of New England. From the day of their landing down to the present hour, the Indian race has been a dying, dying, dying race, and it is fast passing away. It is not that the Government has inflicted wrong; it is not that the Government has not legislated in their interest; that it has not appropriated money liberally and bounteously for the Indian tribes during their whole history; but it grows out of the case itself, the contact of the two races side by side upon the frontiers of Christian civilization.

What do we see, sir, in the relations between the white man and the Indian? We see two classes of men seeking association with the Indians. There is the missionary, and there is the trader and the speculator. The one you may say is the child of Heaven, the other the child of the devil; and they go on the borders of what we call Christian civilization, and between the operations of them both the Indians are continually passing away. There is a great deal of poetry expressed in the old song which we heard in our youth, sung by the Indian chief:

"Oh, why should the white man follow my path,
Like a hound on a tiger's track?
Does the flush on my dark cheek waken his wrath?
Does he covet the bow at my back?"

There is poetry in this, and there is fact in it also. But as a race they are passing away and giving place to another race with a higher civilization, who are to take possession of the country and fill it up with millions, instead of having this vast continent of ours covered by a few hundred thousand wandering savages, hunting through the forests and fishing in the streams. God in His providence is giving this continent to a hundred millions of human beings of higher civilization, of greater energies, capable of developing themselves, and doing good to themselves and the world, and leading the advance guard of human and Christian civilization. In the poetry in which men sometimes indulge when they speak of the terrible wrongs and sufferings which are inflicted, I may say that the Indian race is passing and fading away before the advancing white race on this continent as the mists before the rising sun. It is almost altogether poetry, and such is history and the experience of the country.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio that it is very possible that our intercourse with the Indian tribes and our legislation might be improved, but it is a very difficult thing, let me assure the honorable Senator, the whole experience of this Government has shown it, to ascertain precisely how it is best to deal with the Indian tribes. By the Constitution of the United States they are placed under the Government of the United States. You cannot turn them over to the States. The most convenient mode in the world to get rid of this whole Indian difficulty would be, if the Constitution would allow it, to say, let each State take care of its own Indians, and let this Government be rid of the responsibility altogether. But the Constitution imposes on this Government the responsibility of providing for them, and in doing it our whole history and practice has been to deal with the Indian tribes in the form of treaties. I will say to my honorable friend from Ohio that circumstances are very different now from what they were at the beginning, when we were a little feeble people just skirting the shores of New England, and many of these Indian tribes were powerful nations, and had power enough to sweep us from the continent. We were glad to deal with them then as independent nations, and as our equals, too, in power; but that time has passed. They are now a feeble people, and we are a great and powerful people.

It may be, as the Senator suggests, that a better system than the treaty system might be adopted. Perhaps by some general legislation we could place the Indian tribes under the control of this Government; but if you do so you must first settle the question, shall the War Department take possession of them, or shall the Interior or some other Department? If the War Department takes and keeps possession of them, which perhaps is the wisest policy, it is by no means a more economical policy than the policy pursued by the Secretary of the Interior. We know very well that some of the moneys which are expended in relation to the Indian tribes are wasted and squandered; I have no doubt that dishonest men get the administration of the funds, and use them to their own benefit sometimes; but upon the whole, bad as it is, I believe that it is as economical as the War Department would administer the same business of taking care of the Indian tribes. There are some reasons why I think it would be better they should be under the War Department than the Interior Department, because the Indian, being a savage, looks to the man who has physical force and power, and he looks to a military man with more respect than he does to a civilian; and perhaps under the control of the War Department they might be better managed than they are under the Interior Department; but I doubt whether they would be managed any more economically.

In relation to the amount involved in this appropriation bill, as I desire not to have anything misunderstood on this subject, I will state it precisely as it is. The clerk of the Committee on Finance made a mistake in looking into the estimates. He judged by the book containing estimates, and counted all under the head of "miscellaneous," which contains some other matters different from the Indian appropriations; he included all under "miscellaneous appropriations for the Interior Department." The amount of estimates for the present year is $2,367,077; last year the estimates were $2,657,000. The estimates for the present year are $289,000 less than last year.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that only includes appropriations for treaties.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, it includes everything. If this amount should be stricken from the bill, which is $350,220, and the amounts which were added by the amendments yesterday remain, which are $515,182 or thereabouts, the bill will be about three million dollars, or a little less.

I hope this amendment will prevail, and this clause be stricken from the bill; and to the Senator from Kansas I say frankly that if he desires at any time to call up the question to which he referred, and let the Senate pass on the merits of it, in relation to the Weas and Piankeshaws, whose case stands perhaps rather stronger than any of the other tribes, I am willing to vote with him to take that matter up, and let the Senate determine it.

Mr. POMEROY. How in regard to paying the Pottawatomies?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand that that should be done. If there has been a new treaty formed with the Pottawatomies, that is a different matter; my attention has not been called to it; I do not remember what the Senator refers to.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to submit a few words on this question. It is not new to the Committee on Indian Affairs, nor to the Senate. Three years in succession Congress has declined to pay the interest on these bonds, and that after a thorough examination by the committee to whom the subject belonged. Three years ago the Committee on Indian Affairs detailed members of that committee to examine the treaties and all the laws bearing on the subject. This sub-committee did so, and made their report to the committee. The judgment of the sub-committee was approved by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was subsequently approved by the Senate and by Congress. The ground on which the committee came to this conclusion was this: the officers of the Government invested this money under treaty stipulations for the Indians, as guardian or trustee for the Indians; and that as such, if they exercised reasonable care and due diligence and ordinary intelligence in making the investment, they did not become individually responsible or render the Government responsible as guarantors of the paper in which the money was invested. And after listening to the speech of the learned and able Senator from Maryland, I am not shaken in my confidence in the correctness of that conclusion. We obligated ourselves by treaty stipulation to invest this money in safe stocks, and to pay over the interest, as it should fall due and be collected, to the beneficiaries of the trust. We made the investment in good faith, exercising reasonable care and due diligence and ordinary intelligence. The investment at the time was a safe investment, a good investment; the interest was collected by the officers of the Government and paid over to the wards.

But the paper has since become bad. The States owing these bonds have not paid the interest for two or three years past. The States are in rebellion, and the Senator from Maryland argues that on that account, on account of the rebellion of some of the States whose bonds were purchased and their failure to pay interest, this Government is bound to pay the interest. He says we are under obligations to compel these States to pay their debts; and insists that I, among others, have indirectly admitted this conclusion by voting large sums of money and immense armies to compel those States to stay in the Union. I cannot perceive any connection between the two facts. The one is an obligation of the States to pay their debts; the other an obligation of the people of the United States residing within the limits of the rebellious States to obey the laws and Constitution of the United States. I know it was maintained by British creditors of the State of Mississippi and some other repudiating States many years since that this Government of the United States ought to pay the debts contracted by the defaulting States, but I believe that that demand was never countenanced by any American statesman or by the Government of the United States. And never since until to-day, as far as I know, has any one admitted the validity of such a claim. To admit that it is the duty of this Government to compel the individual States of the Union to pay their debts is but another mode of stating the proposition that the United States is the guarantor of their paper. This is a proposition so dangerous to the very existence of this Government that it surprises me to hear it from the Senator from Maryland. [Mr. JOHNSON.] Each State contracts debts at its own discretion. Heretofore it has been supposed that the obligation to pay these debts was thus imposed on the people of the State contracting them; but if the Senator is right in supposing that the people of all the States become obligated to pay any and all debts contracted by an individual State, it would follow that any State of the Union might by its prodigality bankrupt the nation. I cannot, for one, vote to indorse any such doctrine.

But then the Senator maintains that we held these bonds too long, that as faithful guardians we ought to have sold the bonds as soon as the rebellion commenced, that they could have been cashed at something even since that period. This is not a question of law, but is a question of discretion, and on that point I beg leave to differ with the Senator. As the trustee of this fund, the party holding these bonds for the benefit of the Indians, I do not deem that it would be wise to sell them in the market at this time, nor that it would have been wise at any time since the rebellion commenced. I have full faith that we shall succeed in compelling the people of the rebellious districts to submit to the laws and the Constitution of the United States, that they will be again States of the Union, obedient to the Constitution and the laws; and when that time shall arrive these bonds of course will be worth more in the market than at present; they will then sell for more in the market than they will now command. But supposing, what I think never will happen, that the rebellious States should maintain their separate existence, and should become an independent nation, even in that case the bonds would be worth more in the market than they now are. That would not release the States from the obligations to pay these bonds. They are obligations contracted by them in their State capacity. State obligations will not be vacated on account of a separation, if such a thing were possible; so that, looking at this question from every stand-point taken by the Senator from Maryland, I think his positions are untenable.

But the Senator concludes his speech, as if he distasteful the soundness of his logic, by an indignant protest against the course which has been pursued by the Government for the last three years in relation to these bonds, and says that he does this in the name of these poor helpless Indians. He says we have plundered these children of the forests and the prairies of their lands, of their country, of their homes, of their wealth, and demands to know if we will now withhold from them what we owe them. This, Mr. President, is an assumption of the whole question in controversy. It assumes that the United States owe the Indians the par value of these bonds, when in the opinion of the Committee on Indian Affairs, after a full, candid, and thorough examination of the subject, no such obligation exists. If the committee is correct in the conclusion that this Government is under no obligations to pay these bonds, then refusing to pay the interest is no wrong; and if not a wrong, then his indignation is misapplied so far as this transaction is concerned.

But he would make the Senate and the country believe that we have been depriving them of their land, robbing them of their patrimony, taking from them their possessions, and amassing fortunes for our own people, and aggrandizing ourselves at their expense. I do not agree with him. I have read much of this in books and some little in poetry; but having been born on the frontier, and having become somewhat acquainted with these people from contact with them, I am not prepared to indorse the Senator's poetic notions of their character, nor his denunciations of the conduct of the Government. Who would have given more for these Indian lands than was paid by the United States? He says we have been robbing these Indians in the purchase of their land. I repeat, who would have paid more for their land than has been paid by the United States? When purchased they were an unbroken wilderness, without roads or bridges or means of egress or ingress, inhabited by savages and wild beasts, with none of the necessary appendages and conveniences of civilized life in reach. Who could have been induced to make such a purchase? Certainly no one not able to subdue a wilderness, and this required the energy and power of a nation. These lands were at the time of the purchase perfectly worthless in the market, and have become valuable only after the expenditure of hundreds of millions of money and the application of the labor and toil of vast multitudes of frontier settlers who have exhausted the energies of a lifetime in rendering the country inhabitable. Sir, this glorification of the Indian character, and the poetic tale of his wrongs inflicted by this Government in the purchase of their lands, is all a chimera, a phantom of a poetic brain. We have paid to these Indians and invested for their benefit millions of money for lands that to them were valueless at the time in the markets of the world, and have thus brought to their doors all the arts of a Christian civilization.

It is said in vindication of the idea suggested by the Senator from Maryland that these people have been melting away. That is true, and it is true of every savage people that come in contact with civilized nations and attempt to maintain their separate existence. If they refuse to merge into and become a part of the superior race, they must necessarily be destroyed. It is a law of humanity that is not necessarily involved in the decision of the question now pending before the Senate.

But the Senator in the conclusion of his speech admitted that the larger portion of this money would be due and payable to those who have been and still are in rebellion against the Government of the United States, and appeals to us to pay at least the interest on the bonds held for the benefit of the loyal tribes. On what principle shall this be done? I have attempted to show, as the committee believe and as the Senate has heretofore maintained, that we are under no legal obligation to pay it to the loyal tribes more than to the disloyal. If the legal obligation does not exist, on what principle does he demand the payment of interest on the principal of those bonds which are the property of loyal tribes? It cannot be demanded on the principles of humanity, for several of these tribes are wealthy; they own more property per capita, as has been said to-day, than the people of the United States at large. Some of them are poor, very poor, and for these provision has been made in a different manner. By an amendment to this bill proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, we have virtually confiscated the annuities due to the disloyal tribes and authorized the proper officers to pay them over to the loyal Indians in all cases of suffering where, on the principles of humanity, relief is required. This provision embraces all the refugee Indians who have been driven from their homes. And nearly all of the remaining tribes who hold any of these bonds are comparatively wealthy, and are sufficiently provided for out of their own funds of a different character; and in the few cases of tribes owning any of these bonds, who are otherwise really poor and need assistance, the committee has proposed direct appropriations from the Treasury which the Senate has thus far approved; so that looking at this question as a humanitarian, giving full scope to the feelings of kindness and benevolence which ought to characterize the conduct of a great nation in its intercourse with a weak and feeble people, I can perceive no sufficient reason for rejecting the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs; it appears to me to be a proper one, and, as I think, ought to be sustained by the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish only to reply to a remark made by the chairman of the Indian Committee, and by the Senator from Ohio, that the whole system is bad, which is very likely, and that the Indians are especially badly treated by the agents sent out by this Government, which is unquestionably correct to a great extent. They frequently have, unfortunately, bad agents, dishonest agents; but I want to remind the Senators that while these agents and the wicked traders of whom they speak take a portion of the Indians' annuities, pilfer perhaps a dollar or a hundred dollars, this amendment now proposes to take the whole. In regard to the tribe to which we have had particular reference there is not a dollar appropriated by this bill to them, and this Government has got $319,000 of their money. Senators are virtuously indignant that a few traders or agents should take a few dollars or a few hundred dollars year by year from these tribes; but, sir, their crime whitens into innocence, it becomes pure as the light, when compared with this transaction of confiscating the whole property of loyal, faithful Indians who have been true to the Government and have responded even to the call of the country in furnishing soldiers for the Army. I submit to Senators whether there can be much fairness in the argument of men who become indignant over the stealing of a few dollars and lead in a measure that takes the whole property of these Indians. I have not any apology to make for men who steal the annuities year by year, and much less can I make an apology for the Senate or for a committee that proposes to take the whole property of these Indians as is now proposed by this amendment.

Mr. President, we sustain such relations to these people that they are in our hands as perfectly and as entirely dependent as the infant is in the hands of the parent, and we can at any time crush them by withholding what is just to them, or we can sustain them and save them according to the dictates of humanity and religion.

Mr. HARLAN. I know the Senator from Kansas would not mislead the Senate intentionally.

Mr. POMEROY. No.

Mr. HARLAN. He has stated there is no appropriation in this bill for the Indian tribe to which he refers, and leads us to infer that consequently they are to get nothing. That case stands in this way: most of their funds are invested in bonds held by us, and the interest as it becomes due is paid over to them, and consequently no appropriation is necessary.

Mr. POMEROY. Does the Senator mean to say that most of their funds are so invested?

Mr. HARLAN. I understand the greater part of them are. Ninety thousand dollars is in the bonds to which he has referred; but over two thirds of the amount is in interest-paying bonds, and they are receiving the interest annually.

Mr. POMEROY. They had in addition $25,000 Pennsylvania bonds which the Government made haste to sell even last year; and that money is all the money which has been paid over to the tribe.

Mr. WILKINSON. With the permission of the honorable Senator from Kansas I should like to ask him what Indians he is referring to?

Mr. POMEROY. To the confederate bands of Weas, Kaskaskias, Piankeshaws, and Peorias.

Mr. GRIMES. Why were the Pennsylvania bonds sold?

Mr. POMEROY. On account of the necessities of the tribe. Here is a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. They were sold because the tribe were destitute, and that was the only means the Government had to relieve them.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The sale of the bonds was authorized by a special act.

Mr. POMEROY. The Commissioner says:

"The condition of said tribe is such, caused by losses sustained in consequence of the war and the non-payment of interest on bonds held in trust for them by the Department of the Interior, that they cannot be subsisted without an appropriation of some means for that purpose. Could an appropriation for the interest due them upon said bonds be made, it would relieve a suffering people, and, at the same time, be doing an act of justice toward them."

We cannot disguise the fact that we hold the money belonging to that tribe and other tribes in our hands. To be sure we invested it. They told us we might, on consultation with them, invest it. We have done it without consultation, in violation of the treaty; and when their distress came upon them, the Government had $25,000 of Pennsylvania bonds which were available, and in their necessities the Government got a special act passed by which they might sell the Pennsylvania bonds. They did sell them. They have had that. That was last year. For the purposes of this year I say there is no appropriation in this appropriation bill to meet the necessities of this tribe. The argument against this clause is that it will commit the Government to pay the whole debt. I do not infer any such thing. The Senator from Iowa has just said that the interest on these bonds was paid regularly until within a few years past, and he hopes it will be paid again in a few years to come. So do I. All we ask of the Government is to pay the interest accruing during these few years. We do not ask them to assume the principal. We ask that during these few years, while these States are not paying, the Government shall pay the pittance to the Indians according to its agreement, according to the stipulations of the treaty. When these bonds become interest-paying again, as the Senator says they will—he is rather more hopeful than I am about it—the Government of course will be relieved from any further advance in this direction.

Mr. WILKINSON. I shall not detain the Senate long in regard to this amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to strike out this clause of the bill:

For payment of interest on $1,704,300 of non-paying stocks held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for various Indian tribes up to and including the interest payable July 1, 1864, $350,220 50.

This applies to some stocks which were purchased under the old Democratic organization of the Government when southern men ruled this country. They invested pretty much all the money that was due to the Indians in southern stocks, the stocks of Florida and of South Carolina, and sometimes in the bonds of southern towns and cities and villages. They invested a large amount in the stocks of the city of Wheeling. I would not say that they were looking forward to this rebellion when they were doing these things; but it ran along for several years until Mr. Manypenny, of Ohio, was Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and then he invested the money which was in his hands in Ohio stocks. He was from that State, and I am happy to say that I think he was an honorable and upright man. Since the breaking out of this rebellion three years ago the same question which is now presented has been considered, whether the Government should assume to advance the interest on these State bonds and other stocks held in trust for the Indians. We decided two years ago after very full consultation and consideration in the Indian Committee that it was wrong, and the Senate and Congress sustained the action of that committee by deciding that the Government was not legally bound to pay this interest, and that under the circumstances it was not morally bound to pay it.

The Cherokee Indians held $655,500 of these stocks, and the Choctaws held $452,000, making $1,100,000 of those stocks held by those two tribes. At the battle of Pea Ridge the Cherokees had an entire regiment in that fight on the part of the rebels, and the Choctaws had eight full companies. Those two tribes of Indians held the larger portion of these stocks.

The Senator from Maryland says we ought to pay this interest because we allowed the rebellion to break out, and because we have not put it down. Sir, this money does not come out of James Buchanan; it comes out of the people of the country; and I apprehend that they have done everything in their power to put down this rebellion, and they will continue to do so.

If we are not called upon legally and morally to pay this money, why should we impose this tax of $300,000 now upon the people of this country? The Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] urges the case in behalf of the confederate tribes in Kansas. It is true that they own a small amount of these bonds, and a bill was introduced here providing that the Government should assume the payment of the bonds and pass to the credit of those Indians the sum of $80,000. The committee did not wish to assume that position under the circumstances; and hence they decided that they would relieve those Indians for the time being, and the Senator from Kansas who is a member of the committee [Mr. LANE] agreed that the sum of $5,000 was sufficient for this purpose. At least I understand him so. After the committee decided that it was not wise to establish now the precedent of assuming the payment of the non-interest paying bonds held in trust for the Indians of Kansas, it was agreed that we should advance to them whatever sum might be necessary for their temporary relief, and I understand that the Senator from Kansas agreed to the sum fixed by the committee, $5,000, as being sufficient.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Does the Senator desire an answer now?

Mr. WILKINSON. Either now or when I get through; it is immaterial. I so understood, but I may be mistaken in that regard. The tribes in Kansas own but very few of these bonds, and the committee thought it better, instead of acknowledging the principle that the Government was liable for them, to pay them what might be necessary for their support. Nearly all these bonds are held by Indians who entered into this rebellion. Before Mr. Lincoln took his oath of office Albert Pike went among the Choctaw and Cherokee Indians and exerted such influence among them that they repudiated this Government and went in for the agents sent out there by the rebel government.

I presume that when the Government invested these moneys for the Indians it invested them in good faith. No one claims that we are in law bound to pay the money. We do not owe the debt. The bonds were on deposit in the proper department of the Government for the benefit of the Indians; and the interest as it was received upon the bonds was always paid to the Indians, and would be now if we received the interest. Are guardians responsible for the acts of God or for the acts of the king's enemy? The honorable Senator from Maryland did not answer that question when he was discussing the law in this regard. I say a trustee is not liable for the acts of the enemies of the Government. There is no legal liability in the case, and the question now is whether it is wise for us to establish this precedent when the greater proportion of these bonds belong to Indians who are in rebellion.

I know that it is popular for gentlemen to talk about the poor Indian; I know that it is popular to invoke for the poor Indian the sympathy of the Christian world. The Senator from Ohio said that the whole Indian system was wrong and ought to be altered. Perhaps it ought to be altered; but when that Senator can alter the physical geography of this country, when he can alter the character of the American people, when he can say that they shall not emigrate to new regions, when he can say that they shall not run in among the Indians, then he can get up a system that will be regular and operate with perfect harmony all over this country. But I say, Mr. President, you should take into consideration the character of this nation; that it is utterly impossible to get up a system that shall regulate the Indian affairs all over this country and carry them on smoothly and harmoniously for all time to come. The character of the Indian country is changing every six months. A gold mine is discovered upon an Indian reservation and you may as well undertake to dam up the Mississippi river and prevent it flowing down toward the Gulf as to stop the tide of emigration in this country. Our people go wherever those developments open an opportunity for wealth and prosperity.

This is the difficulty in regard to Indian affairs in this country, and this is the reason why the appropriations to take care of the Indians are necessarily augmented every year. How many Territories have we organized during the last Congress and this? Nevada, Colorado, Arizona, Idaho, and Montana; and our people are rushing to those Territories because they are rich in minerals. It is a great wonder that we have been enabled to get along in the management of the Indians as well as we have.

It is very popular to say that Indian agents are all dishonest, and that Indian superintendents are all wicked and thieves. Sir, there are no offices in the United States the duties of which it is so difficult to execute as those of Indian agents and Indian superintendents; and why? There are always in all countries a miserable set of vagabonds who hang around the border, who will sell whisky to Indians and goods to Indians, and rob and plunder them. Then again the Indian reservations are perhaps right where emigration goes through, and it is almost utterly impossible for these men to execute all that the country expects that they should execute.

Mr. NESMITH. I should like to ask the Senator a question. He has referred to the obligations the Government entered into by treaty stipulations with the Indians to prevent people from encroaching on their reservations, and he says that when gold mines are discovered there, white people do encroach. Suppose they do, and suppose that in that encroachment the Indian suffers a very great wrong by reason of the Government permitting its citizens to be there in violation of the treaty, is not the Government bound to make good whatever damage the Indians suffer by reason of that violation? I should like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. WILKINSON. This Government pays more to support the Indians, ten times more, than it pays for the support of white men of this country. It was said here a few minutes ago by some Senator that the Delawares were the richest people on earth, and they are. There are Indians in the United States drawing more than a hundred dollars a head for every man, woman, and child in the nation. This Government has not been mean to the Indians. The truth is that they are a lazy, miserable, thriftless set of beings, and although we have spent millions upon millions of dollars to give them homes and farms and furnished them farmers to work their farms, and have built them in many cases nice brick houses, they abandon them and run off to follow the chase or other native employments. They will not work. Missionaries have failed to elevate them in this regard, and the whole missionary enterprise among the Indians so far as it is applied to this country has been I may say almost an utter and entire failure. This is the testimony of some of the most pious and devoted missionaries who have labored longest among the Indians on this continent.

I wanted to answer one or two other suggestions that have been made in regard to the treatment by the Government of the Indian tribes. I say it has been most liberal in its treatment of the Indians. The great wrong, if there is any wrong in regard to it, is that we have paid them too much money. In my judgment they never should have received a solitary dollar from the Government. Whatever was paid them should have been distributed by the Government in the exercise of its wise discretion and as a matter of humanity; and it should have been distributed to them in such a manner as to prevent them from indulging in their wicked and perverse propensities. The Government undertook to reform them, to allot them land, and to make appropriations to give them farms and build them houses, and to give them cooking stoves in their houses, and other things for the purposes of civilization, and yet everybody knows that the attempt has been a failure. Everybody who knows anything of the Indian tribes and of Indian character knows that it is an utter and entire failure.

Mr. President, the Government is under no legal obligation, as I said before, to pay the interest on the bonds referred to in this section of the bill. But, so far as the loyal Indians are concerned, I am willing to appropriate what is necessary now for their amelioration, and to give them some temporary aid; but at the same time I want it to be understood that these same Indians live upon as rich soil as there is in the country, and if they would labor they could have plenty of corn, of pork, and everything else that is essential to their comfort; but they will not work. There is no reason why these confederate Indians in Kansas should starve, any more than there is reason for the other people of Kansas to starve. If they would work as white men work, they would not starve. The truth is, they will not work. As far as the larger portion of this fund goes to Indians that have been in rebellion against this Government, I for one do not see fit to vote to pay the interest. I think the committee decided wisely in regard to it, and I hope the Senate will do now as it did two years ago, sustain this action of the committee.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am surprised that any man from the West should be found advocating, or even excusing, or attempting to excuse, our Indian system. It seems to me that a man who has been living on the frontier, with common sense and judgment, must have learned that our Indian system is a failure, an utter failure.

Mr. WILKINSON. I should like to know upon what remark of mine the Senator bases his assumption now.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I understood the Senator generally as defending and apologizing for the Indian agents and superintendents, and excusing everybody else but the traders that surrounded the tribes. Sir, compare our system with the English system. There is scarcely a county in the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific, coast, where do not lie bleaching the bones of white men slain by Indians in the different Indian wars. History proves that with another and different system just across our border on the north, there has never been a single white man slain in an Indian insurrection or war. The English system so far as bloodshed is concerned has been the antipodes of ours. The one system secured peace, the other provoked war. Take the expenditure of money, and the English system as compared with ours is a saving of one as to a thousand.

Mr. WILKINSON. Will the Senator be so kind as to tell us what the English system is?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am not prepared to go into the details, and I would not take the time of the Senate now to do so if I was fully acquainted with them. I have a general knowledge of the system, and I know its results. It would not take our Committee on Indian Affairs a great while to learn the details of the Canadian system; and I propose before the Senate adjourns at this session to move that the Committee on Indian Affairs have leave to sit during the vacation, that they may investigate the evils of our system and the benefits of the English system, so that at the next session of Congress we may have before us both systems, the one in all its terrible deformity, and the other in all its beautiful proportions.

Mr. WILKINSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will tell him what the English system is. It is no system at all. They just organized the Hudson's Bay Company, and gave to the Hudson's Bay Company full power and control over the Indians. Now, I ask the Senator if he is prepared to organize a great monopoly in this country, to give a charter to a company, and give them the political power to control everybody in that country?

Mr. POMEROY. Allow me to say that the English system differs very much from ours. With them every Indian is a British subject, and every Indian agent is a judge appointed by the queen. The differences arising in the tribe are settled by this Indian agent, who is a judge. In our system we do not allow the Indian agent to settle any difficulties that may arise in the tribe. If a murder is committed in a tribe, they go and lay their complaint before the Indian agent, but he is powerless; he can do nothing about it; and then the Indian has to go and avenge his own wrongs, and the near relative or friend has to pursue the guilty man and kill him. That leads to war. The English system is altogether different. They allow no Indian to avenge his own wrongs, but their difficulty is brought to the Indian agent, who is a judge appointed by the queen, and he arbitrates the case and decides it.

Mr. NESMITH. The Senator from Minnesota has defined the English system, and has said that it is entirely under the Hudson's Bay Company. The charter of that company expired in 1859, and the company has ceased to exist. I should like him to inform the Senate who succeeded to them in the management of Indian affairs in British Columbia and the other British provinces.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I suppose, admitting the Senator from Minnesota to be right, that the Hudson's Bay Company had some system. I was glad that the Senator from Ohio had the nerve to announce to the country that our Indian system is rotten from its base. I agree with that Senator that it is an absurdity to deal with the Indian tribes as independent sovereign nations. It is not an absurdity that we should pass laws recognizing the Indians as subjects for a time, and then after reaching a certain point of civilization and advancement to recognize them as citizens, and permit them to take the oath of allegiance, if you please, or oath of civilization and advancement.

Now, Mr. President, having said thus much on the question generally I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the subject immediately before it. I have proposed to amend the clause which the committee move to strike out by adding to it:

But no part of said appropriation shall be paid to any Indian tribe who now are or have been in rebellion against the United States.

The theory is that if we conclude to pay this interest it shall be used by the Indian department for the benefit of the loyal portion of the tribes that have been in rebellion. I propose not to pay a dollar of the interest to either of the tribes that have been or are now in rebellion; and here I desire to answer a suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, who said that we should not be able to ascertain what tribes have been in rebellion. Why, sir, they are known just as well as the States that have been in rebellion are known. They have not only been in rebellion against this Government, but they have actually received annuities from the so-called confederate government.

Mr. BROWN. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that it has not been three weeks since he himself was urging before this body the restoration of the rights of individuals among tribes of Indians who had been in rebellion, restoring them to the right to their annuities. Now, what is to prevent the same thing proceeding in this case?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I think the Senator is mistaken. I certainly advocated no such thing that I remember. On the contrary, a few days ago I introduced a resolution asking the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire as to the propriety of confiscating all lands claimed by disloyal Indians, their entire reservations, and to furnish homes to such as had proved themselves to be loyal.

The theory, as I said, is to expend this money for the benefit of the loyal portion of disloyal tribes. If my amendment be adopted, the appropriation will be only $14,010 25 for interest on $98,000 of bonds held by the Weas and Kaskaskias of Kansas. It will not make one dollar of provision for interest on the bonds held by the disloyal Indians. The interest of the other loyal tribes has already been provided for. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Iowa to the fact that Congress has already provided since 1861 for paying the interest on the bonds held by all the other loyal tribes, whose treaties were not as emphatic as the treaty in this particular case.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator is in error. We have not appropriated a single dollar to pay the interest on any of these bonds.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator is mistaken. We have provided for paying the interest to the Ottawas and the Pottawatomies. There is no other tribe interested except the one that will be reached if my amendment be adopted.

Mr. HARLAN. The committee did recommend that the Government should assume to pay the interest on bonds that were stolen. There were some bonds that were deposited with an officer of the Government of the United States who it is said stole the bonds; and the committee did recommend that the interest on those bonds should be paid, and the amount placed to the credit of those tribes on the books of the Treasury, and the interest paid to them from year to year. That has been done, and it is provided for in this bill.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In making your new treaty with the Ottawas and Pottawatomies you arranged for the payment of the interest on the bonds situated as these are besides the stolen bonds. But here is a case, I say to the Senator from Iowa, that is covered by the vote paying the interest on the bonds stolen, for these bonds were stolen; I mean that after the traitors had determined to make the assault on this Government they changed the bonds of loyal States for the bonds of disloyal States. Therefore it would be covered by that principle. The provision as now drawn, if my amendment be adopted, will include only these particular bonds. I have the treaty before me, and I ask Senators to read that provision of it.

Mr. WILKINSON. With the permission of the Senator from Kansas, I will correct him in a statement which he has just made. These changes were not made to any considerable extent after this rebellion was determined upon. The transactions took place some time ago, longer ago than December, 1860.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. My understanding was that the changes were made just before the rebellion.

Mr. POMEROY. The treaties with the Pottawatomies and the Ottawas have been made since I have been in the Senate, and I came here in 1861. I helped to ratify both those treaties.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The provision of the treaty is:

"And as the amount of the annual receipts from the sales of their land cannot now be ascertained, it is agreed that the President may from time to time and upon consultation with said Indians determine how much of the net proceeds of said sales shall be paid to them, and how much shall be invested in safe and profitable stocks, the interest to be annually paid to them, or expended for their benefit and improvement."

I have said, and the Senators are aware, that this money was invested originally without consultation with these Indians, and that the change which was made in the bonds was not known until long after this rebellion was inaugurated.

Mr. GRIMES. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that this treaty does not require that they should be consulted as to what kind of stocks the money should be invested in. They were only to be consulted by the President of the United States, who by the treaty was authorized to make the investment, as to how much should be invested in stocks, and how much should be paid to them; but as to what stocks the money should be invested in, and as to what changes might be made in the investment in the future, there was unqualified liberty vested in the President to regulate that matter.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa, if that be the true construction of the treaty, and I apprehend he is right, could the President make any investment of any amount until that amount was agreed upon with the Indians upon consultation? Was it not all a breach of trust?

Mr. GRIMES. It is not denied, as I understand, on the part of anybody that there was proper consultation between the President and these Indians at the time the investment was made.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. On the contrary, I say to the Senator from Iowa that the evidence before the Indian Committee is that the President did not consult with the Indians, but that at the time the purchase was made the Indians had an application to have the entire sum paid over to them.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand my colleague right the reverse; and as is well suggested to me by the Senator from Ohio, they subsequently received the interest from year to year, and therefore ratified any action that might have been had; but I understand that there is an issue between the Senator from Kansas and my colleague as to that point.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to hear the Senator's colleague.

Mr. HARLAN. I have stated that I am not aware of any evidence that the treaty was not executed as provided for. I do not remember any testimony that has ever appeared before the Committee on Indian Affairs to indicate that the proper consultations were not had at the time.

Mr. POMEROY. With the consent of my colleague, I will read from a remonstrance of the chief of the tribe of Peorias, in which he states:

"By the treaty of the 30th of May, 1854, provision was made for the sale of the principal part of the lands of our people in Kansas. And by the seventh article of said treaty it is provided, in reference to the proceeds of such sale, that the President should from time to time, upon consultation with our people, determine how much of the net proceeds should be paid to our people, and how much should be vested in safe and profitable stocks, the interest thereon to be paid annually; yet when the sales in June and July, 1857, were over this just and important provision of the treaty was wholly disregarded, and the entire proceeds of the sales, amounting to $346,791 in gold, were, without any consultation with our people, and against our consent, taken away by the Government, and $319,602 thereof vested in stocks neither safe nor profitable."

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In addition I will say to the Senator from Iowa that we had before our committee a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, admitting that the money was invested without consultation with the Indians. I do not know that the Senator was present when it was read in the committee.

Mr. GRIMES. The Commissioner who made the investment, Mr. Manypenny, or the present one?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It goes back.

Mr. GRIMES. Shall we, in a question of this kind that is to settle a precedent that may burden the Treasury with millions of dollars, rely upon a loose statement of the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who knows nothing as to what may have occurred at the time this treaty was made years ago between the then Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Indians? How does it happen that the Senator from Kansas and the Indian Committee have not obtained information from Mr. Manypenny in order to enable us to settle so important a question as this understandingly? for it is virtually an assumption on our part to pay the debt, whatever it may be, that may be due to these Indians, not only the interest, but the principal.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I suppose that when the Secretary of the Interior communicates to the Committee on Indian Affairs a fact of that kind, he is governed by the records of the Department.

Mr. GRIMES. Do the records show a want of consultation?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do not now recollect; I speak of the letter from memory. Now I desire the ear of the Senator from Minnesota. He has said that this particular tribe of Indians live in a good country, and that there is nothing to prevent them from raising their corn, and their hogs, and their cattle. I tell the Senator that there is. When this rebellion commenced, they had all the comforts that he had; they had homes, they had stock, they had their fields. By this rebellion, situated as they are upon the border between Kansas and Missouri, their country has been devastated by the armies of both parties.

Mr. WILKINSON. I have no doubt that that to a considerable extent is true, and it proves what I attempted to state before, that it is not so much the Indian system as the people living around the Indians that destroy them. Bills have been brought in here, coming, I think, from the Senator from Kansas, to pay Indians for horses and cattle, which the people round about them have stolen from them. I have no doubt the Indian system might be improved; I have no doubt that there are grave errors in it; but the people in the State of Kansas have no more regard for the Indians in that State than they have for the beast that perishes; and it is from the people living around them that they are robbed and plundered, and not from our Indian system.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do protest against the Senator from Minnesota judging the people of Kansas by the people of Minnesota. In the intercourse of our people with the Indians they are governed by a Christian and philanthropic principle that I fear does not reach the people that the Senator represents. The country where these Indians live, before this rebellion commenced, was rich in all that the Senator would have them rich in. They had their stock, they had their hogs, they had their corn. The Government agreed to defend them against their enemies; the Government failed to defend them; and now they are reduced to starvation; and the question presented to the Senate is, will you pay them what you owe them, $14,010, or will you according to the policy of the Senator from Minnesota present them with $5,000 and permit the $14,000 to stand?

A word now as to my action on the committee. The Senator from Minnesota knows that I did everything I could to have the Committee on Indian Affairs report in favor of the payment of this interest. After I failed in that I was willing to accept $5,000 or any other amount for the relief of these people. Five thousand dollars to a starving people will be a boon for which, in my opinion, they will thank you; but they would much rather, as I would, that you should pay them what you owe them; and, Mr. President, I do hope that my amendment will be adopted, and that then the amendment of the committee will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas to the clause proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. POMEROY. I trust no one has any objection to this amendment, which is simply that in case the money shall be paid it shall be paid only to the loyal tribes.

Mr. WILKINSON. If this amendment should be adopted it will be necessary to change the appropriation from $350,000 to a less sum.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I propose to alter the $1,700,000 to $98,000, and the $350,000 to $14,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to add to the clause proposed to be stricken out the words "But no part of said appropriation shall be paid to any Indian tribe who now are or who have been in rebellion against the United States."

Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Collamer, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Sautsbury, Sherman, Sprague, and Wilkinson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Clark, Cowan, Dixon, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harris, Henderson, McDougall, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Willey, and Wright—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now returns on striking out the clause as amended.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I now move to amend the clause by inserting $98,000 as the principal sum, and $14,010 25 as the appropriation for interest.

Mr. POMEROY. The amendment of my colleague will not make the clause complete. I have a substitute for the whole clause which I think will meet his views.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from Kansas has a distinct proposition to pay the Weas and Piankeshaws, and acknowledge the debt to them, let that be offered as a separate section, and the sense of the Senate taken upon it. I prefer now to take the sense of the Senate on striking out this clause which embraces all the Indian tribes.

Mr. POMEROY. A substitute for the whole section I believe is not now in order; but I will read what I have prepared for the information of my colleague, and I think he will accept it:

That the confederate bands of Weas, Piankeshaws, Kaskaskias, and Peorias be allowed the interest of $98,000 at five per cent. per annum, this amount being the net interest-paying bonds belonging to said confederate bands, the interest to be paid semi-annually, beginning on the 1st day of January, 1865; and the interest accruing up to the 1st day of July, 1864, at the said rate shall be due and payable on that day.

Mr. WILKINSON. I am willing to vote $14,000 for the benefit of these Indians; but the committee decided not to recognize the principle of paying this interest. Now, what will be the result of it? They will say that we have established the principle here that the Government is holden legally to pay this interest; and the other Indians, even those in rebellion, will afterwards come in and get it. That is the judgment of the committee; and I think the chairman expressed himself in that way. We are willing to have this amendment, and would have passed it in the Indian Committee if the Senator from Kansas, who is a member of that committee, had not told us that $5,000 would be sufficient, and we reported a bill to that effect. I presume, however, the Senate will have no objection to voting $14,000 to the confederate Indians in Kansas if that amount is necessary.

Mr. POMEROY. That is all I am after.

Mr. WILKINSON. But the committee do not wish to frame the terms of the law so as to bind the Government hereafter to pay a debt which the Government does not owe.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have no objection to accepting the proposition of my colleague if it would be in order. I want the Government to recognize this debt of $98,000; but if they are not willing to do it, let them pay the interest.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas to withdraw his amendment, and then let the question be taken on the motion of the committee to strike out the proposition now contained in the bill, and then we can vote on the section offered by the other Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] as an independent amendment. In that way we shall probably reach a result.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It might be reached in another way, by my withdrawing my amendment, and allowing my colleague to offer his instead of mine as a substitute; and I will do that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think it would be better that that should be offered as a distinct section by itself.

Mr. POMEROY. I offer it as a distinct section by itself.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then let us take a vote on striking out the proposition in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] has withdrawn his amendment; and the question now is on striking out the clause as proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. POMEROY. My colleague withdrew his amendment for the purpose of allowing me to offer mine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will not the Senator from Kansas consent to let the question be taken on striking out the clause? He will then be at liberty to move to put in any distinct proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. I am not at all particular about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator now offers his proposition as an amendment to the clause to be stricken out, and that puts it in a very different shape from what it would be in if it were presented as a distinct proposition. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I understand, has no objection to it as a distinct proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. I prefer to take a vote first on my amendment, because if that be adopted I shall then vote with the committee to strike out the other clause.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think we had better vote first on striking out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we strike it out the Senator can move to insert what he pleases.

Mr. POMEROY. Very well, I withdraw my amendment for the present. I am anxious to take a vote, and I do not want to detain the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Committee on Indian Affairs to strike out this clause of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to say a word on that proposition. I shall vote to strike out the clause. The clause as it now stands in the bill would require the United States to pay a certain amount of interest upon bonds issued by States and turned over to the Indians in payment of lands purchased from the Indians by the Government of the United States. Upon what ground is it that we are asked to make good, even to the Indians, the interest upon these State bonds? One ground urged by the honorable Senator from Maryland is that it is the duty of the United States to see to it that the several States are retained in the Union, and that because some of the States which issued these bonds, or a part of them, are no longer in the Union, and cannot be retained thus far by the exertion of the armed force of the United States, the Government of the United States is bound in honor and in equity to make good to the Indians the interest which is due on the bonds of these seceding States. I understand that to be the main ground on which the honorable Senator from Maryland would impose upon the United States the obligation of this guarantee implied by the clause as it now stands in the bill. I do not hold that the United States is under any such obligation. So far as appears before the Senate the trade between the United States and the Indians was an honorable and an honest bargain, neither party taking advantage of the other, and the United States have acted in perfect good faith in placing to the credit of the Indians the State bonds which are now in controversy; and they have been accepted by the Indians with their eyes open, and neither the Indians nor their agents have any ground to complain that the United States have at any time sought to take advantage of them in the concoction of the bargain or in the payment of the interest due on these State bonds.

Now, sir, I reject entirely the idea that the United States is under any obligation whatever at any time to meet the obligations of a State, in other words, to pay the debts due from a State, whether those debts are in the form of State bonds or otherwise. Let us look to what this will lead. There are I know not how many millions of State bonds issued by the States of this Union now in the hands of the subjects of foreign countries. There are some hundreds of millions of dollars in the shape of State bonds now held by honest creditors in England, France, Holland, and other European countries, for which, of course, the United States have never made themselves in any way responsible; and shall the Government of the United States hereafter be told that because some of the States issuing these bonds have committed treason and separated themselves from all connection with or dependence upon the Government of the United States, therefore that Government is bound to pay their debts to foreign creditors? Shall we be told that we are bound to pay to British creditors debts due to them upon the bonds of Virginia and South Carolina and other seceding States, because those States have gone out of the Union and we have not yet been able to constrain them back into the Union?

I trust Senators will reflect seriously upon the consequences which will certainly flow from the precedent we are now setting if we pass the clause contained in this bill; for it will be a precedent upon which the creditors of all the seceding States may apply to the Government of the United States and ask to have the debts due from the rebel States paid out of the Federal Treasury. In the first place, there is no law to justify it. There is no equity in this case particularly as I understand it, and I shall be loth indeed to set a precedent in our legislation which shall give rise to claims as multitudinous and enormous as those will be to which I have referred. I hope we shall strike the clause out of the bill entirely.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. Now I move my amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the confederate bands of the Weas, Peorias, Kaskaskias, and Piankeshaws be allowed the interest on $98,000 at five per cent. per annum, this amount being the non-interest-paying bonds belonging to said confederate bands, the interest to be paid semi-annually, beginning on the 1st day of January, 1865; and the interest accruing up to the 1st day of July, 1864, at the said rate, shall be due and paid on that day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is substantially the provision of the House bill with one exception. The amendment says $98,000 and the House bill says $89,000, $98,000 being the face of the bonds, and $89,000 the amount of money we actually received when we invested in the bonds. This question coming before the Committee on Indian Affairs, the committee were decidedly of opinion that they would not adopt that provision at the present time, and they authorized the reporting of the bill which has been presented to the Senate, appropriating $5,000 for the benefit of these Indians, and I now offer that as a substitute for this amendment. On our inquiry the sum of $5,000 was supposed to be enough for the immediate necessities of these tribes of Indians. I must say also that in consequence of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, and a settlement to which we have agreed on another amendment which has been offered on this bill, the sum of $3,100 is also appropriated for the benefit of these Indians, growing out of a mistake in the survey of land which we sold and received pay for that actually belonged to the Indians. The result will be to put at the disposition of the Department for the benefit of these Indians this $5,000 and $3,100 besides, making $8,100, and we believe that will be sufficient for their present necessities.

Mr. POMEROY. I understood the other members of the committee to say that they reduced the sum to $5,000 because they supposed my colleague consented to that. They were willing to pay $14,000, but they thought he consented to the $5,000. The Senator from Minnesota made that remark, and the chairman of the committee also said that he put the sum at $5,000 because he thought my colleague consented to it. I submit that as $14,000 and a little more is due, there is no use of talking about making gratuities to the tribe; I do not propose to make a contribution to a man that I owe; and as that is due and should be paid on the 1st of July, I object to this substitute entirely.

Mr. HARLAN. The committee do not admit that we owe them anything. The Senator and the committee differ on that subject. The committee were willing to recommend an appropriation large enough to relieve their immediate wants. If the $5,000 in addition to what is in the bill by an amendment heretofore adopted is not enough, as a member of the Senate I am willing to vote for more. However, on inquiry made by the committee, it was supposed to be enough, and hence I hope the amendment may be adopted as proposed by the chairman of the committee, unless there are some new facts to be adduced showing that more is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The Secretary read it. It was to strike out all after the word "that," and insert:

For the temporary subsistence of the Weas, the Piankeshaws, the Peorias, and the Kaskaskias, and furnishing the same with clothing, $5,000.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It seems that the sum of $5,000 was inserted on my judgment. I do not remember what suggestion I made in committee, but I am now satisfied that $5,000 is not enough to relieve the immediate necessities of this tribe, and if any one is to be influenced by my judgment, I object to this proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Marlan, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Carlile, Foot, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, and Powell—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Harris, Hicks, Howe, McDougall, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended. Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is one amendment I should like to have excepted, that in regard to the expenses of the Chippewas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be excepted. The question now is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The other amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the excepted amendment.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

For this amount to defray the expenses of bringing on the delegation of Chippewas of Red Lake and Pombina tribe, and to defray their expenses while detained in this city in making a treaty, and their return to their home, $17,500.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That particular item had not been considered by our committee, and running my eye over it I supposed all these items were correct. Subsequent to the time that it was before the committee we have inquired into it, and we are not satisfied to appropriate so large a sum. I move to strike out the "$17,500" and insert "$10,000;" and also I move to amend the amendment by striking out "in this city," and inserting "in the city of Washington."

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE the title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 282) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes," approved 29th February, 1864, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 521) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863," approved June 1, 1864; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 383) to incorporate the Home for Friendless Women and Children.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a resolution for the adjournment of the present Congress on Thursday, the 23d of June; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 129) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the corporation of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to lay and collect a water tax, and for other purposes," approved May 21, 1863;

A bill (S. No. 316) to grant the right of preemption to certain settlers on the Rancho Bolsa de Tomales, in the State of California;

A bill (S. No. 285) to regulate the veto power in the Territory of Washington; and

A bill (S. No. 223) to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 8th instant, the following acts:

An act (H. R. No. 293) to provide for the payment of the second regiment, third brigade, Ohio volunteer militia, during the time they were mustered into the service of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 426) to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 555) to punish and prevent the counterfeiting of coin of the United States.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILSON. I move now to take up the report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That question is before the Senate as the unfinished business.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President—
Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall settle this report.

Mr. POWELL. I intended to make a motion to take up Senate bill No. 37, but I will wait until this is settled, so as to make my bill the unfinished business for Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. WILSON. The report of the committee of conference is not what I had hoped for or what I expected from the committee. I had hoped that the committee of conference between the two Houses would so adjust the matter as to secure the rights of those colored men that had enlisted under certain promises and pledges. But, sir, they have not done so, or if so in any degree, it depends on the action of the legal officer of the Government. I have consulted with some members of the conference committee, have taken carefully into consideration the importance and the condition of the bill and the disposition in both Houses of Congress, and I have concluded to vote in favor of the report of the committee of conference. I do so, sir, with a great deal of reluctance, but I do so because the subject-matter goes to the Attorney General, who has already given an opinion that I think will require him to recognize and adjust the rights of these regiments; and because it does not preclude them from their rights, if the Attorney General shall not decide to give them what we think belongs to them. In that event we can bring the matter up again in Congress. It certainly precludes them from none of their rights or claims, but it leaves that matter entirely open for future action, if the Attorney General shall not give to them what we maintain belongs to them. I shall therefore vote for the report of the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. I stated last night that in my opinion this was a report which undertook to conclude a matter, but did not conclude it. On further consideration, I am not satisfied that I was materially mistaken. It is a conclusion in which nothing is concluded. I may say, sir, too, that I do not think it entirely creditable to Congress, and, so far as I now accept it, it will be with much reluctance. I think it would have better become Congress to recognize a solemn obligation toward those who are now baring their breasts for us in battle, who are falling on the parapets of the enemy, rather than to question their rights to pay as soldiers, rights which I believe are as strong for them as for any white soldier in the service. I regret sincerely that those rights have not been positively recognized in the text of a statute; but after effort in both branches, and the appointment of several committees of conference, our effort to obtain such a recognition has failed. I despair of obtaining it, at least on the present bill. It is on that account that I am induced to look critically at the proposition before us to see whether it does afford any measure of justice. In one sense it affords nothing; and I believe the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] who was on the committee of conference, will not differ from me on that point; but it does distinctly and unequivocally refer the question to the judgment of the Attorney General of the United States. Substantially Congress agrees to take his opinion on a disputed case. He has already given his opinion. I have it in my hand; it is in a communication dated April 23, 1864, addressed to the President on a case submitted by the President. In that opinion he uses the following language:

"I do not know that any rule of law, constitutional or statutory, ever prohibited the acceptance, organization, and muster of 'persons of African descent' into the military service of the United States as enlisted men or volunteers. But whatever doubt might have existed on the subject had been fully resolved before this order was issued, by the eleventh section of the act of 17th July, 1862, chapter one hundred and ninety-five, which authorized the President to employ as many persons of African descent as he might deem necessary and proper for the suppression of the rebellion, and for that purpose to organize and use them in such manner as he might judge best for the public welfare."

And then in another part of this same opinion he proceeds to say:

"I have already said that I knew of no provision of law, constitutional or statutory, which prohibited the acceptance of persons of African descent into the military service of the United States; and if they could be lawfully accepted as private soldiers, so also might they be lawfully accepted as commissioned officers, if otherwise qualified therefor. But the express power conferred on the President by the eleventh section of the act of 17th July, 1862, chapter one hundred and ninety-five, before cited, to employ this class of persons for the suppression of the rebellion as he may judge best for the public welfare, furnishes all needed sanction of law to the employment of a colored chaplain for a volunteer regiment of his own race."

By the proposition before the Senate it is declared as follows: "And the Attorney General is hereby authorized to determine any question of law arising under this provision." It is in the full confidence that in this way we shall at last, through the opinion of the Attorney General, obtain that justice which Congress has denied, that I consent to give my vote for this report.

Mr. HOWE. I have listened to the declarations made by the two Senators from Massachusetts with a great deal of satisfaction, with all the more satisfaction because it happened yesterday, when this report was made to the Senate, that it was attacked with a good deal of spirit, not to say with some ferocity. My friend from California [Mr. CONNESS] pronounced it ridiculous; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] characterized it not so concisely, but possibly with quite as much elegance, as the little end of nothing whittled down. [Laughter.] Now, against these assaults, of course I had nothing to say. I thought that was perhaps a merit in the proposition, for I thought having been reduced to that very small compass, the Senator from Massachusetts would comprehend it, and I felt entire confidence that when he did comprehend it he would, as he has done, agree to it. I have listened, therefore, to his declaration to-day with all the more satisfaction, because it seems I was not mistaken upon either point. [Laughter.]

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 521) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens, under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863," approved June 1, 1864, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

GOODS IN WAREHOUSE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 282) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes," approved 29th February, 1864.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That bill is in the charge of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN;] he is not now in his seat, and I move that it lie over for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POWELL. I move to take up Senate bill No. 37.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the bill?

Mr. HOWARD. The military interference bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the motion of the Senator from Kentucky be the business in order on Monday? ["No."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not.
Mr. HENDRICKS. Will it not be the pending motion? ["Oh no."]

The motion of Mr. COLLAMER was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 11, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

OVERLAND MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. ALLEY. I ask unanimous consent to offer a joint resolution and to put it upon its passage at this time, for the extension of the overland mail route act for one year, as it is impossible to report the bill which came from the Senate in time. As that act expires on the 15th of this month, I hope the House will consider this at the present time.

Mr. LOAN objected.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the charter of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

PAYMENT OF PERUVIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens under the convention between the United States and Peru on the 12th of January, 1863," approved June 1, 1864.

Mr. STEVENS. The act which we passed a few days ago did not provide for the payment of the interest on those claims, and this bill is introduced for that purpose.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the amount of interest?

Mr. STEVENS. The amount of interest provided in the last clause is the interest on about $37,000 from January to July.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF BONDED GOODS.

Mr. STEVENS. I am also instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back Senate bill No. 282, to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the withdrawal of goods from public stores and bonded warehouses, and for other purposes," approved 29th of February, 1864, with amendments.

I will explain what it is. Last February Congress passed an act giving further time, to the 1st of May, to withdraw goods for home consumption that had been more than one year in bond. As the 1st of May has now passed, it is proposed to extend the time to the 1st of September next for the same purpose. If there is any objection to its passage, I will move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. If that be the object of the bill I do not object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill and amendment be read.

Mr. STEVENS. I will state the amendments of the Committee of Ways and Means. They move to strike out "the 1st day of May, 1864," and some other words, so that it will read that all goods, wares, and merchandise in public stores or bonded warehouses on which the duties are unpaid, and which shall have been in bond for more than one year and less than three years, may be entered for consumption, and the bonds canceled at any time before the 1st day of September, instead of the payment of duties and charges according to the laws in force at the time the goods shall have been withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is an amendment of a bill which has become a law. I would ask, in behalf of those who are not familiar with these commercial matters, the reason for the extension of time when these goods may be withdrawn for exportation to foreign ports? What is the object of allowing them to be entered for domestic consumption after a certain time?

Mr. STEVENS. For this reason: wherever they have been in bond more than a year they may be entered for exportation and no duty is payable on them. If they enter them for home consumption the Government receives duty. That is the difference, and it is a considerable one to the Government.

The amendments of the Committee of Ways and Means were concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANSON ATWOOD.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Anson Atwood; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Next Friday has not been set apart for any particular business, and I move that the morning hour of that day be devoted to the reception of reports on cases of a private nature; and that it be made objection day in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GRANT OF LANDS TO MICHIGAN.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report back from the Committee on Public Lands the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 227, granting lands to the State of Michigan for the construction of certain wagon roads for military and postal purposes. The Senate place the grant under the Legislature, which relieves the objection made to the bill in the House, and we consent to that amendment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

OVERLAND MAIL.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman from Missouri withdraws his objection to my reporting the bill in reference to the overland mail.

Mr. STEVENS. I renew it. We ought to have time to consider the bill.

HOME FOR THE FRIENDLESS.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back Senate amendments to House bill No. 383, to incorporate a Home for Friendless Women and Children.

The Senate amendments were severally concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EUGENE FREEANS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, reported back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs the petition of Eugene Freeans, and asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce. It was so ordered.

RENEWAL OF A PATENT.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the remonstrance of James L. Woodward, of New York, against the petition of Jonathan Ball for relief by the renewal of a patent, and asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

It was so ordered.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution, and move the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the present Congress adjourn finally on Monday, the 20th instant.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw the previous question that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. COX. I will hear what it is.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I propose to fix the 25th of June instead of the 20th.

Mr. COX. We have voted almost everything away, and I think we had better vote ourselves away as soon as possible. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think we will be more likely to accomplish the object which the gentleman from Ohio has in view if we say the 25th.

Mr. COX. I accept the amendment, and will say Saturday the 25th.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that Saturday is not a desirable day for adjournment, as it would be very difficult for the clerks to have the bills engrossed that day.

Mr. COX. Then I will say Thursday the 23d.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I consent to that.

The resolution was so modified.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AN ACT ILLEGALLY APPROVED.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report on a resolution of the House instructing that committee to inquire by what warrant the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States" was approved on the 12th of March, 1863, and whether said act is in force; and asked that the report be printed, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the report is not very voluminous I should like to have it read.

Mr. WILSON. It is but short. Let it be read.

The report was read. The conclusion of it is that the act in question having been approved and signed by the President subsequently to the adjournment of Congress did not become a law and is not in force.

The report was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMASTER RUSSELL'S ADMINISTRATORS.

Mr. MOORHEAD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 337) for the relief of the administrators of W. W. Russell, late paymaster in the marine corps, and asked that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. That bill belongs properly to the business of next Friday. I hope it will be postponed till that time, when it will come up with other private business.

The bill was postponed till Friday next.

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. DAWES called for the regular business, but yielded to

Mr. BOUTWELL, who said: I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bankrupt bill was rejected. I desire to say that my object in moving the reconsideration is to give to the committee on bankruptcy the benefit of the labor which it has bestowed on this bill. It would be a hardship if the labor of the committee were lost by the present rejection of the bill. I have therefore consented to move a reconsideration. If the motion to reconsider shall prevail, I shall then move to postpone the bill till the second Monday in December next, after the morning hour.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the chairman of the special committee on bankruptcy consents to the postponement of the bill if the vote be reconsidered?

Mr. BOUTWELL. He does.

A MEMBER. I understand he does not.

Mr. DAWES. If my colleague is in error about the consent of the chairman who has charge of the bill to postpone it, I cannot give way. But I will yield to my colleague if no opposition be made.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope we will be governed by that fact altogether.

Mr. ASHLEY. I object to further debate.

Mr. DAWES. Then I must object to this matter coming up unless there can be some understanding about it. I resume the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY. I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts can take the floor from his colleague in that way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the motion to reconsider is before the House.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to know of the gentleman who reported the bill what his purpose in reference to it is.

Mr. JENCKES. I can only speak for myself. I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected, and himself move, if he desired it, to postpone it.

Mr. DAWES. Unless there can be some understanding in relation to the postponement I will move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. JENCKES. I think there is an understanding; I think the understanding is satisfactory to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not desire myself to take any responsibility in the matter. I desire the gentleman himself to state whether he will support the motion to postpone or not.

Mr. JENCKES. If the gentleman will withdraw the motion for the previous question, I will state my whole understanding of the matter.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw it.

Mr. JENCKES. This bill has been the result of the labors of the special committee, who have spent a great deal of time on the subject, and have presented as perfect a bill as they could frame under the circumstances. They, of course, desire the bill to pass. I find that the opinion of the House is that it is not wise in their judgment to pass it at the present time. They have expressed that by their votes, and I yield to that result.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL], who has voted against the bill and who has moved a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the bill, did so upon the understanding with me that he would move to postpone the bill until some day early in the next session. I agreed to the motion to postpone and I shall not oppose it. I find that it is impossible during the present session, if this bill should be passed by the House, that it can be passed by the Senate. It follows, therefore, that nothing will be lost by the friends of the bill by agreeing to postpone this bill as the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to move.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now renew the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. CRAVENS. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 78, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Bliss, Boyd, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 181.

S. Brown, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Dering, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, English, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hubbard, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Kernan, McAllister, McBride, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, John O'Neill, Perry, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Voorhees, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Yeaman—60.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. PRICE stated that he had paired with his colleague, Mr. KASSON.

The motion to reconsider was then agreed to, and the question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to postpone the bill until the second Monday in December next after the morning hour, and upon that motion demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. GANSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was postponed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial and accompanying documents of Thomas L. Price, contesting the seat of Joseph W. McClurg, have instructed me to make a report. This case is kindred to the one of Bruce and Loan, and also of Birch and King. The committee came to the same conclusion that they did in the case of Bruce and Loan, the members of the committee standing upon the question precisely the same. When I submitted the report in the case of Birch and King I stated that the committee, in coming to a conclusion in the case of Bruce and Loan, accepted the decision of the House as instructions in reference to the two other cases. They therefore reported back the papers in that case, which was one of the two, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of them, and that the whole subject be laid on the table. In conformity with these instructions, the committee still entertaining the same views with reference to the present case but accepting the decision of the House, have instructed me to report back the papers in this case, and move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the whole subject be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I now call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The business before the House, then, is the contested-election case of Todd vs. Jayne, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] is entitled to the floor. Mr. FARNSWORTH took the floor.

COMPENSATION OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer a resolution pertinent to the case just disposed of, if the gentleman from Illinois allows me to present it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That there be paid from the contingent fund of this House to James H. Birch and Thomas L. Price, respectively, the usual mileage of a member for one session of Congress, and compensation or salary from the commencement of the present session to the period when their contests were respectively acted upon by the House.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the mover of the resolution will accept a modification of—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, as the main question has been ordered to be put.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded; and I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. MALLORY. My object is to amend the resolution by inserting the name of John McHenry, of Kentucky. I think he is certainly as much entitled to the compensation proposed to be paid as these two gentlemen; and if the mover of the resolution declines to accept that modification I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the two cases embraced in this resolution stand upon precisely the same footing. They were before the House upon precisely the same testimony, and the House has disposed of both of them precisely in the same way; so that the House is not embarrassed by embracing them in the same resolution. And while I concur in the views of the gentleman from Kentucky in reference to the case of McHenry, yet it may be considered by the House as not standing upon the same footing. It is desirable that the House should have an opportunity to pass upon the cases as they stand upon their respective merits; and therefore I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will allow these cases I have included in the resolution to be considered by themselves.

Mr. MALLORY. There is as much similarity between the case of McHenry and Price as there is between the case of Birch and Price. They are homogeneous cases. All three of these gentlemen made their appearance before this Congress and contested the right of sitting members upon the ground that they obtained their seats here by military interference. That, I understand, was the sole question involved in the trial of those cases. That was the ground relied on by each of the contestants, and I see no reason for the discrimination which appears to be proper in the estimation of the gentleman from Indiana. If there are merits enough in the cases of these two gentlemen from Missouri to justify the House in allowing them this compensation, there are merits enough in the case of McHenry to authorize the House in allowing it to him. I see no reason, in anything that has been said by the gentleman from Indiana, why the House should embarrass itself and expend time in acting on each of those cases separately, when, by inserting all of them in this resolution, it can dispose of them now. I therefore hope that the House will sustain the motion that I make to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded, in order that I may offer this amendment to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the vote ordering the main question was reconsidered.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the name of Mr. McHenry.

Mr. DAWES. I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky not to press that amendment. The case of McHenry will stand separately just as well as it will in this connection.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman wants me to speak plainly I will do so. Just as true as he puts that name into this resolution the whole will be voted down. I want the gentleman to understand me. I do not mean to say by that that I should vote against it. But I mean to tell the gentleman from Kentucky that just as sure as he puts in that name the resolution will be voted down. These two cases of Birch and Price are precisely like that of Bruce. They had the majority of the Committee of Elections in their favor. The committee considered that under such circumstances there could not be any impropriety in paying Bruce. The case of McHenry stands on a different ground. The Committee of Elections reported against McHenry very strongly. There was but one member of the committee disagreeing to that report.

I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky (not intending thereby to intimate that I would vote against reasonable compensation to Mr. McHenry) that by his pursuing that amendment there will be this result: we will pay one man and refuse to pay another whose case is exactly alike.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I fail to appreciate the force of the reasons urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts. If I understand him at all the whole tenor of his remarks results in this, that if I insist on putting Mr. McHenry's name in the resolution along with the names of these two gentlemen from Missouri, the objection to paying Mr. McHenry is so strong in the House that the contestants from Missouri will fall with him, and no pay will be given to either. If that be the case, let it be so. The gentleman from Massachusetts has stated that there is a great difference in the cases. I fail to perceive it. I understand that these two gentlemen from Missouri contested the seats of the sitting members on the ground that they obtained their seats here through military interference. The Committee of Elections considered these contested cases and virtually reported that there was not military interference enough to justify the House in saying that these sitting members were not entitled to their seats. On precisely the same ground was the seat of my colleague [Mr. YEAMAN] contested by Mr. McHenry. The Committee of Elections reported that there was not sufficient evidence of military interference to justify the House in deciding that Mr. YEAMAN was not entitled to his seat. There were certain cases of military interference to some extent proved in every one of these cases; and in my estimation enough was proved to justify each of these contestants in bringing the case before the House for its action.

If there is justice in paying one of these contestants there is justice in paying all. If the gentleman from Massachusetts means to intimate that this House will vote down this resolution because the name of Mr. McHenry is inserted in it, or because of an effort on my part to get that name inserted in the resolution, in the name of God let it be voted down. If that sort of a reason is to influence the House, let us know it.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Kentucky will take the suggestion in the spirit in which I have made it. I made the suggestion to the gentleman, and of course he will do what he thinks is his duty. I have nothing further to say upon it.

Mr. MALLORY. I insist on the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. MALLORY's amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes seventy-eight, noes not counted.

So the amendment was adopted, and the name of J. H. McHenry, jr., was inserted in the resolution.

Mr. UPSON moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 60.

Mr. UPSON demanded the yeas and nays.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the vote,

MR. KELLEY stated that he was paired with MR. HARRIS, of Maryland.

MR. DENISON stated that he was paired with MR. BROOMALL.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MR. MALLORY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

ENROLLED BILL.

MR. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act to regulate the foreign coasting trade on the northern; northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

DAKOTA CONTESTED ELECTION.

THE SPEAKER stated the business regularly in order to be the resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections in the Dakota contested-election case, on which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] was entitled to the floor.

MR. FARNSWORTH. I do not intend to detain the House long in the discussion of this question, for I know that gentlemen have become wearied with these contested-election cases; and sympathizing somewhat in that feeling myself, I am the last one to wish to detain the House in the further consideration of the case. But, sir, it seemed to me, from the very fact that members have become wearied with these cases, and that many gentlemen have a disposition to get rid of them in the easiest possible manner, that apparently an act of injustice was about to be done to a friend, and, as I believe, a man who is legally entitled to a seat here. This fact I say prompted me to ask the indulgence of the House for a short time this morning.

I do not entirely concur in the views of either the majority or the minority of the Committee of Elections in this case; and in the discussion of it I shall take, to some extent, a different view from that taken by the majority of the committee in their report.

Before proceeding to a discussion of the report of the majority I propose to examine for a few moments the objections made to that report by a minority of the committee. As I understand it, the minority of the committee go with the gentleman who has introduced a resolution here declaring that neither the sitting Delegate nor the contestant is entitled to a seat in this House. The only objections that were urged were in reference to the alleged fraudulent character of the votes in what is known as the Pembina district, Kittson county, together with the alleged fact, or argument, rather, presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the Committee of Elections [Mr. SCOFIELD] that the returns of the votes from that county are not in proper form. I disagree with that gentleman in regard to the return of this vote. I think the return is legally made, in strict accordance with the statutes of that Territory. I wish to call the attention of the House in deciding this matter to one or two points, and I will put it to any fair-minded lawyer or man in this House whether I am not correct in my conclusions. The sections of the statute referred to, relied upon by that gentleman to prove that the returns are not properly made, are as follows:

"Section thirty-one, page 281, laws of Dakota, 1862.—On the twentieth day after the close of any election, or sooner if all the returns be received, the clerk of the board of county commissioners, taking to his assistance two justices of the peace of the county, shall proceed to open said returns and make abstracts of the votes in the following manner: the abstract of the votes for Delegate to Congress shall be on one sheet; the abstract of votes for members of the Legislative Assembly shall be on another sheet, &c.

"Section thirty-three, page 282.—The clerk of the board of commissioners, immediately after making the abstracts of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each said abstracts and transmit it by mail to the secretary of the Territory at the seat of government; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of the Territory, with the chief justice and Governor, or a majority of them, to proceed within fifty days after the election, and sooner if all the returns be received, to canvass the votes given for Delegate to Congress."

Now, it is urged that in making out this certificate the two justices of the peace named in this act did not sign the returns together with the clerk of the county commissioners. It will be observed that the law makes it the duty of the clerk to canvass the returns, taking to his aid two justices of the peace. The clerk is to make the canvass; the clerk is to make the abstract; the clerk is the man who is to make the returns to the secretary of the Territory; and if the two justices of the peace should add their certificates to that of the clerk, while it would not vitiate the returns, it would simply be regarded as so much surplusage.

I am surprised that my friend from Pennsylvania, who declared upon the floor yesterday that he belonged to the honorable fraternity of the law, should draw the conclusion he did from the statute of the Territory of Dakota. It is the clerk who is to do this, and not the two justices of the peace. They are called to aid and assist the clerk for the purpose of attesting by their presence the fact that a canvass was made, to witness the canvass, nothing more. And what is the presumption of law? The presumption is that a directory statute of this kind is complied with. Until you have proved that these two justices of the peace did not aid and assist the clerk in the performance of these duties, the presumption of law is that the law was complied with and the duty performed.

MR. SCOFIELD. I do not suppose that the gentleman designs to misrepresent me, nor do I allege that he does misrepresent me in stating that I spoke of defective returns. I do say as a lawyer, and any Pennsylvania lawyer—I do not know what rules they follow out in Illinois—will agree with me, that where the law requires two justices of the peace to join with the clerk, they must sign the papers as well as the clerk. But the gentleman from Illinois does misrepresent me in reference to the use I made of the incorrect return. I impeached the election because we had the clear evidence of witnesses that only six white men voted, three of them native-born and three foreigners. That the board of judges were composed of two Indians and one Frenchman; the clerks of one Indian and one Englishman; and that there were forty Indians voting and six white men, and that the balance of 144 votes were written out by a man called "Brother Timothy."

And then when the gentleman's friends come in and say you did not prove that within sixty days—a mere technicality—I said that the returns did not come from that district within sixty days. The thing was not heard of in sixty days, and I stated in reply to the sixty days' technicality that you did not happen to have the proper certificate of the two justices as required by the law.

MR. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania said all that yesterday.

MR. SCOFIELD. Yes, sir; but you represent me now as having said something else.

MR. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman still takes exception to the return. He says a Pennsylvania lawyer would hold that where a law requires justices of the peace to join the clerk in doing a thing, they must do it. Well, I imagine a lawyer from any other place would know that, but it happens that the statute of Dakota does not require the justices to join with the clerk. It requires simply that the clerk shall make the return, "calling to his assistance" two justices; not that the justices of the peace shall do it with the clerk. Nor does the law require that the justices shall make the returns, with the clerk, to the secretary. The clerk is to make the return, and that he did.

As to the insinuation about lawyers in Illinois, I have only to say that we have a common saying in the West, when something impossible is to be done, that it would require a Philadelphia lawyer to do it, and I have no doubt my friend is so imbued with the spirit of the Philadelphia lawyers that he is capable to do impossibilities.

MR. SCOFIELD. I do not know whether a Philadelphia lawyer could show that three foreigners and three natives could make one hundred and forty-four votes and bring them here and get this House to allow them.

MR. FARNSWORTH. That is another point, which I have not yet reached. I have sufficiently disposed of the technical objection made to the return, and I submit to any lawyer in this House if my construction of that law is not correct.

I now come to the other objection made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the votes were illegal and fraudulent. How does he prove it? Why, sir, he proved it by hunting up a deposition which has been excluded by an order of the House. He proved it by reading a deposition which this House has declared has not been taken in conformity to the statute—a like deposition to one which in the contested-election case of Knox and Blair was ruled out by the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman whether the deposition in the Blair case was not taken here this winter with no chance given for reply. The deposition in this case was taken fifteen months ago, and if you could show that more than fifteen men voted there you had months in which to do it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. He says the deposition in the Blair case was taken here this winter. But the power of the House extends to the right of extending the time to enable the party to take additional testimony.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Why not count your white men?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That was not the point on which the deposition was excluded. It was excluded on the solemn judgment of the House because it was an illegal deposition, because it was not taken in accordance with law, but against the law. If I recollect right my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] voted to exclude the deposition in the Blair case. With what kind of a face, then, can he or any other member of the House who voted to exclude a deposition for the purpose of getting Mr. Blair out of his seat and putting the contestant in it, vote now to receive a deposition that has the same defect?

Mr. SCOFIELD. When the gentleman from Illinois comes to a fact, he has a very defective memory. I did not so vote in the Blair case.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Perhaps not. The House, however, did so vote.

Now I wish to say a word in reference to the deposition of this man Buckman. In courts of justice we not only attack the formality of a deposition, but we have sometimes a method of attacking the credibility of a witness. Who is Buckman who makes this deposition about the Pembina vote?

He was elected to the Legislature of Dakota Territory by the same vote that the contestant in this case received. He went to the Legislature, took his seat, and sat throughout the session. He afterwards came to the city of Washington, and upon the recommendation of the sitting Delegate in this case and his friends he procured a clerkship in the post office, where he is now.

Mr. UPSON. I deny that that is a fact.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My friends are very technical.

Mr. UPSON. They are truthful.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Nevertheless, what I said is true, and I will not take it back. The man is a clerk in the post office here to-day, or was until recently. If not now, he has been sent away to Dakota. But he did hold such an office here; and he did hold it, too, on the recommendation of a brother-in-law of the sitting Delegate, the appointment being charged, as I understand, to the State of Illinois. But Buckman was not, and never was, a resident of that State.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Does the gentleman mean to say that a man who obtains a clerkship in the post office on the recommendation of Senator TRUMBULL, of Illinois, is therefore a witness who is not credible? Has the gentleman such a low estimate of Illinois Senators and of Illinois men that the fact of this witness holding a clerkship on the recommendation of Senator TRUMBULL is a circumstance going to show that he is not worthy of credit under oath?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have not said that. The gentleman's mind is running on faster than my conversation. He has jumped to a conclusion, perhaps legally and properly, that this man is not entitled to credit as a man of truth and veracity. But I have not said so. I was only asking who the man was and was giving a little item of his history. I said he was elected to the Dakota Legislature by the same vote in Pembina district which it is claimed that Mr. Todd received. He then came to Washington city, and was appointed clerk in the post office. And it was here that his deposition was taken. He had held a seat in the Legislature for one whole session—the sitting Delegate being the Governor of the Territory and present there, seeing him daily; and yet the sitting Delegate did not then take the depositions of this man. Why did he not do so?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will answer the gentleman's question if he will allow me.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Perhaps I will answer it myself before I get through. I know it is said by Buckman in his deposition that the first conversation he had with the sitting Delegate was only a few weeks before the deposition was taken, here in the city of Washington. But is it not a little remarkable that the Governor of the Territory, knowing that his seat was contested, should associate for one whole session with a member of the Legislature without inquiring or finding out something about the vote of Pembina? The law happens to require that depositions shall be taken within the district and within a certain number of days. This deposition was not taken in the district; it was not taken within the time, but long afterwards, and by the judgment of the majority of the Committee of Elections was excluded from their report. In compliance with the order of the House declaring in another case, upon solemn adjudication, a deposition similar to this in every material point should not be received or read to the House, they deemed themselves so instructed.

Now, what would my friend think of a lawyer who in trying a case continually insisted upon reading a suppressed deposition—a deposition that had been suppressed by the very court before which he was arguing his cause?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will you say that the facts set forth in the deposition are false? That is the point. Do you not know they are true? Is not the proof ample that there were but six white men there?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman is troubled about those six white men. [Laughter.] I am now dealing with the gentleman's technicalities.

Mr. SCOFIELD. You are good at that.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Now, sir, what is to be thought of the deposition of a man who was himself a party to the fraud his deposition professes to expose; who himself procured the very fraud and rascalities in reference to which he testifies; who has himself taken the benefit of the fraud; who has held a seat in the Legislature of that Territory for the full term the law would permit by the same vote which his deposition exposes as fraudulent? In reply to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I do not think the deposition of such a man sufficient to establish the facts alleged, especially when it stands out alone unsupported by a scintilla of other testimony. Not another witness testifies directly or remotely to any such allegation. His affidavit comes to us unsupported and uncorroborated; and I ask whether this House will perpetrate such gross injustice upon the deposition of a man who by his own admission is covered all over by fraud and corruption, as to deny a man a seat in this House who is otherwise fairly elected.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania complains that the officers at that election—the judges and clerks—were not competent. He says that they were not qualified; that they consisted of one white man and two Indians. All of this is supported by only the testimony of this man Buckman. The whole speech of the gentleman is based upon the testimony of this man Buckman.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Do not you believe every word of it is true?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I believe every word of the gentleman's speech. I have too high an opinion of the gentleman to believe he would intentionally mislead the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. And you believe every word of the deposition?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, sir, I must be allowed to say in all sincerity that I do not believe every word of it. I would not decide a case where five dollars was involved upon the testimony of such a man under such circumstances. It is true that this man Buckman does testify that only one of these judges of election was an American-born white man, and that two were half-breeds; but it is also true that one of these men, Grant, to whom he objects as not a white man, used to hold a seat in the Legislature of Minnesota, and is widely known in that country as an Indian trader. It may be he has a little Indian blood in him; whether he has or not we have no proof except the deposition of this man Buckman.

Now, sir, I am not disposed to go further into the matter of the Pembina vote. I think enough has been said to dispose of that vote; and when you have disposed of it you have disposed of the whole basis of the minority report. If the House will stultify itself and admit that deposition, and if it believes that vote was fraudulent, it should be excluded. But then comes the question, how does the vote stand in the remaining portions of the Territory? and upon this subject I have a word to say. Herein I differ somewhat with the majority of the Committee of Elections in this case. The first county to which I shall call the attention of the House is that of Bon Homme, which the committee in their report exclude. It was also excluded by the canvassers originally in canvassing the vote of the Territory. I ask the Clerk to read, for the purpose of placing the facts before the House, that portion of the report of the committee in which they have incorporated a summary of the testimony in regard to Bon Homme county.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Bon Homme County.—The vote of this county was rejected by the canvassers, and it is claimed by the contestant that there should be counted from this county 26 votes for him, and 13 for the sitting Delegate. The evidence shows (pages 33, 58) that the polls were opened at nine o'clock in the morning, at the house of G. M. Pinney, United States marshal; Moses Herriek, D. C. Gross, and Jacob Kiel acted as judges. Silas G. Irish was originally appointed by the county commissioners of the county, as the law requires, to act as one of the judges. He was notified of his appointment by Harvey Hartsough, one of the commissioners, and accepted the appointment. A few days after this same Mr. Hartsough, one of the commissioners, came to him and said to him "that he didn't care a damn whether we (referring to the Jayne party) had the majority or not; we would swindle them (the Todd party) out of it anyhow." I replied to Mr. Hartsough, that "You cannot carry any election that way. As a Republican, I was disgusted with this practice of the Democrats in Kansas, and that no fraudulent vote should go into that ballot-box unless it walked first over me." He turned away from me in seeming disgust at my reply. I heard very shortly after that Mr. Skinner was appointed in my place on the election board.

Mr. Skinner was not permitted to serve, however. On the morning of the election he repaired to the polls, before nine o'clock as the witnesses think, at any rate before any voting was commenced, and found Jacob Kiel, the servant of this same Harvey Hartsough, and known as the Dutch boy in this county, (page 38,) installed in his place, and the United States marshal refused to admit Skinner into the room, declaring that Jacob Kiel should act as judge. The voting was done through a window. One witness (Shober) thereupon stationed himself at the window on the outside, and requested the voters to vote open tickets, while he took their names, and those who voted for Todd did so, numbering 25 in all, whose names he gives, (page 34.) And there were 14 other voters, making 39 in all. A recess of an hour was taken for dinner, and during that time Moses Herriek, one of the judges, took the ballot-box and carried it away with him into a room in his own house by himself. The balloting continued in the afternoon, and at the close of the polls, when the counting commenced, which is described by the witness as follows, (pages 35, 36):

"The judges proceeded to count the ballots, denying admittance to the electors at the polls. The judges first began the canvass of the votes by taking the tickets from the ballot-box and separating the same into two different piles—the Todd tickets in one pile, and the Jayne tickets in the other. The Jayne tickets were distinguishable from the Todd tickets by their blotted surface, the ink showing plainly through the ticket. It became at once apparent that a fraud had been perpetrated, by the substitution of ballots during the hour had for dinner. There were at this time about twenty-five persons around the polls, and much excitement ensued. As soon as I saw the excitement, I demanded to be admitted, and to have the canvass made public, which was at that time peremptorily refused by the judges, and by Mr. Pinney, who was their spokesman. During this time Mr. Johnson and myself were standing at the window, directly in front of the judges. Upon this refusal of admission into the room the excitement still increased. The judges thereupon gathered up the tickets and threw them back into the box. I then again demanded admission. After some hesitation, Pinney suggested that myself and Edward Gifford be admitted; we entered together, and went up to Moses Herriek, one of the judges of election, and asked him to proceed with the canvass, which he refused to do. I then asked him to show me the tickets, whereupon he handed me thirty of the tickets to examine. I looked them over in his presence, and found that I was right in my conclusions. I then asked him to show me the other nine of the tickets, which he refused. I found fifteen tickets, among the number handed me, for Jayne. I then laid them down on the table and remarked to Mr. Herriek that there was prima facie evidence of fraud; that there had not been after a vote cast for Jayne; whereupon the judges and clerks jumped up, under the lead of G. M. Pinney, and left the room, leaving portfolios, ballots, and all papers connected with the election, lying on the table. Great excitement prevailed. The canvass was never completed. The crowd rushed in (page 139) and took possession of the ballot-box, poll-books, and ballots, and proceeded then to hold a new election."

The committee were of opinion that the conduct of all parties engaged in this transaction was disgraceful and fraudulent, and that no votes should be counted from that precinct.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is no charge in this case, at least there is no charge supported by any evidence whatever, that the contestant is in any manner implicated with any fraud in the election. There is no evidence in the case that he is implicated or connected with any fraud so far as the other precincts and counties are concerned, than the Pembina district.

The Committee of Elections find in Bon Homme county, as they think, sufficient evidence to vitiate the entire returns, and they have thrown out the returns altogether. I think that they did wrong. What has been read will show that we have the uncontradicted testimony of a man who swears that he counted twenty-five men who voted for Todd, which with his own vote would make 26. These were thrown out. They saw evidence of an effort to commit a fraud at that election. The man who was first appointed judge of the election was excluded and a fellow called "the Dutch boy" substituted in his place, from the fact that the judges of the election would not allow any one to witness the canvass of the votes. From these and various other facts connected with that election they thought that there was evidence of an intention to commit fraud. This man, judging from his deposition, is an intelligent, worthy man. He stood at the polls and requested every man to vote an open ticket so that they might see who voted for Todd and who voted for Jayne. He counted, as he swears, 25 votes for Todd, and he says that there were fourteen others who would not show their tickets. When the citizens demanded the right to witness the canvass after the election was over and they refused it; when, becoming clamorous, they were admitted and detected the fraud, that the ballot-box had been stuffed during the hour they had adjourned for dinner; it is proved that when they had detected this fraud and charged it home upon the judges of the election, they in disgust threw the ballots away and refused to complete the canvass.

It does seem to me that the Committee of Elections should have allowed the good votes, which they could have sifted out in this county. If they had done that, giving Todd 25 votes, and giving to Jayne the 14 votes that this man swears he saw voted by men who would not show their ballots, you will still elect Todd, even if you throw out Pembina—Todd is still elected by the votes of the people of Bon Homme county.

The next is that of Brulé Creek precinct. I think that there is no contest between the majority and minority of the Committee of Elections about this, and that they agree that this vote should be excluded. I only mention it to show the general character of this transaction, and the complicity of the sitting Delegate with this fraudulent election.

In the case of the Brulé Creek precinct the evidence shows that they opened the polls at midnight Sunday night before the day appointed by law for that election, and at a house different from the one where it was advertised to be held. At the dead hour of night, by the dim light of little tallow candles, which only served to make their dark crime more dark and hideous, they attempted to perpetrate the great crime of defeating the free exercise by the people of the elective franchise. Who did this? The friends of the sitting Delegate. The evidence shows that the sitting Delegate was there a few days before, and that he, then the Governor of the Territory, told illegal voters that they had a right to vote. Then and there the plan was cut and dried, concocted and hatched, to cheat the people and defeat the popular voice.

Some fellow with a Dutch name had a method of naturalizing persons and giving them certificates which would entitle them to vote. One man voted for another, and the ballot-box was stuffed. At nine o'clock the next day, the hour appointed for holding the election, they moved to the place appointed and again opened the polls and held another election there. The committee did well in excluding the canvass of that precinct.

While upon this point I wish to refer to a little of the testimony in regard to Brulé precinct. On page 84 of the testimony I find the evidence of Timothy Andrews, as follows:

"Question 4. Were you present when this balloting, of which you speak, first commenced?"

"Answer. I was not. I was, at the commencement, up stairs, in bed; heard a noise below stairs, and went down to see what it was about; found a number of persons in the room; saw three men sitting at a table, with a ballot-box in front of them. One man was writing. Dr. A. R. Phillips and Thaddeus Andrews, my son, were two of the persons seated at the table. They were acting as judges of the election then going on. Mr. Gore handed me a ticket as soon as I got into the room. I took the ticket, which was a Jayne ticket, handed it to Dr. Phillips, the judge, who put it in the box. Immediately after this, Mr. Gore stepped up to Dr. Phillips and said he voted this ticket (which he handed to Dr. Phillips) for another man, whose name he mentioned, but do not remember it. He observed that the man was absent from the Territory, and he would vote for him. Dr. Phillips then placed the vote in the box."

"Question 5. You have stated that you arrived in this Territory on the 2d day of July, 1892, and you voted. Why did you vote at this election, not having been in this Territory, as required by law, ninety days previous to said election?"

"Answer. Governor William Jayne and Mr. Glaze came to my house eight or ten days before election, and Governor Jayne told me that I had a right to vote, and upon his authority I did vote."

This Glaze was the man who did the naturalizing.

The Governor of the Territory instructed the men that they had the right to vote, when he must have known that they had no right. Under his direction, and by his authority as Governor of the Territory, they voted, and he now holds a seat in this House. There is more testimony of a similar character.

While upon the subject of the complicity of the sitting member with these transactions I wish to call the attention of the House to the testimony of James Falkenburg, to be found on page 18:

"Question 4. Were you a voter at this September election, and if so, where?"

"Answer. I was; I voted at Yankton, Yankton county, Dakota Territory."

"Question 5. Were you offered any money for your vote at this election; and if so, by whom? State all the circumstances and particulars; how much was paid you, and in what manner you were paid; answer fully."

"Answer. Yes, sir; I was offered money by Governor William Jayne on the day of election. He came to me on election day, on the platform in front of the Ash hotel; he asked me to vote for him. I told him he had not done as he agreed to do. He asked me what he had not done that he had agreed to do. I told him that he had agreed to finish up the house belonging to me for the use of the Dakota cavalry company; that he had used the house for that purpose two months, and that he had not done it, and that I could have rented it had it been fitted up as per agreement, and that it had been idle three months in consequence. He said that he would make that all right with me. He then went for Lieutenant Fowler, quartermaster of the Dakota cavalry company, and came back to me in his company, where I was standing; we then held a conversation in the rear of Collamer's saloon. Jayne and Fowler told me they would give me fifteen dollars per month for the use of the building for three months, while it was lying idle, provided I would vote for Governor Jayne. This conversation was about noon on the day of the election; I had not voted at the time. And Fowler told me to come to his office, and he would give me a voucher for forty-five dollars. I did not go to his office till a day or two after the election; but did go there, and he gave me the voucher for this sum of forty-five dollars. The only consideration for this sum of forty-five dollars was my agreeing to vote for Governor William Jayne for Delegate to Congress. They further agreed that they would continue to occupy the building, for the use of the Government, at fifteen dollars per month, and make some improvements and repairs upon it; but they have not fully completed the finishing of the building. They have continued to pay me for it under this agreement, though they have made very little use of it."

I also refer to the testimony of Parker V. Brown, to be found on page 30:

"Question 4. Did you receive any sum of money for your vote for Delegate to Congress; if so, what sum, and from whom did you receive it?"

"Answer. I did receive money for my vote for Delegate to Congress. I received about seventeen dollars. Governor William Jayne came to me on the day of election and asked me to vote for him; and if I did so, he would pay me twenty dollars. He then drew from his pocket seventeen dollars and gave it to me, saying that that was all he had with him; which money I received, and told him I would vote for him."

"Question 5. Were you approached on the subject of voting at that election by any one else?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I received two dollars from Lamson, as an additional inducement to vote for Jayne for Delegate on the day of election. Previous to the election day Surveyor General Hill told me that he had a pair of elk at Lac City, Iowa, which he would give me if I would vote for William Jayne for Delegate to Congress."

"Question 6. Do you know of any one else who received any money as a consideration from William Jayne to vote for him?"

"Answer. I did not see Jayne give any one else any money to vote for him; but Samuel Mortimer told me that he got five dollars for voting for William Jayne for Delegate to Congress."

"Question 7. Did you see Samuel Mortimer at the polls on this day? and if so, state whether or not he voted."

"Answer. Yes, sir; I saw him there, and he voted."

"Question 8. Is Samuel Mortimer now in the Territory?"

"Answer. No, sir; he started for Missouri about a month since."

"Question 9. Who is this Mr. Lamson you have mentioned who gave you two dollars to vote for Jayne?"

"Answer. He was at that time clerk in the surveyor general's office."

Mr. SCOFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman, if a man who was indorsed by an Illinois Senator, and who was clerk in the post office, was therefore not a credible witness, whether he will put much reliance upon a man who swears that he got seventeen dollars from one man, two dollars from another, and the promise of a pair of elk from another, for voting?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not know that I would upon his testimony alone. But there are other witnesses who corroborate him. It seems that fraudulent voting and bribery were almost universal things up there with the Jayne party. But it so happens that it nowhere appears in this testimony that anybody gave anybody money to vote for the contestant. It nowhere appears that the contestant used any bribery, or had any complicity whatever with any of these frauds. If gentlemen think it would be just to exclude both the contestant and the sitting Delegate because one of them has committed frauds, I cannot sympathize with them. There is no evidence in this record implicating the contestant with any fraud in connection with this election.

Now, I pass on to the consideration of the vote in Charles Mix county. The canvassers in this county excluded the return. They regarded the voting in this county as so corrupt and vicious that they excluded it. The Committee of Elections excluded a portion of the vote and admitted another portion. They have given from Charles Mix county 62 votes for Jayne and 7 votes for Todd. Now, upon what testimony do they do this? I propose to show to the House that the election in Charles Mix county was as fraudulent and as corrupt as the election in Brulé and Bon Homme, both of which are excluded by the committee. If the whole vote is not so vitiated as to exclude it, there are a great many which have not been excluded which should be in this county. The contestant in this case has taken a great deal of testimony in regard to the vote in Charles Mix county. All the witnesses corroborate each other, and all the testimony tends to show that there were nearly one hundred Iowa soldiers who voted at that election, and who had no right to vote. However, I will pass over the testimony taken by the contestant in this case, and take up the testimony upon the part of the sitting Delegate as rebutting testimony.

Now, sir, where it is shown that a man has perpetrated a fraud in his own election, and that at a given precinct a large number of persons voted who ought not to have voted, what should be the proper rule to govern us in considering the testimony in regard to such a case? Should we give all the balances and presumptions in his favor, or should we indulge in any presumptions in his favor? It seems to me not. It seems to me that the presumptions should be against him; that he should be required to make his proof clear and evident as to the number of men who legally voted at the election and how they voted. But I find that the Committee of Elections in this case has given all the presumptions to the sitting Delegate. Many of the witnesses here testify that there were eighty or ninety Iowa soldiers voting at the Charles Mix precinct; and some other witnesses testified that there were about seventy. The Committee of Elections has excluded only 70 votes, taking almost the lowest number designated by any witness. I hold that the Committee of Elections should have taken the highest number designated by a witness who swears positively to the number. I say that these presumptions in favor of this man should not be indulged in.

On page 147 we have the testimony of a man named Hedges. It is shown by all the witnesses on the part of the contestant that this man was actively engaged for the sitting Delegate on the day of election; that he was circulating whisky, treating soldiers, and circulating tickets for the sitting Delegate. He participated largely in the frauds perpetrated. And yet that man, rack his memory and his brain as much as he may, could only find 49 legal voters on the poll-list of Charles Mix county. I will read an extract from his testimony:

Interrogatory 4. About how many persons voted at that time and place who were not soldiers?

Answer. About sixty. * * *

Interrogatory 6. Were the persons named by you residents of Dakota Territory for the space of ninety days preceding said election?

Answer. They were.

In his testimony he gives the names from the poll-list, which was before him to refresh his memory, of all the legal voters he is able to designate who voted at that election.

In a new country like that, a man like Hedges, who has lived there as long as the oldest settler, would be very apt to know every legal voter within the precinct. It is the custom of a new country. The early settlers, those men who participate in elections, when the poll-list is shown them to refresh their memory, as it was in this case to Hedges, do know and can point out every legal voter within the precinct. Every man who has lived in a new country knows that. Hedges testifies that there were only 49 legal voters there; and yet the Committee of Elections give the sitting Delegate 62 votes, and the contestant 7.

I would like now to have part of the testimony of William Hargis read, from page 61.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Question 3. What description of persons did you meet there assembled?

Answer. I saw there soldiers, half-breeds, and Indians, and some citizens.

Question 4. Did you meet there any persons from the Yankton agency?

Answer. I did. All the employes of Dr. Burleigh, Indian agent, were there assembled when I arrived there. I saw a team of Dr. Burleigh's filled with Indians and half-breeds, and driven by Mr. Andrew J. Faulk, a partner of the Indian sutler at the Yankton reserve, and father-in-law of Dr. Burleigh, the agent, returning from the polls to the agency. The Indians and half-breeds were drunk.

Question 6. Did these soldiers vote at these polls, and if so, state if you know how they came to participate in this election.

Answer. They did vote, and by the advice of Major Pattee, then in command of the post. On the morning of the 1st of September, A. D. 1862, I overheard Major Pattee tell the orderly sergeant of company A that "the men might all go plumping, and to have them go as far as Mr. Hedges' store, the place of election." In a few moments after I saw First Sergeant Hodgdon go in the quarters and heard him tell the men that "Major Pattee wanted them to go a plumping, and that he wanted them all to go." I crossed the river shortly after that, and many of the soldiers crossed with me, and they arrived at the polls shortly after I did, well armed, with rifles, pistols, and bowie knives.

Question 9. Did you exercise the right of challenge at these polls on that day, and to what extent?

Answer. I did. I challenged one vote, that of Edward Higgins, an Iowa soldier, who swore his vote in. I then challenged Corporal Davis, and while in the act I was snatched away from the polls by Charles P. Booge, and held till the vote was deposited. Threats were made by Iowa soldiers, which intimidated me from challenging any further.

Question 10. Did you see any whisky at these polls?

Answer. I saw a barrel of whisky inside where the judges sat, and a large tin pail, filled with whisky, setting under a shed attached to the house; a tin cup was in the pail; free access was had to the pail—Indians, half-breeds, and soldiers and citizens ad libitum. I also saw whisky given from the window where the votes were received.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I only desire to sum up the votes from these several counties and precincts, as I think they should be allowed. From Bon Homme county I think we should allow the honest votes proved, which is, Todd 25, Jayne 14; then add to that the total vote, as canvassed, 221 for Todd and 237 for Jayne, and it gives to the contestant 246 votes, and to the sitting member 251. Deduct the vote of Burle precinct, which is excluded by both reports, 8 for Todd and 63 for Jayne, and it leaves Todd 238 votes and Jayne 188 votes. Then deduct from Jayne the 9 votes proved in Yankton to have been illegal, and it leaves Todd 238 votes and Jayne 180 votes. Add the 49 votes from Charles Mix county, 7 for Todd and 42 for Jayne, and you have, Todd 245, Jayne 222. That, however, is saying nothing whatever about the Pembina vote. That vote gave to Todd 125 and to Jayne 19, which would leave Todd 370 and Jayne 241.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the gentleman from Illinois have leave to continue his remarks.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire only a moment longer.

Leave was granted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. From the testimony of the witnesses on the part of the sitting Delegate, it will be seen that in Charles Mix county the committee has allowed him, as I compute it, 20 votes more than he is entitled to. If there were but 49 legal votes cast, 7 being for Todd, then Jayne was only entitled to 42 votes there. The committee has allowed him 62. Including the Pembina vote, Todd is elected by 129 majority; excluding it, it will still leave Todd a majority of 23 votes.

Mr. UPSON obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman to yield me the floor for a moment to enable me to ask a question of the gentleman from Illinois. I desire to ask him whether from his investigations into this case he is not fully satisfied that this election case is so covered over with fraud that, in order to do justice to ourselves, we ought to send both of these men back?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am fully satisfied that the election case is so covered over with fraud upon the part of the sitting Delegate that he ought to be sent back, but that great injustice would be done to the contestant, who seems not to be mixed up with any of the fraud, and who, by conclusive testimony, is elected from that Territory, to declare that he is not entitled to the seat. Unless you repeal the law and declare that Dakota is not entitled to be represented here, one or the other of these men is entitled to a seat.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to say to the House that the tax bill, as amended by the Senate, is now printed, and I desire members to obtain copies for themselves, to examine the bill, and ascertain upon what amendments they desire separate votes when the bill is taken up.

DAKOTA CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. UPSON. It was not my intention to have occupied any of the time of the House in the discussion of this contested-election case, but having joined in the minority report, it may be proper perhaps for me to specify some of the reasons which induced me to dissent from the conclusions of the majority, and to make some statements in answer to some arguments in favor of the contestant which have been presented by the speakers who have preceded me in this debate.

Had the majority of the committee reported in favor of sending the election back to the people, I should not have considered it a matter of so much importance as to have caused me to join in a minority report; but when they proposed not only to deprive the sitting member of his seat, but also to substitute the contestant in his place upon the admission of the vote as returned from the Pembina district, or the district of the Red River of the North, called Kittson county, I felt that to allow their report to be adopted without objection would be to do great injustice not only to the sitting member, but also to the people of the Territory of Dakota.

I have no design, Mr. Speaker, to go over the evidence generally in this case. I am content in relation to most of it to take it as the majority of the committee have reported it, and to adopt their conclusions until they come to this Pembina vote. I believe, from the examination I have been able to give to the testimony, that they have been liberal enough to the contestant, and that in several instances they have given the sitting member fewer votes than from a careful canvass of the returns he was entitled to. So much so that, with the full number of votes to which he is really entitled, his actual majority outside the Pembina district would have been double what the majority of the committee have given him.

I am not disposed, however, to quarrel with the committee in that respect. I believe the chairman of the committee in making his estimates, outside of Kittson county, has proceeded, on the whole, with fairness and impartiality, and I will take up their report only as to the Pembina vote.

There appears to me to be an absurdity and inconsistency on the part of the majority of the committee in admitting evidence taken on behalf of the contestant not in accordance with law, and rejecting testimony taken on the part of the sitting member because it was not technically in compliance, as to time, with the law of 1851.

The testimony on the part of the contestant was taken before two justices of the peace, which, as I will show, was in violation of the law of 1851.

The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BROWN,] I believe, holds that the law of 1851 is not strictly applicable to the election of Delegates from the Territories, and admits that the depositions taken by the contestant are outside of and independent of that law and in accordance with the practice prior to its adoption, but he nevertheless excludes a portion of the evidence of the sitting member by uniting in the report of the majority. I have said, however, that this testimony on the part of the contestant was taken before two justices of the peace and in violation of the provisions of the act of 1851. Now, under that law before evidence can be taken before two justices of the peace, it must first be shown that there are no other officers entitled to take such depositions in the Territory. The law of 1851, in the third section thereof, designates as the proper officers before whom to take depositions, in the first instance, "any chancellor, judge, or justice of any court of record, or any mayor, recorder, or intendant of any town or city." Now, the contestant does not produce a particle of proof that there were none of these officers in the Territory at that time. The law to which I refer, as to justices of the peace, is as follows:

"Sec. 10. When no such magistrate as is by the third section of this act authorized to take depositions shall reside in the congressional district from which the election is proposed to be contested, it shall be lawful for either party to make application to any two justices of the peace residing within the said district, who are hereby authorized to receive such application and jointly to proceed upon it in the manner hereinbefore directed."

Making it a preliminary requisite that the party must show non-residence or non-existence in the Territory of the other officers before whom the depositions are first to be taken. This objection was made by the sitting member at the time that these depositions were taken. He appeared in the first instance and insisted on his legal right to have depositions taken before those officers first specified in the law to be called upon, and this objection appears in the record. The whole evidence also in this case on the part of the contestant is taken ex parte, without any appearance on the part of the sitting member, except to enter his objection to the whole proceeding as illegal, and is without the cross-examination of a single witness. I ask what may not be proved under such circumstances? I am not surprised at some of the evidence that has been brought in here against the sitting delegate and made the ground of personal assault upon him, because the witnesses were sworn and testified without any cross-examination. The contestant could select his own witnesses, ask his own questions, and take down as much or as little of the answers as he pleased. There is no one to show how much has been taken down and how much omitted. There was no cross-examination to sift the conscience of the witnesses.

Further than that, many of the facts contained in these depositions are not referred to in any of the specifications in the contestant's notice. The sitting Delegate never had an opportunity to see these depositions or know what they contained until he saw them in print in the miscellaneous documents in this case, published by order of the House. His own depositions were taken in ignorance of what was contained in the testimony of the contestant, and he has consequently not examined some of the witnesses in reference to some things which he might and probably would otherwise have done in order to protect his own reputation against some statements made by contestant's witnesses.

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] who has severely commented on this evidence referring to the sitting Delegate, seems to be controlled by some personal feeling against the sitting Delegate, or actuated by a feeling of partiality in favor of the contestant rather than by a disposition to arrive at the truth of the case. It is important for the House, in considering this evidence, to bear in mind that this testimony was taken in the absence of the sitting member, who relied upon his objection taken to its validity. Therefore, I submit, was it not proper and right, if this testimony which was so taken by the contestant not strictly according to law was admitted in evidence, to admit also the testimony of the sitting Delegate taken a little beyond the time?

I wish here to say a word in regard to this House being precluded from considering this testimony by the action in the recent case of Knox vs. Blair, which is urged on behalf of contestant. There the deposition was taken by the sitting member this winter when the House was in session, and without application to the House for leave to take testimony, and on one day's notice, and while the case was on hearing before the committee. The contestant, Knox, had no chance to rebut it, and it was properly excluded by a vote of the House. In this instance the testimony of Buckman was taken nearly a year and a half ago, and when the House was not in session, and it was taken in the presence of the contestant and on notice. The contestant was present during the whole time that the witness was giving in his testimony, and knew all his statements as sworn to by him, and has had all the subsequent time to rebut his evidence if it were untrue. Yet the contestant has not offered a word of proof to contradict or vary Buckman's statements, and the inference is strong that he would have rebutted this proof had it not been true.

I wish, also, to call attention to some printed evidence in this case outside of Mr. Buckman's testimony, and which has not been noticed thus far in this discussion. I refer to the census taken in July, 1861. That census on its face shows the vote in this Red river district to be fraudulent and false. On pages 160 to 170 are given the names, color, age, and sex of the persons who resided at that time in that section of country. In the precinct of St. Joseph, where I think that election was held, there were of white male citizens over twenty-one years of age, native born and foreign, only twenty-four. In this whole Red River district there were only forty-two over twenty-one years of age. I submit to this House that out of forty-two persons, citizens and foreigners, you cannot legally get 140 votes.

It will be borne in mind that this census includes not only native-born white citizens but also all naturalized citizens and white persons of foreign birth, and it is notorious that a great part of this population is foreign born. Now, then, I say that, outside of the testimony of Buckman, there is testimony corroborative of his, to show the non-existence of a requisite population to sustain this vote. I believe the honorable chairman of the committee will agree with me that this is a fair allegation. I believe this census was taken under the organic act organizing the Territory of Dakota, which provided for taking the census preparatory to dividing the Territory into districts for electing members of the Territorial Legislature. The census takers in Dakota at this time would be inclined to make the population as large as possible in order to increase their representation, and certainly had no interest to report the population less than it actually was.

And I wish now to state another fact which appears in the evidence in this case as corroborative of this very claim of fraud. It is that this Territorial Legislature of Dakota, since that election, has repealed the territorial law organizing this election district in that Territory, believing, upon evidence submitted to them since that election, that there is no such voting population to justify that vote, or to entitle them to a district organization and representation. There is now no such election district in the Territory of Dakota, and that fact is strongly corroborative of the position I assume here that gross frauds were perpetrated at that election. Dakota has provided against their future recurrence.

But if we take the testimony of Buckman into consideration in connection with these circumstances, the evidence is overwhelming and conclusive. I submit, taking this census and that vote together, it is enough to condemn this vote as fraudulent, and justify its rejection.

But it is said that this man Buckman is not to be believed; that he was elected by the same vote, and under it served in the Territorial Legislature. Grant the whole of these facts, he had no inducement at that time to divulge that fact, which would have been to his own injury, as it would have ousted him from his seat. But it will be borne in mind, call him what you will, a scoundrel and a dishonest man, at the same time he was elected on the same ticket with the contestant, and was his intimate friend and political associate. If Buckman be a dishonest man, he was then a companion of the contestant and his associates, and when the member from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] comes in here and claims as credible evidence the statements of contestant's witnesses that they themselves were bribed to vote for the sitting Delegate, can he consistently deny the credibility of the evidence of Buckman? It is an old saying that when rogues fall out honest men get their dues, and no man was better able to judge of these frauds than this Buckman, who was there at the time, and who, they claim, was participating throughout the whole transaction. He was the man who made the suggestion to the returning officers, when they added 100 votes to the poll-list, to return some nineteen of them as cast for Jayne, in order to make the vote look more plausible; and it appears from his evidence that 100 names were added to the vote, in addition to the mixed crowd who voted at the election, in order, as it would seem, to make the vote large enough to insure the election of contestant.

It has been said by the gentleman from Illinois who preceded me that this deposition of Buckman has been excluded. I submit to this House that there has been no action of the House upon it, and it was insisted before the committee that the action of the committee would not preclude the consideration of this evidence by the House, and the report was submitted with that view. The committee could not reject the testimony. It is no part of their function. It is the province of the House to determine what evidence they will receive and act upon, and what is competent evidence, having due reference to the law and the circumstances under which it is taken.

So in this case the evidence was not suppressed, but was referred to the Committee of Elections, and was considered, and is a proper subject for investigation here, to be taken into consideration in weighing this case and coming to a conclusion. Buckman had the means of knowledge, and his testimony is corroborated by the census and by the circumstances attending the election; and if we are going to be technical and nice in rejecting that testimony because it was not taken in time, why not reject the returns from this county of Kittson, which were not made in time as required by the law?

I will not consume time in investigating the forms of that return. My friend from Iowa has a judicial decision upon that point; and it settles the case, and shows that it was informal and not in accordance with the law of the Territory.

But I prefer not to waste time in that consideration, believing that this technical objection on a question of time should not make us reject his testimony, when we have admitted testimony on the part of the contestant which was taken before officers not strictly authorized by law to take it. To show that I am justified in what I say by the record, I will refer to a fact which appears in the case, and which, by some strange inadvertence on the part of the contestant in arranging his testimony for print, has been omitted from the printed case. That is the fact that while the contestant now claims that there were no justices of a court of record, or officers authorized to take these depositions, other than justices of the peace, residing in the Territory at the time the notice was served, he told the contestant in the notice he served that he was going to take them before Chief Justice P. Bliss, then residing in the Territory. That notice is printed in the minority report, page 4, and is as follows:

In the matter of the contested election for the position of Delegate from Dakota Territory in the House of Representatives of the United States for the Thirty-Eighth Congress:

YANKTON, D. T., December 25, 1862.

SIR: You are hereby notified that, in pursuance of an act of Congress entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested election," passed the 19th day of February, 1851, it is my intention to examine witnesses before Hon. P. Bliss, chief justice of Dakota Territory, the said chief justice being a resident within and for the congressional district, Territory of Dakota, and duly authorized by said act to examine such witnesses, or before some other person duly qualified to take such testimony, at the office of William E. Gleeson, Esq., in the town of Yankton, Yankton county, Dakota Territory, on Tuesday, the 6th day of January, A. D. 1863, at ten o'clock a. m. of said day, and each successive day thereafter, except Sundays, at the same time and place, till the testimony is taken and the witnesses are examined, a list of whom, together with their respective places of residence, is hereto annexed, of all which you will please take notice.

A copy of the subpoena issued by Hon. P. Bliss, to be served on the witnesses to be examined is hereto annexed.

J. B. S. TODD,

By his agents and attorneys, John Currier, William E. Gleeson, and Jesse Wherry.

Hon. WILLIAM JAYNE.

That is the admission of the contestant under his own hand, that Judge Bliss resided then in the Territory. And it further appears in evidence that he was then in the Territory and ready to take the depositions, as was also Judge Williams.

But it appears that the justices residing within the Territory at the time had deputed a certain man to act as their clerk who was obnoxious to the contestant, and that, rather than take the testimony before these justices having that clerk, he declined to take testimony at all before them, and went before two justices of the peace who he thought would answer his purpose better. That is shown in the printed case as being ostensibly the reason why he neglected or refused to take the testimony before the person before whom he notified the sitting Delegate that he would take it.

The notice which I have read to the House is dated December 25, 1862. The deposition of Mr. Buckman is said to have been taken in March, 1863. It is claimed that the sitting Delegate was guilty of gross neglect because he did not take that testimony within the time prescribed, to wit, sixty days. But I submit to the good sense of the House that that is explained when it is made to appear that he himself did not know that that state of facts existed, nor that Buckman could testify to those facts. We are also all aware that that district is over five hundred miles distant from the capital of the Territory, and that it is comparatively a wilderness. Being of such great extent, it is also argued by contestant that a great many votes must have been cast in it; but if that argument were to hold good, we would estimate the number of votes by the number of square miles contained within a district.

If Buckman is such a person as he is represented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to be, his interest was not to disclose sooner this matter of election frauds at Pembina, as he held his own seat in the Legislature through them. But it is made a cause of attack upon him that he has received consideration for making these disclosures. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to point to a single circumstance authorizing him to make such a statement. He says that Buckman is holding office in this city. I ask him to point to a fact in evidence justifying that statement—and I deny that such fact exists—when he assumes, on the part of the contestant in this case, that no fraud is shown against him. I will meet him outside of the Pembina vote by one extract from the testimony to show that the contestant's friends deliberately destroyed ballots, and drew pistols at the polls, and that that was one reason why some votes were excluded by the majority of the Committee of Elections in making their report in this case. To show that the contestant and his friends are not clear in this matter, I will ask the Clerk to read from the testimony of Moses Herrick, commencing at page 150, in regard to the election in Bon Homme county.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Interrogatory 3. Were you present at said election; and if so, what part did you take in the same?"

"Answer. I was present, and acted as one of the judges of the election."

"Interrogatory 4. Were the judges and clerks of said election duly appointed and sworn according to law?"

"Answer. They were. I was personally knowing to their being appointed and sworn."

"Interrogatory 5. What were the names of the judges and clerks of said election?"

"Answer. Moses Herrick, D. C. Gross, and Jacob Kiel were the judges, and C. E. Rowley and Samuel Hardy were the clerks."

"Interrogatory 6. At what hour were the polls opened, and at what hour were they closed?"

"Answer. They were opened at nine o'clock a. m., and closed at six o'clock p. m."

"Interrogatory 7. Was said election conducted by the judges and clerks without fraud, deceit, or abuse?"

"Answer. It was."

"Interrogatory 8. After the polls were closed were the votes duly counted, canvassed, and proper return thereof made to the county register of Bon Homme county, as required by law?"

"Answer. They were not."

"Interrogatory 9. Why were they not so canvassed and returned?"

"Answer. Because a mob entered the house in which the election was being held, and took forcible possession of the ballot-box, ballots, and poll-books, and drove the judges and clerks from the house, and destroyed the ballots."

"Interrogatory 10. Were the persons who thus broke up the election the friends and supporters of William Jayne, or the friends and supporters of J. B. S. Todd?"

"Answer. They were the friends and supporters of J. B. S. Todd."

"Interrogatory 11. What are their names?"

"Answer. John H. Shober, R. M. Smith, E. W. Gifford, D. C. Gifford, R. M. Johnson, Charles Cooper, W. W. Warford, and several others.

"Interrogatory 12. Did they hold a pretended election on the same night?

"Answer. They did.

"Interrogatory 13. Who were the judges and clerks of said election?

"Answer. Hugh Fraley, Chroel Gifford, and S. G. Irish were the judges of the night election, and W. W. Warford and B. M. Smith were the clerks.

"Interrogatory 14. How many persons participated at the night election?

"Answer. About fifteen or sixteen.

"Interrogatory 15. How many votes were cast at said night election?

"Answer. The judges and clerks announced that 22 votes were cast.

"Interrogatory 16. Explain how fifteen persons were able to cast 22 votes.

"Answer. I heard one of the voters, namely, John H. Shober, say that he knew how certain persons would vote who were absent, and that he would cast their votes for them.

"Interrogatory 17. How many votes were cast at the election sought to be held within the legal hours?

"Answer. Thirty-nine.

"Interrogatory 18. Are any of the judges and clerks who sought to hold an election in the legal hours now absent from the Territory? If so, name them.

"Answer. Jacob Kiel and Samuel Hardy are now absent, having removed during the early part of the last winter.

"Interrogatory 19. Which one of the friends and supporters of J. B. S. Todd who participated in said mob seized and destroyed the ballots?

"Answer. John H. Shober seized and destroyed the ballots, while E. W. Gifford stood by with a pistol, aiding and abetting Shober. The whole mob numbered some fifteen persons.

"Interrogatory 20. Were most of the persons who composed this mob intoxicated?

"Answer. They were."

Mr. UPSON. It will be seen by this, Mr. Speaker, that the skirts of the contestant and his friends are not so clear in this matter as is pretended. I believe it will be found on investigation that the contestant in this case is an adroit political manager, and is well acquainted with the mode of conducting elections in Territories. That is attested, if I mistake not, by the evidence in the celebrated case of the Nebraska contested election, Morton against Daily, in which his name appears somewhat conspicuously. Therefore, when he had an opportunity, as in this case, of taking testimony ex parte, selecting his own witnesses, putting down whatever answers he saw fit without cross-examination, it is not surprising that he made out a plausible case for himself. It is only surprising that he did not make it stronger.

I hazard the assertion that I could successfully assail the right of almost any member of the House to his seat, if I might be permitted to go around and select my witnesses and put only such questions to them as I saw fit, writing down so much of the answers as I pleased and having no cross-examination of the witnesses. I therefore dissent from the report of the majority in regard to this Pembina vote, and submit that the evidence is conclusive that the return of the vote from that county of Kitson is an absolute fraud. The last census shows that the number of votes returned from that precinct is four times the number of white persons, native or naturalized or foreign born, who were in that whole district; that within the precinct of St. Joseph where this election was held, there were not twenty-five white persons residing in July, 1861, a little more than a year before this election was held. It seems to me, therefore, that outside of Buckman's testimony there is sufficient evidence to warrant us in rejecting the vote of that precinct. And when in connection with the objection to Buckman's testimony you take into consideration the objections urged against contestant's evidence which is admitted, and the facts that the returns from Kittson county did not come in within the time contemplated by the law, and also that if strict compliance with the law of 1857 is required it was absolutely out of the power of the sitting Delegate to have complied with it by reason of the distant and isolated situation of the district, I think under all the circumstances the House is fully justified in receiving the testimony of Buckman, (which contestant has not attempted to contradict or rebut,) and in deciding that the sitting Delegate is entitled to retain his seat. If, however, the majority of the House should decide this election contest, as the Dutchman decided the lawsuit, that it was bad on both sides, [laughter.] I shall then be satisfied to have the election referred back to the people of the Territory for their decision, believing that on the whole it will be doing substantial justice in the premises, and that they are properly the ultimate arbiters in the case.

Mr. SMITH. I do not rise to make a speech, but to call the previous question on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a question of order. I ask if the House can by seconding the previous question cut off the right of General Jayne from replying if he desires to do so under the rule of the House entitling a gentleman to speak in reference to his own contest?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Dakota has the right to speak upon this contest unless the previous question shall be ordered, which cuts off all debate.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Well, sir, I am sure the gentleman from Kentucky will not insist on his demand for the previous question to the extent of cutting off the sitting Delegate from his right to be heard in his own behalf.

Mr. SMITH. If the gentleman will be quiet for a moment I will finish the remark I proposed to make in connection with my demand for the previous question. I understand that if the previous question is ordered I would have the right to speak for an hour in the closing debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] would have that right, having reported the resolutions.

Mr. SMITH. Very well; the gentleman from Massachusetts, I should have said. Now, I understand that if the previous question is seconded, the gentleman from Massachusetts does not desire to occupy his whole hour, and will yield to the sitting Delegate as much time as he desires to occupy in his hour.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Very well; I am satisfied with that.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. DAWES. Did I understand the arrangement was that the sitting Delegate should have a portion of my time?

The SPEAKER. It was so stated by the member from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DAWES. It is the first time I have heard of it, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON. I hope, by unanimous consent, the gentleman will have as much time as he desires.

There was no objection.

Mr. JAYNE. The gentleman from Illinois had a good deal to say in reference to charges against me of bribery, of the use of money in the buying of votes in this election. I have only to say in reference to the charge of using money in that election that it is false, totally false; and to show the kind of testimony which is relied on to sustain the charge, I call upon the gentleman representing the northwestern district of Iowa to say whether he is acquainted with the character of one of these witnesses by the name of Brown, and if so, whether it is such that he would be believed by any respectable man in Dakota?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I am acquainted with a man by the name of Brown, whose deposition has been read here to-day, and he has the reputation of being a most notorious liar, so much so that he went by the name of "Gassy Brown." I do not believe there is a single respectable man in that country that would believe anything he would swear to.

Mr. JAYNE. The other districts have been so fully commented on that I will not detain the House any longer by a repetition.

Mr. GANSON. Is Mr. Brown a person who could be bribed?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I think it likely that he might be bribed, and I think it likely that he might tell what was untrue. He has a bad reputation. No man in that whole country has so generally the reputation of being a corrupt liar as this man Brown.

Mr. TODD. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa. There are two Browns. [Laughter.] There is a Brown there who is a most notorious liar, and who is known as "Gassy Brown." He has confounded the two Browns of Dakota, and his statement is not in reference to the right one.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I did not think I was mistaken in the man. If so, I stand corrected. I do know that Gassy Brown had a very bad reputation, and I supposed this was his deposition.

Mr. TODD. One word in reply. This man, "Gassy Brown," was indicted in Dakota for trespassing on the Indian land reservation, and removed from the Territory in 1862, and went to Minnesota. He got there in the midst of the Indian troubles in August, and was killed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I should like to know whether the gentleman obtained that information from Brown himself. I saw him alive and well on the Missouri river about one year ago, and am informed that he was lately hung in Montana Territory.

Mr. JAYNE. I propose to examine the testimony in this case, and I will say at the very commencement of my remarks that I do not deny but that some illegal votes may have been cast for me as well as many for the contestant. But I do affirm and shall prove from the evidence that a majority of the legal votes cast on the 1st day of September, 1862, in the Territory of Dakota, for a Delegate to the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States, were cast for myself. I take it that the decision of this case depends not on the illegal votes, but upon the legal votes cast. I propose to show, and will show beyond all doubt or question, that I received a majority of the legal votes cast for Delegate to Congress.

YANKTON COUNTY.

The contestant (Mr. Todd) objects to the votes of Newton Edmunds, George W. Lamson, Abner Wood, Charles McKinley, Cortes Fessenden, D. T. Fessenden, and John Mellon being counted, on the ground that they were not residents of the Territory. Now, there is no positive evidence for whom they voted; various witnesses testify that they believe or have heard that they voted for me. There is no evidence for whom they voted; it is all hearsay.

But let us examine the point, were they legal voters? Mr. Lyman, (page 29,) Mr. Todd's witness, testifies that he challenged six of the above-mentioned seven (all save John Mellon) and that they took the required oath, and then voted.

Now, we find that these gentlemen took the requisite oath that they had resided in the Territory ninety days prior to the election. Have we any other evidence that they were residents of the Territory ninety days prior to the said election? Mr. Pinney (page 146) testifies that Cortes Fessenden, D. T. Fessenden, and John Mellon, were residents of the Territory more than a year prior to the election. Mr. Edmunds, then the chief clerk in the surveyor general's office, and now the present Governor of Dakota, testifies that he himself had been a resident of Dakota since July, 1861; that he was personally acquainted with Abner Wood, Charles McKinley, Cortes Fessenden, D. T. Fessenden, John Mellon, and George W. Lamson, and that they were residents of Dakota ninety days prior to election day. For Mr. Edmunds's evidence see page 152. Now, as a matter of fact, these persons have been residents of Dakota for three years past.

BON HOMME COUNTY.

The election in this county was broken up and the ballots seized and destroyed before they were counted and canvassed so as to ascertain for whom a majority of them were cast. This most wanton outrage was committed by a drunken mob, instigated and led on by one John Shober and Byron M. Smith, they all being the friends and supporters of Mr. Todd, as proven by the evidence of George M. Pinney, (pages 145 and 146,) Charles E. Rawley, (pages 144 and 145,) L. H. Litchfield, (pages 142 and 143,) and Moses Herrick, (pages 151, 152, and 153.) This vote, I submit, should not have been counted at all, for Mr. Todd has no right to avail himself of the benefits of his own wrong. But if counted, his own testimony gives him 26 votes and myself 13.

I know that the contestant alleges as an excuse for the illegal and shameful conduct of his drunken friends and supporters in seizing and destroying the ballots, that they thought a fraud had been committed by the officers of the election. We have the evidence of Mr. Rawley, one of the clerks of the election, (page 144,) and Moses Herrick, one of the judges of the election, (page 151,) that the election was conducted by the officers of the election without fraud, deceit, or abuse. The evidence of these parties I claim to be good against that of John H. Shober and R. M. Johnson, Mr. Todd's principal witnesses, both of whom, Shober and Johnson, were indicted for perjury by the United States grand jury last fall for fabricating and swearing to false Indian claims, presented to the Sioux indemnity commission, sitting in Minnesota in 1863.

CHARLES MIX COUNTY.

The contestant asks that the whole vote of Charles Mix county may be rejected, because he alleges some Iowa soldiers voted in this county whom he insists were not legal voters. For sake of argument admit that fact. Does that vitiate the entire poll? The fact that illegal votes are cast at any poll will not, cannot disfranchise the legal voters of the poll. Nothing could vitiate the entire poll unless it were the fact that the officers of the election had practiced fraud, deceit, or abuse in conducting the election. This is not even alleged.

This attempt to disallow the legal vote of a whole county has no foundation in law or equity. I will not insult the good sense of this House by dwelling on this point any further.

I prove by the evidence of John J. Thompson, that he was one of the judges of the election held in Charles Mix county, at the house of Charles E. Hedges, on the 1st day of September, 1862, (for Thompson's evidence see page 149,) and that the judges and clerks of the election were duly appointed and sworn according to law; that the polls were opened and closed at the legal hours, and that there was no fraud, deceit, or abuse practiced by the judges or clerks, or any one of them, in conducting said election. He also testifies that the friends and supporters of Jayne did not use any threats or violence to prevent the friends and supporters of Todd from voting at said election.

He testifies that only 7 votes were cast for J. B. S. Todd, and 138 were cast for William Jayne.

Charles E. Hedges, (page 147,) A. J. Faulk, (page 147,) and F. Carman, (page 149,) all testify that they were present at said election at the house of Charles E. Hedges, in Charles Mix county, and they all corroborate the testimony of Thompson, and testify that no violence or threats were used by the friends of Jayne to prevent the friends of Todd from voting.

By reference to the laws of Dakota passed at the first session of the Legislature held in 1862, page 1, Private Laws, it will be seen that Collin Campbell, Collin Lamont, Lewis Lacompt, and Benjamin Cadot, half-breeds, had been made citizens by an act of the Legislature, and were therefore legal voters.

I prove by the evidence of T. V. B. Johnson, Daniel Babcock, R. Michael, John Shover, Martin Powell, Reuben S. Dexter, and Benjamin F. Smith, all members of the Iowa regiment stationed at Fort Randall, and all Mr. Todd's own witnesses, that the entire number of Iowa soldiers who voted in Charles Mix county was just 70. For the above evidence see pages from 72 to 79. To the vote of the 70 Iowa soldiers add three half breeds, Balleste Lacont, Boctas Dazaro, and Eluxe C. Young, proved by the evidence of James Maloney (page 67) to have voted, and you find 73 votes to be taken from the 146 votes cast at said election poll, which leaves 73 legal votes beyond any question or doubt. Of which legal vote, if you please, concede Mr. Todd the whole number returned for him, 7, though there is no evidence that Mr. Todd received 7 legal votes; for Mr. Johnson, (page 72,) and Mr. Babcock, (page 73,) Mr. Todd's own witnesses, testify that some of the Iowa soldiers voted for Mr. Todd. Among all his witnesses we only find two who swear that they voted for him; yet conceding him 7 and myself the remainder of the legal votes, and my majority in Charles Mix county is 59. I claim that by Mr. Todd's own evidence it is shown that there were 73 legal votes cast in Charles Mix county. I corroborate this fact by my own witnesses.

I prove by Mr. Hedges (page 147) that 60 legal votes were cast by citizens who were not soldiers, and he further testifies that he was personally acquainted with forty-nine of them, and gives their names, and states that to his own knowledge they have been residents of the Territory for ninety days prior to the election.

Mr. Carmon (pages 148 and 149) and Mr. Thompson (pages 149 and 150) both swear to the same facts; Mr. Carmon giving the names of fifty-two citizens with whom he was personally acquainted and who had been residents of the Territory for ninety days prior to said election.

By the testimony of the same three parties, Hedges, Carmon, and Thompson, I prove in addition to the citizen voters that Owen Irish, Columbus Irish, Jerome Irish, William Harcomb, N. B. Dempsey, James Hunter, Abraham Shaeffer, and Joseph Charidon, were legal voters, and that they did vote at said election; that they were members of the Iowa regiment, but that they had resided in Dakota at the time and before they enlisted in the fall of 1861.

BRULÉ CREEK POLL.

Admitting all that the contestant says in relation to a portion of the votes being cast before the legal hour for opening the poll, and rejecting all votes cast before nine o'clock, how stands the vote at this Brulé Creek precinct?

By the evidence of Mr. Wallace, page 83, and M. H. Somers, page 86, Mr. Todd's own witnesses, it is proved that 37 legal votes were cast at this poll between the legal hours for holding the election, only 12 of which Mr. Todd claims to have been cast for him, leaving me 25, giving me a majority of 13 at this poll.

But I prove by Mr. Allen, the register of the land office in Dakota, pages 153 and 154, that he was personally acquainted with almost every man residing at Brulé Creek; that there were about sixty men residing there at the time of said election, and that they were legal voters; that a portion of them had been there in the fall of 1861, and had made claims at that time, and went back for their families and did not return until about fifty or sixty days prior to the election.

RED RIVER DISTRICT.

The election returns from Kittson county, on the Red River of the North, I hold are not to be received and counted, for two reasons. One is that the county of Kittson is situated wholly in the Indian country, and though within the geographical limits, it is, by the act of Congress organizing the Territory of Dakota, without the political limits of said Territory.

Section first of the organic act of Dakota provides that all Indian Territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries of said Territory and shall constitute no part of said Territory.

But I insist for another reason, and a very conclusive one, why the vote of Kittson county shall not be counted. The pretended election held in that county was false, illegal, and a fraud throughout. (See evidence of Buckman, pages 154, 155, 156, and 157.) Mr. Buckman testifies that there were present at the polls on election day only six men who were legal voters; that the officers of the election consisted of three half-breeds, one Englishman, who was not naturalized, and one Frenchman, who claimed to have been naturalized.

Of the whole board of election, there seems to have been but one legal voter among them; while the law requires that every officer of the election should himself be a legal voter. Mr. Buckman testifies that about 46 votes were cast in the day-time, 10 or 12 by white men, and 36 by Indians and half-breeds, and that at night about 100 names were added to the poll-list. That for appearances, to make the returns look well on the face, the officers of the election gave me 19 votes, and the rest were set down for Mr. Todd, returning for Mr. Todd over a hundred majority, as cast at this spurious election.

The two Representatives on this floor from the State of Minnesota are not ignorant of the well-established character of these Pembina voters; nor is the country ignorant of the systematic frauds which have been practiced before this by these same men. They have made for themselves a name. Pembina and Red river are synonymous with fraud and ballot-box stuffing.

In conclusion I would say, taking the official canvass in those counties in which there is no dispute, and Mr. Todd's own evidence in regard to the vote in Brulé Creek precinct, in Cole county, in Bon Homme county, and in Charles Mix county, the vote stands as follows, giving Mr. Jayne a majority of 20 votes:

	Todd, Jayne.
Cole county.....	18	12
Elk Point.....	32	6
Willow.....	12	25
Brulé Creek.....	64	66
Clay county.....	66	66
Yankton county.....	26	13
Bon Homme county.....	24	13
Todd county.....	9	11
Dakota cavalry.....	7	66
Charles Mix county.....	258	278
		258
Jayne's majority.....		20

Having passed over all the evidence in this case, and having shown that I received a majority of the legal votes cast for Delegate to the Thirty-Eighth Congress, I propose to close my remarks by briefly noticing the majority report made by the Committee of Elections. I have always felt indifferent whether this case should be settled upon strictly legal principles, holding each party to the law, or upon the merits, without regard to mere technicalities, and the seat awarded to the person having received the highest number of legal votes, conscious that in either case I must be declared elected.

It would seem to be a self-evident proposition that this case should be settled either upon law or the merits; yet the majority of the committee do neither of these things. They confessedly depart from the requirements of the law in behalf of the contestant, while they hold me strictly to the law.

The majority report acknowledges that the contestant at the first step departed from the requirements of the law, for it states that—

"While the statute requires the contestant to serve his notice of contest upon the sitting Delegate within thirty days after the result of the election has been declared by the board of canvassers, the notice in this case was served before the result was declared."

The report, however, proceeds to state that—

"The committee are of opinion that this was a defect which the sitting Delegate could waive, and that by answering after the result had been proclaimed," &c.; "he had waived the right," &c.

Without controverting this position it is difficult to perceive why, if the contestant is to be permitted to avail himself of a notice not strictly in accordance with the statute, I should not have the like liberality extended to myself in relation to a deposition taken on notice to the contestant, when the contestant (Mr. Todd) was present listening to the examination, and consenting to an adjournment for the purpose of completing it. There is, however, a more serious objection, and, if the requirements of the statute are followed, a fatal objection to all the contestant's testimony. It is all ex parte and taken before justices of the peace. Now, the act of Congress regulating the taking of testimony in contested elections, passed February 14, 1851, prohibits the taking of any testimony before justices of the peace if there shall be residing in the congressional district in which the contest arises "any judge of any court of the United States, or any chancellor, judge, or justice of any court of record, or any mayor, recorder, or intendant of any town or city."

Now, in this case it so happens that the contestant gave me notice that he should take his testimony before Hon. P. Bliss, one of the United States judges of the Territory of Dakota. I quote from the notice of the contestant, which is as follows:

"It is my intention to examine witnesses before Hon. P. Bliss, chief justice of Dakota Territory, the said chief justice being a resident within and for the congressional district, Territory of Dakota, and duly authorized by said act to examine such witnesses."

But when the day of examination of witnesses arrived the contestant, not in accordance with the statute, but directly contrary to it, and in violation of law, proceeded to examine his witnesses before two justices of the peace—incompetent authority. I protested against the right of the two justices of the peace to act in the case, and declined to appear before them. If the law is to be observed, the contestant has presented no evidence which can be received.

But admitting all the contestant's evidence, thus giving him the benefit of the irregularities shown, still I am entitled to my seat, as proclaimed by the territorial canvassers, and so acknowledged by the majority report, unless the Kittson county return is received and counted for the contestant, (Mr. Todd.)

The Kittson county return, commonly known as the Pembina or Red river vote, then decides the fact who is entitled to the seat as Delegate from Dakota, according to the majority report.

I accept this statement of the case. The return from Kittson county, known as the Pembina vote, and situated wholly within the Indian country, is not a copy of "the abstract of votes given in his county," made by the clerk, with the assistance of two justices of the peace, as required by the territorial laws, chapter thirty-two, sections twenty-eight, thirty-one, and thirty-three, but a mere certificate of the clerk; and moreover, it was not received till after the time limited by law when returns could be received, and the canvass had been completed, and therefore, if the law is to be observed, could not be received; and this would leave me entitled to the seat as proclaimed by the canvassers.

But the majority of the committee admit the Pembina vote, notwithstanding it was not in accordance with law, nor received within the time limited by law, and refuse to admit the testimony taken on notice and when the contestant was present, showing the Pembina returns to be fraudulent, because I did not take the testimony before the proper officer and within the proper time. Time is held to be immaterial by the majority for the purpose of admitting the Pembina returns, and material for the purpose of excluding the testimony to show those returns fraudulent.

So the letter of the law is departed from to bring the case of a Delegate within the act of Congress, to make valid the notice of contest given before the canvass was declared, to receive the testimony taken before justices of the peace, and the Pembina vote not returned within the time or according to law, all these departures being for the benefit of the contestant; but when a departure from the strict letter of the law would have admitted the testimony impeaching the Pembina vote, and showing it to have been wholly false, fictitious, and fraudulent, and have been for the benefit of myself, the sitting Delegate, the letter of the law is insisted upon and the testimony is excluded. On what principle can such gross inconsistency be sanctioned?

It does seem that justice and equity demand that if any consideration is to be given to this return made out of time and contrary to the requirements of the law, equal consideration should be paid to the testimony which proves this return to have been fictitious and fraudulent.

I have before referred to the evidence in relation to this bogus return, but, as according to the majority report, the whole case turns on this return, I hope I will be excused if I again briefly notice the testimony in relation to this Pembina return. What is the evidence in regard to this vote?

First, the census, taken about a year previous, shows that in the whole Red River country there were of white males but fifty-one, and of those over the age of twenty-one but forty-two; and these whites were living in different places in the Red River country, some of them two hundred miles apart, thus only a part living in the county adjacent to the precinct where this fraudulent vote is cast.

Then the testimony of Joseph J. Buckman, taken March 11, 1863, before Hon. W. F. Purcell, judge of the orphan's court in the District of Columbia, on notice duly given, both parties being present at the examination. This testimony (pages 154, 155, and 156) shows that there were but six persons, native born and naturalized, present at the place of voting in Kittson county on election day, who were entitled to vote on the day of election; that the board of election consisted of three half-breeds and a Frenchman and an Englishman, only one of the five being a voter, the other four not only being disqualified from acting as members of the board of election, but not even being qualified voters. The witness was the postmaster at Pembina, and had been an Indian trader, and was well acquainted with all persons residing in that country. The witness swears that he does not think that more than ten or twelve white persons were present on the day of election, and of those but three were native-born citizens of the United States, and three others who claim to be naturalized citizens, and none who had made declaration of their intention to become citizens. He says 46 or 48 votes were cast for Delegates to Congress at that election; that the excess over the number of legal voters present was cast by illegal voters, mostly half-breeds, and that there were added to the votes cast, after the close of the polls, a little over 100 votes; and the witness also testifies that Charles Morneau, who was clerk of the board of county commissioners, and sent his own certificate, and not a copy of the abstract as required by law, to the secretary of the Territory, was himself present at this fraudulent election.

The fact that this pretended election was wholly false and fraudulent, is the true reason why the return was not made in accordance with law, by sending a copy of the abstract of the canvass made by the clerk and two justices of the peace. The election being fictitious, no two justices of the peace could be found to indorse such a fraud, so Charles Morneau, the clerk, himself a party to the fraud, alone makes out a certificate of this pretended election return and certifies to it. The evidence of Buckman is unimpeached, and is corroborated by the census returns. The fact is so notorious that the whole Red River country is almost wholly uninhabited by white persons, who alone, if possessed of the other qualifications, are by law entitled to the right of suffrage, that the Legislature of Dakota at its last session abolished the district as a voting precinct, and repealed the act creating the county of Kittson, because the laws of Dakota require that there shall be twenty voters residing there before a county can be organized. Here we have a bogus return of 150 votes pretended to have been cast, returned from one precinct in Kittson county, while the Legislature of Dakota tell you by a solemn enactment that there are not twenty voters in the whole county of Kittson. Can it be that the House of Representatives will receive a return made out of time and contrary to law, and yet refuse on a mere technicality to receive the testimony which exposes this base and fraudulent vote? Without the aid of this fictitious Pembina vote, every member of the committee admits that the contestant (Mr. Todd) has no claim to the seat.

As to any personal allusions the contestant has seen proper to make, or any attempt to connect me with any of the fraudulent voting, I have only this to say, that it is wholly false; and I may as well say that I have too much respect for my character to notice, care, or concern myself about any such attempts at slander, coming from a man who resigned his place, so says report, from fear of being dismissed from the Army for cowardice; coming from a man whose name the domestic influence of the White House has three times induced the Executive of the United States reluctantly to send to the Senate for confirmation as a brigadier general, and who has three times met with a prompt refusal by the Senate. I should scorn to notice any personal remarks coming from any one bearing the name of the contestant, (Todd,) a family somewhat notorious for their love of office. If they cannot get office under President Lincoln they take it under Jeff. Davis.

A word or two in reply to the remarks of the honorable and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, and I am done. I understand that the gentleman is a lawyer—a very able and distinguished lawyer—and for this reason I was the more astonished at the course of argument he thought proper to pursue in his speech. I had thought that in the argument of a case a judge of character and pretension always confined himself to the record and evidence in the summing of the evidence in a case. Where do you find it in evidence or record that Mr. Buckman received an office as a consideration for testifying in this case, or that as a further consideration he is now employed in the office of the United States marshal for Dakota Territory? The gentleman from Massachusetts must not suppose that his influential position as chairman of the committee, and the fear that that position is to be wielded against me, will deter me from correcting such erroneous statements. I was not a little surprised that he, the chairman of the committee, a lawyer, and in this case one of the judges sitting in judgment on this case, should have so traveled out of the record, and made use of idle rumors and false rumors, and brought them into this House to influence the minds of members who should decide this case upon law and evidence.

Not wishing to be misunderstood, I now state plainly that I cannot believe that the distinguished chairman of the committee would deliberately, maliciously, and willfully state that which he knew to be false, and therefore I must say that he has ignorantly stated that which he did not know to be true.

Mr. Buckman is not in the office of the United States marshal for Dakota, nor has Mr. Buckman ever received from me any consideration, either pecuniary or political, for testifying in this case, and exposing the infamous fraud of that pretended and fictitious election on the Red river.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FANGSWORTH] seemed to take much delight while reading and commenting upon the testimony of Messrs. Falkenburg and Brown, endeavoring to implicate me with securing their votes by money. Now, all I have to say is, that all the testimony of these two witnesses in relation to myself is false, wholly, totally false, from the beginning to the end. Be he who he may, whoever asserts that I gave any man money or promised any man money to vote for me utters a most atrocious falsehood.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to enter into any discussion of which is the "true, genuine, and original 'Gassy Brown,'" and which is not. I leave the matter of the Brown family of Dakota Territory to the gentleman from Iowa, who seems to have an unction for it. It has nothing to do with the question which is before us.

The Committee of Elections have no desire beyond this, that the House shall understand what is the real issue in this case, and decide fairly between these parties. There is an apprehension in my mind, and I think it generally pervades the committee, that injustice is about to be done. If possible I want that no wrong shall be inflicted upon the Territory of Dakota.

So far as the majority and the minority of the Committee of Elections are concerned, they both agree that Jayne is not entitled to a seat upon this floor as the Delegate from Dakota. On this all parties are agreed, notwithstanding the attempt on the part of those who conducted the election in his behalf in the Territory to put him in a seat by the grossest frauds that could be perpetrated. The committee have not reflected on Mr. Jayne personally. They have not taken into consideration the testimony brought forward for that purpose, and I have no desire to lend the sanction of the committee to it. It is enough that Mr. Jayne had a majority returned for him fraudulently, and that he has no right to this seat.

The only question on which two members of the committee have differed with the others is this—and it is the only question on which there is any substantial difference—whether the deposition taken in this city after the expiration of the time for taking testimony in this case by the sitting Delegate shall be admitted. I wish to allude to two or three of the points taken by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. URSON] and others, who argue that it ought to be admitted. They say that the law regulating elections to this House does not apply to elections in the Territories, and that we are not, therefore, to be guided by that law. The report of the minority takes that position, that there is no law of Congress regulating a contested election in a Territory, simply because a Delegate has no vote. It is quite enough to know that that matter has received a construction by this House which until to-day has never been questioned, that the contestants of seats of Delegates must conform to the laws of Congress touching this matter. Since the passage of the law there have been seven contests in the Territories which this House has made to conform to it.

The cases of Bennet vs. Chapman and Otero vs. Galligos in 1856, Reeder vs. Whitfield in 1857, Chapman vs. Ferguson in 1858, the same case in 1859, Morton vs. Daily in 1860, were all held by the Committee of Elections and by the House itself to conform to that statute; and this session this very committee have reported unanimously to this House a contested-election case from New Mexico—Galligos vs. Perea—recommending that it should be dismissed because it does not conform to that statute. I hold the report in my hand, submitted by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. SMITHERS] in behalf of the committee without a dissenting voice.

Mr. UPSON. Our main consideration in that case was that nobody appeared on behalf of the contestant. Nobody appeared to contest the case.

Mr. DAWES. That is true, but I would not slander the committee by saying that in the absence of a party they turned a man out of a seat without giving him a hearing. It was not upon that ground. I have the report in my hand, and I submit to the gentleman from Michigan that the report never was put upon that ground, although that fact is set out in it.

I consider some things settled by precedent; I consider some things settled by the construction which the House of Representatives put upon the law; and during the last fourteen years, while that law has been standing upon the statute-book, year after year they have required contestants from the Territories to conform to it, and it seems too late to raise the question that the law does not apply to Territories. Then the gentleman from Michigan, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] who coincides with him, insist that if the law touching elections applies to the Territories, and a deposition was introduced by the contestant not in conformity to law, that would make it right to introduce the deposition of the sitting member, although in other respects it was not in compliance with the statute.

But I submit that the gentleman is mistaken both in his premises and in his conclusions. He is mistaken in his premises because I think, if I could have the ear of this House, that the committee's conclusion was correct. The law provides that the testimony shall be taken before certain officers; if they are not present in the Territory, then two justices shall take the testimony. Now, it seemed to be admitted by everybody at the hearing, that unless the justices of the supreme court of the Territory were residents, then there were no other officers to take the testimony, except the justices of the peace who did take it.

Mr. UPSON. It was the duty of the contestant to show that there were no other officers in the Territory.

Mr. DAWES. I submit that it is not the duty of the Committee of Elections to raise for parties points which they never raised for themselves. That is a duty which I did not suppose either devolved upon a court or upon the Committee of Elections; and now I ask my friend if the idea was suggested before the committee that there were any other officers to take the testimony except the judges of the supreme court of the Territory.

The whole testimony, uncontroverted, shows that the justices of the supreme court did not reside in the Territory. Therefore the duty devolved upon some other officers. The last named in the list are two justices, and nobody claimed before the committee that anybody else was there to take the evidence.

But aside from that there is another fact which settles this question. Suppose that the chief justice of the Territory, who is the only one talked about, did reside in the Territory. Notices were given by him to take testimony "before him, or some other person duly qualified to take said testimony," on Friday, the 5th day of January. There was before the committee a note from the judge saying that he could not stay in the Territory long enough to take those depositions; that he might possibly stay until Friday night, the 5th of January. Now it appears that there was no testimony taken on Friday, but that the testimony was taken on a subsequent day.

Mr. WILSON. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the note to which he alludes, stating that the chief justice could not be in the Territory on a certain day, is evidence to be received by the committee or by anybody else?

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps not generally; but where you want to ascertain a man's residence the law says the best evidence is his own declarations. That is what I am after now. I want to know whether Justice Bliss resided in that Territory; and inasmuch as a man's residence does not depend upon his location merely but on that coupled with his intention, and his intentions can only be ascertained by his declarations accompanying his acts, the books of evidence have admitted those declarations as evidence. Besides, the note was used by both parties before the committee without objection.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to make a suggestion.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot yield.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he intends to have a vote to-night.

Mr. DAWES. I did intend to have if I live through this operation. [Laughter.] I was about to remark, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. We cannot hear a word the gentleman from Massachusetts says on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. Neither can the Chair.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The word "operation" has been heard here; and that is the only word heard here for the last half hour. I would like to know what he means in connection with the word "operation."

Mr. UPSON. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will read the note to which he refers, so that the House may understand it.

Mr. DAWES. There is no evidence, nor any pretense, that Justice Bliss, or any other man authorized to take this testimony, was present at Yankton on the day it was taken, except the two justices of the peace who officiated. It is claimed by the two gentlemen who made this minority report that Mr. Justice Bliss was authorized to issue a subpoena. He said himself that he was going to leave the Territory on a certain day, which was nearly two weeks before the time fixed for taking testimony. There is not a particle of evidence or a claim that he was there; but, on the contrary, it was admitted that Mr. Justice Bliss was not there when the testimony was actually taken. It was taken on a notice issued by him. The statute provides that all witnesses who shall attend upon subpoena, or shall attend voluntarily at the time and place appointed, of which examination notice shall have been given, shall be examined on oath or affirmation by the magistrate who issued the subpoena, or, in case of his absence, by any other such magistrate as is by law authorized to issue such subpoena.

So that, if Mr. Justice Bliss was not there when the testimony was actually taken on notice issued by him, then it was proper to pick up any of the magistrates designated in the section to take the depositions, and these two justices are so named. That is the fact of the case. And therefore, Mr. Speaker, there is no soundness in the position taken by the gentlemen who join in this minority report, that the testimony was not taken according to law, even if Judge Bliss was a resident, which is against all the evidence. But it does not follow that, if it was not taken in accordance with law, that authorizes the taking of depositions on the part of the sitting Delegate long after the time prescribed by law.

The minority of the committee object to the count of the Pembina vote by this House because it was not received at the office of the secretary of the Territory till after the time fixed by law for the board of canvassers to canvass the votes and declare the result, and was not included therein. This was reason enough for the canvassers but not for this House, which looks after the vote actually cast, not when it was returned. The law fixing the time within which they were to be returned was directory upon the canvassers but not upon this House, which always has and ought to count such votes if they are satisfied that they are genuine. The next objection is that the return itself was not made out in conformity to law, for this reason, as the minority say:

"The return from Kittson county, known as the Pembina vote, and situated wholly within the Indian country, is not a copy of 'the abstract of votes given' in his county," made by the clerk, with the assistance of two justices of the peace, as required by the territorial laws, chapter thirty-two, sections twenty-eight, thirty-one, and thirty-three, but a mere certificate of the clerk."

Now, this is what the law requires the clerk to do:

"On the twentieth day after the close of any election, or sooner, if all the returns be received, the clerk of the board of county commissioners, taking to his assistance two justices of the peace of the county, shall proceed to open said returns and make abstracts of the votes in the following manner: the abstract of the votes for Delegate to Congress shall be on one sheet, the abstract of votes for members of the Legislative Assembly shall be on another sheet," &c.

After having done this he shall do the next thing, which is required in these words. I read from the statute:

"The clerk of the board of commissioners, immediately after making the abstracts of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of the Territory at the seat of government."

He "shall make a copy of the abstract"—not that he shall certify that he took to his aid two justices—and "transmit it," that is, the abstract, "by mail." Now, what did he transmit by mail? Here it is:

ST. JOSEPH, DAKOTA TERRITORY.
OFFICE OF THE REGISTER OF DEEDS,
September 5, 1862.

At an election held on the 1st day of September, A. D. 1862, in the county of Kittson and Territory of Dakota, being the seventh council and representative district of said Territory, the following persons received the number of votes annexed to their respective names, to wit:

For Delegate to Congress, J. B. S. Todd had 125 votes.
For Delegate to Congress, William Jayne had 19 votes.
Certified by me: CHARLES MORNEAU,

Clerk of the Board of County Commissioners.

Now, it is objected that this is no "abstract." What is an abstract of votes? It is the summing up and drawing off the result of several items, that is, the total result of voting of several precincts. But suppose, as is the fact in this case, there is but one precinct, how could you sum it up and draw off a result differing from this actually furnished? If this had only been called an abstract, that is all that would have been necessary, because it is all which would have been possible. But my friends of the minority agreed to a report in the Knox vs. Blair case, just adopted by the House, in which they say that an abstract is not necessary at all. This is the language of that report:

"In the opinion of the committee, all of the polls which were rejected for want of 'an abstract of votes' were erroneously rejected. The abstract is simply a computation or casting up of the votes, not required by law, and, if erroneously done, to be corrected. The name of each voter and the person for whom he voted is given in each case, and the computation left to be made is not only perfectly easy, but is what is being done all the way through this investigation. The committee have therefore taken into the count all polls rejected for this reason."

By this decision of the committee in that case the returns from nine voting places made without an abstract, although the law of Missouri is in this respect precisely like that of Dakota, were nevertheless counted by the committee and the House. I think, therefore, it is altogether too late, both for my friends who signed this minority report and for the House itself, to raise that objection.

The question before the House is then narrowed down to this, and this is the whole of it. Here were before the House yesterday two depositions, both of them taken in this city; both of them taken out of time, after the time had expired for taking depositions. They were taken before a magistrate in this city, both of them. But they were taken in two different cases. They were both printed, and were both before the House. The House refused to permit one of them to be used because it was taken out of time, and decided the case without allowing it to be read. And now the House is asked in this, the very next case, to reverse the rule and to permit this other deposition to be read and considered. If it were right to exclude it in one case, it is not right to read it in the other. That which was right an hour ago cannot under the same circumstances be wrong now.

I submit it to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD], who I know does not mean to do wrong in this matter, and I ask him to explain the reason why the House should shut its eyes and ears to the one and open them to the other.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in the case of Mr. Blair the deposition was taken this winter about an election occurring in the State of Missouri a year and a half ago, giving the party on the other side no opportunity to be heard or to make any contradictory reply. In the case before us, the deposition taken by Mr. Jayne was taken a year ago last March, on the 10th day of March, 1863. General Todd had all of last spring, all of last summer, fall, and winter, as well as of this spring, to bring witnesses from that Territory for the purpose of disproving this affidavit.

Now one thing further, if the gentleman will allow me. The vote itself from this St. Jo.

precinct could not and did not arrive at the seat of government of the Territory within the sixty days prescribed by law, and Mr. Jayne therefore had no opportunity to avail himself of his rights under the law. And I desire to say furthermore, that a majority of the committee waived the matter of time in respect to General Todd giving his notice of the contest of the election before the vote was declared. They waived that, and yet they insist on the sixty days' limitation in respect to this vote at St. Jo., which had not reached the seat of government at the expiration of sixty days.

Now, sir, in respect to the officers before whom these depositions of the sitting member were taken, they gave notice to Judge Bliss of their intention to take them before him. Judge Bliss was there and said he would take them. Then they said they wanted to take them before Judge Williams. Judge Williams said he would not be there to take them all, but would take as many as he could; and they then went off and took them before two justices of the peace. The majority of the committee waived that irregularity, they waived the irregularity of the notice, and yet when they come to this fraud, which the gentleman from Massachusetts is too honest to swallow—I want the gentleman from Massachusetts to hear this—I say which the gentleman was too honest to swallow, in respect to these 44 votes, when he knows that there was only one man who voted legally, they exclude the proof of that upon these technicalities alone.

Mr. DAWES resumed the floor.

Mr. TODD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot yield any further. If I understand my friend from Pennsylvania correctly, while he admits that both of these depositions were taken precisely alike without any authority of law, he justifies the conclusion to depart from the rule adopted in one case in the other because the deposition was taken earlier and left an opportunity for Mr. Todd to bring witnesses to controvert it. He omits to state to the House what every lawyer who has been a judge knows, that Mr. Todd had no power to bring a witness here. The authority of the law over the case had expired. He had no authority to take a deposition. It must all be voluntary after that. He could not take depositions; he had no power to reward witnesses by raising them to office here for telling their story. Sir, there is no reason I can comprehend, and I think my friend from Pennsylvania in all fairness will admit there is none, why the committee should have departed in one case from the rule laid down by the House to them in the other. He says that the committee departed from the rule themselves in overlooking the technicality of Mr. Todd giving notice of the contest before the certificate had been given to Mr. Jayne.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman will allow me I will make a proposition which I think will make a satisfactory adjustment of this question.

Mr. DAWES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I decline to yield, and I might as well decline going on any further in this case. I have been struggling since yesterday morning to discharge my duty, knowing as well as anybody that it was a disagreeable one; but I find that I cannot have the attention of the House, and I am almost disposed to abandon the whole thing. It is impossible to speak to the House when nobody is disposed to listen. I am sure I do not want gentlemen to listen on my account, for I have ceased to have any further interest in this matter than my duty compels me to take.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has introduced a minority report, in which he says he will not controvert the position of the majority in declaring that the defect in the notice had been waived.

The gentleman had notice. The minority of the committee say that they do not controvert the proposition of the majority of the committee in pronouncing all defects in that notice waived. The committee say that, inasmuch as the notice was served before the time—after the time Mr. Jayne answered it without taking objection to it—he thereby waived any defect, and the minority say they do not controvert that point.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move an amendment repealing the act organizing the Territory of Dakota?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman has not the floor to make that amendment.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order if the gentleman had the floor.

Mr. DAWES. After admitting that the majority report was correct in that respect, it is now too late to object; and he cannot admit a deposition in one case that he refused to admit in another.

Mr. SCOFIELD rose.

Mr. DAWES. I decline to yield further. I want to conclude what I have to say as speedily as possible. I hope this will be received in good temper—I am in good temper myself.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no reason for making a distinction between the two cases. If we do we are submitting ourselves to the criticism which I have suggested. Whoever is disposed to criticize the action of the House in the last case will say then that you refused to open your ears and listen to a deposition in order that you might turn one man out, and that in the next breath you declared you would have a like deposition admitted to keep another man in. Will you admit a deposition taken in this case out of time, when you refused in the previous case to do the same thing? I do not think any gentleman intends to do wrong; I do not think any gentleman is desirous of doing that which he thinks is wrong; but I submit that we are in danger of putting ourselves in that attitude.

The committee have supposed that the decisions of the House from year to year constituted a code of laws by which they were to be guided. What sort of a code would we have by such contradictory action as this?

Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House for a few moments to the character of this deposition. It is claimed as proof that there were 125 fraudulent votes cast for Todd. Let me ask the House to look to the inside of that deposition. Although it is contrary to ordinary proceeding in law, yet I am compelled by the course taken by the minority, who have read portions of the deposition to the House, to quote other portions of it. This deponent undertakes to show that there were not six legal voters in that precinct. Hear what he says:

"Question 5. How many white male persons of twenty-one years of age residing at Pembina were born within the limits of the United States?"

"Answer. Well, sir, besides myself, I do not believe that there are more than one.

"Question 6. How many white male persons of twenty-one years of age residing at St. Joseph were born within the limits of the United States?"

"Answer. To the best of my knowledge there are but two there who were born within the limits of the United States."

How does he know that?

"Question 7. How many foreign-born residents of either of these places were naturalized citizens, or had filed their declarations to become naturalized citizens, at the time of the election on the 1st of September, 1862?"

"Answer. I know that there is one naturalized citizen in Pembina, for I have seen his papers; and there are two residents of St. Joseph that I suppose are naturalized citizens, from the fact that they have held offices under the United States Government. And further than this I have no knowledge on the subject."

"And further than this I have no knowledge on the subject." Yet my friend is convinced there were only six men there! This man confesses that this contrivance was carried out at his suggestion, and it is proposed here to adopt the deposition of a particeps criminis. Now there is no rule of law plainer than that a man shall not be convicted of stealing even a hen upon the uncorroborated testimony of a particeps criminis. The testimony of the man who is guilty of the crime or offense with which another is charged is never taken in a court of justice unless it is supported by other testimony; and I submit to the House whether it is worth while for them to depart from a rule established by themselves in the last case, for no other fruit thereof than to admit here and to decide a case upon the uncorroborated testimony of the man who did it himself, and the man who confesses he enjoyed the fruit of it himself, as long as there was any fruit of it to enjoy, to wit, a seat in the Legislature on these votes alone, and who never disclosed the fact that there was a fraud—if there was any fraud—until there was held up to him the prospect of a reward in the shape of an office after the disclosure. I put these facts before the House because I know the House is disposed to decide this case as it ought to be decided. I submit that if they adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] to declare that Todd is not entitled to his seat, they do it upon the testimony of the man who committed the fraud—testimony taken without the law and against the law—and when they have just decided in another case that they would not touch any testimony so taken, and testimony, too, of a confessed particeps criminis, with the reward for his story in his mouth while he testifies.

Now, notwithstanding the suggestion of my friend from Michigan, [Mr. URSON,] that there is corroborative testimony, I submit to this House that there is not a word of corroborative testimony; and what he relies upon as cumulative, I beg leave to refer to. That is the census taken fourteen months previously, in which two things are shown: the lie is in the first place given to this deposition of Buckman, for that census could not have been true and this deposition also; because he says there were but six men there, while the census says there forty odd, and this same man Buckman made the report of that fact to the Legislature. And yet he comes here and swears that there were only six. That was fourteen months before. And I submit that in a new Territory the addition of a hundred voters in a place is no remarkable thing.

Whether it be so or not, I wish to submit to this House that they should seek to be consistent. Try a case on the record—and only on the record—made up for trial, and give no occasion for the charge of inconsistency, merely to carry out a prejudice of the members. I do not believe the members of the House are actuated by any such feeling, and I do not desire that any such slander shall be brought upon this House, or that any course they shall take shall subject them to any such accusation as that, because I believe it will be false.

The result of the examination is, all the committee agreeing, that the majority for Jayne was fraudulent, and that he is not entitled to his seat, and, all the committee but two agreeing, that Todd is entitled to his seat. Two of the committee say he is not entitled to his seat because they insist that this deposition to which I have called the attention of the House ought to be read and considered by the House, and ought to be taken as true, when it is shown that it was taken without law, against law, against the very precedent of the House made an hour before this case was taken up. And besides all that, it is a deposition of a party guilty himself, and who held his tongue so long as he could enjoy the fruit of his silence, and only opened his mouth that, immediately after he uttered this deposition, there should be dropped into it a plum.

I now leave the matter entirely with the House. Mr. SLOAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts which of these two men got most of the legal votes which were cast in that Territory?

Mr. DAWES. I would answer the question with pleasure if there were no objection. I merely desire that the House may adopt such a course of action in these election cases as that the Committee of Elections may know precisely what the House does intend and may be guided by it. It is utterly impossible for me or for the committee to understand how we are to act in future cases if, in consulting the record, we find that in one case we are to admit testimony taken outside of the time prescribed in the law, and in another case to reject it. Are we to understand it that the rule is to operate alternately—that in the one case we are to act on the rule of rejecting such testimony, and in the next case not to act on it, and so change alternately? That is a rule which is absurd in itself, and I trust the House will not be guilty of any such absurdity.

The first question was on the amendment offered by Mr. BROOMALL—that the election in the Territory of Dakota for Delegate was attended with so much illegality and fraud that neither William Jayne nor J. B. S. Todd is entitled to a seat in the House as such Delegate, and that the seat of the Delegate of such Territory is declared vacant.

Mr. GANSON called for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 66, not voting 58; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

During the roll-call,

Mr. NORTON stated that he had paired off with his colleague, Mr. FARNSWORTH. He (Mr. Norton) would have voted for the amendment, and his colleague would have voted against it.

Mr. SMITH moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw the motion, and let the House take the vote on the resolutions.

Mr. SMITH. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

The question next recurred on the first resolution reported by the Committee of Elections—that William Jayne is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Dakota in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will recollect that the success of that motion would give the seat to Jayne, who, the gentleman himself admits, is not entitled to it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It is proper for me to say that I did not design such a result.

The SPEAKER. That would be the result. Mr. SCOFIELD. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew it. Jayne is bad enough, but he is better than the other. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 95, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashley, Cole, Driggs, Eckley, Frank, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Amos Myers, Patterson, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Spaulding, Starr, and Williams—16.

During the roll-call, Mr. STEVENS stated that he was paired off with Mr. WINFIELD.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that the Senate have agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1865.

WAR NEWS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following dispatch from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, June 11, 1864, 2 p. m.

SIR: Official reports from the headquarters of the army of the Potomac down to five o'clock yesterday evening detail no movements of importance.

A dispatch from General Sherman, dated yesterday, states that our cavalry yesterday (Thursday, 9th) developed the position of the enemy in a line along the hills from Keneas to Lost Mountain, and we are now marching by the roads toward Keneasaw.

A dispatch from General Butler, dated this morning at one o'clock, reports "all quiet along our lines. Yesterday General Kautz charged the enemy's works at Petersburg and carried them, penetrating the town, but not being supported by General Gillmore, who had withdrawn his forces without a conflict. General Kautz was obliged to withdraw without further effect. General Kautz captured forty prisoners and one piece of artillery which he brought away with him."

A dispatch from General Canby, dated Vicksburg, June 4, states that "General Emory reports that an attempt by Taylor's force to cross the Atchafalaya had been frustrated, the troops that had crossed dispersed, and a large quantity of commissary stores and clothing captured."

General Burbridge, commanding in Kentucky, in a dispatch dated yesterday, at Lexington, reports that, "after concentrating a force at the mouth of Beaver creek, on Big Sandy, I moved against Morgan's force in Virginia, west as far as Gladestown. Morgan, with twenty-five hundred men, moved into Kentucky via Whitesburg. I pursued, and by marching ninety miles in twenty-four hours, came upon him at Mount Sterling yesterday morning and defeated him. By stealing fresh horses, he reached Lexington at two o'clock this a. m. Our forces held the fort, and the rebels did but little damage. He left here at seven a. m. for Versailles. I start in pursuit with a fresh force this evening."

No official report has yet been received from General Hunter.

Your obedient servant,
EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House adjourn.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion to adjourn to enable me to make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. SPALDING. I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAWES. I submit whether it is in order to interfere with the business before the House by a report of a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The report of a committee of conference is a question of very high privilege, one which will even interrupt the speech of a member; but the Chair doubts whether, after the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered on a question of privilege affecting the right of a member to his seat, it can be entertained except by unanimous consent. The Chair has not examined the authorities, but he thinks the report of the committee of conference cannot interrupt the business before the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well; if the gentleman objects, I have nothing to say.

Mr. DAWES. I object at this moment. We shall dispose of this contested-election matter in a very few minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ASHLEY called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered—ayes 23, noes 75.

Mr. COX. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays. I want to stop this filibustering. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. One fifth the members have voted for the yeas and nays, and have the right under the Constitution to order the yeas and nays. The Chair therefore decides that the call for tellers is not in order.

The question was taken on Mr. SLOAN's motion; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 71, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Beaman, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, McClure, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Alexander H. Rice, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Spaulding, Starr, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Williams, Wilder, and Windom—40.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Al-ley, Allison, Anderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Ingersoll, Jenckes, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Perham, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Ross, Scott, Stebbins, Strouse, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—71.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Ashley, Blaine, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Loan, McAllister, McBride, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Nelson, Norton, Odell, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Perry, Pomeroy, Price, Pruy, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scott, Stebbins, William G. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilson, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—70.

So the House refused to adjourn.

DAKOTA CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER stated the pending question to be on the adoption of the first resolution reported by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move to lay that resolution on the table, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SLOAN. I move that when the House adjourn it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Is it in order to amend that motion so as to adjourn sine die on Monday next?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Upon Mr. SLOAN's motion 11 voted in the affirmative and 65 in the negative; no quorum.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion is in order, but the motion to fix the day of adjournment takes precedence. No quorum having voted, the Chair orders tellers, and appoints Mr. SLOAN and Mr. W. J. ALLEN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 3, noes 67; no quorum voting.

The question recurred on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOTCHKISS called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to adjourn was disagreed to—ayes 30, noes 76.

The question recurred on the motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. SLOAN moved that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, and no quorum having voted, under the 132d rule the Chair will count the House, to ascertain whether a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER proceeded to count the House, and announced that 118 members (a quorum) were present; and the motion that there be a call of the House was therefore not in order.

Mr. MALLORY. Is it in order when the Speaker is counting the House for members to withdraw into the coat-room to prevent being counted?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, but the Chair has no power to prevent it. The Chair has no control over the actions of members.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the Chair whether, under the rule recently adopted, the names of the members not voting are published in the Globe.

The SPEAKER. When the vote is taken by yeas and nays the names of members not voting are published in the Journal as directed by the House, and the Chair understands they are published in the Globe.

The question recurred on the motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 89.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to lay the first resolution on the table.

Mr. ASHLEY moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 25, nays 71, not voting 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ambrose W. Clark, Cole, Dixon, Driggs, Eliot, Frank, Hooper, Jewkes, Julian, Kelley, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Alexander H. Rice, Schenck, Spalding, Tracy, Upson, and Williams—25.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Boyd, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Gooch, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKimney, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Perham, Price, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Ross, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Windom, and Fernando Wood—71.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Arnold, Ashley, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Ganson, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Lazear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, Melndoe, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, James R. Morris, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Starr, Stebbins, Stevens, Strouse, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Wilder, Wilson, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—85.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the vote, Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, stated that his colleague, Mr. WILSON, was paired with Mr. LAZEAR.

Mr. PENDLETON moved that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. ASHLEY objected.

Mr. WADSWORTH stated that he had met Mr. FENTON going out, who told him that he was on his way to see a sick soldier, and that he did not think the business was important enough to induce him to remain. [Laughter.]

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. ASHLEY moved that the House take a recess until nine o'clock, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX. What is the object of the recess?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 67.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered; one fifth not voting in favor thereof.

Mr. ASHLEY demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. ASHLEY moved that the House adjourn. The House was divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 64.

Mr. ASHLEY demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, moved that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. SLOAN demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of order, that the Speaker cannot count, in a division of the House, members who raise their hands and do not stand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is not according to the rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is according to the usage.

Mr. SCHENCK. Have the rule read.

The SPEAKER. State the number of the rule and the Chair will have it read.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. If the Speaker has a copy of the rules let the gentleman from Ohio have it to study to-morrow. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman will talk in the English language I will understand him. [Renewed laughter.]

The question recurred on the motion to lay the first resolution on the table.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 60; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers.

Mr. SPALDING moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would like to know whether the motion to lay the first resolution on the table is not to be first put?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does it carry the other resolution to the table with it?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. DAWES. Laying the first resolution on the table confirms Jayne in his seat.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, and Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 22, noes 69.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative, making a quorum; the yeas have it, and the first resolution is not laid on the table.

The question recurring on agreeing to the first resolution,

Mr. SLOAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and there were in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 1, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, James S. No quorum voted.

During the roll-call, Mr. ASHLEY stated that he had paired off with Mr. CRAVENS.

Mr. BAILY stated that Mr. LAZEAR had paired off with Mr. WILSON on this question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the names of members sitting in their seats and not voting be read over.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can reserve the names of such members until the question is decided, and they can then be made the subject of a resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move such a resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this time, nor would it be at any time unless the gentleman specifies the names.

Mr. COX. I would suggest that a large number of members are in the cloak room.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the Clerk give me the names?

The SPEAKER. The officers at the desk do not take any note of the members present and not voting.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Is it in order to read the names of the absentees?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of May 20, information in relation to the seizure of the silver mine of Sylvester Mowry in Arizona by order of General Carleton; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate the annual report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1863.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented a memorial of wholesale dealers in glue in the city of New York, remonstrating against the proposed tax of one per cent. on all grades of glue; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of importers of peanuts, praying that the duty on peanuts may be fixed at not exceeding one cent per pound; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented the memorial of Henry R. Schoolcraft, praying for an appropriation to enable him to complete his publication relative to the condition and future prospects of the Indians of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented seven petitions of men and women, praying for the abolition of slavery throughout the United States; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. HARRIS presented a memorial of citizens of the United States, remonstrating against the extension of Goodyear's patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of the United States, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 276) to secure to persons in the military and naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FOOT presented a petition of citizens of Shoreham, Vermont, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 276) to secure to persons in the military and naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of Congregational clergymen of Iowa, praying for the establishment of a Bureau of Freedmen; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of citizens and constables of the District of Columbia and of members of the bar and judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, praying for the repeal of the law taking from the county constables the right to execute process requiring the arrest of persons charged with offenses against the laws; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COLLAMER presented a petition of citizens of Vermont, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 276) to secure to persons in the military and naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SPRAGUE presented the petition of Major Morris S. Miller, quartermaster United States Army, praying to be credited in the settlement of his accounts with payments made by him under express orders of the Secretary of War and Adjutant General; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of an eminent citizen of New York, well known to the country for his generosity and for his enterprise, Peter Cooper, relating to the present financial condition of our affairs, and calling upon Congress to provide a system of taxation which shall pay the ordinary expenses of the Government and the interest on all money borrowed on the public credit, and also to provide a better system of currency than we now have by superseding any currency furnished by the State banks. The petition is somewhat elaborate, but there are one or two sentences which I will read, with the permission of the Senate, in order to convey more completely his idea. He says:

"Without taxation sufficient to pay interest and ordinary expenses, we may apply the language of Swedenborg and defy the history of the world to show an instance where a nation has been able to legislate a permanent value into a paper-circulating medium."

In a subsequent part of the petition he proceeds to say:

"The assumed power of State Legislatures to authorize local banks to issue bills of credit called dollars in open violation of their constitutional agreement has opened a flood-gate of evil to the country, corrupting the Legislatures and tempting the people into extravagance and prodigality of expenditures in their efforts to live on the borrowed promises of banks instead of their own honest industry. In the opinion of your petitioner, the amount of loss that has fallen upon the community should not fail to receive from the only power authorized by the Constitution 'to coin money and regulate the value thereof' that prompt and decided action so indispensable to the security and welfare of the nation. Great and lasting advantages must result to the business of the country from the adoption by the local banks of one uniform currency secured by the whole property of the States."

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 511) to provide for the more speedy punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred various memorials and petitions praying for increased facilities for the transportation of mails, passengers, and freight between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 293) to empower the Superannuated Fund Society of the Maryland Annual Conference to hold property in the District of Columbia, and to take a devise under the will of the late William Doughty.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appointed Mr. R. C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. F. W. KELLOGG of Michigan, and Mr. J. S. ROLLINS of Missouri, managers at the conference on its part.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 11th instant the following acts:

An act (H. R. No. 355) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to stipulate for the release from attachment or other process of property claimed by the United States, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 422) to amend an act entitled "An act to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico;" and

An act (H. R. No. 487) to provide for the execution of treaties between the United States and foreign nations respecting consular jurisdiction over the crews of vessels of such foreign nations in the waters and ports of the United States.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. STODDARD, his Secretary, announcing that, on the 11th instant, he had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. No. 28) relating to members of Congress, heads of Departments, and other officers of the Government;

An act (S. No. 42) in relation to the limitation of actions in certain cases;

An act (S. No. 52) to provide for the summary trial of minor offenses against the laws of the United States;

An act (S. No. 256) to change and define the boundaries of the eastern and western judicial districts of Virginia, and to alter the names of said districts, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 283) to abolish the collection districts of Port Orford and Cape Perpetua in the State of Oregon; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 60) tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailey, of the fourth regiment of Wisconsin volunteers.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 306) to grant to the State of California certain lands for State prison purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 307) consenting to an act of the Legislature of Michigan concerning the construction of canals and harbors, and the improvement of the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for 1863 be printed, two thousand for the use of the Smithsonian Institution and three thousand for the use of the Senate: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages contained in said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, without wood-cuts or plates, except those furnished by the Institution; and that the Superintendent of Public Printing be authorized, if consistent with the public service, to allow the Smithsonian Institution to stereotype the report at its own expense, or to otherwise print at its own expense such additional copies as may be desired from the type set in the Government printing establishment.

ROCK ISLAND.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether the granting of the right of way to the Chicago and Rock Island railroad across the island of Rock Island in the Mississippi river, provided the track of said road should be laid in such manner and upon such line as the Secretary of War should direct, would injuriously affect the use of said island for the purposes contemplated in an act passed at the present session of Congress entitled "An act in addition to an act for the establishment of certain arsenals."

DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS.

Mr. WILKINSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 63) repealing the joint resolution of Congress "providing for the distribution of certain public books and documents;" which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILKINSON. I ask for the consideration of the joint resolution now. The resolution which I propose to repeal is one that was passed at the last Congress distributing among members of Congress all the books and documents then in the Interior Department.

By unanimous consent the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to inquire of the Senator what the effect of this resolution is. Some of us do not understand the subject.

Mr. WILKINSON. During the last session of Congress, on the 3d of March, 1863, a joint resolution was passed which if it had been understood I think would have received no support in this body at least. I will read it:

"Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior, and all other custodians thereof, be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to cause equal distribution to be made forthwith among the members of the two Houses of the present Congress of all the books and documents heretofore printed or purchased at the cost of the Government and not actually belonging to any public library, or a library kept for use in any Department of the Government, excepting, however, all such books and documents as are embraced in any existing order for the distribution thereof among the members of either House of Congress."

I understand that this is distributing thousands upon thousands of books that are under the control of the Interior Department, and the Secretary of the Interior has thus far been unable to carry out and execute that resolution. It is entirely impracticable and cannot be carried out.

Several Senators. Why not?

Mr. WILKINSON. He cannot make a distribution of the books so that they will be of any use to anybody; and it is a disgrace to Congress, I think, that any such resolution should stand upon the statute-book.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It ought to be repealed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It seems to me that if the books are worth anything they had better be distributed. They are lying by thousands of volumes in many of the rooms of the Interior Department. I do not see why it is impracticable for members to send them to their constituents.

Mr. WILKINSON. Then let a law be passed making a proper and just distribution of these books among the people of the United States, and not pass an act for members of Congress to take them and appropriate them all to themselves.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does this resolution come from a committee?

Mr. WILKINSON. No, sir; it is my own resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know the difficulty of carrying into execution the law referred to by the Senator from Minnesota, and I believe it is impracticable. At the same time these books are there in the way; they are cumbersome, and if they are distributed at all now, it is done by the favor of those who have charge of them, and not by any law. I think they ought to be distributed. I move that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing, who probably can devise some mode of amending the law so as to provide for their distribution. I remember to have received a circular from the Secretary of the Interior stating that he could not distribute them because he had not enough sets to give one to each member and Senator. I do not think the members or Senators ought to have anything to do with them. It is better to provide by law for their distribution among public libraries, to be selected, if desirable, by members of the Senate and House of Representatives. At any rate they should be out of the way, out of the rooms of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. WILKINSON. I have no objection to the reference if the Senator desires it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

COAL BEDS AT DES MOINES.

On motion by Mr. HARLAN, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 55) granting certain privileges to the city of Des Moines, in the State of Iowa, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a relinquishment to the city of Des Moines of all the right and interest of the United States in the coal beds underlying the river Des Moines, within the limits of the city; with a proviso that no disposition or use of them shall be made which shall obstruct the free navigation of the river; nor shall any one grant of the privilege of mining them extend for a longer period than ten years.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 149, concerning school lands in Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 149) concerning school lands in township forty-five north, range seven east, in the State of Missouri, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes that all of the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to all of the lots, tracts, pieces, and parcels of land within the Grand Prairie common field, in township forty-five north of the base line, in range seven east of the fifth principal meridian line in the State of Missouri, which have not heretofore been disposed of by the United States, shall be granted, relinquished, and conveyed by the United States, in fee simple and in full property, to the State of Missouri, for the support of schools in said township; but nothing in the act is in any manner to abridge, divest, impair, injure, or prejudice any adverse right, title, or interest of any person or persons in or to any portion or part of the lots, tracts, pieces, or parcels of land.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATORS FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate joint resolution No. 62.

Mr. CARLILE. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that there is a special order for half past twelve o'clock, and it is now within a minute or two of that time.

Mr. SUMNER. I understood that the Senator from Kansas was to move this morning the reference of the papers in the case of the claimants for seats from Arkansas.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I propose to refer the joint resolution and the credentials.

Mr. SUMNER. The credentials are first on the Calendar. Those were presented some time ago. If the Senator will make that motion, he is aware that it is a privileged motion. The other is not a privileged motion.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 62, for the recognition of the free State government of the State of Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I now move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will include in that reference all the papers in the case, including the credentials. There is a motion of mine pending to refer the credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary. I hope the whole question will go together.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have charge only of the credentials of Mr. Fishback, and I move that his credentials be referred with the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be included in the motion.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. At the request of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foor] I also move that the credentials of Mr. Baxter be referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will regard the credentials of both gentlemen as included in the motion to refer, if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. That opens, as I understand, the whole question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the special order for this hour.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will be postponed. I ask the Senator from Virginia to let the bill which is the special order go over until to-morrow and call it up then. I am not prepared for its final disposition this morning.

Mr. CARLILE. I desire to accommodate Senators of course. I am willing that it shall go over if it be made the special order for to-morrow at the same hour. I move therefore that the special order for this hour be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, and be made the special order for that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is a bad precedent, and I must call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. CARLILE. Then, with the leave of the Senate, I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion may be withdrawn. The special order is before the Senate.

Mr. CARLILE. The Senator from California of course will excuse me now for making the motion.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly, sir. I am not prepared for a vote this morning on this subject. I do not wish to put the question off; that is not my purpose; but the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands has indicated a desire to have time for a further investigation of the case, which I do not wish to prevent. I hope the Senator from Ohio, in view of this, will withdraw his objection at this time and let this bill go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection to letting it go over until to-morrow. I merely object to making this private bill a special order during the morning hour.

Mr. CONNESS. We can call it up in the morning hour without a doubt.

Mr. McDUGALL. My colleague has protested against the postponement of this bill on several occasions. This subject has been up for discussion, and he has sensibly engaged in the discussion of it. The Senate would have come to a conclusion on Saturday if the question had been proceeded with. It can be disposed of now, I have no doubt, in a few minutes, for I think there is no doubt in the minds of Senators as to what should be done with regard to it. If it is now postponed there will have to be a struggle to-morrow morning again, equal to the time it will take in debate, in order to get it up.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask if the question on which I was about to speak is not a privileged motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not. It is a motion of the Senator from Kansas to refer a joint resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Chair's pardon. It concerns the seat of a Senator. Associated with it, the Chair will bear in mind, are the papers relating to the seat of this claimant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair bears in mind what is the motion before the Senate, to refer the joint resolution, with which the credentials of the Senator from Arkansas was attached, that subject having once been postponed by the Senate, and also the credentials of the other Senator from that State. It cannot alter, in the opinion of the Chair, the joint resolution which was the subject of the motion.

Mr. McDUGALL. I was on the floor when I was interrupted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts rose to a question of order.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not anticipate any considerable discussion on the bill which is the special order for this morning. The most that will be required to be said will be simple statements of fact. The Senator, my colleague, having engaged in this discussion, and having raised this objection, should be able to state any further facts that may have come to his possession since his past discussion. With regard to the matter I have very little to say, scarcely anything except a brief statement of less than five minutes. I should like to see the bill disposed of. It was a subject of discussion during the last Congress, when it happened that my then colleague and myself concurred, agreeing in the propriety of the measure, about the propriety of which, I think, there can be no doubt. I wish this matter disposed of for the economy of time in the transaction of business.

Mr. CONNESS. What my colleague, the Senator from California, has said in regard to the honorable Senator and his then colleague being in favor of this bill a year ago is doubtless true. It is also true that when the Legislature of the State—the State which he represents—found that the two Senators were engaged in the passage of this bill they passed concurrent resolutions instructing them against its passage. Those resolutions have been read from the desk of the Secretary to the Senate upon this question. It is a question, indeed, of great importance, because if this bill shall be passed it will be necessarily made the precedent for a hundred others of the same kind. It is a question of too much importance to be pressed through this body at the request of private persons. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and on that motion I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As I have not been paying any particular attention to this case, I wish to know whether it is proposed to be postponed until to-morrow, with a view of getting some additional information, or simply to get rid of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; it is not to get rid of the bill. I am exceedingly anxious to have the determination of the Senate upon the question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it is merely to obtain further information in regard to it.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir, merely until the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and myself are better prepared to dispose of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that is the case, I think it had better be postponed until to-morrow. I think there had better be an acquiescence in the motion to postpone under such a statement as that.

Mr. HARLAN. I think I ought to state that papers have been put in my hand since this discussion commenced on a previous day, which I have not had time to examine, and I desire to have time to read them. I therefore should like to have it postponed on that account.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the call for the yeas and nays will be withdrawn.

Mr. McDUGALL. After the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, I have no objection to the postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] withdraw the call?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the call may be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we may proceed with the subject which was under discussion when the special order was called up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] to postpone the further consideration of the bill which was made the special order for to-day at half past twelve o'clock until to-morrow.

Mr. CARLILE. I shall have no objection to that motion if I can amend it by making that bill the special order for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senate sees fit to make it a special order I have no objection.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think that would be but right under the circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the motion cannot be amended, because it requires two distinct votes. A majority may postpone, but it requires two thirds to make a special order.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will ask my colleague to withdraw his motion to postpone and allow the question to be put on the motion to make it a special order.

Mr. CONNESS. I will do that with pleasure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone is withdrawn, and the motion now is to assign Senate bill No. 238, to ascertain and settle certain private land claims in the State of California, as the special order for to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; two thirds of the Senate concurring therein.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the subject which was under consideration when interrupted by the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate resume the consideration of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. LANE.]

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I begin by expressing my sympathy with every loyal character in a rebel State. Knowing well, from long experience, the cruel rule and domination of slavery, even in this Chamber, I cannot be indifferent to the trials of loyalty anywhere in these latter days. Show me a man who in a rebel State has stood faithful to the national cause, and I go forth to meet him with my heart in my hand. To have been true at a time when truth was disowned is enough for honor as well as thanks. But the merits of individuals cannot determine the rights of States.

The case is too important. If individual merits, universally recognized, could have saved a State to present rights in the Union, Tennessee would not now be a self-condemned exile. There are few anywhere who have been so entirely true as Andrew Johnson, and not one in all the rebel States who so bravely encountered the rebellion face to face. In himself he was more than ten men, and ten men might have saved Sodom. Besides, he was a Senator on this floor when the State which he represented took its place in the rebel confederacy and joined in war against the national Government. But he stayed behind with his country, and kept his seat here. Persons ignorant of parliamentary law here sometimes argued from the latter circumstance that rebel Tennessee was still entitled to her ancient rights in the Union; but they forgot two principles fixed long ago in England, the original home of parliamentary law, beyond all question: first, that the power once conferred by an election to Parliament is irrevocable, so that it is not affected by any subsequent change in the constituency; and, secondly, that a member, when once chosen, is a member for the whole kingdom, becoming thereby, according to the words of an early author, not merely knight or burgess of the county or borough which elected him, but knight or burgess of England. (Cushing's Parliamentary Law, page 284.) If these two principles are not entirely discarded in our political system, then the seat of Andrew Johnson was not in any respect affected by the subsequent madness of his State, nor can the legality of his seat be any argument for the ancient rights of his State. Nor, again, can the fact that Andrew Johnson has been selected by the convention of a powerful political party as a candidate for the Vice Presidency be any argument for these ancient rights. It is not necessary even that a candidate for President or Vice President should belong to a State.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask whether it is not necessary that he should not be an alien enemy?

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will bear with me, I was not discussing that question now. I was observing that it is not necessary even that a candidate for President or Vice President should belong to a State. That is all I am on now. It is enough, under the Constitution, that he is a "citizen of the United States." He may be of the District of Columbia, or of a Territory, or of a rebel State; for these are all equally within the rightful jurisdiction of the United States, and this is enough. The jurisdiction of the United States is permanent and indefeasible. Therefore, I repeat again, we must look, on the present occasion, beyond the virtues of individuals. Not all the virtues under heaven can suffice to make a State of this Union, or to give any claim for restoration to ancient rights, where there is a failure to comply with essential requirements.

The question under consideration is of momentous interest. It concerns primarily the claim to a seat in the Senate. But it involves also the right of the State of Arkansas to share at this moment in the national Government by a representation in Congress; and also the other right of participating in the approaching presidential election. And behind this great question looms that other question, "How shall we treat the rebel States?" This question has already been answered by the House of Representatives in a bill which has been passed by that body. But it has not yet been decided by the Senate.

Unexpectedly the great question and all the subordinate questions are now presented for decision. Not only Arkansas, but Louisiana and every other rebel State will await your judgment. No question of equal importance has been presented since it was determined to meet the rebellion by arms.

For the present I forbear all minute discussion, either of history or of principle. It will be enough if I state the case and exhibit the questions involved.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. With the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts I desire to make a statement. The Senators from Arkansas asking seats on this floor—

Mr. SUMNER. I propose to come to that. I am going to state the facts.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am not going to make a speech, but I desire to make a statement in justice to them. They do not expect seats in this body until these conditions are complied with:

"That the present organized government in the State of Arkansas be, and it is hereby, recognized upon the condition that slavery and involuntary servitude shall never exist in said State except as a punishment for crime.

"That this joint resolution shall be in force from and after the acceptance of its provisions by the people of the said State, and proclamation of the same by the President of the United States."

Mr. SUMNER. William M. Fishback, a citizen of Arkansas, appears before the Senate of the United States and claims membership therein. He asserts that he has been duly chosen to fill the unexpired term of Senator Sebastian, who was expelled in 1861 for complicity with the rebellion; and he produces a certificate purporting to be signed by the Governor of Arkansas.

Shall this claimant be admitted to a seat in the Senate? Such is the immediate question. But I have said that there are other questions, of the most far-reaching character, which must be considered now and here; for they all enter into the present case. If we now admit the present claimant, we must also now admit that other claimant who has presented himself with like-credentials, as a colleague. The question is not, therefore, shall Arkansas have one vote in this Senate? but, shall it have two?

But if Arkansas is now to be fully represented in this Senate, does it not follow that it is to be represented with equal fullness in the House of Representatives? If represented in that Chamber, such representation must be under the existing apportionment act, which assigns to Arkansas two Representatives, who are to be chosen by districts, without reference to the number of votes polled in either.

One privilege will draw after it another. To him that hath shall be given. If Arkansas is admitted to an immediate representation in the national Government, this rebel State, which has overthrown the Constitution within its borders, and assumed the front of war, can participate in the approaching election of President and Vice President, by organizing an electoral college; and in case the election of either of those great officers should devolve upon Congress, it can give a vote affecting the result as weighty as that given by Massachusetts, New York, or Illinois; for in such case the vote in the Senate is per capita, and in the House it is by States.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 182.

Therefore, sir, I repeat, the decision of the question now before us rules all the questions which can arise upon the representation of Arkansas in the Congress of the United States, and also the other question of the participation of Arkansas in the election of President and Vice President for the term of four years next ensuing. The importance of such a subject cannot be exaggerated. It is important constitutionally. It is important practically. It is important also to the peace of the country. It ought to be discussed fully and carefully; especially when it is considered that we are on the eve of a presidential election which may possibly be affected by our decision.

Mr. President, I am against the admission of Arkansas to representation in the national Government at this time and under existing circumstances. There may be a time, and there may be circumstances, when such representation will be proper; but clearly at this moment it is improper, unreasonable, and dangerous. The reasons are obvious.

First. The proposed representation is that of a minority not only of the people, but even of the ancient electors of Arkansas. It is superfluous to say that such a representation is inconsistent with republican principles, and can be vindicated only by an overruling necessity. But this point becomes of peculiar importance when it is considered that the minority, asking representation in the national Government, has acquiesced in rebellion, and, still further, that some of those composing this minority have actively assisted the public enemy. Look at the facts.

The authority and jurisdiction of the United States were wholly overthrown and subverted in Arkansas. By the action of the State Legislature and of a convention called by this Legislature, followed by a popular vote, the State was made de facto a member of the rebel confederacy. However much we may deny the rightfulness or the legality of the proceeding, there can be no question with regard to the fact. This at least is undeniable, and it constitutes an essential circumstance in the case. As a fact it must be recognized, whatever may be the consequences—precisely as truth is recognized. But this unquestionable fact was followed by a general acquiescence of the people of Arkansas, so that this State became, in point of fact, as in name, a rebel State, linked with other rebel States arrayed in arms against the national Government. At last, after much bloodshed and various vicissitudes, through the exertion of the military power of the United States, a portion of the territory of this State has been rescued from rebel domination and brought within the lines of our Army. The rest will follow, in process of time and after further bloodshed, until eventually the whole State will be rescued from rebel domination and brought within the lines of our Army. Even then we shall be obliged to wait for the tokens of returning loyalty also. But at the present moment the possession of the State is still contested by opposing armies, and a minority only have signified their adhesion or re-adhesion to the national Government. This objection, of course, may be removed by time; but it existed in full force at the election of the claimant, and is decisive upon the question before us.

Unquestionably, it is according to the genius of our Government that the majority should rule. A majority is the natural base of a republic. To found a republic on a minority is scarcely less impracticable than to stand a pyramid on its apex.

Secondly. The proposed representation of Arkansas in the Senate is unjust and inequitable in its relations to the representation of other loyal States; and if it be extended to representation in the House of Representatives and in the electoral colleges it will become still more unjust and inequitable. By the original terms of union the other States have agreed that the whole people of Arkansas shall have two Senators and also Representatives according to a fixed proportion; and also electoral votes for President and Vice President according to the number of their Senators and Representatives. Now it would be manifestly wrong to ward all the other loyal States, if not a fraud upon their rights, to assign such representation and such privilege to a fraction of the people of Arkansas, constituting a small minority; so that on all questions of legislation, or of treaties, or of appointments, in the discharge of legislative, diplomatic, and executive trusts, this small minority would wield in the Senate all the power of a loyal State, while in the choice of President and Vice President it might turn the scale.

Thirdly. The military occupation of Arkansas, and the unsettled condition of the community there, cannot be forgotten when we are considering whether to admit the Representatives of a newly organized civil government in that State. Military occupation is practically inconsistent with civil government. Even if the former does not absolutely exclude the latter, yet it is evident that it must exercise a controlling influence in political affairs. It is impossible in time of war to preserve the conditions of peace; especially in time of civil war. Military power, when engaged in subduing revolt, cannot be insensible to political forces. It must win what it cannot overcome. From the nature of the case, ordinary political conditions are disturbed or subverted, and electoral power loses its essential character, so as to be no longer entitled to that peculiar respect which it enjoys under American institutions. These observations I apply solely to a theater of war, and I insist that so applied they are true, just, and indisputable.

But, in point of fact, there is another and kindred force which conspires with the former to disturb suffrage in Arkansas. I mean that which proceeds from the incursions and other operations of the enemy. These prevent elections in some parts of the State, and render them partial in others, and this unhappy condition must continue so long as war prevails in that region. That I do not exaggerate these perils let me quote the testimony of General Gantt, a citizen of Arkansas, who participated in the recent election. "Thousands," says he, "when they started to the polls in the morning felt that at nightfall, when they returned, it might be to a mass of charred and smoking ruins and to a beggared and impoverished family. And yet other thousands knew that the knife of the murderous crew of Shelby, Marmaduke, and others was whetted for their throats and might do their execution before the polls were reached; and all knew that, should the tide of war surge backward over our State, instead of being simply ordered out of the lines, bankruptcy, dungeons, chains, and an ignominious death awaited them." This picture, which is unquestionably authentic, while it interests us for the heroic sufferers, testifies conclusively how incapable Arkansas is at this moment to bear the burdens and discharge the trusts of a State.

Fourthly. The present organization in Arkansas, which seeks representation on this floor, is without that legality of origin which is required by the American system of government. It is revolutionary in its character. Nay, more, it may all be traced to a military order. Clearly this incongruity will not be tolerated. A new civil government to be recognized as a State of this Union cannot be born of the military power. Congress has jurisdiction over all those States in which loyal governments have been overturned; and this jurisdiction furnishes a natural, obvious, and constitutional origin for the new government. Without it I am at a loss to see how the connecting link of legality can be preserved between the old and the new. This is not the first time in our national history that Congress has stood between the old and the new. Such is its natural place and function. At the separation of the colonies from the mother country it interfered by formal resolution to indicate the process by which the new governments should be constituted, although the Tories of that day doubted the power. According to this example, sustained by congenial principles, Congress must set the new government in motion and infuse into it that vital force which is found in liberty regulated by law.

Fifthly. Arkansas is at this moment shut out from commercial intercourse with the loyal States under the proclamation of the President of 16th August, 1861, made in pursuance of the act of Congress of 17th July, 1861. By this proclamation it is placed on the list of States in "insurrection against the United States, and all commercial intercourse between the same and the inhabitants thereof and the citizens of other States and other parts of the United States is unlawful until such insurrection shall cease or has been suppressed;" and all goods, chattels, wares, and merchandise coming from any of the enumerated States and proceeding to any other State by land or water are made liable to forfeiture. (12 Statutes at Large, 1262.) And yet Arkansas, which is still under the ban of a presidential proclamation and a congressional statute establishing non-intercourse with other States asks representation in the national Government. Disqualified for trade with other States, it asks to govern them. The old practice is to be reversed. Thus far in history trade has preceded political power; now political power is to precede trade. Arkansas cannot send her merchants into the loyal States to buy and sell. Can she send her representatives into this Chamber to vote? Can she send her electors into the electoral college to choose a President?

Such, Mr. President, are five distinct reasons, obvious to the most superficial observer, against the recognition of any representation at this time from Arkansas; first, because the representation is founded on a minority; secondly, because any such representation, unjust in itself, is especially unjust toward the loyal States; thirdly, because the military occupation of Arkansas and its exposed condition are inconsistent with civil government; fourthly, because the present organization of Arkansas is without that legality of origin which is required by American institutions; and, fifthly, because it is absurd to admit a State to representation which is still by solemn proclamation shut out from commercial intercourse with the loyal States.

The argument thus far applies to the present case without touching that other question, sometimes discussed, whether, in point of fact, Arkansas is still a State of this Union. Indeed, it is evident that Arkansas may have preserved her place in the Union and yet not be entitled at this moment to representation in the national Government. She may be a State, but in a condition of political syncope or suspended animation. Or she may be under such abnormal influences as to render her for the time being incompetent to perform the functions of a State.

But if Arkansas, by reason of her ordinance of secession and her open participation in the war against us, has ceased to be a State of the Union, it is manifest that the Senate cannot now admit the claimant to a seat as one of its members, nor can it admit him at all until Congress, by a joint vote, has restored the State to its original position. The power to admit States into this Union, and, by consequence, the power to readmit them, are vested in Congress, to be exerted by joint resolution or bill, to which the concurrence of both Chambers and the approval of the President are necessary. Here I content myself with a statement. For the present I forbear from all consideration of the status of the seceded States. The argument is complete without it.

It is my desire to present this question on the facts, and not on any theory or hypothesis. I say nothing, therefore, on the questions, what constitutes a State government in this Union; whether a State by a process of suicide may not cease to exist; whether a State may not by forfeiture lose its rights as a State; or whether, when the loyal government is overthrown, a State does not lapse into the condition of territory under congressional jurisdiction, to be treated like other national territory. All these questions I put aside. I choose to present the case of Arkansas on facts which nobody can call in question:

It is enough that the loyal authorities were overthrown, and that there were no functionaries holding office under the State government who were bound by oath to support the Constitution of the United States; and since a State government is necessarily composed of such functionaries, thus bound by oath, there was no State government which we could recognize. Sir, does any Senator recognize the rebel governor of Arkansas? Does any Senator recognize the other rebel functionaries who held the offices of the State? Of course not. It follows, then, that the offices were empty. And this was the practical conclusion of Andrew Johnson when he began to reorganize Tennessee by an address as early as 18th March, 1862. Here are his words:

"I find most, if not all, of the offices, both State and Federal, vacated, either by actual abandonment or by the action of the incumbents in attempting to subordinate their functions to a power in hostility to the fundamental law of the State and subversive of her national allegiance."

But if the offices were vacated, the machine of government could not work. And now the practical question is, how this machine shall be again put in motion. Obviously, not by any power within; but by some power without.

But it may be said that the new State organization in Arkansas is authorized by the President's proclamation of amnesty, and that the claimant's case stands good according to the promises of this exceptional paper. A glance is enough to dispel this pretension. True it is that the President put forward a plan for reorganizing loyal State governments in the rebel territory, and he proffered a guarantee to these communities against domestic violence and rebel invasion; but he neither proposed nor promised any representation in Congress or in the electoral college. Nor would such a proposition or promise by him have possessed the slightest validity; because, by the Constitution, "each House is to be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." This provision is inconsistent with any prerogative of the President over this question, even if this prerogative were not controlled by that other provision which reserves to Congress the power to admit "new States into this Union."

The proclamation declared that whenever in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of 1860, each having taken the particular oath prescribed by that proclamation and not having violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before its secession, and excluding all others, should reestablish a State government which should be republican and in nowise contravening the proclamation oath, it should be recognized as the true government of the State, which should receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," &c. But subsequently in the same paper the President declares "that whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats constitutionally rests exclusively with the respective Houses and not to any extent with the Executive." Nothing is said in this paper on the participation of such reorganized State in the approaching presidential election, and the question seems to have been left open for the judgment of Congress, to which it obviously belongs, to be settled by joint action.

It is plain, therefore, that the reorganization contemplated by the President was in its nature provisional. It was not complete or permanent in itself, but evidently looked to the action of the legislative power to determine representation, whether in Congress or in the electoral college. Loyal governments might be established in the manner indicated for the conservation of local order, and these would be recognized and upheld provisionally by the military power. Considered from this point of view, and in the absence of congressional action on the subject, the President's plan of reconstruction was proper if not necessary, and very little obnoxious to the objections sometimes brought against it. A handful of persons keeping their loyalty might justly look to the military power for support against a hostile majority. Such a handful might be allowed to set up a local government for the management of their local affairs, and to assist the national Government in the work of restoration. All this was natural. But the limitation was clear. Admitting that it was right to authorize the establishment of local government for the benefit of a handful of loyal persons in a rebel State, it does not by any means follow that such local government can be entitled to representation in the national Government as a loyal unit, on an equality with the loyal States of the Union. The two questions are entirely different, and the latter was wisely left untouched by the proclamation.

Besides, the power of the President to institute this Government is only as Commander-in-Chief of the Army. It is therefore military in its character. But what proceeds from this power is, from the nature of the case, provisional or temporary until it has received the sanction of Congress. To a certain extent, and from the necessity of the hour, military governments may be constituted by the President; but permanent civil governments with—

Mr. COLLAMER. To last beyond the war. Mr. SUMNER. As the Senator from Vermont happily suggests, to last beyond the war, with a right of representation in Congress and in the electoral college, cannot be constituted by the President. Such a power would be open to infinite abuse, and in the hands of an ambitious President might be employed for selfish purposes. The national safety, in harmony with republican principles, requires that it should be exercised by Congress, which must take the lead in calling the new government into being.

Against these conclusions there can be no argument founded on principle. But it may be said that the admission of Senators from Virginia constitutes a precedent applicable to the present case. This is a mistake. The Virginia case is a precedent for nothing, unless it be to make us more careful for the future. It arose at the beginning of the troubles, before the relations of the rebel States had become fixed by pertinacious war, and it was little considered at the time. But beyond all it had this peculiarity, that a large section, geographically, of Virginia had in point of fact declined to recognize the pretension of secession, and had promptly constituted a loyal government without military intervention, so that practically it had never been a part of the rebel government. The circumstances were so exceptional that this case cannot be cited to determine our conduct toward a State which in all its parts, throughout its whole jurisdiction, accepted the pretension of secession and maintained it by arms. Such a State is beyond all question a rebel State, with no title to a place in Congress or in the electoral college until readmission to its ancient rights by a vote of both Houses of Congress.

Surely the readmission of a rebel State to representation is not less important than its original admission into the Union. And when it is considered that what is done for one such State will be a precedent for all, its importance is multiplied by the number of rebel States; and this again is augmented infinitely by the disturbed condition of affairs, and the supreme duty to take every precaution for the restoration of permanent tranquility. It will not be enough if we comply with certain forms or constitute a State only in name. Much more must be done, and all this must be placed under fixed and irreversible guarantees. Vain will be victory on the battle-field if these guarantees are not obtained. It is to make these possible that our armies are now engaged in the deadly shock. It is in order that the future at least may be secure, that the present is given over to blood and slaughter—to graves and epitaphs. And here is the difference between your responsibilities and those of the soldier. The latter sees only the present, but you must see the future also. The soldier meets his enemy face to face.

The statesman, by wise precautions, provides that the enemy, once conquered, shall never rise again. Vain is the work of the soldier if it be not consummated and crowned by the wisdom of the statesman.

For years slavery has been claiming its guarantees in States and Territories, and these Chambers have echoed to the hoarse, inhuman cry. At last another voice has begun to prevail, sounding from basement to cupola, filling chamber and dome with another echo; it is the voice of Freedom claiming guarantees. But in the absence of any constitutional prohibition of slavery it is evident that these guarantees can be obtained only under the sanction of Congress acting in its legislative capacity. And here we are brought again to the question of representation; for it is clear that representation cannot be conceded until the guarantees for freedom have been secured. Therefore, representation can be obtained only under the sanction of Congress in its legislative capacity.

That Congress in its legislative capacity must determine this question is sustained by the necessity of the case; by reason; by authority; and by the President's proclamation itself.

1. I have already shown that guarantees for freedom are a condition precedent to representation, so that by the necessity of the case the latter must be determined by the joint action of both Houses of Congress. Such is one form in which this necessity appears. But there is another.

Congress must have jurisdiction over every portion of the United States where there is no other government; but there can be no other government in the rebel States, so that the words of Chief Justice Marshall are as applicable to a State without a loyal State government as they were originally to a Territory:

"Perhaps the power of governing a Territory belonging to the United States, which has not by becoming a State acquired the means of self-government, may result necessarily from the facts that it is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State and is within the power and jurisdiction of the United States."—American Insurance Company vs. Carter, 1 Peters, 532.

The three things which are here affirmed of a Territory may all be affirmed of a rebel State.

First. It has not the means of self-government. Secondly. It is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State.

Thirdly. It is within the power and jurisdiction of the United States.

From these again the necessity of congressional jurisdiction ensues.

2. It would be unreasonable, if not absurd, for each Chamber to determine the question of representation for itself. Suppose, for instance, that the Senate admit claimants from Arkansas and the House reject them. Then we should witness the anomaly of a State admitted to one Chamber and excluded from the other. This would be a case of semi-admission into the Union. Part would be in and part out. The Senators and Representatives of the same State would be compelled to separate, as in Grecian mythology, when one of the inseparable twins, Castor and Pollux, was translated to Olympus and the other was left upon earth. Surely the Constitution does not contemplate the repetition of any such fable. Arkansas must stay away until she can be received in both Houses and can be recognized as a unit and not as a fraction; but no power short of Congress can assure this equal reception in both Houses.

3. Authority is in harmony with reason. This question seems to have been anticipated by the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States as pronounced by Chief Justice Taney in the case of Luther vs. Borden, (7 Howard's Reports, 42.) Here are the words:

"The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on the application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

"Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guaranty to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal."

According to these positive words "it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State." But Congress can decide only through joint action.

4. The Constitution also, by a positive text, seems to place the question beyond doubt. There are express words, as we have already seen, declaring that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." If these words stood alone, the case would be clear; but it becomes clearer still when we revert to the other clause by which it is provided that "the Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States." Now, since the guarantee is vested in the Government of the United States, it follows that Congress has the power for carrying it into execution. In Arkansas a republican government has been overthrown by rebellion. Congress must see that such government is restored; and to this end it has all needful power. Congress, and not the President, must decide when the restoration has taken place.

5. There is also the President's proclamation, which, by its very terms, necessarily implies the action of Congress in the restoration of a State to the Union. There is first the positive declaration that "whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats constitutionally rests exclusively with the respective Houses, and not to any extent with the Executive." But the language of the proclamation and of the accompanying message plainly assumes that the rebel States have lost their original character as States of the Union. Thus in one place the President says that "loyal State governments have for a long time been subverted." But if subverted, they are no longer States. In another place he proposes "to reinaugurate loyal State governments." But a proposition to reinaugurate implies a new start. In another place he proposes to "reestablish a State government which shall be republican." But we do not reestablish a government which continues to exist. In another place he proposes to "set up" a State government in the mode prescribed. But whatever requires to be set up is evidently down. In another place he seeks to guaranty and protect a "revived State government." But we revive only what is dead, or at least faint. There is still another place, where the President evidently looks to the possibility of a change of name, boundary, subdivision, constitution, and general code of laws in the restored State. These are his identical words: "And it is suggested as not improper that in constructing a loyal State government in a State, the name of the State, the boundary, the subdivisions, the constitution, and the general code of laws, as before the rebellion, be maintained." Thus the President does not insist that even the name and boundary of a State shall be preserved. He contents himself with suggesting that it will not be "improper" to preserve them "in constructing a loyal State government." Of course this suggestion of what is not improper implies necessarily that in his opinion these great changes were within the discretion of the revived community.

I have called especial attention to the language of the President, because it constantly assumes, in a succession of phrases, that the rebel States are in an abnormal condition, from which they are to be recovered or revived; and since such restoration or revival can be consummated only by the action of Congress, it is reasonable to infer that such was his expectation. At all events, the proclamation, by its repeated assumptions with regard to the rebel States, testifies to the necessity of congressional action.

We have already seen that Andrew Johnson had declared the State of Tennessee "vacated" by all local government which we were bound to respect; and Arkansas was in a similar situation. But this language obviously harmonizes with that of the President.

Such are some of the arguments for the power of Congress over this question. Others might be adduced; but I have said enough. The necessity of the case—reason—the authority of the Supreme Court—the Constitution—and the President's proclamation, each and all tend to the same conclusion, even without resorting to those war powers which are all within the reach of Congress. But if we glance at the latter we shall find the power of Congress declared beyond question. There is nothing which the President may do as Commander-in-Chief which Congress may not direct and govern, according to the authoritative words of Chancellor Kent:

"Though the Constitution vests the executive power in the President and declares him Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, these powers must necessarily be subordinate to the legislative power in Congress."
—Kent's Commentaries, volume 1, 292, note 5.

And these powers, vast as they may be when called into activity by the exigency of war or rebellion, become as constitutional as if specified precisely in a written text.

Mr. President, there is a saying of antiquity which is applicable to this question: make haste slowly. Do not fail to make haste; but let your haste be governed by wisdom and prudence. In making haste do not sacrifice all safeguards for the future. In your haste to welcome Senators from rebel States do not forget everything else; do not forget the principles of republican institutions, which are offended by the rule of a minority; do not forget the principles of justice among the States, which will be shocked by the recognition of a fraction of a rebel State to an equality of power with loyal States; do not forget the disturbed condition of the rebel States, rendering the civil authorities subordinate to the military; do not forget the necessity of a connecting link of legality between the old and the new; do not forget that commercial intercourse must be restored, and every ban of proclamation or statute must be removed before representation can be allowed; and still further, do not forget that the rebel States by their own acts, sustained by bloody war, have voluntarily placed themselves outside the pale of political association, until Congress shall recognize them again as entitled to their original equality; and, above all, do not forget that there can be no recognition of a rebel State until its permanent tranquillity has been assured by irreversible guarantees which no local power can disturb. Keep these things in mind; and then make haste.

Of course when within the confines of a State the rebellion is triumphantly subdued, and the great body of the people testifies an unmistakable loyalty; when local elections can be held according to the ordinary municipal forms; when the laws and not arms prevail; and when a government, republican in fact as in name, making slavery forever impossible, has been permanently established, then will Congress, by proper legislative action, rejoice to welcome the newly constituted State to its equal share in the national Government. But such welcome must not be precipitated. It can be offered only after a most careful inquiry into the actual condition of things and the assured conviction that the rebel State has been newly constituted in fact, as in name. And this caution is needed not only for the good of the Union but for the good of the newly constituted State, which must be saved from premature responsibilities beyond the measure of its present powers.

Sir, it is much to be a State in full fellowship and equality with other States represented in this Chamber and in the other Chamber, with a voice in the election of President and Vice President and with a star on the national flag. To be admitted into these prerogatives and privileges a State must be "above suspicion," and it must be able to use well all the great powers which belong to a State. But if a State is not yet "above suspicion," and if it is not strong enough to stand alone, ever against domestic disturbers, it cannot expect immediate recognition. It must wait yet a little longer until, restored at last in character and in strength, it can do all the duties of a State, and with master hand grasp that Ulyssean bow which pretenders strive in vain to bend.

Mr. President, I conclude, as I began, with my heart's gratitude to those brave citizens who again in Arkansas have lifted the national banner. Let them not be disheartened. Their country is with them in all their perils and all their efforts, longing to accept them again into ancient fellowship and equality; but the time for this welcome has not yet come. Meanwhile let them remember that "They also serve who only stand and wait."

Mr. JOHNSON. I am by no means sure, Mr.

President, that this debate is not to be considered as premature. The motion before the Senate is to refer the right of the gentlemen who are here claiming to be Senators from Arkansas to the Committee on the Judiciary. The only gratification I have, if the debate so far is to be considered as premature, is that if the reference should be made the members of that committee will have had the benefit on the questions which the reference may present of the argument of the honorable member from Massachusetts. I put to him an inquiry while he was delivering his speech, the aim of which he seemed at the time very distinctly to discover, but the answer to which I have listened to him in vain to hear.

Mr. SUMNER. It came in the next sentence.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I lost the sentence. I am sorry for it.

Mr. SUMNER. It was because it came in the next sentence that I forbore to make any special reply to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senate are already aware, if they have taken any interest in the opinions which I have from time to time expressed on this floor, that upon some of the questions argued by the honorable Senator I have the misfortune, or the good fortune, to differ with him. I have heard him before to-day, and I have read him before, announce as the true doctrine of the situation in which these States are placed, that they are out of the Union; that their citizens are enemies of the citizens of the loyal States; that the States of which they are practically the citizens are to be considered as States at war with the United States, and that the result of the relation between them and the United States is such that they and the territories which they occupy are to be treated, the one as enemies, the other as conquered, if our arms should be successful.

The honorable member, in support of that position, has heretofore relied and relies again, if I have understood him correctly, upon the decision of the Supreme Court in the cases known to the profession as the prize cases. I do not mean to anticipate what may be the opinion that I shall express in the Judiciary Committee, but if his interpretation of that decision is a sound one—that is to say, if, to illustrate it, the State of Tennessee is a State in the relation of an enemy to the United States, if the people within her limits are to be considered the enemies of the United States—then it would seem to me to follow that that very intelligent and patriotic convention by whom the recent nominations, which I suppose have carried pleasure to the honorable member from Massachusetts, were made, have come to the extraordinary conclusion of selecting as a candidate for the Vice Presidency an enemy of the United States; and if the State of which he is a member is now not a State of the United States, but a State outside of the limit of the States which compose the United States, they have selected an alien enemy to represent them in the next highest office in the gift of the people, and, contingently, to represent them in the highest.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator evidently did not hear what I said.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will listen now attentively.

Mr. SUMNER. I stated that the person selected was within the rightful jurisdiction of the United States. My proposition was that the District of Columbia, a Territory of the United States, and any one of the rebel States, are all within the rightful jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that. The honorable member has always contended for that; that is to say, the United States have the rightful power to punish them all, and that necessarily assumes the existence of jurisdiction over them all. But when the honorable member relies upon the doctrines which he supposes the Supreme Court have announced—

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will bear in mind that I have not alluded to-day to that decision.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; but you have before, unless you have retracted your former views on the question. I do not understand the honorable member to have done so in his speech to-day.

If that doctrine be true, then it is impossible that any loyal citizen of the United States who believes in that doctrine can vote for the candidate of the party to which my friend belongs for the office of Vice President. The honorable member and the Senate are not to understand me as holding any such doctrine. On the contrary, I hold an opinion directly the opposite of it. In my view, Tennessee is as much, in the view of the Constitution, now one of the United States as she was before the rebellion commenced, and consequently that the very distinguished and patriotic citizen who has been selected by the friends of the honorable member, is eligible legally to the place for which he has been nominated, and of course will be the constitutional Vice President, if the people should sanction the selection.

But if the honorable member's view is right, I do not see upon what ground he can vote for that nominee. The laws of war, say the honorable member and those who agree with him on that subject—and the official law adviser of the War Department has published quite an elaborate and learned treatise looking to the same end—are the only laws which are to govern the United States in their treatment of the seceded States, and whatever under those laws they could do as against an alien enemy in point of fact, a foreign foe, in the prosecution of a national war, the United States can do as against these enemies, who are to be considered, according to the view taken by the honorable member, as national enemies, extra-territorial enemies, and not as citizens of the United States committing a crime against the allegiance by which they are bound and liable to the punishment which the laws may provide for such a crime.

I have already said, Mr. President, it is not my purpose to express more decidedly the opinion I have upon that question, because, as I suppose, the subject which is involved in the present motion will go before the Judiciary Committee, of which I am a member, and I deem it due to myself and due to the committee and to the Senate that I should not in advance prejudice the question which that reference may present.

The honorable member has thought proper, in the view which I take of that part of his speech, to assail the course of the President. I know he attempted to qualify what unqualified would have been an absolute assault, by construing away (as I think the Senate will see) what the President has actually decided. But he has announced doctrines in debate, and has maintained them with a learning which he always brings to the illustration of every question which he thinks proper to discuss; he has thought over it in his closet, he has given the midnight taper to the thoughts which he has brought before the Senate to-day; and he has told us that the President in his proclamation of amnesty has decided to a certain extent that it is in the power of the people of these States to come back into the Union without legislative sanction. How could he have decided it if he entertained the view taken by the honorable member from Massachusetts? What but clear and palpable usurpation would it have been or would it be in the President of the United States to say to the people of either of these States, "You may come back and I will receive you as one of the States of the Union?" As far as the executive authority of the Government is concerned, he announces that "if the people of any State now in rebellion who comply with the conditions stated in that proclamation shall ask to be received into the family of the States of the Union, they shall be received; all the authority which I may possess necessary to consummate that end I will exercise; I will appoint judges, district attorneys, and marshals." And he has done it; he has done it in this very State of Arkansas. By what authority has he done it?

Mr. SUMNER. The statutes of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Statutes of the United States applicable to a State of the Union?

Mr. SUMNER. The territory has not gone.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where is it?

Mr. SUMNER. It is in the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON. The State is?

Mr. SUMNER. The territory.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not suppose the land had gone out or seceded.

Mr. SUMNER. The territory is in the Union, the people, the jurisdiction.

Mr. JOHNSON. According to the hypothesis of the honorable member, what authority has the President of the United States, Congress being in session, to say that these States shall have their judges paid out of the Treasury of the United States, district attorneys, marshals, and all the other officers which the Government could have had in that State, and had in that State before she went out, all to be compensated out of the Treasury of the United States, provided the State of Arkansas was not a State in the Union, politically, not territorially? I do not know what course my friend pursued when the nominations for the offices to which I have adverted were brought here for the advice and consent of the Senate, but they were confirmed. I do not think the honorable member voted against the confirmation. Of that, however, I am not sure. If he did vote for the confirmation, then the President has a right to hold him to the fact that Arkansas is in the Union under his proclamation, and has a right to say to him, "By your vote you have estopped yourself from denying it."

But the President, as the honorable member says, has not attempted to interfere with the action of either branch of Congress on the same question. Certainly not. How could he? Whether these gentlemen are to be received as members from Arkansas, Senators of the State, by this body, or whether any members elected by the people to the other House are to be received by that House as members of that body, depends respectively upon the judgment of the two bodies; and over the judgment of the Senate and the judgment of the House of Representatives, to whom is given by the Constitution the right to decide upon the qualifications of members, the President has no control whatever. But that does not show that he did not go to the entire limit of the power which the Constitution confers upon him as President, when he told the people of Arkansas, "One tenth of you—I do not require more—one tenth of you assemble in convention; and if you, one tenth, decide, whatever the other nine tenths may do—they may be all in rebellion, all upon the battle-field—that the State is to return to the Union, as far as my power is concerned, I tell you in advance, you will be a State in the Union." For the same reason that I said I did not propose to express any decided opinion on the other question to which I before alluded, I do not propose to express any opinion upon this except to say that before one can come to the conclusion that the President is not right, he ought to think well of the question.

Now, Mr. President, I know the tenacity with which the honorable member from Massachusetts holds on to that opinion, which seems to have a stronger hold on him than any other, that slavery is a crime, and should be everywhere upon the face of God's earth put an end to. And he looks to the possibility that as far as that institution is concerned, as to its existence in the United States, it may not be brought to an end as soon as he would have it. Doubts have been entertained whether that can be accomplished except by an alteration of the Constitution. The Senate have provided for that alteration; that is to say, to leave it to the people. The other branch of the Legislature have not, as I believe, decided the one way or the other; and if they sanction the resolution adopted by the Senate, it has to go to the people; and it becomes more or less doubtful whether the constitutional majority required can be received in order to make that change legitimate; and looking to the possible contingency that that mode of getting clear of this, in the eyes of the honorable member, hateful institution may not be entirely successful, he wants, to use an expression which he has used more than once, to strike at it wherever he sees it. One of the ways of striking at it is to maintain the doctrine that none of these States shall be permitted to come back except upon the condition that they first, by their State constitution, prohibit slavery; or, if they do not do it in words, except upon the condition of an act of Congress, which you may pass, providing that slavery shall never thereafter exist in the State.

Has the honorable member refreshed his recollection with the debates which resulted out of the admission of Missouri? Has he consulted the debates which from time to time since have occurred in either branch of Congress? If he has he will find that however upon the first occasion doubts were entertained whether it was in the power of Congress to annex any such condition to a State as a condition upon which it is to be admitted, it was soon after conceded that it was not in the power of Congress to annex any such condition to the admission of a State, because such condition would produce inequality as between the States. He reads everything that comes out that is worth reading, and he will pardon me for saying he sometimes reads what is not worth reading; and I am sure the honorable member must have read the speech that electrified this body, charmed an immense audience, placed his name high upon the roll of orators, made him for the time the observed of all observers, the speech that Pinckney delivered on that question in this Chamber. It is very imperfectly reported, but the argument is there, and the argument was so overwhelming that although the opposite view was taken by a man of eminent ability, and pure and spotless character, and burning patriotism, (Rufus King was his opponent, and spoke in advance,) he yielded to its masterly power, and stood, if I may be permitted to use what I have heard from those who were spectators of the debate, crest-fallen. And from that day to this, (I speak what I know, Mr. President, for it has happened to be my duty particularly to examine this question professionally,) with rare exceptions every jurist in either branch of Congress who has spoken on the subject, until the last two or three years, has admitted that whether a State is to be received into the Union or not, one thing is certain, she can only come in as an equal; and as Massachusetts might establish slavery if she thought proper to do so, as she once recognized it, as she once, if there could be any enjoyment in such an institution, enjoyed it, as some of her citizens sold the slaves which went out to the South—as she could now establish African slavery within her own limits, it followed that if you prohibited it to Arkansas or to Tennessee, or to any other States, they would not be on an equal footing with Massachusetts. I trust in God the Union is destined to last forever, but it cannot last when once it is understood that each State in the Union is not the equal of every other, equal in everything, equal not only in the power to do right but equal in the power to do wrong; I mean morally wrong. My friend is for blotting out all these State lines which were so valuable to us in the past, around which so many associations that cling round the heart of an American are to be found; associations the result of intercourse, the result of marriage, the result of blood relationship, the result of joint glories and joint trials in the field. He is for blotting them all out and considering these States merely as territory, to return to the United States as territorial acquisitions; or, if the honorable member refuses to admit that that word properly illustrates his own view, to get them back into the United States as Territories, stripped of State power and unprotected by the Constitution of the United States, except so far as that Constitution deals with and protects the Territories of the United States.

Now, I have nothing to say either one way or the other; first, because I do not know what the facts are; secondly, because, if I did, it would not be proper in the relation in which perhaps I shall stand to the question of the right of these gentlemen from Arkansas to seats on this floor; but I may be permitted to remark that there is one aspect in which the question is one of transcendent moment. Why did the President attempt to get back Florida? Why Louisiana? Why Arkansas? Why Tennessee? Why, to the extent that he has succeeded in getting them back according to his view, has he filled up all the offices which the acts of Congress provide for those several States? To have them represented here and in the other branch? That would depend upon the two branches.

But there is another forum to whose decision the questions may be referred. A presidential election is near at hand; electoral votes are important. As these States may be represented in that electoral college, or as they may not be represented, some one man may be elected instead of some other. Suppose they are represented; suppose Arkansas, Tennessee, Florida, and Alabama elect electors, who is to decide the question? Suppose the election of Mr. Lincoln or the election of his opponent—I put it both ways—suppose the man who receives of all the votes counted a majority of the votes, has a majority or not a majority just as these electoral votes may have been legitimately cast or not; who decides it?

Not the Senate of the United States; not the House of Representatives. The President has already decided it in advance; the honorable member from Massachusetts has decided it in advance, provided he has voted to confirm the nominations which have been made in some of these States. They are in the Union now; and if they are in the Union now, under the President's proclamation, although they were out of it or might have been out of it before, they have a right to choose electors. If the reelection of Mr. Lincoln or the election of any competitor of Mr. Lincoln shall be found to depend upon the legality of those votes, God knows what may not be the result.

Let me assume that Mr. Lincoln receives them. What will his competitor, who, I assume, has a majority of all the other votes except these, say? He will hold up the speech of the honorable member from Massachusetts, "Here one of your leaders versed in constitutional law, devoted to your policy, has pronounced on the floor of the Senate, with undoubted confidence, that they have no right to be heard in the electoral college, and therefore their votes, if cast, are to be considered as a nullity." The issue will be a frightful one. God forbid that the contingency should happen; but if it shall happen, look to hear the earth tremble again. It is more especially calculated to excite the public heart and arouse the public blood when we know that it has been asserted, and continues to be asserted from time to time, that the very purpose of bringing back those States, illegally, as the honorable member from Massachusetts insists, is with a view to the presidential election. I do not believe it. I am not here to criminate the President of the United States, nor to assail his motives. As at present advised, I think he has erred, as I think he has erred in a great many other things; but my individual belief or the individual belief of anybody else is a matter of little or no moment. Should the result of the election depend upon the legality of those votes, and those votes should alone give it to him, then I think I can almost hear by anticipation the mutterings of the thunder.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. SUMNER. Then the Senator must agree with me in the importance of settling this question in advance.

Mr. JOHNSON. I admit that.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator agrees with me.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly. I do not say that I agree with you in opinion. I say it is necessary to settle it in advance.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator agrees with me as to the importance of settling it in advance.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course I do; but suppose it is settled against your view and mine, what then?

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand the Senator to say they are entitled to electoral votes?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir; I have said almost directly the reverse. I have forborne, as the Chair will recollect, and as perhaps some of the Senators who have heard me will recollect, to express any decision of the question. I unite with the honorable member—

Mr. SUMNER. I am at a loss to see where the difference is between the Senator and myself. The Senator thinks they are entitled to electoral votes. For instance, take the case of Tennessee or of Arkansas. If either of those States is a State of this Union completely constituted, in the exercise of all the rights and functions of a State, of course it will be entitled to cast its electoral vote. It seems to me that that is a crucial question which determines the case. If the Senator says that those States are not entitled to cast an electoral vote, it must be for some reason. What is it? Because they have not that position in the Union which can so entitle a State; because their position is anomalous; because they are not yet completely on their legs, if I may so say, as a State; or, borrowing the language of the President, because the State government must be re-established; or, again borrowing the language of the President, must be revived; or, again borrowing his language, must be set up. It seems to me that that is the only reason which can sustain the Senator, and therefore the Senator and myself do not differ.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am always happy to agree with the honorable member from Massachusetts, and during the whole of this session I have upon every occasion which presented itself, made a very honest effort to come to that result, but have very seldom succeeded. The difference between the honorable member and myself is as wide as the poles. I consider the war now being carried on against the citizens of those States as being carried on against them individually; that each man is just as much a citizen of the United States in those States now as is each man in the loyal States; but as those men for the most part are now in arms against the United States, trying to destroy the United States, they are not to be represented in the electoral college because they are criminals, traitors, whom it is the duty of the United States to prosecute as such, and to punish as such. If the President thinks proper to pardon them all, and he has pardoned a great many, or if Congress should think proper itself by some legislative act, with the consent of the President, to wipe out all their sins as against the United States, and they should organize their government again, and come here, they have a right to come; but until they do that they are the enemies of the United States. But that is not the case made by the President.

Mr. SUMNER. How are they to be organized? There is the practical question.

Mr. JOHNSON. By organizing as they did before.

Mr. SUMNER. Who is to set it in motion?

Mr. JOHNSON. They themselves, just as they did it before. If the constitution of Arkansas as it originally existed stands, it has all the power it ever had; but that is a question to be discussed hereafter.

Now, Mr. President, we ought not to be in great haste, says my learned friend. Festina lente is his maxim. The ancients tell us that, as he reminds us; but he tells us we ought not to make hurry. I do not think we have made any particular hurry. These gentlemen have been here a good while waiting for the decision of the Senate. There is one thing in which the maxim has been followed, whether by compulsion or not I do not know, but we have certainly made haste slowly in putting down this rebellion. We have been making the effort here some three or four years, and we do not see as clearly as we would wish the end of it yet. I think I see—but I am sanguine—I think I see that the time is comparatively near at hand when it will be put down. I do not believe, speaking with all the reverence in which in common with every Christian man I hold Providence, I do not believe it is in the providence of God that this nation is to die. I believe it will survive, and be the purer and the greater for the trials through which it has passed and through which it is passing.

"We will fight till the triumph is won,
Till the States form the realm of the Union
As the stars form the realm of the sun."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, like the Senator from Maryland, I do not concur with the position assumed by the Senator from Massachusetts that these States are out of the Union. I do not think one of the parties to the compact that formed the Union, by an ordinance of secession, by a mere resolution which is of itself a nullity, can take a State out of the Union and destroy the compact. I hold and believe that all the States are in the Union. It does not follow, however, from that position, that I am in favor of admitting all who present themselves from those States with credentials in proper form into the Senate. I am opposed to the admission of one certainly of the applicants who are here now from the State of Arkansas, and I shall proceed to give as briefly as I can the reasons why I am thus opposed. If Congress had passed, as I desired they should, a general amnesty act, the objections in part I now urge would not be valid.

Hereafter, when these troubles are all over, if a member, I will not investigate the antecedents of persons presenting themselves, I will then only look to the regularity and legality of the election and the qualification of the applicant.

This is not a propitious time to admit to seats here persons who aided to pass ordinances of secession, persons who have led in rebellion. I am not willing to vote to admit them into the Senate of the United States during the progress of the difficulties. Mr. Fishback, one of the applicants from Arkansas, voted for secession in that State. In a letter of the 28th of May, 1864, adressed to the Editors National Intelligencer, he says substantially that this vote was given while he was in duress.

If I believed this I would not raise my voice against him. I have examined the case with some care and labor; and if I had to form an opinion in reference to him I should say that he was the leader of the rebellion in the State of Arkansas; certainly one of the leaders in the convention.

There was one statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts in which he has been led into an error. No vote of the people of Arkansas has ever justified secession. In the only vote the people of Arkansas ever took upon that subject they, by a majority of eleven thousand, decided against it. That was in the election of their delegates to the convention, which convention subsequently adopted and signed the ordinance of secession. Among the delegates who were elected to that convention were two from the county of Sebastian, and one of them was Mr. Fishback. On the 4th of March, 1861, that convention met. A majority of the convention—a majority of five, I believe—elected what they denominated a Union president, a president opposed to the secession of the State. Mr. Fishback voted with that majority. On the 7th of March, soon after the convention was organized—they met and organized upon the 4th—Mr. Fishback offered the following resolution for consideration in that convention:

"Resolved, That any attempt on the part of the Federal Government to coerce a seceding State, by an armed force, will be resisted by Arkansas to the last extremity."

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator read that again?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

"Mr. Fishback offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That any attempt on the part of the Federal Government to coerce a seceding State, by an armed force, will be resisted by Arkansas to the last extremity."

Mr. Fishback was elected to the convention in opposition to secession. Three days after he took his seat he offered a resolution for adoption in that convention which was the very essence of the rebellion itself. And yet, sir, in the statement he makes in his letter of the 28th of May last he says he was coerced to vote for secession. The resolution is as destructive of Government as secession, and is secession. While I am upon this point I will read what he does say, affording him opportunity to be heard upon it. I read from the letter of Mr. Fishback to the editors of the National Intelligencer:

"For some time prior to the rebellion I had been under ban of suspicion in Arkansas as an 'abolitionist,' because of what I conceived to be my liberal views on the slavery question, and more especially because of a letter which I had published concerning the John Brown affair, and which came very near driving me from the State. Nor was this suspicion lessened when the secession agitation began. I made haste to take strong and decided grounds against it."

This was the strong and decided ground that he took against it, pledging Arkansas to resist to the last any attempt to coerce the States that were in secession.

In the same letter he says:

"So active and so successful was my opposition in that part of the State where I resided that threats of taking my life or of driving me from the State became frequent and extensive. The newspapers of the State were especially abusive and menacing. But I was elected to the convention by a large majority after it was decided to have a convention; and on my way to the capital to take my seat I was warned by the secretary of State not to come to Little Rock or I would be hung. I went, however, and at the first session of the convention we voted the ordinance of secession down by a small majority. During my stay in Little Rock my life was constantly threatened, and on my return a mob in the town of Clarksville, through which I had to pass, had provided a half-bushel of rotten eggs for my benefit, and because of my efforts in defeating the ordinance."

"When Sumter was fired on, and the thorough organization of the rebels became developed so suddenly as to take the Union men quite by surprise, the president unfortunately called the convention together again. Upon assembling we found two rebel regiments already in the capital, the arsenal in their hands, Fort Smith captured by another, the Governor receiving troops daily, and the Union men entirely without organization or concert. Immediately upon discovering this state of facts, I became convinced that the State was inevitably gone, and attempted to make my escape to the North. But so great was the bitterness against me, and so keenly was I watched—it was expected that I would attempt to escape, and therefore my movements were closely watched, for they desired an excuse for my assassination—that I found it impossible, and no course was left me but to acquiesce then and to make my escape afterward when suspicion should subside. This I did on the very first opportunity. Nor did I ever assist the rebellion in any way, shape, or form after that vote."

We shall see about that after a while. This, he states, is the reason why at the second session of the convention, which met, I believe, on the 6th of May, 1861; he voted for the ordinance of secession. We see on the 7th of March, when there was no force called out, no violence threatened, the second resolution offered in the convention was one by Mr. Fishback, pledging Arkansas to stand by the seceded States and see that they were not coerced. The whole essence of secession is in that resolution of the 7th of March, which he proposed when there were no regiments to menace him, and when, according to his showing, he was free and untrammelled. On the 12th of March—this was during the first session of the convention, before the firing on Fort Sumter—Mr. Fishback offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president of this convention be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint one commissioner to each of the slaveholding States, to request their cooperation in an effort, through a national convention, to secure an adjustment of our political troubles upon the basis of the resolutions offered by Mr. Thomason on yesterday."

Now, let us see what was the basis of settlement in Mr. Thomason's resolutions. I find the following in these resolutions:

"1. The President and Vice President of the United States shall each be chosen alternately from a slaveholding and non-slaveholding State, but in no case shall both be chosen from slaveholding or non-slaveholding States.

"2. In all the territory of the United States now held, or which may hereafter be acquired, situated north of latitude 36° 30', slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, is prohibited while such territory shall remain under territorial government. In all the territory now held, or which may hereafter be acquired south of said line of latitude, slavery of the African race is hereby recognized as existing, and shall not be interfered with by Congress, but shall be protected as property by all the departments of the territorial government during its continuance."

"3. Congress shall have no power to legislate upon the subject of slavery, except to protect the citizen in his right of property in slaves."

No sane man who will take the trouble to read Thomason's resolutions would favor them then or now. To urge them was to render secession and rebellion in Arkansas inevitable. It lead the people blindfold into revolution. This took place in March, 1861. Mr. Fishback, in his letter, says that then the ordinance of secession was defeated. That is true; or rather they did not pass the ordinance. The convention, however, conferred on their president power to convene them at any time, every member of the convention acquiescing in that movement, placing it thus in his power to assemble them at any time, to disregard the popular will of Arkansas, and to pass a secession ordinance. This convention, with Mr. Fishback in the lead, prepared the State for what followed. The convention adjourned and went home; but it was convened again soon after the war commenced by the firing upon Fort Sumter. Their president called them together in May. The first thing they did when they met in May was to pass an ordinance of secession; and, in his statement in the National Intelligencer, he attempts to explain that on the first call of the roll every member of the convention voted for that ordinance except five. Among those who so voted was Mr. Fishback.

Mr. HOWARD. Which way?

Mr. RICHARDSON. For the ordinance. Those who voted against it were "Messrs. Bolinger, Campbell, Gunter, Kelley, and Murphy." I read from the record:

"At the call of Mr. President, Mr. President addressed the convention urging unanimity, whereupon Mr. Bolinger, who had voted in the negative, arose and stated in substance that 'I voted against the ordinance declaring the independence of the State, in accordance with my pledges to my people, but to secure unanimity I ask to change my vote to the affirmative, at the same time denying the right of secession.'

"Mr. Bolinger also asked that the explanation be spread upon the journals; which was so ordered, and his vote changed from 'nay' to 'yea.'

"Mr. Campbell, with a similar explanation, also changed his vote from 'nay' to 'yea.'

"Mr. Kelley, with an explanation in substance that 'he was in favor of revolution, but ignored the right of secession,' also changed his vote from 'nay' to 'yea.'

"Mr. Gunter, with a similar explanation, also changed his vote from 'nay' to 'yea.'

"Mr. Fishback explained his vote."

How we do not know. Mr. Murphy refused to change his vote; he stood solitary and alone voting against the ordinance. I believe they have elected him Governor lately; and I think they have done a very meritorious thing. But Mr. Fishback in his letter says that certain interrogatories were propounded to the candidates for the Senate, the fourth of which was:

"Have you ever aided, directly or indirectly, the secession of the State of Arkansas from the Federal Union?"

Mr. Fishback's answer was:

"In no other wise than by my vote in the convention under circumstances such as you all know. I could hardly be considered as aiding a foregone fact, however."

Now, Mr. President, I state the fact to be that he remained in that convention for nearly a month, participating in its debates, offering resolutions, &c., up to the time that it adjourned. He says he aided the rebellion in no way but by voting for the ordinance of secession. Now, let us see; I invite the attention of the Senate to the proceedings of the convention: A resolution had been offered to place the State upon a war footing, and immediately afterwards Mr. Fishback offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the militia be instructed to report to this body, at as early a period as practicable, a statement of the cost of maintaining one regiment in active service according to existing laws of the United States."

There was not very much in that, perhaps; he wanted to get at the expense of a regiment; but on the same day, May 7, a resolution being offered to notify Jeff. Davis of their proceedings:

"Mr. Fishback offered the following as a substitute for the resolution as amended:

Resolved, That the president of this convention be requested to telegraph to the president of the confederate States, officially informing him that the State of Arkansas has dissolved her connection with the Federal Government of the United States of America, and inquire what is the ratio of representation in the government of the confederate States."

He had an eye on Congress somewhere or other. [Laughter.] He said he aided the rebellion in no other way but by simply voting for the ordinance of secession. Mr. President, the man must have forgotten his own record. He says he was a Union man, opposed to secession, loving the old flag and the old Constitution and the old Union; and here we find him proclaiming to those who were struggling to overthrow and destroy that Union, "We have broken our connection with it; how many votes does it take to send a member to your congress?" As the Yankees say, he "wanted in." I do not know what more aid he could have given to Jeff. Davis than that. It was aid and comfort. He could not wait for the news to go by slow coaches; it must go with the rapidity of lightning to cheer Jeff. Davis's heart when he was making his first onslaughts to overthrow the Government and Constitution of our fathers. Mr. Fishback says he did nothing but just vote for the ordinance of secession, and they had two regiments of military there and mobs, and all that sort of thing! Sir, the whole thing from first to last shows that he was easily robbed of his patriotism. Having aided to ruin them let him be content with the mischief, and not desire to aid further in the work of ruin. If he had desired he could have stood with Murphy. A like opportunity will never present itself again to him.

Mr. President, when Arkansas passed her ordinance of secession the convention went on immediately to organize men and put them into the field. Mr. Fishback participated in all those movements. He offered resolutions and offered amendments to resolutions relative to raising a military force and bringing them into the field. He took an active part in bringing all that machinery into motion. I will do him the justice to say that when the question came upon attaching Arkansas to the southern confederacy he voted against that proposition with a number of others, as the journals show.

Now, Mr. President, I am opposed to his case going to the Committee on the Judiciary. Why? There is upon your statute-book a law to which I was opposed—I did not think it a wise or proper law—prescribing an oath which shall be taken by Senators and members of the House of Representatives. I have taken that oath, and every gentleman who is admitted to a seat here must take the same oath. It is an oath that the person taking it has not voluntarily aided this rebellion. Fishback, I understand, is willing to take it. He cannot, he ought not to take it; it is impossible that he can.

Mr. President, this is an unwelcome duty to me. I would much prefer to say words of kindness and encouragement to him and all who have seen the errors of the past. I must, however, discharge my duty. There is another fact which I must bring to the notice of the Senate. Whatever may have been the election in the case of the other applicant for a seat here, Mr. Fishback's election is not such a one as I would vote to recognize under any circumstances. I have not the official record to produce in regard to that matter as I have in regard to his action in the convention, but I say he was not elected to the Senate by a majority of the legal members of the Legislature. Mr. Baxter, the other applicant, was elected three days before him. Mr. Baxter and Mr. Fishback were the competing candidates. Mr. Baxter got 38 votes and Mr. Fishback got 34 votes. I believe there is no dispute about this fact.

Three days afterwards there were 37 votes against Mr. Fishback, and 42 for him. Where did those additional votes come from? My information is that they came from Little Rock. From the county of Desha there appeared a member that had just two votes, and they were cast for him in the city of Little Rock. One of the members who voted for Mr. Baxter voted for Fishback, and the other seven were votes manufactured in the city of Little Rock, and they were brought into that Legislature and he was sent here by those votes, some of them representing no constituents at all and some having but two votes. That is my information on the subject, and of course I believe it. Some of the votes for Mr. Fishback were from counties in complete possession of the rebels, where no elections were held or could be held. Then, as Mr. Fishback's case stands, in either view of it, in my judgment it is not in such a condition that his claim ought to be supported, or dignified by reference to a committee. If it is referred it is only for the purpose of paying mileage and per diem, where there is no claim.

Mr. President, sometimes people are very complimentary to me; some persons are great flatterers. A friend was kind enough the other day to call my attention to a letter in the New York Times, signed by a man by the name of Gantt, or some such name, in which he vouched for Mr. Fishback's entire loyalty and for his entire fidelity, and said that all that I have alleged was a mistake; that he had never done anything except what a truly patriotic man ought to have done. Mr. Gantt added in the letter that the country would do very well to swap Mr. Fishback for four just such gentlemen as me. [Laughter.] I do not know how that may be; the country might profit by it; but my judgment is that it is putting me down tolerably low. [Laughter.] But, sir, when we get an indorser we generally inquire into his standing. Who is this Gantt? He was a little while ago a general in the rebel army, a traitor to his country, and now he is false to his confederates. Can you conceive of a lower depth of infamy than that? I have heard it often said that there ought to be honor among thieves. Gantt is the word for all villainies and crimes. But these are the men who come forward and talk about us as not being true and loyal. They call us "copperheads," and such beautiful little epithets. Mr. President, if there is in my past history, if there is in my past record, one action that has not been prompted by a desire to advance the great interests of my country, I do not know it. I call Heaven to witness to-day that whatever errors of judgment I may have committed, every pulsation of my heart has been for my country, for her preservation, for her advancement, for her renown. With the conviction of duty discharged to the best of my ability to my country at all times, I can look on complacently when assailed by the traitor and the betrayer of traitors. Their assaults fall harmless at my feet. One of the fearful omens of the times is the fact that such men, steeped in crime, fearful, damnable crime, covered all over with infamy, can get space in a respectable journal to assail public men, or audiences to listen to their teachings.

Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senate for alluding in their presence to so dirty a dog as Gantt.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President, if there was no reason before for sending these papers to the Committee on the Judiciary, it seems to me that the Senator from Illinois has furnished one. A people who have to-day ten thousand soldiers in the field defending the flag of the country selected Mr. Fishback as their representative by a majority of the Legislature, let me say, for the benefit of the Senator from Illinois, he receiving 42 votes out of 76. The gentleman assailed came to this city recommended to me by the most loyal of my friends. They tell me, as does Mr. Baxter, the colleague of Mr. Fishback, that there is not and never has been a loyal man in the State of Arkansas who suspected the loyalty of Mr. Fishback. He was opposed to the ordinance of secession, and voted for it only because that vote was indispensable to the saving of his own life. I hope, Mr. President, that without any further discussion, this matter may go to the Committee on the Judiciary that they may investigate the question. I believe that at this time the discussion should not have been indulged in. When the committee reports, it will be time enough for us to discuss the general subject.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is not my intention, Mr. President, to enter into this discussion, but simply to say that I shall vote against the reference of these credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary, although, in the first instance, I thought that I should vote otherwise. I shall vote against the reference, because if forty thousand Committees on the Judiciary were to report favorably to the admission, not only of Mr. Fishback, but of his colleague, I would not, under any circumstances, vote for their admission, simply on this ground: if they were the most loyal men in the world, they come here as the representatives of what I consider a rotten borough government established by Abraham Lincoln, and not by the people of Arkansas.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I shall vote against the reference of this subject to any committee of the Senate. I shall vote against the reference of the joint resolution which is the first in order, because I think the time has not yet come for us to take into consideration the propriety of setting aside the President's proclamation declaring certain States of the Union to be in insurrection; and I shall vote against it, because I think that, fairly and properly speaking, at the present time the State of Arkansas is in insurrection. It is not at peace. So far as the resolution relates to that State, I shall treat it as a State in insurrection.

Now, sir, one word as to the reference of the so-called credentials of Mr. Fishback, who has made application to be admitted as a member of this body. By what right does he come here? The President's proclamation of 1861 declared the whole State of Arkansas to be in a condition of insurrection and rebellion against the Government of the United States, and such was the undoubted fact. That State was as much at war against the United States as were the people of England under Cromwell against King Charles. The state of war was as perfect and complete on the part of that community known as Arkansas against the United States, as was ever a condition of war by any community since the world began. What evidence have we, sir, that this state of war does not still exist? Has it ceased, and if it has ceased, in what manner has it ceased, and what is the evidence of its cessation? The President of the United States has not proclaimed to the world that the condition of hostility in Arkansas has ceased or even subsided. He has not in any way modified his proclamation certifying to the world that Arkansas was in a state of insurrection. If it was in a state of insurrection, and if it be still so, I ask some Senator to inform me upon what ground it is, under what right or claim of right, under what law it is that this people, constituting a hostile and belligerent community, so far as the United States are concerned, have elected or assumed to elect members of this Senate and members of the House of Representatives.

Are public enemies entitled to be represented in the Legislature of the United States? Certainly not. No man will so contend. If we were at war with Great Britain no man in this body or elsewhere would pretend that any portion of the British people, whether in Canada or in England, Ireland, or Scotland, had any right to be represented here, and no man would contend that any one of the citizens or subjects of that Government had any right even to hold intercourse, direct or indirect, with the people of the United States. How, then, has it happened, sir, that this hostile people, the inhabitants of Arkansas, have acquired a right to be represented in the Senate of the United States, to appoint successors to those gentlemen who were expelled from this body during the session of 1861? It seems to me to be a solecism, an absurdity in law, to pretend that in the present condition of things Arkansas has any right whatever to be represented in this Senate or in the House of Representatives, for the plain reason that so far as Congress is informed, the population of Arkansas is still a hostile and belligerent population.

Now, sir, to refer these credentials and to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary or to any committee of the Senate, is so far forth a recognition of the absurdity that such a thing is possible as a rightful representation of a belligerent and rebellious State in the Senate of the United States, and I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, to give the proposition any countenance on my part, direct or indirect. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not refer or pay any regard whatever to the credentials of Mr. Fishback at present.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I do not propose to go into the discussion of this question to-day. I am for this reference to the Committee on the Judiciary that it may be considered by the committee, that the facts may be reported to the Senate, and then the Senate will be called upon to discuss them, and to act upon them. It seems to me altogether premature for men now to discuss this question and prejudice this case in advance. There are important questions undoubtedly involved in the case which is presented. Let those questions be submitted to the Judiciary Committee, and let us have their report, and then it seems to me will be the proper time to enter into the full discussion of the subject.

Mr. President, I am myself decidedly for the reference of the whole question. I was for the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. Conness] when it was first made to refer this case to the Committee on the Judiciary. The other question which has been raised, and the joint resolution in relation to Arkansas, I desire to have referred to the committee at once. Let them take it and report upon it, and then we can discuss it and decide it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I agree exactly with the Senator from Wisconsin. It would be, as all Senators understand, impossible for each individual Senator to investigate primarily the very difficult and grave questions that come before us with reference to matters of law, constitutional and municipal, in regard to finance, in regard to commerce, in regard to our postal relations, in regard to our territorial interests; and therefore committees are organized in the Senate, and those committees are supposed to be selected from men most conversant with the particular subjects referred to those committees; and after their investigation and the presentation in form of the considerations involving their conclusions, Senators, with the facilities afforded by the committees, are prepared to arrive conveniently at conclusions. That is the office of committees.

The questions involved in the present controversy are of the gravest character. They belong to fundamental law, and demand grave consideration. It seems somewhat strange to me that gentlemen in the majority—for this House has a political majority of the Republican party—are not willing to trust to at least the investigation of a committee, the majority of which has been assigned in caucus by the Republican party, and let that committee lay before the Senate such considerations as will at least suggest to them sound conclusions.

I confess myself ignorant as to the true solution of the questions involved in this controversy. I think I have a right to the aid of the Committee on the Judiciary to assist me in my conclusions, not that I shall be coerced to concur with them; but it is their particular office and business to furnish the material for sound conclusions, and, at least, their own course of argument. We have, as a Senate, the right to call for their counsel and advice as a part of the legitimate machinery of the administration of our business in the Senate; and it is strange to me that there should be any objection to the consideration by a learned committee of questions involving the principles of fundamental law. I trust the matter may be referred; and when the committee shall report, I will try then, with the aid of the light they may throw on the subject, to investigate it, so that I may be satisfied in my own conscience as to how I should conduct myself in delivering my vote in the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, Congress has neglected to pass any law for the reorganization of the governments of the seceded States, and therefore we are left to act on every case when it comes up according to its own merits. I hope that we shall now spend but little time upon this question, and that the reconstruction bill, as it is called, which has passed the House of Representatives, will be taken up at an early day and passed, or that some bill like it will be passed. Congress should not adjourn until we pass some general law guiding and governing this matter.

Sir, there are many true and loyal men in Arkansas. Several thousand of them are in the field fighting the battles of the country. They have elected a Governor of the State who was faithful among the faithless. They are here claiming admission by their chosen Senators and Representatives. Now, sir, I do not wish to give a vote to discourage the truly loyal men in any effort they may make to put their State right, and therefore I think we ought to receive and examine their application with respect and with deliberation and care, and pass upon it so as to promote the cause of the country.

But, sir, I desire to say now, once for all, that under no conceivable circumstances will I ever give a vote for the admission into this body of any man who voted to take any State out of the Union, or who has been engaged in this rebellion. I want it understood that so far as depends on me no traitor shall ever more fill any place of honor or profit under the Government of the United States. If we spare the lives that traitors have forfeited to their country, if we allow them to linger out the remainder of their forfeited lives under a Government that they have tried to destroy, it is all they have a right to ask of the Government of the people of the United States. Sir, make the circuit of the hospitals in this city; look at the twenty-five thousand maimed and bleeding and dying heroes who have fought to save this land against this treason; and then, if you can pardon and admit these traitors into the councils of the menaced nation; do so. God in His infinite mercy may pardon those red-handed traitors, but I never can. I cannot look into the pale faces of our dying heroes and clasp the hands of their murderers.

This Mr. Fishback who comes here and asks admission into the Senate has been proved by the record read by the Senator from Illinois to have early engaged in the work of treason. I will never, never vote for his admission into this Chamber, and I think it is an insult to the Senate of the United States to ask his admission into this Chamber. The other day we had here from the State of Alabama Jere Clemens, a man elected as a Union man to the convention of that State, but after he got to the convention Yancey met him and used him. Yancey knew who he was and what he was, and how to rule him. He made a bargain with him, and Clemens betrayed the people that elected him. He betrayed them on the condition that he should be made adjutant general of the State, an office the profits of which were thousands a year. He was appointed to the office, and for twelve months he put the traitors from Alabama into the confederate service—men who have shot down our brothers and our friends and our neighbors. He remained in that office until his associates got sick of him and threatened to abolish the office in order to get rid of him, and then he resigned. He has recently come here, strutted around the city, came into this Chamber, and talked about being a Union man. Sir, I think it is time to have it understood that this class of men are not hereafter to shape the policy of this country or of any State of the Union, or to receive the confidence of the administrators of the Government.

I am willing to refer this subject to the Committee on the Judiciary. I respect the truly loyal men in the State of Arkansas, and I treat with respect their application for organizing civil governments; sir, I do not mean their application to come into the Union, for it seems to me that Arkansas is not out of the Union. We hold that State now with their iron hand of war, and I choose to so hold her until they are ready and ripe for civil government. I would hold all the other rebel States by military power and whip them into obedience as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foot] suggests. That seems to me to be the correct position; but I will examine their application or their effort to organize civil government and see what they have got to say; and as we have no general law under which to act, I will take each case by itself and act on it according to our best judgments. I wish it understood, however, that I will not, while I hold a seat here, vote to admit anybody who voted to carry any State out of the Union or any one who has fought the battles of the rebellion to seats on this floor, nor will I vote to allow such men to hold office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States. No, sir, never.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It seems to me that the Senator from Massachusetts might have refrained from insulting a gentleman in his presence, at least when he is here not permitted to say a word in his own defense. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts that Mr. Fishback has as clean a record as a loyal man as he has, with the single exception of having cast a vote for the ordinance of secession in order to save his life. Mr. Fishback comes here with the indorsement of friends as true to the Union as the Senator from Massachusetts, and I have said here to-day that there is not now, and there never has been, a loyal man in the State of Arkansas that doubted the loyalty of Mr. Fishback. I am responsible somewhat for introducing him upon the floor of the Senate. I have said that he came recommended by true men, men as true as the Senator from Massachusetts dare claim to be. After consultation with older Senators, I told him that it was the practice of the Senate to permit those who came here with regular credentials to take their seats within the bar; and so he is here. I put it to the Senator from Massachusetts, when this case is sought by these very applicants to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for investigation, if it is chivalric for him to rise in his place in the Senate and assail a helpless man in his teeth. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts that so far as I am concerned, I should feel that I was perpetrating an act of which I would be ashamed, in the Senate of the United States, and before the world, to brand a man who has it not in his power to defend himself, who seeks an investigation, and who, if he cannot show a clean, pure record of loyalty, from his birth to this moment, does not ask a seat on this floor. He perhaps was the only man in the State of Arkansas who could not have voted against the ordinance of secession. He had before the rebellion written a letter in extenuation of the raid of John Brown upon Virginia, and he was known throughout the western States as a radical abolitionist. That is a misfortune in the eye of the Senator from Delaware, I doubt not, but in the eye of loyal men it is an honor to be branded as an abolitionist.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In response to that, I will simply say to the Senator from Kansas that if by the assertion that in the eyes of loyal men it is an honor to be an abolitionist he means to cast any imputation upon me, I do not intend to enter into any discussion of my loyalty with that Senator.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The gentleman who has been assailed here was elected to the convention of Arkansas as a Union man. He opposed the ordinance of secession and defeated it at the first session of the convention. Before he finally cast a vote for that ordinance of secession, he went upon a steamboat lying in the Arkansas river at Little Rock and tried to escape, but the officers told him that if they received him their boat would be destroyed. He voted for that ordinance of secession after full consultation with the loyal men of the State, and with the distinct understanding that he voted for it merely to save his life.

Mr. President, I take this opportunity of answering a suggestion made by the Senator from Michigan a few days ago, that this State ought not to be received into the Union unless it was evidenced that they were able to maintain themselves after the army of the Union was withdrawn.

Mr. HOWARD. I think my honorable friend from Kansas need spend none of his time on such a proposition as that, for I think I did not advance any such idea.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The suggestion was that without the military aid of the Government they could not sustain themselves.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator is mistaken. Such an idea never occurred to my mind.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I certainly understood the Senator from Michigan, and he will find it in his printed speech, to express the idea that that was to be the test. Does the Senator disavow it?

Mr. HOWARD. What is the question?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Does the Senator disavow that he took the ground that Arkansas ought not to be recognized because they could not sustain their State government in the absence of the military power of the General Government?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know what the report of my speech may be; I have not seen it since I made it here; but I have no recollection of ever advancing such an opinion as that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to understand from the Senator if he entertains that opinion now.

Mr. HOWARD. It is unnecessary to catechize me on that subject. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I will answer the question when it properly arises.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I so understood the drift of the argument of the Senator, and I was going to answer that proposition by saying that I take it that would affect every State in the Union. The State of Michigan could not long maintain her State government after the armies of the Union were dissolved or withdrawn. The armies of the United States are as necessary to maintain a State organization in Massachusetts, in Pennsylvania, or in Kentucky, as in Arkansas.

I have desired the admission of Arkansas because I believed that it was our true policy to organize State governments in the rear of our advancing armies. In the confederate States there are governments hostile to our Government. There is no true way, in my opinion, to meet those organizations successfully except by State government. It was by a State government organization in Kansas that Kansas was saved to the Union. I think experience will prove that the true policy is to organize our State governments, free State governments, in the rear of our armies as they move forward. It has been for that reason that I have been anxious for the admission of Arkansas.

I desire to say further, Mr. President, that I should be as far as the Senator from Massachusetts from voting for the reception of any man upon this floor who had entertained an opinion, or who had perpetrated an act hostile to the Government. It is not true that Mr. Fishback ever engaged in the armed service of the rebellion. On the contrary, as soon as he could escape from the State of Arkansas he did escape, and he has been engaged during this entire rebellion in organizing troops for the Government. He has organized one entire regiment and almost another one, almost two thousand men. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts, with a knowledge of what I say obtained from others, that there is no man in the State of Arkansas who has the confidence of the loyal people of Arkansas to a greater extent than Mr. Fishback has.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Kansas, who assumes to be the champion of the claimant from Arkansas, speaks with a great deal of earnestness, not to say of passion. Sir, I assure the Senator there is no occasion for any excitement or passion in this case. The Senator complains because I have chosen to speak of the claims and position of Mr. Fishback in his presence. How could I speak otherwise when he was present? The question is before the Senate; everything pertaining to the claim, position, and conduct of that gentleman is before us for consideration. Yes, sir, every act of his is before us; and if I speak at all on the subject I must speak in his presence, for the Senator from Kansas has introduced him to this Chamber. Is he introduced here by the Senator for the purpose of imposing silence upon us? When we are considering this question must we be silent in regard to his conduct in voting to carry his State out of this Union? Must we fail to characterize his work of treason as it should be because he is present? I object not to that gentleman coming into this Chamber any more than I object to his coming to the city of Washington; but when he is here, if he chooses to remain and listen to the discussions in the case of Arkansas, he must listen, yes, sir, he must listen to what Senators choose to utter in regard to his acts and his conduct. While this question is before us if I choose to say anything upon the subject, I shall speak of it precisely in his presence as I would if he were absent. That is all I have to say in regard to the remarks of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, during the five years that I have been a member of this body I have heard a great many extraordinary debates, but it occurs to me that this is the most extraordinary one that I have ever listened to. Some gentlemen appear before us and present to us credentials from a man calling himself or representing himself to be Governor of the State of Arkansas. That gentleman is recognized by the chief Executive Magistrate of the United States as the Governor of Arkansas. The credentials are presented to us and read, and the proposition is made to refer them for investigation to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The highest prerogative of this body, I undertake to say, is that which relates to the qualifications and admission of its members, and their expulsion. We act in regard to that question purely or almost purely in a judicial character. There are friends here with whom I am always pleased to act, for whose opinions I entertain the highest consideration, who propose that these credentials shall not be thus referred, that we shall not investigate the facts in regard to them, some for the reason that they say this man did not receive the requisite number of votes. How do we know? Shall we not give him a fair opportunity to appear before the organ of the Senate which we have constituted for this particular purpose, and explain to the Senate how that is? Would it be just for us to drive him from the doors of the Senate without giving him an opportunity to have the question investigated?

Others say that he voted for an ordinance of secession in Arkansas: As evidence of it they produce to us a printed document, a book. How do we know that that is not a forgery? Who knows whether that was published by the authority of the so-called confederate State of Arkansas, or, if it was published by that authority, that it does not contain an interpolation? Will you drive this gentleman away from the doors of the Senate Chamber without giving him an opportunity to explain that vote? I am not prepared to say that I would not vote with, and I incline to think that I would, nay, I certainly would, vote with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] against the admission of any man who had participated in this rebellion unless he could satisfy me, as the Senator from Kansas has said that this committee and the Senate can be satisfied in regard to this man, that he cast that vote under coercion of such a character as to make it absolutely necessary for him to do it in order to save his life. But give the man an opportunity to be heard. It is due to the State of Arkansas, it is due to the dignity of this body, it is due to the country, that we should not thrust him away in this manner without letting his credentials be sent to the organ of this body which we have constituted to investigate questions of this kind.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa seems to regard this as a very extraordinary discussion; the most so, it would seem, that he has ever listened to. I see nothing extraordinary in the discussion. What are the facts which have given rise to the discussion? They are few in number and easily understood. The first is that on the 6th of May, 1861, the people known as the State of Arkansas, then one of the United States, assembled in convention and passed what is called an ordinance of secession by a vote of 69 against 1; and in that ordinance, among other things, they declare:

"We do hereby further declare and ordain that the State of Arkansas hereby assumes to herself all rights and powers heretofore delegated to the Government of the United States of America, that her citizens are absolved from all allegiance to said Government of the United States, and that she is in full possession and exercise of all the rights and sovereignty which appertain to a free and independent State."

This was an open, undisguised declaration of national independence on the part of the State of Arkansas, as plainly such was the declaration of the 4th of July, 1776. It was an assumption by her, contrary to all right and all law, of the rights and powers of a sovereign nation and a sovereign people, and an entire rejection and repudiation of all allegiance to the Government of the United States, of all dependence upon that Government, and of all friendly connection with that Government. That is one fact.

A second fact is that on the 16th of the same month of May, 1861, this community, claiming thus to be an independent nation in and of itself, sent to the rebel confederacy six representatives, which representatives were received as members of the rebel congress, and are now, as I suppose, for I know nothing to the contrary, acting in the rebel congress in hostility to the Government of the United States.

A third fact is that the delegation of that State in the Congress of the United States either withdrew, and thus vacated their seats voluntarily on the secession of their State, or were afterwards, and shortly afterwards, expelled from their seats in this body or in the other House. I do not know what the particular fact was in regard to the expulsion of members from Arkansas in the other House; but the seats of all the Representatives and Senators from that State became vacant in consequence of this act of rebellion and insurrection committed by the people of the State of Arkansas acting in their convention, and that State shortly afterwards joined the rebel confederacy, and is now, so far as she has any representatives anywhere abroad, a member of the rebel confederacy, and as a political community is engaged in open war with the United States of America.

Is there any doubt about these facts? None whatever. The honorable Senator from Iowa will not deny one of them.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know whether they are true or not, and this Senate does not know officially that they are true or not. That is the question we propose to investigate through the Judiciary Committee. As my friend from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] suggests, I do not know, and I presume the Senator from Michigan cannot tell me, whether or not that convention that assembled in Arkansas was legally called under the Constitution, and by authority of the old constitution of the State of Arkansas.

Mr. HOWARD. That question is entirely immaterial. Of course it was not called in accordance with the old constitution of the State of Arkansas.

Mr. GRIMES. It may be immaterial in the Senator's opinion, not in mine.

Mr. HOWARD. It is not in the slightest degree material to anybody. Is it material for the Senate of the United States to institute an inquiry into this proposition, whether an ordinance of secession is a legal ordinance under the constitution of the seceding State?

Mr. GRIMES. That is not the question.

Mr. HOWARD. That was the question put to me by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRIMES. Not at all; but whether the convention that assembled in Arkansas assembled in pursuance of the provisions of their original or old constitution, the State constitution, or not. The trouble with the Senator is that he begs all the questions which I propose to have investigated by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the honorable Senator from Iowa expect a committee of this Senate to inquire into the legality of that seceding convention? And that is the question which he puts to me now. He seems to intimate that it might have been legal. I take it for granted in limine, without discussion or inquiry, that such an assemblage got together for such a purpose was a treasonable and therefore an illegal and unconstitutional assemblage.

Mr. GRIMES. How does the Senate know for what purpose that convention originally assembled? It may have been called in pursuance of the old constitution of Arkansas, and may have been assembled for a legitimate and constitutional purpose, but after it assembled it may have been perverted in its purposes.

Mr. HOWARD. I judge of the character of the assembly from the acts which it performed. I judge the tree by its fruit. If its purpose was not treasonable, it certainly in its fruits greatly departed from the purpose for which it was originally called. It is sufficient for my purpose to know what it actually did, to determine the purpose for which it was called together. I do not wish to spend any time on a question of that kind.

The next fact in the case is the proclamation of the President of the United States declaring to the nation and to the world that this community, once a State of the United States, was in a state of insurrection against the lawful authority of the United States; and subsequent proclamations of the President duly issued prohibited all trade and intercourse between the people of Arkansas and other portions of the people of the United States, treating it to all intents and purposes as a belligerent community with which the people of the United States were engaged in a defensive war, and that is all you can make of it. That condition of things, so far as we know, still endures. There is the President's proclamation declaring it to be in a state of hostility. Is that revoked? No, sir; it is the same that it ever was, and, so far as we have or can have any information, the state of war between that community and the Government of the United States is still existent.

Now, sir, it is proposed to refer solemnly for a report from the Judiciary Committee of this body the question whether a community, a population engaged in hostilities against the United States, a population who have been decided to be enemies of the United States, and so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, are entitled at such a time as this and under these circumstances to be represented in this body or to be recognized as a State. Sir, I will spend no time upon a question so absurd, so suicidal to the interests of the United States. Whenever the President of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, who has due authority under acts of Congress, shall see fit for causes sufficient to influence him to declare that this state of hostility no longer exists on the part of the people of Arkansas, it will be time for me to take the question again into consideration; and if I find that that State has ceased to be belligerent and hostile as a community—that it has returned as a body-politic and corporate to its allegiance to the Government of the United States—I shall be among the first to hail its return to loyalty, to peace, and to harmony in the Union; but I shall be very careful to take the best possible security the circumstances of the case will afford, and see to it that the cause of this hostility shall have been extinguished. Before I agree to receive that hostile community back into the Union I shall take every precaution that pertains to common prudence that my constituents and my State shall not again be under the necessity of marching through this sea of blood and fire for the purpose of vindicating the honor of the nation, for the purpose of vindicating the nationality of the United States and of putting down this heresy of the right of secession. I shall take as good security as the nature of the case will admit. I will not discuss a question that involves even indirectly the right of a seceded State to claim a seat here or in the other House of Congress.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President—

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to make just one remark? The very first paper that will be laid before the Committee on the Judiciary will be a proclamation of the commanding general of Arkansas declaring that the rebellion is so far crushed out in that State that the people can proceed to organize a State government—the proclamation of General Steele.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me ask my friend from Kansas whether that is sufficient evidence for him to act upon in so grave a matter as this? Would he take the certificate of the general in the field of the fact that the rebellion had been subdued in a State?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I understood the Senator from Michigan to state in his place that when such evidence as that was produced, when the military authorities communicated to the Senate that the rebellion was crushed out, he could begin to entertain the proposition. I say that the commander of the department, General Steele, has already made such a proclamation in regard to Arkansas.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator entirely misunderstood the observation which he supposed I made. I certainly never advanced any such idea as that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator from Michigan certainly said that when the President of the United States communicated such information it would be time for him to act. I say the President of the United States, through his subordinate commander, General Steele, has already proclaimed that to the world, and proclaimed it to the people of Arkansas, and under that proclamation these proceedings were instituted.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maryland, that we had better make haste slowly. I am afraid we shall fall into some confusion if we do not. I have a document in my hand entitled "The Constitution of the United States," and here is a clause which reads:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote."

If that is a genuine document [laughter] and that is a binding law, it opens up the inquiry whether the State of Arkansas is a State of the Union. I have another document which is entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes." A clause in that act reads as follows:

"That the State of Arkansas shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and the said State shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit."

I will not read the boundaries. I suppose the body which enacted that law had authority to enact it, and I suppose it to be a law to-day which binds this Senate and binds the President and binds each of the agencies and all the authorities of the United States except the law-making power, unless it has been repealed or abrogated. If it has been repealed, I ask when, and by whom? There are those who say it was repealed by the people of Arkansas. I think they are mistaken. I think the people of Arkansas cannot repeal one of the acts of Congress, and I suspect it will not be seriously contended by anybody on this floor. There are others who suggest, if they do not say, that it has been repealed by the President of the United States. I think they are mistaken also. I do not believe the President of the United States can repeal one of these laws. I do not believe that he has the authority to do it, and what is more, I do not believe he has attempted to do it.

It is said he issued a proclamation which operates as a repeal of this statute. I have looked at the proclamation. I do not think it was intended to have any such effect, and if so designed the terms employed were utterly inadequate to effect any such purpose. He declared, to be sure, that "the inhabitants of the said States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida (except the inhabitants of that part of the State of Virginia lying west of the Alleghany mountains, and all such other parts of that State and the other States hereinbefore named as may maintain a loyal adhesion to the Union and the Constitution, or may be from time to time occupied and controlled by forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of said insurgents), are in a state of insurrection."

That portion of this proclamation which I have read does not declare that the people of Arkansas even are in a state of insurrection positively, but only so far as they are not controlled by the military forces of the United States. So far as they are not controlled by those forces he does proclaim that the people are in a state of insurrection against the United States; but what then? What if they are in a state of insurrection, the whole of them, what is the consequence as declared by the President? Simply not that they are out of the Union, not that they are no longer in the Union, not that they are no longer entitled to a representation in this House or the other, not that they are deprived of the functions of a State; the President does not declare either of these things, but simply that "all commercial intercourse between the same and the inhabitants thereof, with the exceptions aforesaid, and the citizens of other States and other parts of the United States is unlawful, and will remain unlawful." When? "Until such insurrection shall cease, or has been suppressed." What then? Why, that "all goods and chattels, wares and merchandise, coming from any of said States, with the exceptions aforesaid, into other parts of the United States without the special license and permission of the President, through the Secretary of the Treasury, or proceeding to any of said States, with the exception aforesaid, by land or water, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, or conveying persons to and from said States, with said exceptions, will be forfeited to the United States."

Give to this paper whatever authority you please, if by it the people of Arkansas are deprived of the power of establishing a State government, of electing a Legislature, which Legislature can elect Senators to this body, if by this paper these prerogatives are taken away from the people of Arkansas, they are taken away from the people of New York unquestionably, because the obligations and the duties charged upon the people of Arkansas and the people of New York are precisely alike. The citizens of Arkansas cannot send commerce to New York; and New York cannot send commerce to Arkansas. They are placed upon precisely the same footing, and if by the terms of this proclamation Arkansas is thrown without the pale of the Union, New York is also without the pale of the Union.

I shall say no more to establish the point that up to this time the act which I read from the statutes of the United States, and which was enacted on the 23d of June, 1836, is not repealed or abrogated.

I have said to the Senate once or twice that in my judgment we ought to act on this question in reference to each of these States. Some of these acts, in my judgment, ought to be repealed. Some of these States in my judgment ought to be declared by the law-making power of the United States to be no longer privileged to elect representatives to this body. Up to this time we have done no such thing. This law still exists in full force. I think it is binding upon the Senate, and if so, the people of Arkansas have a right to be represented in this body. I am told they have sent up here two representatives. I understand this body to be clothed with the power to judge of the qualifications and of the returns of its members. It is proposed to refer this question, which I understand is not an unusual procedure, to one of the established standing committees of this body. It is objected to. For myself I cannot see any good reason for refusing that reference. I shall say not one single word now whether this particular individual ought or ought not to be admitted to a seat here. I do say that the Senate is not clothed anywhere with the authority to say that that State cannot be represented here; and if she has the right to be represented here and sends representatives, we ought to take some measure to determine whether the individuals presented are entitled to that representation or not.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, the question now before us involves the merits of the whole subject of the admission of members from the seceded States, and on this preliminary motion it will be argued as thoroughly as it will be when that general subject comes up for final determination. There is a bill from the House of Representatives which was referred to the committee of which I am chairman, that undertakes to settle the relations between the General Government and the seceded States; and if we pass it it will undoubtedly cover all the ground on which this debate is proceeding; and it seems to me, as that will settle the general principle, in order to save time in debate, we ought to take that bill up at a very early period, and perhaps we had better do it before we proceed any further with this question. I have said that so far as the relations of the seceded States and the General Government are concerned, that bill, if it be passed, will settle them. As to any personal considerations in regard to this applicant, of course it would not have the effect to settle that. But if the relation of the State is such that we cannot receive Representatives or Senators from it at this stage of proceedings, that bill would settle it.

Now, for the purpose of getting rid of this debate, which I suppose will continue—if it did not I would give way to have the question taken—I suggest that it might be well to lay this subject on the table for the present, and in the mean time I will bring forward the bill and urge it on the consideration of the Senate as soon as I can get an opportunity to do so. I have only waited this long because most important appropriation bills and the tax bill seemed to crowd out every other consideration; but at the very earliest period I pledge the Senate I will move to take up that bill and have it considered, and if it is passed here as it was in the other House, it would settle the whole question.

Several SENATORS. What is the bill?

Mr. WADE. The title is "A bill to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government."

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator not to move to lay this question on the table; but let it go to the committee and let the Judiciary Committee act upon it; and in the mean time I shall join the Senator in the importance of the measure to which he has referred, and I will join in aiding to take it up.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to make a suggestion to my friend from Ohio. He is aware, every Senator is aware, that when a measure has been reported to the Senate all petitions and other things coming in that concern that matter or any other kindred or cognate questions are naturally and logically allowed to lie on the table until the main question has been considered and disposed of. It is within our experience every day that we present petitions, and if any measure involving those petitions is already on the Calendar, we ask that the petitions may lie on the table. It seems to me, therefore, that the Senator from Ohio is entirely right when he proposes that the papers of this claimant and the other kindred matters lie on the table now.

Mr. GRIMES. Has the Senator from Ohio made that motion?

Mr. WADE. I was about to make that motion, or rather I wanted to see how it would suit all around. I wanted to get rid of as much debate as possible.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us refer the credentials.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that my friend from Ohio is entirely right in proposing that this matter should lie on the table until the main question has been settled. The main question will dispose of this.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. There are six gentlemen here claiming seats in the two Houses from Arkansas. They are very desirous to have this question decided. The Senator from Ohio is aware—if he is not I am—that the bill to which he refers never will pass Congress, and I desire to state the reason why. The House of Representatives, in the bill, confine the right of voting in the rebel States to the white voters. Our committee have struck out the word "white," and I suppose the Senate will adhere to that amendment. We know enough about the House of Representatives to know that they will never concur in the amendment, and thus, it seems to me, that bill is inevitably lost; it cannot be passed. So far as I am concerned, I would see a thousand such bills defeated before I would consent to confine the voting in the rebel States to men who ought not to have the right of suffrage, the whites. So far as the whites in the rebellious States are concerned, I am clear that they ought not to have the right of suffrage, and that the negroes ought to have it, because they are pretty much the only loyal men there.

Mr. WADE. It is a very strange suggestion coming from the Senator from Kansas, a member of the Committee on Territories, that recommended this bill for passage by the Senate, to get up now and say that we ought to abandon it, because he is very certain—and he speaks for the whole Senate—that it never can pass here.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I did not say it would not pass here, but it can never pass the lower House.

Mr. WADE. It has passed the lower House and come to us.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Yes; but they put in the word "white," and we have struck it out, and I suppose from the votes heretofore given the Senate will adhere to that position, and then the bill, so amended, can never pass the House of Representatives. We have already seen evidence enough of that.

Mr. WADE. That is a pretty bold assumption when we see the vacillating character of votes in the Senate. We have seen lately a bill precisely in the same predicament which did finally pass both Houses and is now a law.

Mr. McDougall. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that upon the question before the Senate I believe every Senator is prepared to vote, and I think we may as well vote upon it without further debate. We are taking up too much time.

Mr. WADE. If I was certain that the debate would cease here and the vote be taken on the motion to refer this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, I would have no objection.

Several SENATORS. Try it.

Mr. WADE. It was to stop debate that I propose to lay the subject on the table. I think I will try the vote on that motion. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to lay the joint resolution and the credentials on the table.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Howard, Richardson, Sumner, and Wade—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sausbury, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlisle, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Nesmith, Riddle, Ten Eyck, and Wright—12.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. The question now returns on the reference, and there the question naturally is to what committee this matter should go. The motion, I know, is to refer it to the Judiciary Committee; but should it logically go to that committee according to the usages of the Senate? My friend from Ohio has already referred to a bill of the House of Representatives which is on our tables, House bill No. 244, to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government. That bill, the Senate will remember, was referred to the Committee on Territories. It is understood that it has been carefully considered by that committee. At any rate, it is now on our tables reported back from that committee. That committee has, therefore, had this whole subject under consideration. Should it not be allowed to proceed with its consideration in this other aspect of it? Here is a joint resolution moved by the Senator from Kansas who now rises, which in effect is covered by this bill already on our tables.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to ask the Senator a question. I ask if, in his long experience, he has ever known the credentials of members claiming seats here to go to any other committee than the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Kansas is aware that he himself has moved the reference of the credentials, and the reference also of a joint resolution. That joint resolution raises the question involved in this very bill, which has already been considered by a committee of this body. Why take the subject away from that committee? I began by saying that logically it belonged to that committee unless you wish to assign the same subject to two different committees, so that you may have the advantage of a report one way from one committee and another from another committee. I do not think that can be desirable. It seems to me, in order to give unity to our deliberations and unity to our conclusions, we ought to refer these present papers, with the joint resolution of the Senator from Kansas, to the committee that already has had the whole subject under consideration. I think, therefore, it would be better to substitute the Committee on Territories; but my friend from Ohio, who is chairman of that committee, says, "Let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary." If he is agreed I shall not struggle longer.

Mr. WADE. I am agreed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the joint resolution and the credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. There is on the table a resolution moved by myself on this subject which ought to take the same reference.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. Sumner on the 27th of May, was taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That a State pretending to secede from the Union and battling against the national Government to maintain this pretension must be regarded as a rebel State, subject to military occupation, and without title to representation on this floor until it has been readmitted by a vote of both Houses of Congress; and the Senate will decline to entertain any application from any such rebel State until after such vote of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to present to the Senate a proclamation from the commanding general of the department in which Kansas is situated for the purpose of reference to the same committee, and I ask that it be printed.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the date of the proclamation?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In March last.

The proclamation was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PERFORMANCE OF MILITARY DUTY.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to call up the bill introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN] to repeal the commutation clause of the enrollment act, for the purpose of acting upon it to-morrow, and I desire to submit some amendments that I intend to offer to it, for the purpose of having them printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have been struggling for some time to get the floor with the view of making a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to have the paper which I presented as an intended amendment to Senate bill No. 286 printed, and I shall desire to call up the bill in the morning.

The amendment was received, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the amendment is now presented, as it seems to be voluminous, I move that the bill be recommitted with the amendment to the proper committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that that motion cannot be entertained at the present time, because the bill is not before the Senate. It was only by unanimous consent that the amendment was received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the amendment is received my motion is applicable to the amendment; and I desire to say just a word. A committee of this body presents a measure before us. We have a right to suppose that that is the measure the committee is going to stand by; but I have seen committees of the body frequently change the whole proposition. I think it is an objectionable practice, and when the whole thing is gone over again by an amendment, as in this case, I think the matter should go back to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair only understands the Senator from Massachusetts to offer an amendment which he intends to propose to the bill for the purpose of having it printed.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 40) entitled "An act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and for other purposes," having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments: strike out the words "twenty-five" and insert the word "thirteen;" strike out the word "pupils" and insert the word "clerks."

That the House agree to the twenty-eighth amendment of the Senate.

That the Senate recede from all the twenty-ninth amendment after the enacting clause, and that the following be inserted in lieu thereof:

That the President be, and is hereby, authorized, whenever he shall think the public good will be promoted thereby, to appoint consular clerks, not exceeding thirteen in number at any one time, who shall be citizens of the United States, and over eighteen years of age at the time of their appointment, and shall be entitled to compensation for their services respectively at a rate not exceeding $1,000 per annum, to be determined by the President, and to assign such clerks from time to time to such consulates and with such duties as he shall direct; and before the appointment of any such clerk shall be made, it shall be satisfactorily shown to the Secretary of State, after due examination and report by an examining board, that the applicant is qualified and fit for the duties to which he shall be assigned, and such report shall be laid before the President. And no clerk so appointed shall be removed from office except for cause stated in writing, which shall be submitted to Congress at the session first following such removal.

That the Senate recede from its thirtieth amendment.

That the House recede from its amendment to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

IRA HARRIS,

P. G. VAN WINKLE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES F. WILSON,

GODLOVE S. ORTH,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state that the only difference between this report and that submitted by the previous committee of conference is that we have given up on the part of the Senate our thirtieth amendment to this consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. That is the amendment which proposed to raise the grade of the minister to Belgium. The House of Representatives had rejected the report of the previous committee of conference, and on conferring with the committee last appointed on the part of that House they told us that there was no probability of their being able to pass the bill if the Senate insisted upon that amendment. They have given up all the other amendments which were agreed to by the former committee of conference, so that the Senate has already agreed to this report precisely as it now is, with the exception I have stated.

Mr. SUMNER. The chairman of the committee is aware that the proposition was presented in an entirely different form by the last committee of conference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know it was.

Mr. SUMNER. It was general, not applicable to Belgium exclusively.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Our amendment was applicable to one country alone. The former committee of conference altered that amendment and made it general, and authorized the raising of the grade without raising the pay of the minister, making it general and applying to all countries excepting those that were specified in the previous act; but the House of Representatives refused to concur in the proposition in that shape, and now we have given up our amendment which provided for raising the grade of the minister to Belgium.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I understand from the chairman that it was not thought practicable to obtain from the other House a recognition of the proposition in the latter form.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We were told distinctly that there was no probability of the other House agreeing to it in either form. In fact they thought it would pass better as a general proposition than in the particular case.

Mr. SUMNER. Doubtless; and I supposed that when it was put in the general form it would be unobjectionable. It would simply authorize the President in the exercise of his discretion to change the grade, which would be a public service in some places, and I think it very important to have it done.

The report was concurred in.

MARINE HOSPITAL IN CHICAGO.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire, as I suppose the Senate is about adjourning or going into executive session, to call up the joint resolution which has heretofore been under debate with respect to duties on imports, in order that it may come up to-morrow at one o'clock, and I give notice at the same time that I shall desire to follow it by the fortification bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator does not wish to act on that joint resolution now, I hope he will allow me to call up a local bill with a view of passing it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood that it was proposed to go into an executive session immediately.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to make that motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to call up the bill in regard to the marine hospital at Chicago. It will not consume time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not wish to interfere with anything that may be done to-night, but I want to take up, to-morrow, the joint resolution to which I have referred, because it is absolutely necessary that we should act upon it. I withdraw my motion to accommodate the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the disposition of the marine hospital at Chicago.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 504) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the marine hospital and grounds at Chicago, Illinois, and to purchase a new site and build a new hospital, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do I understand that the present hospital is first to be sold?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; but possession is to be retained until the new one is completed.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the title will be in the purchaser.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The title will be subject to that condition.

Mr. JOHNSON. But suppose, in the opinion of the Secretary, it is impossible to get as good a one for the same money, what then?

Mr. TRUMBULL. He will make his contract in advance, I suppose. He necessarily must do so. I think the bill is very carefully guarded in that respect. He purchases the ground and makes a contract for the building, and the grounds and building, when complete, are not to cost more than the sum which he receives for the old hospital and grounds. The difficulty about it is that the old hospital is situated at the mouth of the Chicago river, in an undesirable location. I do not know whether the Senator is familiar with it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am familiar by information, and in no other way. I have no doubt the present hospital ought to be sold, but I suggest that this bill compels the Secretary to sell.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, it is in his discretion. It does not compel him; it leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary, but I have no doubt he would sell.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. Does this bill come from any committee of the Senate?

Mr. ANTHONY. It was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I reported it back. It is carefully guarded.

Mr. GRIMES. The Committee on Naval Affairs has nothing to do with marine hospitals. It ought to have been referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ANTHONY. As it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs by the Senate, that committee thought proper to take jurisdiction of it.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

MARQUETTE AND ONTONAGON RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 64) explanatory of the act entitled "An act extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad of the State of Michigan."

Mr. HOWE. The act of which this resolution is explanatory is now before the President awaiting his signature. There is some little ambiguity about it. I have shown this joint resolution to the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD], who is particularly interested in the act that has been passed, and to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. HARLAN], which committee reported that act, and they are satisfied with the resolution, and I should therefore like to have it passed and go to the House of Representatives at once.

Mr. HOWARD. I have not the slightest objection to the passage of this resolution, though I regard it as entirely useless. If the Senator from Wisconsin desires to have it passed as explanatory of the act, I shall not object.

The resolution was read. It provides that the act extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad of the State of Michigan shall be so construed as to extend the time for completing only so much of that road as lies between Marquette and Ontonagon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not recollect the subject very well now, but I believe I had some charge of the original bill. I think I reported it from the Committee on Public Lands, or, at least, I was in the committee when it was discussed.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. CARLILE] reported it from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I knew that I had it in charge to some extent at some time, and I thought I reported it. It was certainly investigated by the committee when I was present; and I should like the Senator from Wisconsin to say why he proposes this modification.

Mr. HOWE. It is a question whether this does modify the act; the Senator from Michigan thinks it does not. It is explanatory. The act as passed extends the time for completing the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad, and it is a little difficult perhaps to determine what the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad is. There was a grant of lands made to construct a railroad from Bay de Nequette to Marquette and thence to Ontonagon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Was there a Senate bill on the subject?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; but the Senate bill—
Mr. HENDRICKS. That is how I was misled about it. It was the Senate bill that I reported.

Mr. HOWARD. It is all right.

The joint resolution was read three times, and passed.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 81) amendatory of the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports, approved April 29, 1864.

Mr. SUMNER. On the question of taking up the joint resolution of the Senator from Maine, I wish merely to make a single remark. That resolution is of such a character that I cannot doubt the Senate ought to act on it at once. I do not know that there is any business which should take precedence of it. But when the Senator suggested that he proposed immediately after that to go on with the fortification bill, I felt disposed to remind him of what I think he will remember told from him on Friday or Saturday, that he would leave this week for other business. Now, it so happens that there are several questions that the Senate is midway in the discussion of, one that my colleague has in charge and another which I have in charge—the bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen—and I confess my great anxiety that nothing should be allowed to push that out of the way until it is finally decided.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot make two motions at the same time. The only motion I now make is to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution in relation to the duties on imports. When that shall be disposed of, the next motion I will make will bring up for consideration another matter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I rise to give notice that on Friday next at one o'clock I shall move to take up House bill No. 244, and shall give the Senate very little peace until they have acted upon it.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 13, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. CHINERY, of Kankakee, Illinois. The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

REPORT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from Professor Henry, transmitting the report of the Smithsonian Institution for 1863; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX moved that the usual extra number of copies be printed; three thousand for the use of the House, and two thousand for the use of the Smithsonian Institution; which motion was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

ARMY OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States, of 25th April, 1864, in reference to a military appointment of Hon. Francis P. Blair, jr., representing the first congressional district of Missouri in the present House; and also another message of the President of the United States, of 2d May, 1864, transmitting certain letters, notes, telegrams, orders, and other documents concerning the same general matter, has instructed me to make a report, and ask that it be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The resolutions reported by the committee are as follows:

Resolved, That ROBERT C. SCHENCK, having resigned the office of major general of volunteers which he then held on the 13th day of November, 1863, which resignation was accepted November 21, 1863, to take effect December 5, 1863, was not, by reason of having held such office, disqualified from holding a seat as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, whose first session commenced on the 7th day of December, 1863.

Resolved, That Francis P. Blair, jr., by continuing to hold the office of major general of volunteers to which he was appointed November 29, 1862, and to discharge the duties thereof till January 1, 1864, the date of his resignation, did thereby decline and disqualify himself to hold the office of Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, the first session of which commenced on the first Monday in December, 1863.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill of the Senate (No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, with the amendments of the House, disagreed to by the Senate, thereto.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will explain the character of the report to the House, showing the reason why we ask for a committee of conference instead of reporting amendments to the amendments. Senate bill No. 145, to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army—that is, to equalize the pay of colored soldiers and white soldiers—was passed by the Senate. In this House the Committee on Military Affairs reported as an amendment a provision raising the pay of all the soldiers in the Army. While this was pending, the original bill of the Senate was introduced by the Senate and concurred in by the House, as an amendment to an appropriation bill. This disposed of all there was of the original Senate bill, and the bill went back to the Senate with the amendment of the House striking out all of the original bill and inserting a provision increasing the pay of the soldiers.

The Senate have amended the amendment of the House in several particulars. The Committee on Military Affairs are satisfied with some of the Senate amendments, but desire to modify others. The amendments of the Senate, however, being amendments to an amendment, any further amendment would be in the third degree, and it would therefore not be in order for the Military Committee to report further amendments.

I am instructed, therefore, to ask the House to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the House amendment, and ask for a committee of conference for the purpose of enabling us to introduce amendments which cannot now be introduced because they would be amendments in the third degree.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker thereupon appointed Messrs. SCHENCK, KELLOGG of Michigan, and ROLLINS of Missouri, as such committee on the part of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to request a committee of conference on the bill; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a privileged question. I present the following report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 198) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their amendments to the seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, and the Senate agree to the same. Strike out all after the enacting clause (being section four) and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

That all persons of color who were free on the 19th day of April, 1861, and who have been enlisted and mustered into the military service of the United States, shall from the time of their enlistment be entitled to receive the same pay, bounty, and clothing allowed to such persons by the law existing at the time of their enlistment. And the Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized to determine any question of law arising under this provision. And if the Attorney General aforesaid shall determine that any of such enlisted persons are entitled to receive any pay, bounty, or clothing in addition to what they have already received, the Secretary of War shall make all necessary regulations to enable the pay department to make payment, in accordance with such provision.

That the Senate recede from their ninth amendment.

T. O. HOWE,

L. M. MORRILL,

C. R. BUCKALEW,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THADDEUS STEVENS,

THOMAS T. DAVIS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. It will be recollected that the main difference between the Senate and the House was in regard to the pay of colored soldiers. The Senate put it upon the ground of a special contract aside from the law. The House put it upon the ground that all were entitled to be paid alike without regard to special contract. The Attorney General had given an opinion in conformity with the opinion of the House. The Senate would not recede from their position unless it was determined formally that the position of the House was in accordance with the law. The House committee finally agreed to put it upon the legal question, and to make the Attorney General the judge of that question, compelling the War Department to pay according to that opinion, which, unless the Attorney General alters his written opinion, will be just what the House had decided before.

So much for the main point. The first amendment which the House had reported was one of form more than anything else. It limited the bounty to $100, where it was fixed by law. The House receded from that.

The third amendment of the Senate to which the House receded from their disagreement allowed fifteen dollars, according to some regulation of the War Department, to anybody who enlisted one of these colored soldiers, whether slave or free. This would involve the expenditure of a very large amount of money, as we thought unnecessarily, and the House refused to allow it. The Senate receded from that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand that the Attorney General has already decided that all these colored soldiers who have enlisted are entitled to the same pay as white soldiers?

Mr. STEVENS. He has already made a written opinion, which has been printed, to that effect.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then why not so declare by act of Congress as well as to arrive at the result in this roundabout way?

Mr. STEVENS. Because the House decided as the Attorney General did; and as we were to adhere to the decision of the House, and the Senate would not agree to it, we put it in the other shape so that the Senate might come to us.

Mr. MORRILL. As I understand the report made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania it amounts to this: by the former report of the conference committee made by me, we gave full pay to all of the colored soldiers who had received any assurance that they were to have full pay, and left the remainder to the adjudication of the proper legal authorities of the Government, and if they were entitled to it under the adjudication of those officers they were to receive it. As I understand the report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania it is the same thing only in different language. All colored soldiers who were free in 1861 are to receive full pay, and if, under the opinion of the Attorney General, the others are entitled under the law they also are to receive full pay. As the former report, with the help of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was almost unanimously rejected, and as he has now made the same report, I hope, with his help, that it will be adopted unanimously.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Vermont is mistaken. By the report made by the committee of which he was chairman he selected the cases where special contract had been made by the War Department, and they were to be paid absolutely. All the rest were left, not to the decision of the Attorney General, but to the law. Between the Attorney General and the Solicitor General there is a difference of opinion; and we have selected the one that agreed with us, and rejected the opinion of the other one, that the War Department would have acted on if we had not pointed out the Attorney General as the deciding officer.

It also turned out when we came to examine the matter that there is a great difference as to whom promises had been made by the War Department—the War Department denying absolutely that any promise had been made to the Massachusetts colored soldiers, and the Governor of Massachusetts asserting absolutely that a promise had been made. The report we have made obviates all question of veracity between them.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Am I right in supposing that colored persons not free in 1861, who have enlisted, are prohibited from receiving full pay?

Mr. STEVENS. We leave them to the law, without saying a word about it. There may be a difference between the two cases. The law may be construed differently in regard to the "contrabands."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is an amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 58, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Thomas T. Davis, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Meludoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, John H. Rice, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—71.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Bliss, Boutwell, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Elliot, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hollman, Hutchins, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Law, Le Blond, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Sutes, Srouse, Stuart, Sweat, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Brooks, Broomall, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Deming, Dumont, English, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hulburd, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Knapp, Lazear, Long, Mallory, McAllister, McBride, Middleton, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Perry, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Stebbins, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Yeaman—52.

So the report was adopted.

During the vote,

Mr. STROUSE stated that his colleague, Mr. RANDALL, had been called home by the serious indisposition of his brother.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The call of committees for reports having been concluded, the House proceeded, as the regular order of business during the remainder of the morning hour, to the call of States for resolutions.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. ASHLEY introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire into and report at an early day upon the expediency of amending the rules of the House, so that on and after the passage of a joint resolution for the adjournment of Congress, no motion for mere delay shall be in order after the previous question shall have been seconded on any bill or pending resolution before the House, except to lay on the table, to postpone to a day certain, to postpone indefinitely, to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and to adjourn; which motions it shall not be in order to repeat until after the pending bill or resolution shall have been voted upon.

Mr. COX. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill goes over, under the rule.

COMMUTATION OF MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. SCHENCK, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," and of the several acts amendatory thereof, and upon it called the previous question.

The bill was read. It repeals all acts that provide for a commutation of money to be paid by persons enrolled or drafted for military service in lieu of actually rendering such military service, and provides that hereafter no payment of money shall be accepted or received by the Government to release any enrolled or drafted man from obligation to perform military duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this bill regularly before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is. Whenever resolutions are in order bills on leave may be introduced under rule 115, which will be read.

The rule was read, as follows:

"Every bill shall be introduced on the report of a committee, or by motion for leave. In the latter case, at least one day's notice shall be given of the motion in the House, or by filing a memorandum thereof with the Clerk, and having it entered on the Journal; and the motion shall be made, and the bill introduced, if leave is given when resolutions are called for; such motion or the bill when introduced may be committed."

The SPEAKER. The State of Ohio was called for resolutions, and under that call the gentleman from Ohio introduced the bill.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Has notice been given?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio stated that he gave notice.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have given notice.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. If it has been given it will be upon the Journal, and I ask if it is on the Journal. I make the point of order, that as all notices of that kind can be proven by the Journal of the House, and by that alone, that the word of a member cannot be taken.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman need not trouble himself, for I appeal to the record myself.

The SPEAKER. On what day did the gentleman give the notice?

Mr. SCHENCK. One day last week.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I do not doubt the gentleman's word at all, but I insist that his word has nothing to do with the matter. The proof must be on the record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the record consulted; but the usual custom of the Chair has been, when any gentleman states a fact in his knowledge, to accept it as conclusive.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I do not doubt the gentleman's word in any manner, but the notice should be upon the record, and I ask the gentleman if he states that this notice went upon the record.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot answer to anything except that I handed in the notice in my own handwriting, and therefore I appeal to the record.

Mr. STEVENS. That the notice was given I have no doubt. Was the previous question called?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. STEVENS. I am sorry for that.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question was not called, it would go over if any gentleman rose to debate it. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Ohio and Wisconsin whether they desire that the Chair shall change his custom in reference to accepting the statement of members?

Mr. COX. This differs somewhat from the usual cases, and we are entitled to the record proof.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I do not object to the general practice of the Speaker, but inasmuch as the rules require that the notice shall be on the record, and inasmuch as there is an attempt here to change the fundamental law of enrollment without the slightest chance to debate it, I object in this instance.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to the gentleman's arguing this matter upon a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and business will be suspended until the record is consulted.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I will withdraw my call for the record.

Mr. HOLMAN. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to offer an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin, if he is willing to accept the statement of the Chair, what will confirm the statement of the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio came to the Chair and inquired if he gave notice of a bill he could introduce it upon a call of the States for resolutions. The Chair stated that he could do so. The gentleman from Ohio then replied that he would give notice of a bill, and the Chair supposes that he carried out his intention.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. The previous question could not be called by the gentleman from Ohio until the question of the right to introduce the bill had been settled. Before it was settled I proposed to debate the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdrew the demand for the record.

Mr. COX. That was after I proposed to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is too familiar with the rules not to know that after the previous question is demanded a gentleman cannot rise to debate a proposition.

Mr. HARDING. I rise to a question of order. We want the production of the record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the objection too late.

The House divided on seconding the previous question; and there were—yeas 45, nays 60.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN rising to debate the bill, it went over under the rule.

TREATY OF 1817.

Mr. SPALDING asked leave to introduce a joint resolution in relation to the treaty of 1817.

The SPEAKER. Has notice of the introduction of this joint resolution been given?

Mr. SPALDING. No notice has been given.

The SPEAKER. Then its introduction is not in order under this call.

Mr. SPALDING. Is it not in order to introduce it for reference?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes there will be no objection.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was introduced, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF REBEL STATES.

Mr. GARFIELD asked leave to introduce a joint resolution on the subject of electors for the Presidency of the United States.

The resolution was read. It resolves that no State declared to be in rebellion by proclamation of the President is entitled to appoint electors of President or Vice President, and that no electoral vote from any such State shall be received or counted until both Houses of Congress, by concurrent action, shall have recognized a State government in such State.

The SPEAKER. Has notice been given of this joint resolution?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has not been.

The SPEAKER. Then it is not in order under this call.

Mr. COX. There is no objection on this side of the House.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was introduced and read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD moved the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. GARFIELD moved the previous question on its passage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. McKINNEY. Is it in order to inquire whether Mr. Johnson could be a candidate for the Vice Presidency under that rule?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to make the inquiry.

Mr. BLAINE. Is it too late now to raise a point of order?

The SPEAKER. It is entirely too late. The joint resolution has received its third reading, and the main question has been ordered on its passage.

Mr. BLAINE. as the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has; but the House has ordered the main question to be now put.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to lay the joint resolution on the table; and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 33, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawes, Denison, Dixon, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Elliot, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hutchins, Ingalls, Jenckes, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Marcy, Marvin, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorehead, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Otis, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Sloan, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, Windom, and Fernando Wood—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blaw, Branderage, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Donnelly, Eckley, Garfield, Higby, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Lazear, Longyear, McClurg, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Norton, Shannon, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Williams, and Woodbridge—23.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ancona, Arnold, Boyd, Broomfield, William G. Brown, Clay, Dawson, Deeming, Dumont, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hullard, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Loan, Long, Mallory, McAllister, McBride, Middleton, Morrison, Nelson, Noble Patterson, Perry, Pomroy, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Stebbins, Tracy, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Yeaman—44.

So the joint resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. ORTH. I rise to a privileged question. For the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Ohio to modify his joint resolution, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. WILSON. If the motion to reconsider prevail, would it be in order to move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. It would not, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. WEBSTER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. ORTH. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw the previous question; and then the joint resolution can be referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio cannot withdraw it. The House has ordered the main question.

Mr. ORTH. Then I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

OBJECTS OF THE WAR.

The SPEAKER stated the business regularly in order to be the motion made two weeks ago by Mr. LAZEAR to suspend the rules to enable him to introduce the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas the fratricidal war which has for the last three years filled every neighborhood of our once united and happy country with mourning, and has drenched a hundred battle-fields with the blood of our fellow-citizens, and laid waste many of the fairest portions of the land, and yet has failed to restore the authority of the Federal Government in the seceded States; and whereas we believe a misapprehension exists in the minds of a large portion of the people of the South as to the feelings which actuate a large portion of the people of the free States, and which misapprehension we are called upon by every consideration of humanity and a sense of justice to correct and if possible remove, whether we regard in making this effort what we owe to ourselves, to our fellow-countrymen of the South, or to the world: Therefore,

Resolved, That no truly loyal citizen of the United States desires the application of any rule or law in determining the rights and privileges and the measure of responsibility of the people of any of the States but such as shall have been determined by the Supreme Court to be in accordance with and sanctioned by the Constitution and well established usages of the country.

Resolved, That the President, in his capacity of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, be, and he is hereby, required to adopt such measures as he may think best, with a view to a suspension of hostilities between the armies of the North and the South for a period not exceeding — days; and that he be also authorized to adopt or agree upon some plan by which the decision of the great body of the people North and South may be secured upon the question of calling a convention composed of delegates from all the States to which shall be referred the settlement of all questions now dividing the southern States from the rest of the Union, with a view to the restoration of the several States to the places they were intended to occupy in the Union, and the privileges intended to be granted to them by the framers of our national Constitution, who were in our opinion the most enlightened statesmen and purest patriots that ever lived, and than whom we cannot hope to find wiser or better counselors in the present exigency of our national affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. Hickey, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate have passed a bill and joint resolutions of the House, without amendment, of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 149) concerning certain school lands in township forty-five north, range seven east, in the State of Missouri; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 55) granting certain privileges to the city of Des Moines, in the State of Iowa.

Also, that the Senate have passed a bill (H. R. No. 240) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes of Indians for the year ending June 30, 1865, with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ADMITTANCE TO HOSPITALS.

Mr. BEAMAN. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has moved to suspend the rules to yield to me for a moment to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution for reference to which there will be no objection.

Mr. LAZEAR. I will yield to the gentleman.

There being no objection,

Mr. BEAMAN submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas since the recent battles in Virginia, which resulted in the wounding of many thousands of our soldiers, the most intense anxiety has prevailed among our people at home demanding early and exact information as to the condition of their relatives in hospitals; and whereas members of Congress are daily receiving from their constituents telegrams and letters of inquiry touching the true condition of such wounded soldiers, and also messages from the soldiers themselves, requesting their attention; and whereas in some of the hospitals in this city members of Congress are absolutely excluded from visiting their sick and wounded constituents, and utterly prohibited from seeing them, or any of them, at any time whatever: Therefore,

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire and report whether there is any good and substantial reason for such exclusion; and in case they do not find it incompatible with the safety and interest of such sick and wounded soldiers, that they then recommend the adoption of some regulation whereby members of Congress shall be permitted at all reasonable hours to visit any and all of the hospitals of the United States without let or hindrance.

Mr. BEAMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give way for a moment to enable me to make, with the leave of the House, a personal explanation, which will involve no reply.

Mr. LAZEAR. I yield to the gentleman.

There being no objection,

Mr. FENTON said: In the Congressional Globe of May 13, Mr. MIDDLETON states that Mr. PERRY was paired off with Mr. FENTON on the Raritan railroad question. The record shows that Mr. FENTON voted for that resolution.

Now, it is due to the House, to Mr. PERRY, and myself, that I should make this explanation. The vote came off on Friday, May 13. A few days previous, on Tuesday perhaps, Mr. PERRY stated that he had paired with my colleague, Mr. FRANK, who was then absent. As I understood him, he desired me, if Mr. FRANK returned in his (Mr. PERRY's) absence, to pair on the Raritan railroad question. To that I assented.

The day the vote came off my colleague, Mr. FRANK, was here not voting. It occurred to me that the pair was still running between him and Mr. PERRY, and I therefore voted for the bill. I understand now that Mr. FRANK had only paired with Mr. PERRY for one day, and that on the Missouri election case of Bruce and Loan.

The following day Mr. PENDLETON called upon me with a dispatch from Mr. PERRY asking why I had voted. I made the same explanation which I now make, which was satisfactory to Mr. PEN-

PLETON, and he so replied to Mr. PERRY. On Mr. PERRY's return I explained the circumstances to him fully, and, as I understood at the time, to his satisfaction.

A few days before this vote came off, at the request of Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, I endeavored to effect a pair between him and my colleague, Mr. MARVIN, and the arrangement was made; however, without a definite understanding how Mr. MARVIN would vote, as he had gone to New York. At the time of the vote Messrs. STEELE and MARVIN were absent, and their pair announced; and it appears that Mr. STEELE was paired also with my colleague, Mr. DAVIS. Of this I do not complain, nor was Mr. STEELE at fault in the least that I know of, for Mr. MARVIN's position on this bill perhaps was not announced, although I believe he would have voted for the bill and against Mr. STEELE. This, however, has nothing to do with the case of Mr. PERRY and myself; and I only further remark, that if I had supposed Mr. FRANK was not paired with Mr. PERRY, I should not have voted; and as it was, if I had heard the announcement of Mr. MIDDLETON, it would have led to a prompt explanation and withdrawal of my vote, which, however, would not have changed the result.

PROCEEDINGS OF A COUNCIL OF WAR.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask my colleague to yield to me to offer a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. LAZEAR. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then I insist on the regular order of business.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Let my resolution be read. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to this House a copy of the proceedings of a council of war held in the city of Washington on the 7th of March, 1862, of which General Sumner was president.

Mr. COBB. I object.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will yield to me to offer a resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I insist on my demand for the regular order of business.

OBJECTS OF THE WAR—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolutions submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. LAZEAR.]

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 65.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I understand that these resolutions were before the House for discussion, and that they were laid over because some gentleman objected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to the fact. Two weeks ago to-day the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose and asked unanimous consent to offer certain resolutions, and objection being made the gentleman moved to suspend the rules in order that they might be introduced. Pending that motion to suspend the rules the House adjourned.

The rules were not suspended.

REPEAL OF THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be House bill No 512, to repeal the fugitive slave act of 1850, and all acts and parts of acts for the rendition of fugitive slaves, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORRIS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I propose to withdraw the demand which is pending for the previous question, and to allow the discussion to run on for a reasonable length of time. The matter was set down for to-day that there might be discussion. After the bill shall have been debated to a considerable extent, I give notice that I shall renew the demand for the previous question.

CONTRACT FOR IRON-CLADS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me for a moment to submit a resolution.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Whereas the Navy Department on the 28th day of July, 1862, entered into contract with Captain John Ericsson, of the city of New York, for the construction of two imprugnable floating batteries, the Dictator and the Puritan; and whereas experience with a similar class of vessels in actual conflict and during a varied service of more than two years has demonstrated that many improvements could be made to render them more complete and efficient as vessels of war; and whereas these improvements have added largely to the cost of construction of each of these vessels, rendering it impossible for the contractor to complete them under existing arrangements; and whereas it is of the utmost importance to the honor and interests of the country that they should be finished and ready for service at the earliest moment: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to amend the existing contract for the construction of these vessels so far as it relates to the Puritan, and to appoint a competent board to ascertain the present value, as far as completed, of that vessel, and of the material on hand deemed actually necessary to her construction, and to pay to Captain John Ericsson, the contractor, the amount of valuation so ascertained, deducting therefrom any sums already advanced toward the completion of said vessel; and that upon said payment being made by the Secretary of the Navy the rights of the contractor to said vessel and material or any portion thereof shall cease and be vested wholly and absolutely in the United States, which shall thenceforth proceed to complete said vessel under such arrangements as may be deemed most advantageous: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall in any manner affect the contract for the construction of the Dictator, which shall be completed by said contractor upon the same terms and conditions as if this resolution had not been passed: And provided further, That no action shall be had under this resolution until said contractor shall have signified to the Secretary of the Navy in writing his acceptance of its provisions, and his willingness to superintend to completion the construction of the Puritan: Provided further, That this resolution shall not take effect until the completion and delivery of the Dictator.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I object.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved that the rules be suspended.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not now in order.

SUPERANNUATED FUND SOCIETY.

Mr. WEBSTER, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 293, to empower the Superannuated Fund Society of the Maryland Annual Conference to hold property in the District of Columbia, and to take a devise under the will of the late William Doughty.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was taken up and read a first and second time.

The bill recites that William Doughty, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, by his last will, bearing date on the 29th of April, 1859, duly admitted to probate, devised and bequeathed certain real and personal property and estate—part thereof to take effect at his death, and the residue at the death or marriage of his widow—to a society incorporated by act of the General Assembly of Maryland by the name of the Superannuated Fund Society of the Maryland Annual Conference, and called in the will the Superannuated Fund Society of the Methodist Protestant Church for the District of Maryland; and as it has been questioned whether the corporation can lawfully take and hold the property, in virtue of the last will, without the leave and assent of Congress, it gives the assent of Congress to all such devises and bequests to the Superannuated Fund Society of the Maryland Annual Conference, and authorizes and empowers the society and body corporate to take and hold the property and estate devised and bequeathed to it, agreeably to the tenor and provisions of the last will, and to dispose of and enjoy the same to every intent and effect as if the society had been originally incorporated by act of Congress. The second section empowers the corporation to hold real and personal property located in the District of Columbia, acquired or that shall be acquired by gift, purchase, devise, or bequest, and the same enjoy, rent, lease, or convey, at pleasure, as freely as any person or body corporate can do, provided the net yearly income thereof shall not exceed $20,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. FINCK. I ask unanimous consent to change my vote from the affirmative to the negative on the motion to lay upon the table the resolution to pay contestants on Saturday last.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MEMBER EXCUSED.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I have been absent several days on account of sickness, and I ask that I be excused for non-attendance.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, was accordingly excused.

REPEAL OF THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW—AGAIN.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I do not yield any further. I ask that the agreement be that we shall take the vote at four o'clock this afternoon on House bill No. 512, to repeal the fugitive slave act of 1850, and all acts and parts of acts for the rendition of fugitive slaves.

Mr. COX. We cannot tell until then.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that the discussion go on to-day, and that the vote be taken to-morrow at half-past twelve o'clock.

Objection was made.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. Unless there is some understanding, I shall have to call for the previous question after reasonable discussion has been had. We do not want more than twenty minutes on this side of the House.

I will suggest further, that if any number of gentlemen desire to speak, I will move that there be an evening session to enable them to be heard upon this question.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I object to any arrangement.

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman from New York that there has been no debate yet upon this subject.

TRADE WITH REBELLIOUS DISTRICTS.

Mr. INGERSOLL asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this House all permits heretofore issued by the Treasury Department to any person or persons allowing such person or persons to trade within the limits of any of the States now or heretofore in rebellion should at once be revoked and no more issued.

Mr. STROUSE objected.

REPEAL OF THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW—AGAIN.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, the report and bill of the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. MORRIS] propose to repeal the act of 12th February, 1793, usually called the fugitive slave law. This law was passed in pursuance of and with the view more effectually to secure to the citizen his rights guaranteed to him by the second clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution, and which is as follows:

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

This clause was the result of one of the many compromises which brought about the adoption of the Constitution.

In submitting the few remarks which I intend at the present, I desire to draw the attention of the House to the circumstances which gave rise to the adoption of this clause of the Constitution, and then to point out the rights guaranteed thereby to slaveholders. And notwithstanding the institution of slavery has received a fatal stab, mainly at the hands of its friends, yet, as I conceive, there has been no legitimate abolishment of that institution, only so far as it has been effected by the Army and Navy in its approaches into the enemy's country, by the exercise or enforcement of a well-established rule of the laws of war, by depriving the enemy who may be in arms of that which strengthens them and weakens us. The institution is, nevertheless, an existing one among us, and as such I shall treat it in the few remarks I am about to submit.

I know it is sought to be impressed upon the public mind that the institution is gone, and that therefore no rights exist in reference to that species of property at this time, whatever may have been the admitted and adjudicated rights heretofore.

These revolutionary times have originated a new school of commentators upon the Constitution; they now boldly argue that no rights ever did exist under the Constitution to that species of property. I trust my honorable friend and colleague of the Judiciary Committee who reported this bill to the House does not intend to assume that ground in urging its passage. It is true I see this point pressed with some ability by an abolition writer, who says among other things that—"We need a President, a Congress, and judges who have done reading the Constitution of the United States through pro-slavery spectacles. The self-contradictory and half-way measures of the Government in regard to the war, and especially to slavery, come from this false reading; this gratuitous pro-slavery construction of that grand abolition document."

And after admitting that the greatest statesmen of the nation have given such construction to our Constitution, he says:

"The most learned statesmen, lawyers, and judges of England gave a like construction to their constitution until a certain clerk in a store, plain Mr. Granville Sharp, by dint of good common sense, some thorough examination, and a number of well-written published articles, compelled Lord Chief Justice Mansfield to see the truth very much against his aristocratic will, and to decide, in the Somerset case, contrary to his former decisions, and to the opinions, dicta, and decisions of the great men of the realm, and thus effected an entire revolution in the construction of the English constitution in regard to slaveholding."

In answer to this I have to say that the constitution of England is formed and made of the old, ancient common-law maxims of Fleta and Braxton, of Littleton and Coke and Bacon, and others, and of concessions extorted from the Crown in every revolution from the days of King John down to the present time, and extending through a long series of ages past, so that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; and these all combined give direction and point to judicial decisions as well as governmental policy.

But according to our theory of government we have a written Constitution by which our rights are derived and secured and our wrongs redressed. Our system is an improvement upon everything ever known to the republics of Greece and Rome, or any of the Governments of the Old World. Its edifice is that of a written Constitution, and its avowed objects and purposes are declared to be: "to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." I see it argued by some, and the fanatical sentiment is gaining ground in certain quarters, that from the foundation of our Government we have been living in disregard of the plain, written declarations contained in the preamble to our Constitution, which, among other things, is to "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity;" and then we are told, with an air of triumph, that these declarations were intended for the negro. I have this question to ask those who thus argue: Is the negro of the posterity of those who, in Convention, adopted our Constitution? Were they recognized to be of "we the people of the United States" who sent up the delegates to the Convention? If so, then they properly come under the designation of "posterity." I desire those who thus argue to give a miscegenical answer to these questions.

Lexicographers tell us that the word "posterity" means descendants, and that "descendants and posterity" are terms never applied solely to children, but they are used comprehensively to include children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren, &c., without limitation.

The framers of our Constitution spoke for themselves and their children, and the children of those and their posterity, whose delegates they were. Those who vote to repeal this law, certainly will not attempt to place its passage on any such utopian theories as those to which I have been referring; nor will they, I trust, take the other ground, assumed by those visionary theorists of the same political party to which I have already referred, who take as their theory the exact reverse, and declare that ours is a pro-slavery Constitution, and that the Union of which it is the only bond, by reason thereof, is a lie. "The American Union is an imposture, a covenant with death, and an agreement with hell." It must be overthrown. "Up with the flag of disunion."

I will not do gentlemen the injustice to charge that they take either of the grounds to which I have been referring: If, however, they do, it will take a little more than the ability of "plain Mr. Granville Sharp," who by his common sense and powerful arguments drove Lord Chief Justice Mansfield from his opinions of constitutional law. They must encounter first the opinions of the framers of our Constitution, and their sentiments uttered by such men as Alexander Hamilton, Fisher Ames, James Madison, Luther Martin, Patrick Henry, and other distinguished statesmen. Yea, more, they must encounter the sentiments delivered by Washington to Congress, by the unanimous order of the Convention, when he submitted the Constitution to Congress. In his letter to the president of Congress, among other reasons for its adoption, he says:

"It is obviously impracticable, in the Federal Government of these States, to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all. Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend as well on situation and circumstance as on the object to be obtained. It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered and those which may be reserved; and on the present occasion this difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests.

"In all our deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union—in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence. This important consideration, seriously and deeply impressed on our minds, led each State in the Convention to be less rigid on points of inferior magnitude than might have been otherwise expected, and thus the Constitution which we now present is the result of a spirit of unity and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable."

These are the sentiments uttered by Washington on behalf of the Convention which adopted our Constitution. How worthy now, in this dark day of our troubles, in the midst of a revolution brought on us by a disregard of these sentiments, that we should emulate the noble example here set us. Would that these patriot ages were now here, in this their country's day of trial, with their lessons of wisdom, and to commend them to national approval.

When the Constitution was referred by Congress to the various States for its adoption, we find the same enlarged views taken, and often by the same men who had been in the Convention, urging reasons why it should be adopted. In the northern States the effort was to satisfy the people of the necessity there was for securing to the South their rights in slave property, and that by the compromise the North received more than an equivalent in the advantages secured to their commerce and navigation. This solemn compact between the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States was adopted by the unanimous votes of the States then present in the Convention. The dissent of a single State might have marred the whole scheme of compromises so elaborately prepared as a basis of the new Constitution, and remitted the States of the Confederacy to a condition little short of anarchy.

That the Constitution of 1787 was in truth founded on a deliberately formed scheme of compromises and equivalents is a historical fact denied by none in terms, but virtually and practically by many who believe themselves to be statesmen, but who are nevertheless politicians merely. The importance of this historical fact justifies, if it does not demand, an exhibition of the evidence, in part at least, by which it is sustained.

Here are the declarations of Alexander Hamilton to the New York convention, assembled at Poughkeepsie, in June, 1788, to pass on the new Constitution submitted to the States by the General Convention assembled at Philadelphia. I read from Eliot's Debates, page 212. He said:

"In order that the committee may understand clearly the principles upon which the Convention acted, I think it necessary to explain some preliminary circumstances.

"Sir, the natural situation of the country seems to divide its interests into different classes. There are navigating and non-navigating States; the northern are properly the navigating States; the southern appear to possess neither the means nor the spirit of navigation. This difference of situation naturally produces a dissimilarity of interests and views respecting foreign commerce. It was the interest of the northern States that there should be no restraints on their navigation, and that they should have full power, by a majority in Congress, to make commercial regulations in favor of their own and in restraint of the navigation of foreigners. The southern States wished to impose a restraint on the northern, by requiring that two thirds in Congress should be requisite to pass an act in regulation of commerce; they were apprehensive that the restraints of a navigation law would discourage foreigners, and by obliging them to employ shipping of the northern States, would probably enhance their freight. This being the case, they insisted strenuously on having this provision infringed in the Constitution; and the northern States were as anxious in opposing it."

Again:

"Much has been said of the impropriety of representing men who have no will of their own. Whether this be reasoning or declamation I will not presume to say. It is the unfortunate situation of the southern States to have a great part of their population, as well as property, in blacks. The regulation complained of was one result of the spirit of accommodation which governed the Convention, and without this indulgence no Union could possibly have been formed. And, sir, considering some peculiar advantages which we derive, it is entirely just that they should be gratified. The southern States possess certain staples, tobacco, rice, indigo, &c., which must now be capital objects in treaties of commerce with foreign nations; and the advantages which they necessarily procure in these treaties will be felt throughout all the States.

"It became necessary, therefore, to compromise, or the Convention would have dissolved without effecting anything. Would it have been wise and prudent in that body, in this critical situation, to have deserted their country? No. Every man who hears me, every wise man in the United States, would have condemned them. The Convention were obliged to appoint a committee for accommodation. In this committee the arrangement was formed as it now stands, and their report was accepted. It was a delicate point, and it was necessary that all parties should be indulged."

So much for the testimony of a distinguished northern statesman to the fact that the Constitution was a deliberately concocted system of compromises—the work of "a committee for accommodation," specially appointed for the purpose, and in which committee the rights of the slaveholders were distinctly recognized and guaranteed. And stronger still is his evidence as the representative of a great navigating and commercial State, as to the value and importance of the equivalents given by the South for all the concessions made in the Convention by the North connected with the subject of slavery.

The eloquence and fervid zeal of Fisher Ames, who, like Hamilton, was cut off in the full bloom of his intellectual powers, urged the acceptance of the new Constitution in the Convention of Massachusetts. He said:

"Shall we put everything that we hold precious to the hazard by rejecting this Constitution? We have great advantages by it in respect of navigation, and it is the general interests of the States that we should have them. But if we reject it, what security have we that we shall obtain them a second time, against the local interests and prejudices of other States?"

I could refer to the opinions at that day of other distinguished northern statesmen as to the absolute necessity of introducing these compromises into the Constitution, and without which no Union could ever have been formed, but I deem it unnecessary.

To the same effect, and with like arguments, southern statesmen urged in their conventions the adoption of the Constitution. In reference to the fugitive slave clause, Edmund Randolph, in the Virginia convention, said:

"Were it right to mention what passed in Convention on the occasion, I might tell you that the southern States—even South Carolina herself—conceived this property to be secured by these words."

And Judge Iredell, in the North Carolina convention, referring to this clause of the Constitution, says:

"In some of the northern States they have emancipated all their slaves. If any of our slaves go there and remain a certain time they would by their present laws be entitled to their freedom, so that their masters could not get them again. This would be extremely prejudicial to the inhabitants of the southern States, and to prevent it this clause is inserted in the Constitution."

In the South Carolina convention for the adoption of the Constitution we have these emphatic expressions from Charles Cotesworth Pinckney:

"We have obtained a right for the recovery of our slaves, in whatever part of America they may take refuge, which is a right we had not before."

Mr. Speaker, I may add truly no such right existed under our Articles of Confederation, yet it is equally true that this Congress of the Confederation would not pass the celebrated Ordinance of 1787, in reference to the Northwestern Territory, until a clause for delivering up fugitive slaves was inserted.

Mr. Speaker, I could add, if necessary, contemporaneous expressions going to sustain the same view from the Legislatures and conventions of every State to which the Constitution was submitted for its adoption. I now refer briefly to the view taken by the courts and the learned commentators upon the Constitution since its adoption.

The passage of the act in reference to fugitive slaves in 1793 was not called for by any complaints from the South, but it is historically known that, upon a call for remedial legislation upon the subject of the surrender of fugitives from justice, this question also naturally pressed itself upon Congress, many of its members having been in the Convention when the Constitution was adopted.

The owner of a slave, in the absence of any law, has the right under the Constitution, upon the principles of recaption at the common law, to seize and recapture his slave whenever he can do it without a breach of the peace. But cases may often arise when he cannot lay his hands on him by reason of obstacles thrown in the way, and hence the necessity of some legislation. This opinion and position is fully sustained by Mr. Justice Story in the opinion delivered in the case of Prigg vs. The State of Pennsylvania. In this decision, announced by a northern judge, he says:

"The full recognition of this right and title was indispensable to the security of this species of property in all the slaveholding States, and was so vital to the preservation of their domestic interests and institutions that it constituted a fundamental article, without the adoption of which the Union could not have been formed."

I will read no more of that decision. It is lengthy, and fully discusses the constitutional question as to the rights of the slave States upon this subject. I am aware that, since the death of Judge Story, some fanatic has procured a note to be appended to the decision, stating that Judge Story had said, out of court, that the constitutionality of the act was not considered in making the decision. The facts of this note are so irreconcilable with the decision that I will not insult the intelligence of the House by further comment upon it. It has emanated from the brain of some abolitionist who never had more than one idea in his head at a time, and that not a very clear one.

To the same effect is the opinion of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, by Chief Justice Tighman, in the case of Wright vs. Deacon, 5 S. and R., 63. He says:

"Whatever may be our opinion on the subject of slavery, it is well known that our southern brethren would not have consented to have become parties to a Constitution under which the United States have enjoyed so much prosperity, unless their property in slaves had been secured."

And I may add that all our distinguished writers and commentators upon this subject are to the same effect.

But, Mr. Speaker, I may stop here. Enough has been said to show the undisputed position of this question from the foundation of the Government to the present day. The law now sought to be repealed was passed in the discharge of a solemn duty to the slaveholding States; a duty enjoined by the Constitution, and which cannot, in my opinion, be repealed by Congress without a total disregard of an imperative obligation. While I give honorable gentlemen, who perhaps will vote to repeal this law, credit for the sincerity of their efforts to restore the Union, yet they should remember, even in the present crippled condition of slavery, that all assaults upon this law, all efforts to prevent its execution, all movements to deprive the slave States of its benefits, whether dictated by morbid sympathy with the fugitive slave or by hostility to the system of domestic slavery as it exists, are aimed directly at the Constitution, and consequently the perpetuity of the Union. It is a right guaranteed to those States when they entered the Union, and of which they cannot be deprived so long as the Constitution and Union stand.

Those now in rebellion repudiate our Government, deny the binding force of the Constitution, and refuse submission to the laws; and to bring them to the recognition of the one and submission to the other we have sacrificed hundreds of thousands of our best men. Wives have been made widows, children have become orphans, and the whole country is draped with the habiliments of mourning. We have spent several thousand millions of treasure for the same objects; and does it become us, standing by the Government under the Constitution, in our action here, and upon a subject so irritating as to call forth the declaration that it is the sole cause of the rebellion, to so shape our legislation as to show a disregard of constitutional obligations? I can understand how slavery is to be abolished by an amendment to the Constitution, according to the forms prescribed in that instrument, yet I cannot comprehend how, by our legislation, we are to accomplish the same object while the Constitution remains as it is.

Upon what States is this repeal intended to operate? It will not affect Missouri. We, by an ordinance, have abolished slavery, and there remains to us a very short time that we could have any benefits from this law, if it is not repealed. But, practically, it is now repealed to us; we are under duress in reference to our slave property; we are not free to act, we are not allowed to assert our rights under the Constitution and laws, even in our own State, much less to follow it into a neighboring State and demand, as a constitutional right, that it shall be delivered up. The ordinance for the emancipation of our slaves was the result of the will and consent of those who were the owners of that species of property, upon an express consideration and promise, authoritatively made for those who had the power to keep it, that if the ordinance was adopted, we should be protected in our slave property until it should pass off in accordance with its provisions; but so soon as the ordinance was adopted we found those who had been instrumental in making the pledge urging further spoliation upon this species of property, until now we have no encouragement to demand constitutional rights, or the enforcement of municipal laws in reference to our slaves, and much less in reference to the fugitive slave law.

The repeal of this law certainly is not intended to operate upon the States now in rebellion and which are not under our control, neither in a military point of view nor subject to our legislation. They have thrown off their allegiance to the Government, denied the binding effect and force of the Constitution and the laws; they have refused to recognize the common arbiter of our rights, as provided by the Constitution, and are consequently out of the pale of its protection. Upon what State and upon whom is it intended the repeal shall operate? Is it upon Kentucky—noble old Kentucky—that this blight, this mark of disapprobation, this thrust at her constitutional rights, this effort to put the mark upon her forehead as indelible as was the mark upon the forehead of the murderous Cain? If so, I beg of gentlemen to remember that the end of this revolution is not yet; I entreat them to add no more fuel to the flame already burning with irresistible fury. Kentucky, amid the buffeting storm of revolution raging around her, has been made to reel and stagger amid the ingulfing floods; yet she has emerged from all these, and to-day stands as a beacon light upon a far-off distant promontory, inviting the weary mariner safely into port. Amid all the temptations with which she has been surrounded, she has nobly determined to stand by the Government, planting herself upon the compromises of the Constitution as our fathers made it, standing ever ready to do equal and exact justice to men of the North and men of the South. Her position upon this subject is of the very spirit and essence of the Constitution. She seeks to maintain her rights under it, and she has a right to expect this concession from her sister States.

Is this a fit time to press a policy and give it the prestige of governmental sanction as one of its primary objects, when in fact it is a mere incident in the drama of this bloody revolution, and should be made secondary to our united efforts to stop the effusion of blood and restore unity and harmony and fraternity among us? The policy which seems to be pursued by a dominant majority here in its effects has but served to intensify and solidify the eight million of southern people, while an honest difference of opinion among us as to the wisdom of these policies has gotten up a spirit of crimination and recrimination which in the end may prove fatal to all our hopes of success in assuring the friends of liberty everywhere that man is capable of self-government.

We seemingly content ourselves with discussing these secondary and abstract propositions, while our scarred and veteran legions, as the "horsemen of Israel and the chariots thereof," are pouring out their life's blood upon the battle-field almost within the sound of the Capitol. Have we no reason to fear that, having abandoned the original objects and purposes so unanimously agreed among us for which this war was to be prosecuted, we may find ourselves soon and forever, like ancient Israel, "unkingdomed and a widow," and that Mene, tekul upharsin may be written on the walls of the Republic and Ichabod on our national colors and columns?

I mean no crimination upon the commanding majority here when I declare that the whole system of legislation is based upon a false hypothesis; that we are separating and dividing upon issues which can be of no practical importance until the rebellion is overcome, and the rightful jurisdiction of the Government over our whole national territory is restored. To give practical effect to our ultra legislation, other hundreds of thousands of our men must yet be called to lay down their lives upon the battle-field. The war must be carried on upon the idea that the man of death must be satisfied. God grant that we may seriously reflect upon these things, and so shape our future legislation that there may be but little ground for difference of opinion among us; and that our united and harmonious efforts may bring peace to our borders, a restoration of our Union, the supremacy of the Constitution, and the observance of the laws. Then will be the propitious time when he of the South will not regard too bitterly his brother of the North for maintaining the heritage of his fathers at all hazards; and he of the North will not treat too harshly his brother of the South; but they will again meet in such a way that "Their joys will be remembered,

And their sorrows be forgot."

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. This, in the estimation of my constituents, is a threadbare subject, and I desire a few minutes only to utter all I wish to say with reference to the bill. I am not about to speak of the demerits of slavery, of its oppressions, and of its crimes culminating in treason, for these are to-day as patent to the world as the sky over our heads or the earth under our feet. Nor do I care to speak of the monstrous incompatibility of the existence of these laws providing for the rendition of fugitive slaves with the present state, condition, and affairs of the Republic; for this, too, is as plain to every man as the "way to parish church." I desire simply to utter the convictions of my own judgment with reference to some objections to the repeal of the act of 1793, discussed in one or the other branch of the present Congress.

I deny that any constitutional question whatever properly arises under the consideration of the subject-matter of the bill. The Constitution does not anywhere provide for an enactment by Congress of any law for the rendition of fugitive slaves; and if it did, I hold that by the treason of slavery the people are absolved from that obligation upon their part. This is so by the common law, and in the nature and fitness of things it must be so.

I am aware, sir, that slavery still exists to some extent in some of the loyal States, but I want to say in the hearing of my friends upon the other side, it is not the fault of the Government that the further existence of the law for the rendition of fugitive slaves has become altogether inconsistent with the honor and safety of the Republic. It is the fault of the institution in which a few individuals in those States happen to hold or claim to hold a little stock. And surely it must be competent for this Congress to repeal any act which it was competent for any other Congress ever to enact. There can be no question about that.

And I want also to say that I make no distinction whatever between the act of 1793 and the act of 1850. To-day they are equally obnoxious, and, in my opinion, equally infamous. I revere the memory of the founders of the Republic, but I am not so infatuated as to believe that the fathers would ever have passed the act of 1793 had slavery then been in rebellion against them. The presumption they would not have passed it under such circumstances is argument enough for me upon that point of reverence. Could they to-day rise up from the ground or come down from the skies and occupy our seats here, they would repeal the act of 1793 in the twinkling of an eye. And I hold that good policy and the highest and the best interests of the Government require and most imperatively demand the repeal of those infamous acts during the present session. Repeal them, sir, and you will get fifty thousand men during the next six months which otherwise I fear you will not get at all. You cannot draft black men into the field while your marshals are chasing women and children in the woods of Ohio with a view to render them back into bondage. The moral sense of the nation, ay, of the world, would revolt at it. The attempt to draft black men into the service during the existence of the fugitive slave acts would cast such a burden of obloquy upon the Government as would sink it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I asked the floor for five minutes only, and begin to feel that I am trespassing. I therefore conclude by saying that I rejoice that we are to have the yeas and nays upon the question of the passage of the bill. It is fit that American statesmen in this age of the world, at this period of the great American war; at a time when the Republic is smarting and bleeding, if not reeling, under the blows that slavery has given it, and at a time when a hundred thousand black men are fighting for the flag and not one against it; it is fit that American statesmen here assembled to deliberate and act upon this momentous question should have an opportunity to record their votes for posterity to read.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HUBBARD] insists that we should record our names on this question by the yeas and nays. Before doing so, I propose to give a few reasons why I cannot vote in the affirmative. I have listened to what has been said in order to gather from the chaff some grain of reason for the repeal of the fugitive slave law. Very little reason has been used in its favor. I suppose this bill is the result of an indefinite impulse. It is dashed in upon the House without any other consideration than that slavery is in it, and, without regard to the Constitution or its sanctions, or to the judgment of the courts, or to common sense, or good faith, or timely policy, or any other reason. Slavery having been placed before the House; that side of the House is expected to vote one way, and this side, of course, must vote the other. Then, after such an exhibition of votes, gentlemen can go out to the people and say, "We are the friends of human freedom, and the Democracy are its enemies." Is it not time that this contemptible claptrap had ceased?

The gentleman from Connecticut said that he revered the fathers of the Republic, but he thought that they would not vote against the repeal of the fugitive slave law while slavery was in rebellion. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, exactly what the gentleman means by that. I know that slaveholders are in rebellion; but I do not, and cannot, understand that the abstract idea of slavery is in rebellion. Such language is as inappropriate as it is illogical. But does it follow because slaveholders are in rebellion that we are bound to break down every law that was intended to carry out the Constitution with respect to the return of fugitive slaves? Slaveholders are in rebellion; but who believes that they would get the benefit of the law? And for a very good reason: a line of force separates them from us; an abyss of blood yawns between them and us, not to be bridged by laws. No, no. The only persons who will ever be the beneficiaries of the act for the rendition of fugitives are the slaveholders not in rebellion, men faithful to the Government of their country amid all trials and temptations. If the gentleman means anything, he means to say that the patriotic and faithful slaveholders of Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, and other States, shall not have their guarantee for the return of their slaves under the Constitution of the United States, to which they have never wavered in their allegiance. He means to say to them, "You shall go where these revolted slaveholders have already gone. We place the penalties of their treason on your innocent heads. We add to your calamities the ingratitude and treachery of the Government to which you have adhered. We do not want your aid. You shall not have the privilege of having your slaves returned to you, because you have been better, truer, nobler men than some of your brother slaveholders." That is the consequence of the gentleman's argument. I do not think that he ever looked at it in that light before, and it seems to me, from this distance, that there is a little change coming over his features now as he reflects upon it.

Roger Sherman, from the gentleman's own State, voted for the law of 1793, and George Washington signed it.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Will the gentleman from Ohio have the kindness to give me a second of his time?

Mr. COX. More than that, sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I said that, in my judgment, the fathers never would have enacted the law of 1793 had slavery been in rebellion against us. That was my statement.

Mr. COX. That is a curious argument. If the fathers had lived till to-day, I cannot tell what they would have done. But the fathers have gone. We can only judge of what they would do by what they actually did for a Confederacy like ours. They put this clause in the Constitution. They made an injunction on Congress to carry out the provision of rendering back those who should escape from service or labor. They enjoined it in the same breath and with the same sanction by which they commanded us their descendants to return fugitives from justice. They did these things to keep peace, friendship, and faith between the States forever. They were honest men. During their generation and the one succeeding, faith was kept. The men who made the law of 1793, some of them helped to create the Constitution, and the rest were their contemporaries. They were men whose patriotism the gentleman will not dispute. They were men whose names he reverences. But would he reverence them if he believed that to-day they would vote to deprive the slaveholders who are faithful to the Government which they made in wisdom and amid tribulation, of the very remedies and rights which were promised as the reward of fidelity? Would it not be monstrous to reverence men who could so break their own faith? They would be worse than their graceless and degenerate children who propose to do the same thing. But the very idea is an aspersion on their noble fame. Who are these "fathers?" Such men as Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, (an ancestor, I suppose, of my friend from Massachusetts, who has changed very much from his ancestor,) Jonathan Dayton, Elbridge Gerry, Nathaniel Macon, Frederick A. Muhlenburg, and Theodore Sedgwick voted for the act of 1793. In the same Congress the names of Langdon, Ellsworth, Sherman, King, Dickinson, Morris, and Monroe, are found in the Senate. It passed the Senate without a division, and almost unanimously in the House.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a question?

Mr. COX. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the Supreme Court did not decide, in the Prigg case, that the feature of the law requiring State officials to execute it was unconstitutional?

Mr. COX. The fugitive slave law of 1793?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. I will read what the court decided in that case; and I take it that he will abide their decision. I ask him whether he will abide by the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I deny the right of Congress to legislate upon this subject at all.

Mr. COX. I must beg the gentleman from Massachusetts to answer me whether he will abide by the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I will guide my action in this House by nothing but the Constitution upon this question.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman take the interpretation of the Supreme Court of the Constitution and abide by that upon this question?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Ohio will answer my question I will be obliged to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I will answer the gentleman's question, that I abide by the law; and now I want to know whether he will abide by the decision of the Supreme Court interpreting the law?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. The gentleman has not answered my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I want no quibbling on this subject. I have answered your question; now answer mine.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. You have not answered my question.

Mr. COX. If I have not, will the gentleman please state it over again, and then I want an answer from him.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. The law of 1793 did not attempt to engage the General Government in the business of catching fugitive slaves; it did not dream of doing that. They waited until 1850, until Mr. Mason's bill, before they directed the Federal officers to deliver fugitive slaves. The Supreme Court decided that portion of the law of 1793 relating to State officers to be unconstitutional.

Mr. COX. I say to the gentleman that the Supreme Court has decided no such thing; but the majority of the court decided that this power was exclusively in the United States, while the minority held the power to be concurrent both in the State and the General Government, and that in the absence of congressional action the States might carry out this clause of the Constitution in aid of the claim of an owner of a slave. Its execution having been committed to the Federal Government by the law of 1850, the laws of the United States in that respect are the paramount laws of the land. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts abide by the decision of the Supreme Court thus interpreting the law?

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COX. No, sir. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not come in to help his colleague. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I want to know whether I understand the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COX. Oh yes; I think the gentleman did understand me perfectly, and I object to his coming to the assistance of his colleague, who is large enough to take care of himself. [Laughter.] It is as much as I can do to see through him.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Then I hope the gentleman will answer my question.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want further to tell the gentleman what the Supreme Court did decide in the case of Prigg. He will find it reported in 16 Peters, page 543. It is there decided "that the act of the 12th of February, 1793, is clearly constitutional in all its leading provisions, and indeed, with the exception of that part which confers authority upon State magistrates, is free from reasonable doubt or difficulty." In every other respect they decide it is free from all doubt and difficulty. Now, I want the gentleman from Massachusetts not to turn his back upon me and the subject, but to answer me whether he will abide by the law of 1850, made in correspondence with the decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to read that part of the decision which relates to State officers.

Mr. COX. I am calling the attention of my friend to the whole decision of the Supreme Court on this law. And when the gentleman says he will vote to repeal the fugitive slave law because it is unconstitutional, I want him to understand, as I have shown him, that the Supreme Court has decided that, in all their leading features, both the law of 1793 and the amendment of 1850 are constitutional.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I repeat again that the Supreme Court has decided one portion of that law to be unconstitutional, and as an additional reason for it I will state that the gentleman refuses to answer my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I have answered the gentleman as fully as I was able. I referred him to this decision of the Supreme Court, and read from it to the point; now I want to indulge him further by reading what Judge McLean says upon the same subject:

"Congress have legislated on the constitutional power and have directed the mode in which it shall be executed. The act of 1793 it is admitted covers the whole ground, and that it is the constitutional one, there seems to be no reason to doubt."—16 Peters, 669.

There has not been since the law of 1793 any hostile decision, except in Wisconsin, in the Booth case, which was overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case the latter court say, speaking of the act of 1850:

"In the judgment of this court the act of Congress, commonly called the fugitive slave law, is, in all of its provisions, fully authorized by the Constitution of the United States."

Suppose the States have concurrent power, as the minority of the Supreme Court of the United States once held, and might exercise such power in aid of the claimant of a slave in the absence of a law of Congress, does it follow that we should break our bond and repeal the law as it exists? Does it not follow that the remedy should be retained and made adequate? We are authorized not only to exercise the power to carry out the specific grant, but, as if to place this question beyond cavil, we are authorized by the Constitution "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department."

Having thus obliged the gentleman, I ask, in common fairness, will he stand by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to read that part of the Prigg case which relates to ordering State officials.

Mr. COX. I have read it. With the exception of that part of the law of 1793 which confers authority on State magistrates, all of that law is free from doubt. But how does that help the gentleman? Not a whit. The law of 1850 conforms to that decision, but the anarchists will not agree to abide by either the law or its authoritative interpretation. Some gentlemen, like the gentleman from Massachusetts, have argued that this matter was exclusively in the power of the States. The Supreme Court have said otherwise; and in one case the minority have said that it is concurrent, and that when the power is devolved on the Federal authorities that law which devolves it is of paramount obligation. Will the gentleman stand by that?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Paramount within the range of the Constitution?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; under the Constitution, paramount. But I will have done with this trifling. The gentleman does not expect ever to obey the laws of the United States as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is not the doctrine of the party of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The President in his inaugural gave to the Supreme Court the benefit of his opinion of their authority in such matters. The Republican party was built on the idea that the Constitution should be interpreted according to the peculiar idea or conscientious conviction of each individual. And one of the chief causes of our troubles to-day is that very idea, nursed in Massachusetts and other States, that they would interpret all laws to suit themselves. Regardless of Federal laws passed in pursuance of the Constitution, they began that practical nullification which secession so well copied. In Ohio, in Wisconsin, and other States, following the teachings of Massachusetts, the party on the other side of the House, on this very matter of fugitives, has raised the standard of sedition and rebellion against the authority of the United States. If the gentleman wants any proof of my assertion, unpleasant as is the retrospect, I can furnish it to him.

The infraction of this very law and the Constitution which required it to be made was the great cause of the trouble between the two sections of the country. One of the reasons for the departure of the southern States was the bad faith of northern States—the fatal infringement of this part of the Constitution. It was because of personal liberty bills, John Brown raids, and general denunciation and intermeddling with slavery; it was because you of Massachusetts would not take the earnest advice of your venerable Chief Justice Shaw and other conservative patriots like him, and erase from your statute-book all your unconstitutional legislation; it was because in Ohio and other States, members of Congress like those opposite from my own State gave aid and comfort to rebellion against the authority of the United States, going so far as to pledge in the name of the State its military power to break down by armed resistance the law made on this subject. It was because of these outrages, these breaches of the fundamental compact, that the southern States shot so madly from their proper spheres and brought on this terrible conflict. These were the grievances of which they complained, not sufficient to justify their revolution, but of sufficient magnitude and importance to demand from us redress.

Gentlemen say that this matter does not belong to the Federal Congress but to the States. I understand that to be the doctrine of my friend from Massachusetts who sits near me. Does he ever expect Massachusetts to pass a law for the rendition of fugitives from labor? No, sir.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. The question here is not what Massachusetts will do, but what this Congress will do.

Mr. COX. The gentleman proposes that Congress shall repeal this law, and he does not propose that Massachusetts should enact a law to carry out this injunction of the Constitution. Why? Because Massachusetts does not act in good faith.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I deny that.

Mr. COX. The repeal of this law is not intended in good faith. No man on that side of the House expects that Massachusetts, or Ohio, or Wisconsin will pass a law for the return of fugitive slaves. Who dreams of it? Who proposes it?

Some few years ago when a Democrat in the Legislature of Ohio proposed by resolution to carry out the Constitution by State action, the party on the other side of the House voted to table the resolution. I would not vote for such a resolution myself, because a law of this kind should be uniform throughout the United States. As general power is given to the Federal Government by the Constitution, it was intended to be exercised in a general way. This has been the practice and the interpretation of the Constitution from the beginning of the century down to the present time.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. By what clause of the Constitution?

Mr. COX. By the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution. I am sorry the gentleman has not read a clause so familiar to almost everybody in this country.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Please read the clause which gives Congress the power to legislate in reference to fugitive slaves.

Mr. COX. I would not have my constituents think I was so ignorant, or had a seat in a body so ignorant, that I had to read that old familiar clause of the Constitution about the return of fugitive slaves.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. The gentleman cannot find it.

Mr. COX. That is because I do not wear spectacles, I presume. I say that from the beginning of the Government to the present time there has been a uniform opinion upon this subject. Why, sir, that great man who presided over the birth of the Constitution, George Washington, and who urged its adoption upon the States, was the same great man who signed the fugitive slave law of 1793. History says, too, that he was the first man to have a slave reclaimed under that law, a slave that escaped and was hidden somewhere in the city of Boston. It is said around me here that the fugitive slave of George Washington took refuge in the district of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I have no authority upon that point at present. All I can state now is that the fact was stated in a debate here in December, 1859, by General Curtis, of Iowa. It is a curious fact that General Washington, in 1796, had a slave woman who left the service of his wife and went into New England. In a letter to Mr. Whipple he asked for her restoration under the law of 1793. He stated the fact of her escape, and claimed the benefit of the law.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I will say that a man who hunts for his liberty finds a great deal of sympathy in my district.

Mr. COX. They who hunt for constitutional liberty in Massachusetts find no sympathy; but they who seek for that liberty which knows no law, and which breaks down constitutional restraints, find there sympathy and devotees by the thousands in Massachusetts.

It is a maxim of the common law, as it is of common sense, that every right to be of any avail must have its remedy. The Constitution is no exception to this rule. For every right therein asserted there must be a remedy somewhere. Where is this remedy, then, if not in Federal legislation? No respectable party ever disputed this. The old Whig party never disputed as to this remedy by Federal legislation. It was left for these men of the higher law dispensation, the new lights of this day of war and revolution, men who have been borne here within a few years past upon the waves of fanaticism, to find out all these new interpretations of the Constitution. The great men of 1793 whom I have named, and those of 1850, your Clays, your Websters, your Douglasses, men of that giant mold and whole-hearted patriotism which took in all the States by a common bond, never questioned the power or the mode and expediency of its exercise by the Federal Government to carry out this clause of the Constitution.

Mr. COLE, of California. I would ask the gentleman if he would return the fugitive slave of a rebel.

Mr. COX. No, sir.

Mr. COLE, of California. In the next place, suppose the fugitive slave of a Union man had joined the Union Army, would you take him out of the ranks of the Army and return him to his master?

Mr. COX. I would comply with the law. I would remand the case to the commissioner to be decided under the law.

Mr. COLE, of California. The gentleman can answer "yes" or "no." If you were the commissioner before whom the case was brought, would you take him from the Union ranks and remand him to his master?

Mr. COX. I would try to carry out the law in every respect.

Mr. COLE, of California. I want a direct answer; would you or would you not?

Mr. COX. I do not see how I can answer my friend any more directly or satisfactorily. I am entirely frank about it. I would comply with the law as it exists. I would break it under no circumstances.

Mr. COLE, of California. I ask the gentleman how he would interpret the law in that respect; whether, under the law as it exists, he would return the slave to his master under such circumstances.

Mr. COX. I would comply with the fugitive slave law; and if the master were a rebel I would catch and try and punish him.

Mr. COLE, of California. Would you return the slave of a Union man?

Mr. COX. Of course I would. Would the gentleman refuse to carry out the law because it happened to be a Union man that owned the slave?

Mr. COLE, of California. Not as I interpret it. The gentleman will not answer my question.

Mr. COX. I have answered his question. He knows it. But how can he act with the other side of the House, who have attained their political position by advising the infraction of this law, and the disregard of the decisions of the courts of the United States? How can he act with that side of the House who declare that they will not obey the Constitution with respect to the fugitive slave law when that Constitution comes in conflict with their own conceptions?

Mr. BLAINE. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. I was not entirely satisfied with his response to the question propounded by the gentleman from California, [Mr. COLE.] The gentleman is lecturing the House upon his views of the Constitution and the laws enacted under it, and therefore I presume he will not in the slightest degree refuse to give us his views upon any particular application of the law. The laws of the United States now allow the enlistment of negroes, and there are a great many slaves of Union men in the service.

Mr. COX. Come to the question; I want the question; but do not make it too sharp.

Mr. BLAINE. Those negroes are regularly enlisted in the Army, and I want to know if the gentleman would return them to their alleged owners. Do not dodge the question by saying that the commissioner will decide the case when it arises. Here is a negro in the ranks of the Army belonging to a loyal owner; would he return that negro to his master? I do not want the gentleman to go off and say that the commissioner would decide so and so; I wish him to give the House his own view of the law.

Mr. COX. The gentleman does not want me to answer the question except just as he wishes I should.

Mr. BLAINE. I want you to answer yes or no.

Mr. COX. Learn to put your questions directly without preface.

Mr. BLAINE. Would the gentleman return to a loyal owner his slave, found in the ranks of the Union Army, fighting for the preservation of the Government? Is that direct enough to suit the impatient gentleman?

Mr. COX. I would return any slave stolen from his legal master, and let that slave take the consequences of the military law.

Mr. BLAINE. I hear the answer of the gentleman from Ohio, but I cannot catch its meaning.

Mr. COX. And I guess that very few people ever catch their slaves under present circumstances. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understand the gentleman to say that unless the slave be stolen he would not return him.

Mr. COX. If I were a commissioner under the law I would return every man whom the law required to be returned.

Mr. BLAINE. But does the law require a man to be returned who is in the ranks of the Union Army? The gentleman skillfully attempts to evade that question.

Mr. COX. The gentleman skillfully puts a question and doggedly shuts his ears to the answer. The law was never made in view of a condition of things like the present.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understand the gentleman to say that he would return men to slavery from the ranks of the Union Army.

Mr. COX. I would return any man now in arms who has been wrongfully taken from his master, and then I would let the proper tribunal decide whether he properly belonged to the military service or not.

Mr. BLAINE. Are the men who are in the Army wrongfully taken?

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman that. Were they wrongfully taken?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir.

Mr. COX. Then I have nothing more to say to the gentleman on that point. The answer is obvious.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, but obvious as the answer may be, the gentleman fails to give it. But I will put another question. Suppose a runaway slave, one not taken by law from his master, enlists and is found in the ranks of the Union Army and is claimed as a fugitive slave, what does he think about that?

Mr. COX. I will tell the gentleman what I think about it. I opposed putting the black men in the Army in the first place. I said there would be trouble about the exchange of prisoners. I warned the House against that policy earnestly, in the interest of our white soldiers who have been kept in prison by reason of this infamous military policy as to black soldiers. I do not believe that the Army has been strengthened one jot or tittle by these black men. I believe they are a positive weakness to the Union Army and the Union cause. General Grant does not use them. He does not put them in the front. He does not fight them. He knows their worth or worthlessness. He uses them where he can, but takes care where he places them.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me tell the gentleman that there are more than one hundred and fifty wounded negroes in one hospital at Fortress Monroe.

Mr. COX. The gentleman may find one hundred and fifty blacks wounded out of one hundred and fifty thousand soldiers. They were with Butler. The wonder is that any escaped. But General Grant is too skillful and able a general to put himself and black men against General Lee and his white men.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not see the pertinency of that to my question.

Mr. COX. I will show the gentleman. I would be willing to let the black soldiers in our Army be taken home to their loyal owners, and if the war must go on, leave to the white men the honor and duty of carrying on the war for the constitutional liberties of white men.

Mr. BLAINE. Precisely; but I still fail to see the pertinency of the gentleman's harangue. I recognize in it the sentiments and the phrases of a stump speech which I had the pleasure of hearing from him more than once before. But it has no relevancy to my question.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is mistaken. I never discussed the subject-matter of his question before in my life. He imagines it to be a stump speech, because, in his familiar parlance, it is a stumper to him. True, I gave him a general answer.

Mr. BLAINE. Quite a general one.

Mr. COX. Then I will not yield any further. If I cannot make him understand, it is not my fault.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all.

Mr. COX. I do not think the gentleman is so stupid as that he cannot understand it. The trouble is he does not want to understand it.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand distinctly that the gentleman does not wish to give me a direct answer.

Mr. COX. I have answered all direct questions directly; and indirect questions I have answered directly and indirectly. What more can I do?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. You have answered every way but directly.

Mr. COX. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Massachusetts has been most thoroughly answered.

The majority want to nullify this constitutional clause as to fugitives by repealing all laws to execute it, and they do not provide any remedy instead of the law, or suggest any other mode for carrying out the constitutional right. They would, in their impulsive movements against slavery, shatter the Constitution. They have undertaken unwisely to keep up this crusade against slavery, with a view, as I charge, to prevent the States South from ever returning to the Union, and to their old relations under the Constitution. They would imbitter the loyal men South against us, and thus weaken the bond of Union. They deepen the abyss between us and the insurgent States.

This is strange enough when we consider that those who thus act call themselves the Union party. But there is still a stranger anomaly. I cannot understand why these gentlemen would destroy the only method of carrying out this extradition system of our Constitution, and yet the other day, when a Spanish subject was arrested by our authorities, and taken from our shores which he sought as an asylum, these gentlemen sustained such extraordinary action. Against the Constitution, without law, without treaty, without evidence, without jury trial, without warrant, without information, by executive power, usurping the treaty power, usurping the law-making power, usurping the power of the judiciary, this Administration delivered to Spain a white refugee; and this Congress, with cringing obsequiousness, bowed before executive dictation and by their legislative action said, "All right, Mr. President, you can seize a white man and take him from the country in defiance of the great right of asylum, but when a black man, escaping from one State to another, and whom we are commanded by the Constitution to deliver up, and under the sanction of our oath to make laws for such delivery, we break down the constitutional clause and the laws sanctioned by the judiciary in order to create in the North an asylum for the blacks of the South." When a white man from another nation is torn away, and the practice and usage of all free and civilized nations is outraged, gentlemen on that side stifle proper resolutions of condemnation.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. The gentleman will allow me to ask him a question for information. In the case referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, was the man charged with crime or was he not?

Mr. HIGBY. I object to further interruptions.

Mr. COX. I say to my friend from New York that that white man was charged with a crime in newspapers, by clamor, but not legally. There was no charge, no warrant, no information, and no trial. I defy gentlemen to give me a resolution of inquiry, to ascertain whether the Executive or the Secretary of State had anything in writing but the request of the Spanish minister upon which to base the arrest and extradition of this Spaniard, seeking an asylum in this country. Upon the request of Señor Tassara, the Spanish minister, Mr. Seward issued his rescript and the man was taken from the privacy of his own room, without the knowledge of his wife, who was in the next chamber. He was hurried on board a steamer, was hurried off to Havana, and is there held as a criminal to be tried. Yet gentlemen upon the other side dare not condemn that. Why? Because it was alleged that he was engaged in some way in the slave trade. Well, some one with less sense than sensibility may cry out, "Oh! you are the defender of the slave trade and slave trader." There is only one answer to this: the monosyllabic answer, "Pshaw." I defend no crime when I defend the right of asylum; nor do I defend slavery when I oppose the repeal of the constitutional law for the rendition of slaves.

It has been said that this Spanish subject, Colonel Arguelles, was engaged in the slave trade, and hence an enemy of the human race. The truth is that he was not engaged in that trade. Slaves had been landed in the district of Colon, in Cuba, under his jurisdiction, and those slaves, as it was alleged, he had sold after they were landed and confiscated, and having made money out of the transaction in violation of his duty he had fled to this country. There was no proof of all this. It was the only allegation, however, and it may be true. Suppose it were. The charge is simply that of a breach of the municipal law of Spain. He is not, then, in the legal sense, as Mr. Seward asserted, an enemy of the human race. He was not a pirate in any legal or moral sense, but a criminal under the laws of Spain. He could only be delivered to Spain under a treaty or a statute, and neither existed between this country and Spain. Yet gentlemen who are becoming so careful about the personal liberty of black men as to refuse to render them up in pursuance of the Constitution sustain the extradition of a white man without evidence, law, treaty, or constitutional authority. If there were a treaty between Spain and the United States similar to this authority in our Constitution with regard to the rendition of black fugitives, no indignation would ever have been hurled by a hospitable people, proud of their system of asylum under our once free Government, against its present perfidious administrators. Upon the same principle, or want of principle, by which the Executive gave up this Spaniard, they would have surrendered Thomas Francis Meagher, a criminal convicted by the judicial tyranny of England, Professor Agassiz, the savant whom the world delights to honor, and every other man of great or little note who comes here from abroad.

We have had many humiliations since the present Administration came into power. We have bowed humbly before the throne of the French usurper, at the beck of an arrogant foreign minister, and allowed an Austrian prince and an imperial dupe to bear a crown from Europe to our continent, and sway a scepter over a democratic republic with which we were in friendly alliance. We have had domestic humiliations by the forcible abduction, imprisonment, and exile of our citizens without law or trial. We have had our very thoughts pinioned, our presses manacled, and our writs of right and liberty annulled. For all these we place our hands upon our mouths in shame; but for this last humiliation, by which America is no longer the home of the oppressed or the refuge of the foreigner, by which we are made the hissing and byword of the nations, we cast our mouths in the dust in abject degradation. We are put to cruel shame before all civilized nations, nay, before even half-civilized nations.

Turkey once protected the Hungarian patriot, Kossuth; Switzerland protects all political refugees in the midst of Europe, and stands there in her republican simplicity and faith as firm as her everlasting mountains against the oppressions around her. We protected the half-made citizen Kotza in an Asiatic harbor, and rescued him from an Austrian ship; but this was when we had a Democrat to represent us in our foreign affairs like William L. Marcy. But while this national Congress stops in the midst of a great civil war to sow new dissensions in our midst by unwise legislation like this for black fugitives, it has shown its servile timidity before the usurpations of our Executive, and has allowed the lettre de cachet of the French monarch to be reissued under the great seal of the United States without a murmur of dissent or denunciation. We are disgraced before the world by the violation of the great feature of our system of polity. What new humiliation is in store for us?

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I am not traveling out of the range of proper discussion by referring to this matter of the extradition of a foreigner without treaty or law. I have considered it fully. I hope before Congress adjourns that the Committee on the Judiciary will report a bill for the purpose of punishing such officers as dare lay their hands upon refugees who are here from countries with which we have no treaty, and in cases where there is no law for their delivery. Such refugees have the right to shoot down the officers who thus arrest them, and be entirely innocent of crime. Refugees under such circumstances would have the right to sue Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Seward, or the marshal of New York for false imprisonment, because of the absence of all law and all treaty in relation to that subject.

What inference do I draw from this? That in my opinion, as to all matters of rendition, whether of fugitives from service or justice, or of political refugees, there is always some law required to carry out in good faith the treaty or agreement upon those subjects. Hence, as between these United States, we had placed here in this second section of the fourth article of the Constitution that any person charged with treason, felony, or other crime fleeing from one State to another should be delivered up, and Congress passed a law to carry that out. For the purpose of delivering up persons accused of crime in one State and fleeing to another, papers are prepared, a prima facie case is made out, and a quasi trial is had. These are indispensable to executive action among our States. So in regard to fugitives from labor, the same preliminaries are required. Proof, a hearing before the commissioner, and warrants for the delivery up of the fugitive to the claimant, these prerequisites are a part of a system as to all renditions.

It is laid down in every authority on international law, and by statesmen who have had instances before them in this country in the various cases growing out of the treaties with Great Britain, France, and other countries, that there can be no rendition of any one from one State to another, except in pursuance of some treaty or law specially made to effectuate the object.

Indeed, in this very case of Arguelles, when our consul at Havana was informed of the flight of Arguelles to New York with a view to his recalculation, the consul at once said that, in the absence of a treaty, no recalculation could be had; that if it were had it would be an "exceptional measure." In this view he is confirmed by Judge Story in his Conflict of Laws; by the practice of this Government in a case as early as 1792, when Mr. Jefferson urged a treaty with Spain; in another case under the Jay treaty in 1799; in another case under Washington's Administration in 1797, for the rendition to Spain of certain criminals from Florida, then a Spanish province; in another case in 1821, when William Wirt, as Attorney General, held that the Executive had no power to arrest a refugee, except for the violation of our own laws; in another case in 1831, of a Portuguese pirate, wherein Attorney General Taney decided the same principle; and in various other cases up to the time of our civil war, where, in a case of demand by Mr. Seward for rebels held by Spain, the Spanish minister of State himself, Miraflores, insisted on a treaty of extradition as a prerequisite to the delivery. It makes my American blood tingle to read the eloquent vindication of this great right from the lips of the minister before the Cortes of Spain. I insert it here as the better sentiment of what is left of the free white men of America:

"The right to give asylum to political refugees is in such manner rooted in the habits, in such sort interwoven with the ideas of tolerance of the present century, and has such frequent, generous, and beneficent applications in the extraordinary and ensanguined political contests of the times we live in, that there is no nation in the world which dares to deny this right, and, moreover, not any one that can renounce its exercise. What would become of the most eminent men of our days if, in the political tempests in which success may be against them, they could not protect themselves beneath the inviolable mantle of foreign hospitality, offering to them haply a friendly country, where they may breathe tranquil and safe; haply a shelter whose thresholds their pursuers cannot overstep, or haply, in fine, the shadow of a national flag floating in a port? In such cases it can be said that the flag which shields them is not merely the ensign of a foreign nation, but rather the banner of humanity and civilization, under whose ample folds all those can be received who are pursued because they are enemies, rather than because they are criminals. We are empowered, therefore, and we ought to give asylum on board our vessels of war in the United States to political refugees. The limitation of asylum lies in the offense. Asylum ought not to serve to give impunity to those guilty of ordinary crimes; that would be to encourage crime, and no civilized nation may do that. But it may be said that it is not easy for the commander of a ship-of-war to know whether the man who presents himself on board, asking for asylum, is or not guilty of ordinary crimes. In such cases the commander should require his word of honor that he has not committed such offenses. But should he give that, and it should afterwards turn out that he has lied, there could be no difficulty in handing over to the authorities a man who to former offenses had added that of the abuse of good faith, in being wanting in his parole. And if the Government of Washington wishes to acquire a perfect and positive right to the delivery to them of those guilty of ordinary crimes, it will be enabled to do so by means of a treaty of extradition, to the conclusion of which the Spanish Government would not oppose itself, as it has not refused to conclude such with other States."

I need not call the roll of English judges or statesmen who have spoken to the same effect with legal learning and indignant eloquence. The Creole case gave rise to these discussions in the English Parliament. The great names of Aberdeen, Denman, Campbell, Brougham, and others might be cited, to show that the sanctity of asylum can only be invaded in pursuance of treaty or of statute.

Yet, in defiance of all precedent, practice, and authority, this House proposes not to repeal the constitutional clause requiring fugitives from labor to be delivered up, but, preserving that clause, to nullify it altogether by repealing the law by which alone the clause can be executed.

On the charitable assumption that gentlemen on the other side intend to execute the Constitution, I say that it is indispensable that some law should exist to carry it out. As in the case of a treaty, as in the Arguelles case, so in the case of a fugitive slave there must be some law to carry out the treaty or clause of rendition. To repeal the law made for that purpose, is a cowardly blow at the Constitution itself. It is a breach of faith, a breach of treaty; and between independent nations would be a casus belli. Between States banded like ours under a Constitution, it is a flagrant violation of a sacred compact.

I know that I may be considered as having wandered in discussing this Spanish case, but the majority here would not allow me to discuss it upon my resolution offered last Monday. They called for the previous question to smother discussion. They referred it by a hostile vote to a hostile committee. Therefore I choose, on the subject of the rendition of fugitive slaves, to show how the Administration is illustrating the rendition of another class of persons. The law in the one case, is analogous to the law in the other. Wherever there has been a treaty with any nation in respect to any person fleeing from one nation to another, there has been a law to carry that out. The gentlemen propose to repeal a similar law in the case of fugitive slaves. What do they propose to do in addition? Nothing. They leave this part of the Constitution a dead letter. They leave it not to law, but to the passions of the claimants to rescue their slaves.

Mr. SLOAN rose.

Mr. HIGBY. I object to any further interruption.

Mr. COX. I have a special reason for yielding to the gentleman. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that the Republicans in his State long since repudiated the fugitive slave law.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to reply to the gentleman.

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SLOAN. I rose for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Ohio whether he believes, as has been announced upon that side of the House, that slavery is dead.

Mr. COX. Then I ask the gentleman does he believe slavery is dead?

Mr. SLOAN. That is the question I put.

Mr. COX. I put it to the gentleman first, as my opinion may be influenced by his judgment.

Mr. SLOAN. I object to that Yankee mode of answering a question.

Mr. COX. I am not a Yankee. I want to know whether the gentleman thinks slavery is dead; and then perhaps I may alter my opinion.

Mr. SLOAN. The question is whether the gentleman from Ohio concurs in the view announced by some gentleman upon that side of the House, that slavery is dead.

Mr. COX. I do not believe that slavery is entirely dead; do you?

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman believe it will be destroyed by this war and rebellion?

Mr. COX. What would be the use of the repeal of the fugitive slave law if slavery were altogether dead? Would not the law be a dead letter?

Mr. SLOAN. That is an evasion of the question.

Mr. COX. Why bring in this bill if slavery is dead?

Mr. SLOAN. In reply, I ask why keep alive this law for the rendition of fugitive slaves if slavery is already dead?

Mr. COX. Because I am informed by gentlemen here from Kentucky, what I know to be true, that there are loyal men yet slaveholders. I would give them the benefit of the compact which our fathers made with their fathers. Would not you?

Mr. SLOAN. That is an evasion. Does the gentleman believe slavery is dead?

Mr. COX. No, sir. Do you?

Mr. SLOAN. I believe it ought to die; [laughter:] and I believe it will die if the loyal people of this country succeed in putting down the rebellion.

Mr. COX. So, on the other hand, I want you to die—politically—but you do not. [Laughter.] God in heaven hasten that day; but you are not entirely dead yet.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman believe that the institution of slavery will survive the issue of this war and rebellion?

Mr. COX. Now the gentleman compliments me by thinking I am prophetic enough to look through these dark clouds of Republican policy and these red clouds of civil war into our future. I cannot see that the institution of slavery will be altogether eradicated by this war. I think it was dying inch by inch, under the blows of war, until the President revived and stimulated rebellion by his African policies and proclamation. But I do not believe that slavery is yet altogether dead, though we must confess it is rather unhealthy and probably may die.

Mr. SLOAN. There was no compliment in the question I asked. I supposed the gentleman at least possessed the ordinary intelligence of the members of this House, and that he had some settled convictions on the subject of whether this war would extinguish the institution of slavery, and I supposed he must have had an object in desiring to have this fugitive slave law continued upon our statute-book. If slavery is not to survive the war this is a useless and obsolete statute, and ought to be wiped from the statute-book, for it has always been, in my judgment, a disgrace to the nation. But if the gentleman is so strenuous for its continuance upon the statute-book, he must believe that slavery is not dead nor even in the process of dying, but is to survive the convulsions of this war, and is looking to the preservation of the guarantees of that accursed institution after peace is returned.

Mr. COX. I have let the gentleman speak some time; but he has not returned the courtesy by answering my question. I answered his frankly. What I want to know is whether or not he thinks slavery is already dead.

Mr. SLOAN. No, sir; but I think it is dying, and I think the loyal and patriotic men of this country will trample its life out in this civil war and rebellion.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Wisconsin, of all others, is not the man to talk in that way, for the reason that he was opposed to the execution of this fugitive slave law long before this rebellion broke out. I understood the gentleman upon this floor to confess that he once took the ground that that law should not be executed, and he proposed—to use the tenderest expression—something seditious, something rebellious—a resistance to the Federal Government when it undertook to carry out that law in the State of Wisconsin. I ask the Clerk, as a part of the logic of the history of the gentleman, to read what I send to him.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Joint resolution relative to the decision of the United States Supreme Court regarding the supreme court of Wisconsin.

"Resolved, That the Government framed by the Constitution of the United States was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, but that, as in all other cases of compact among parties having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself as well of infractions as of the mode and measure of redress.

"Resolved, That the principle and construction contended for by the party which now rules in the councils of the nation, that the General Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it, stop nothing short of despotism, since the discretion of those who administer the Government, and not the Constitution, would be the measure of their powers; that the several States which formed that instrument, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of its infraction, and that a positive defiance of those sovereignties, of all unauthorized acts done, or attempted to be done, under color of that instrument, is the rightful remedy.

"Approved March 19, 1859.

"ALEXANDER W. RANDALL, Governor."

Mr. COX. These resolutions were not the impulsive throbbings of a popular meeting, sympathizing in hot blood "with the panting fugitive," but the cool action of a deliberative assembly of legislative malcontents, determined to provoke, defy, and resist the Federal Government. The gentleman defended that action. Where does he belong? With what grace can he appear here to justify, as a present necessity, the repeal of that law which he defied when no necessity existed, except the necessity for good faith in its execution? He is not the man to make the question for its present repeal. He must justify his forcible resistance to the law anterior to this civil war. He should be placed on the list of rebels; and only one tenth of his nature be allowed, on repentance, to express itself through him!

I wish to say further, just here, that these resolutions are in part copied from the old Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, but not interpreted as we Democrats interpret them. We interpret those resolutions to mean that the mode and measure of redress which any State might take for the remedy of grievances should be in pursuance of the Constitution by the amendments thereof. This is Mr. Madison's interpretation of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions. But the Legislature of Wisconsin and the gentlemen in its defense, as well as the Republicans in Ohio who proposed similar resolutions in our State, when they sought to array Ohio against the United States, gave to them an interpretation precisely similar to that given by South Carolina and Alabama when they passed their secession ordinances. Claiming the sovereign independence of the State, and that the Federal Government by making itself the exclusive judge of the powers delegated to it, and the unquestionable right of the State to judge of the infraction of the Constitution, these Republican disunionists of March, 1859, hurled down the glove of "positive defiance," and prepared, as they did in Ohio, "the rightful remedy" by forcible resistance. South Carolina bettered their example. With the same plentiful lack of patriotism and the same plentiful supply of sedition, she and her sisters in rebellion imitated this bad example.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. COX. No, sir, not now. I want the other resolution read.

Mr. SLOAN. I appeal to the gentleman in fairness to allow me a word in reply.

Mr. COX. I think I have done very fairly by you.

Mr. SLOAN. I think not.

Mr. COX. Before the Clerk reads the other resolution allow me to say that while the revolutionary resolutions approved by Governor Randall were pending in the Wisconsin Legislature, Mr. Horn offered the following as a substitute, which was rejected by yeas 36, nays 49—a strict party vote; the Democrats voting ay, and the Republicans no.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Whereas it would lead to anarchy and a dissolution of the Union if the interpretation of the Constitution should be usurped by the different State courts, in opposition to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it was placed by those who mutually pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor? Therefore,

"Resolved, That we will abide by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, declared by said court to be constitutional, without regard to our private views and feelings."

Mr. COX. The gentleman defends this action in voting down such resolutions. He thereby defended and helped along the causes of "dissolution." Is he not, therefore, equally with the revolutionists South guilty of bringing these dire calamities upon the land?

Mr. ASHLEY. I want to ask my colleague at what time the party of which I am a member ever passed such resolutions?

Mr. COX. Such resolutions were adopted in May, 1859, in Ohio, after the rescue case in Cleveland; and the gentleman himself is put down as one of the committee on resolutions on that occasion. I have here the Ohio State Journal of May 26, 1859, in which my colleague figures as one of the leading men in that great secession-abolition movement in Ohio. I will do him the justice to say that four years afterwards, when told, for the first time as it seemed, that his name was recorded as one of the members of that convention, the gentleman's memory had at once all the waters of oblivion rolled over it, and he had forgotten all about the interest he took in that meeting.

Mr. ASHLEY. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COX. With great pleasure.

Mr. ASHLEY. I want to say that the party to which I am attached never, in State convention in Ohio, passed such a resolution; that I never was present in any convention when such a resolution was passed; and that I never subscribed to that doctrine.

Mr. COX. I did not say it was at a State convention. But now I say that at a State convention of the Republican party on the 13th of July, 1855—the first Republican convention in Ohio—this resolution was passed:

"That the people, who constitute the supreme power in the United States, should guard with jealous care the rights of the several States, as independent governments. No encroachments upon their legislative or judicial prerogatives should be permitted from any quarter."

This was done at the nomination of Mr. Chase for Governor, who on accepting it said that "the independence and sovereignty of the State in her legislature and judiciary must be asserted and maintained." The gentleman supported the resolution and nominee. The object of the party then was to get up a controversy with the Federal authority and break it down by State action.

But the convention to which I had particular reference was a great gathering at Cleveland; as the report says, "the influx of all the surrounding country." About ten thousand men came in with banners, singing revolutionary round-lays; and this great mob of persons was addressed by Governor Denison in a letter, and by Governor Chase in person. My colleague [Mr. SPALDING] presided and made a speech—the only sensible speech of the grand occasion. I always supposed that my colleague was also there in person.

Mr. ASHLEY. No, sir.

Mr. COX. Then my colleague never disavowed it until this moment.

Mr. ASHLEY. I was never called upon to disavow it.

Mr. COX. It was published all over Ohio at the time. The gentleman has received the political benefits of his cooperation with that movement of the "sons of liberty," and it is too late now to disavow it after it has been heralded for months and years as one of the great signs of anti-slavery advancement. I pass by the frothy declamation of the speakers, inciting revolution, to quote for my colleague the "declaration" which was adopted with great enthusiasm:

"This assembly of the people of Ohio, holding—

"That, next to our duty to the Supreme Being, is the obligation to preserve our free institutions and our civil liberties;

"That the greatest tyrants have been those whose titles have been least questioned;

"That every violation of the Constitution should be watched with jealousy and resented with spirit;

"That the history of every free people has shown the impossibility of a cordial compliance with laws which neither embody nor execute the public will;

"That the enforcement of such laws, against an unwilling people, is productive only of evils threatening public order, and the stability of governmental institutions."

The enforcement of law against an "unwilling people!" Why, the sentiment is the very boldness and badness of secession, the parent of civil strife, the source of all our woes. Holding thus, that meeting proceeded to declare:

"That the several States composing the United States of America are not united on the principle of unlimited submission to their General Government, but that by compact, under the style and title of a Constitution for the United States, and of amendments thereto, they constituted a General Government for certain definite powers, reserving each State to itself the residuary mass of right to their own self-government; and that whenever the General Government assumes undelegated powers, its acts are unauthorized, void, and of no force, and being void, can derive no validity from mere judicial interpretation; that to this compact each State acceded as a State, and is an integral party; that this Government created by this compact was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion and not the Constitution the measure of its powers; but that, in all other cases of compact among parties having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as of the mode and measure of redress."

For years in Ohio this doctrine ran its round of ruin, under the sanction of my colleague's [Mr. ASHLEY's] name, and this is his first open disavowal of it! That meeting gave its interpretation of the "mode and measure of redress" by expressions of resistance, which resulted in a pledge from the Republican government to use the arms of Ohio against the Federal authority. Ball cartridges were ordered to be manufactured to carry out these designs of bloody revolution.

Whether my colleague helped to draw these resolutions, or by his absence and subsequent acquiescence in them, with his name attached, tacitly favored them, it does not matter. He voted for a man for judge of the supreme court of Ohio who afterwards on the bench carried out in his decision the identical doctrine declared in the Wisconsin resolutions and copied in these Ohio resolutions. I refer to Judge Brinkerhoff.

Mr. ASHLEY. Does my colleague pretend to say that that decision of Judge Brinkerhoff endorsed these resolutions?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; almost word for word.

Mr. ASHLEY. Not at all.

Mr. COX. We will see about that presently. Thank God we had a majority on the bench who decided that the fugitive slave law was constitutional; but Judge Brinkerhoff decided the other way, and the gentleman voted for him. And I say now that the reason why that convention and the party which sanctioned it did not succeed in dragging Ohio out of the Union and making revolutionary resistance to the Federal Government was—and I mention this in all confidence to the House—that the committee levied a "fund of liberty" on the citizens of the Western Reserve to pay the lawyers for suing out of the State courts a writ of habeas corpus! When they found that they had to pay a dollar a head for breaking out into rebellion they revolted against revolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY. Not being present at that meeting I am not responsible for what was said or done there, but I call the attention of my colleague to the fact that he misrepresents Judge Brinkerhoff in what he says of that decision.

Mr. COX. The gentleman may not be willing to take the responsibility now, but he lived and gathered honors for years under its load. His party constituents who have just nominated him by acclamation are yet faithful to him, and amid all obloquy cling to him for his bold avowals of anti-slavery sentiments. As to Judge Brinkerhoff, I will insert his language in my remarks, when it will appear that my colleague is conveniently ignorant of what the judge did say.

I read from Judge Brinkerhoff's dissenting opinion, (Ohio State Reports, volume nine, page 228:)

"I know of no way other than through the action of the State governments in which the reserved rights and powers of the States can be preserved and the guarantees of individual liberty be vindicated. The history of this country, brief as it is, already shows that the Federal judiciary is never behind the other departments of that Government, and often foremost, in the assumption of non-granted powers. And let it be finally granted that the Federal Government is in the last resort the authoritative judge of the extent of its own powers, and the reservations and limitations of the Constitution which the framers of that instrument so jealously endeavored to fix and guard will soon be, if they are not already, obliterated."

It was upon this reasoning, similar to that employed by secessionists at Montgomery and abolitionists at Milwaukee and Cleveland, that this judge sought to array the States against the Federal Government by denying the authority of the latter over the question of rendition. He held that the Federal Government was a usurper of State rights, and "denied that the decisions of a usurping party in favor of the validity of its own assumptions can settle anything." He in fact held, as Attorney General Wolcott argued, (9 Ohio Reports, 114,) that "as to these powers, the States stand to each other and to the Federal Government as absolutely foreign nations." Yet my colleague voted for both Judge Brinkerhoff and Mr. Wolcott!

One more word to this Wisconsin gentleman, [Mr. SLOAN,] the gentleman who has more than "ordinary intelligence," the gentleman who, at an early day, helped to bring this war on by just such a course, if not worse, than that pursued by the Republicans of Ohio.

I assert that these gentlemen in their resolutions and conduct proposed to array the States in armed hostility against the Federal Union. Oh yes! they talk now against State rights, as if these rights were the teterrima causa belli. If State rights carried into rebellion be the cause, how will these gentlemen escape condemnation? Failing to observe the limitations of the Constitution and the reservations therein to the States, they do not want any State to have its rights now; not now. Not so in 1859. At that time they were for giving the States all sovereign rights, including nullification and resistance by force against the Federal authority. When the Democrats appealed to the country for the right of the Federal Government to exercise the powers clearly delegated to it under the Constitution with respect to fugitives from labor, these devotees of the new gospel of black liberty cried out in chorus: "No, no! All these laws passed in pursuance of the Constitution come in collision with our peculiar notions of the higher law of our conscience and our God. No matter if the Supreme Court have decided the law to be constitutional; we will array our personal liberty bills against your fugitive slave bills, and our courts against the Federal courts. We will release the men you arrest for resisting the Federal authorities, by State writs of habeas corpus, or 'rescue' them from their incarceration!" They did not then undervalue the habeas corpus. Oh no! It was made for the black man. They were over-zealous then for the great writ of freedom, to prevent the proper exercise of the Federal authority. But now they, I mean you, have ignored that right and nullified that writ. You will not allow it for the white man when imprisoned without warrant and punished without trial. You are against the rendition of the black man in pursuance of the Constitution; and you give up a white man who has sought an asylum on our shores without the form or substance of law or treaty, and in "positive defiance" of the law of nations and the Constitution. Your Executive is a usurper of the powers wisely distributed to the other departments of the Government. Here you sit to-day striving to strike down the only mode whereby one peculiar clause of the Constitution can be carried out, and propose no mode as a substitute either by State or Federal action. You will not allow an individual to take his slave by the sanction of the Constitution alone; you will pass no law to help him. You will not allow him to go into a free State and have his right there by jury trial, because you cannot try the claimant's right to his slave by a jury in a free State. You will not allow the law of 1793, which George Washington assisted in making; yet you strike down all the great rights of personal freedom for the white man fixed by the fathers of the country in our fundamental law, because you are bent, because you are demoniacally bent, upon riving this Union in twain, and separating its parts forever. Your ideas are not those of the higher, but of the lower law. They do not come from the sources of law and light and love above. They sunder all the ties of allegiance and all the sanctions of faith. You are destructionists; you would tear down all that is valuable and sacred in the past and build up nothing in their place. You are revolutionists. You were trying for years by wrongful interference and force to nullify the very law which you now seek to expunge by repeal. You diligently sought to embroil the States in collision with the Federal Government, and have succeeded in bringing with your advent into power the consequences we predicted, a relentless and bloody war. I charge it upon every man of you on the other side of the House who took any part in these seditious infractions of the Constitution, who counseled individual and State resistance and fomented sectional strife, that you are responsible before God and the country for our present calamities. The enormous burdens of taxation, the widow's tears, the orphan's curse, the wail of the bereaved, and the future destitution and consuming desolation of this land, all cry aloud against you as the authors of this worst evil which ever befell a suffering people!

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to detain the House but for a single moment. The gentleman from Ohio who has just taken his seat has alluded to some resolutions passed by the Legislature of Wisconsin. He had the fairness while commenting upon these resolutions to admit that the principles which were announced in those resolutions were the principles contained in the Kentucky resolutions of 1798. The only difference between the resolutions of the State of Wisconsin and the Kentucky resolutions, which formed a part of the Democratic platform in 1852 and 1856, was that they were applied to a different subject. If there was any error on the part of the Legislature of Wisconsin or on the part of the people of Wisconsin it was only in this: that they had seen these Kentucky resolutions of 1798, under the sanction of the Democratic party, doing service in the cause of bolstering up and perpetuating slavery in this country. They took the principles contained in those resolutions and applied them to the cause of human freedom. If the principle embodied in those resolutions was erroneous it was a principle taught them by the gentleman from Ohio and his party. The Legislature of Wisconsin wrested these resolutions of 1798 from the base uses to which the Democratic party of the country had put them, of serving and attempting to bolster up with them the institution of slavery, and applied them to the cause of liberty in the case of a fugitive slave in the State of Wisconsin.

Now, sir, for members who have acted with that party, and who have indorsed those resolutions, to charge it upon our State as a reproach for passing these resolutions is simply self-stultification. It is an inconsistency that no man who belongs to that party and has examined the subject, who has any regard for his own reputation, would be guilty of upon this floor. It may have been an error on the part of the Legislature of Wisconsin to affirm the doctrine that is contained in the resolutions of 1798, and which is reiterated in the report that Mr. Madison made to the Virginia Legislature in 1799; but if it is an error it is one which the gentleman from Ohio and all who belong to that party have taught to the people of Wisconsin, and taught to the people of the whole country.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SLOAN. I will.

Mr. COX. The gentleman does not do me justice. I gave an interpretation to those resolutions which the gentleman has forgotten, and I gave it in the words of Mr. Madison himself, as published in his private correspondence, printed by Mr. McGuire, of this city. He says that the proper interpretation of those resolutions is this: that the mode and measure of redress which a State may take, and the only mode and measure of redress which a State may take for any grievance, is an amendment to the Constitution by the mode proposed in that Constitution. And that is the Democratic doctrine on that subject.

Mr. SLOAN. What mode or measure of redress did the people of Wisconsin propose to take in that case, except by an appeal to the constitutional tribunal?

Mr. COX. They did not propose to appeal to the Constitution. They appealed to force, they took up arms, and the gentleman backed them up in it. I heard him upon this floor say that they were right.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman is mistaken in his facts in relation to the people of our State. I deny that any authorized or organized force in that State took up arms to obstruct the execution of the fugitive slave law.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. SLOAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I rise to a point of order. I object to the gentleman from Wisconsin yielding any further for the discussion of side-bar questions. I insist that the discussion shall be confined to the pending question. I want to get a vote before we adjourn to-day, and I shall object to any further interruption of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. All this debate being in reference to the fugitive slave law is in order.

Mr. COX. The gentleman yielded to me before the objection was taken by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not object to yielding to the gentleman from Ohio, although it would be extending a larger measure of courtesy to him than he saw fit to extend to me.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman object to me?

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I do.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I content myself with simply saying that the misrepresentation which is attempted to be put upon the resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin by the gentleman from Ohio are unfounded; that, so far as the announcement of principle in those resolutions is concerned, they are an exact copy in language of those famous Kentucky resolutions, and that whatever construction may be put upon the Kentucky resolutions by Mr. Madison or by the gentleman from Ohio can be put upon the Wisconsin resolutions. The offense of which Wisconsin was guilty, as I have said, was in wresting those resolutions, made to do service in the cause of human slavery by the Democratic party in this country, to support the cause of human liberty. The Legislature and the supreme court of the State interposed the principles contained in these resolutions between the fugitive and his pursuers. It rests with no man who has been a member of the Democratic party and supported its platforms and candidates to reproach the State of Wisconsin for the passage of those resolutions. It is a case of self-stultification so gross that I wonder any man can be guilty of it here without the blush of shame mantling his cheek.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, obtained the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. How long?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. A few minutes only.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I propose to occupy the floor but five minutes, and then to move the previous question; but I am inclined to give way to my friend for ten minutes.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I object, unless the gentleman yields unconditionally.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My friend can yield me the floor and get it again when I get through, can he not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not able to answer the gentleman whether he can or not.

Mr. BLAINE. In the colloquy which took place with the gentleman from Ohio—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is not in order; the gentleman from New York is upon the floor, and objection is made to yielding.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to send to the desk a dispatch in reference to negroes fighting, to which allusion has been made, to be read.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Gentlemen on the other side have objected to yielding on this side, and now I object.

Mr. BLAINE. I withdraw it.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I will ask the Clerk to read it as part of my speech.

The Clerk read the dispatch, as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, June 12, 1864.

Major FOSTER, A. A. G.:

Am informed that at Frankfort there were in the fort three hundred negroes, unarmed, for refuge. After rebels had captured two guns the negroes were allowed by Governor Bramlette to fight with their fists and knives, and recaptured the guns. General Fry telegraphs camp Nelson, sixteen hundred negro recruits there; very useful fortifying. General Thomas came last night.

R. D. MUSSEY,
United States Army.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to occupy the attention of the House over five minutes; but it is due that I should say a few words with reference to the question involved in the bill before the House.

The Constitution of the United States, in section two, article four, provides that no person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service. Such is the provision of the Constitution, and there has been certain legislation supposed to come within that provision and which is now upon the statute-book. The bill before the House proposes to repeal those statutes. The power authorized to enact those statutes may also repeal them, and the only question is the practical one whether it is wise and proper to repeal them.

I hear but two objections alleged to their repeal. The gentleman from Ohio who has just taken his seat [Mr. Cox] urges one prominent objection, and to illustrate it cites a case which occurred recently in this country where a citizen of the island of Cuba was remanded by reason of crime and surrendered up by the Government. He says it was a monstrous outrage upon the rights of foreign citizens.

Now, sir, the individual who was thus demanded by the Government of Cuba had done, what? He had been guilty of that which is proclaimed by every civilized Government upon the face of the globe as piracy; he had been engaged in taking men by force from their homes and country, and of transporting them to Cuba against their wills.

The gentleman from Ohio deprecates the act of the Government in surrendering up this criminal, but not a word escapes his lips in condemnation of that man for having thus perpetrated a crime, not only offensive to this nation, but also to the civilized world. He concedes that the remanding of this man was, by reason of the commission of a crime, recognized by the laws of the Government of Cuba.

Now, sir, we ask the repeal of this law; and why? Suppose some man from Cuba, like the gentleman alluded to by the gentleman from Ohio, had stolen three hundred negroes from the shores of Africa, and then had brought them to these shores, and a portion of them had been landed and sold in Missouri or Maryland, and then had escaped from their purchaser into another State, under this law the gentleman from Ohio, as commissioner, would have surrendered them up to the claimant. Now, I insist that we should have a court by which such person thus seized in any other State shall have the usual trial by jury in the State where arrested to ascertain whether he is entitled to his liberty or not. By a repeal of these statutes there may such hearing and trial be had in accordance with the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State where such person is found. I ask that it be repealed for another reason, and my friend from Ohio has given an instance which peculiarly illustrates the necessity of the repeal. Under the laws of the United States, enacted by the present Congress, a colored man in the State of Missouri or Maryland, being a slave, may enlist into the armies of the United States. If he should do so, and should be stationed in the State of New York, under the laws sought to be repealed he might be seized and remanded to slavery; and a further consequence would be that he might be dealt with as a deserter from his post of duty. Here is a conflict in our laws, an absurdity which demands a remedy. Under the laws sought to be repealed our Army may be invaded and our troops consigned to slavery.

But independent of that, I object to these laws. It is conceded by nearly every one that they are a dead-letter upon our statute-book, and from high moral considerations I would strike from the statute-book every law which the people condemn and so despise that they cannot be enforced. The retention and violation of a bad law leads to the contempt and disregard of good ones. I do not object to enforcing laws, but I do object to the retention of a law so unjust, so unpopular, that you can find no citizen willing to execute it. These statutes are repugnant to the sense of every good man who has not been educated to believe that the slave code is more imperative than the Constitution itself. I say, sweep out a law which no man respects who is not a votary of human slavery. It is an abomination. I would begin with this. It will be one prop knocked down under slavery. Then I would amend the Constitution, and so strike out another and another prop of this iniquitous system, which is conceded by every man to have been the foundation and procuring cause of the war that is now desolating the land, until the whole is swept away. For these reasons I would repeal these obnoxious statutes.

Mr. SPEAKER, I stated that I should occupy the attention of the House but a few moments. I now move the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the previous question, and I will renew it.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I withdraw the previous question for the gentleman from Illinois, he promising to renew it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of detaining the House long; but it seems to me that a bill of this kind, and especially after the speech made on it by the gentleman from Ohio, ought not to be pressed to a vote without giving some little time for reply.

I am in favor of the repeal of the fugitive slave law for divers reasons. In the first place the Constitution does not require such law. I would give to slaveholders what they have got by the letter of the Constitution, and no more, until we can amend the Constitution. I am in favor of its repeal, again, for the reason that I am in favor of striking all the blows I possibly can at the institution of slavery, and just as fast as I can. In the third place I am in favor of the repeal of the fugitive slave law because it is a disgrace, a standing, blasting disgrace upon the statute-books of the nation.

If I understand the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] he would, armed with this fugitive slave law, go to the field and strip from these valiant sable defenders of the Republic their uniforms, take from them their muskets, and in place of their knapsacks on their backs lay on stripes and chains and manacles, and send them back again to slavery. He would not stop there, but would even follow the wounded black soldier to the hospital, tear him from the hands of his surgeon, and with chains and stripes take him back to his master and slavery. I would like to put the question to that gentleman or to any other who sympathizes with him on that question, whether he is willing to follow out to its logical sequence the argument which he makes; whether he desires to strip the uniforms from all these men who are now soldiers of the Republic, occupying the most honorable position that any man can occupy in the nation—defenders of their country; whether he is willing to go to the field and strip the uniforms off these men, and return them to a dark and dismal slavery.

The gentleman from Ohio expressed his sympathy for Arguelles, the slave pirate—

Mr. COX. I expressed no sympathy at all for Arguelles.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Why, Mr. Speaker, under this fugitive slave law, the fugitive has no trial until he is taken back to the place from whence he escaped, for the examination before the commissioner is not a trial; you put the iron hand of the law upon him and take him back to his master; and there is the only place where he can have anything like a trial.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot be expected to yield any of my time, which is but six minutes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman misinterprets me.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In the case of a man-stealer the gentleman objects to any such summary proceeding. He objects to sending the pirate to the place of his crimes for trial. If he had been charged with some petty crime, if he had been some poor ordinary "cuss," and had been sent back to answer, there would not have been a word of complaint from the gentleman. But he is a man-stealer, a towering rascal. He has committed the greatest crime that a man can commit on God's green earth, the sum of all villainies, and therefore he is worthy of being made a plank in the Democratic platform. If we have not got a precedent or law for sending back a man like that, we will make one. It is the destiny of republics like this to set precedents, not to follow them.

Oh! Mr. Speaker, I understand where the trouble is with that side of the House. The effect of the action of sending back this rascal to Cuba was the emancipation of eighty human beings—that is where the shoe pinches. All the trouble is that upon Arguelles landing in Cuba the chains fell from the limbs of eighty men—that is what troubles my friend upon the other side of the House. If he had stolen money or horses, some petty crime, it would have been all well enough, and you would have heard no dissent; but he is so infamous, his crime so high-handed and God-defying, that he is worthy of a plank in the Democratic platform, and a nail from the Democratic party.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in compliance with my promise, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, demanded the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill. The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. SCOFIELD stated that Mr. FENTON was detained at his room by ill health, and had paired with Mr. STEELE of New York.

Mr. COX stated that Mr. VOORHEES had paired with Mr. ROLLINS of New Hampshire.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN stated that Mr. POMEROY had paired with Mr. NELSON.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL AND RESOLUTION.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 149) concerning certain school lands in township forty-five north, range seven east, in the State of Missouri; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 55) granting certain privileges to the city of Des Moines, in the State of Iowa.

THE GOLD BILL.

Mr. HOOPER. I rise to a question of privilege. I call upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the gold bill was laid on the table.

Mr. COX. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOOPER. I propose to submit a few remarks on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. DAWSON. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the motion to adjourn is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts was entitled to the floor, and the gentleman from Ohio, therefore, had not the floor to move to adjourn.

Mr. DAWSON. I submit then that a motion to reconsider a vote laying a bill on the table is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that question of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 66, noes 53.

Mr. HOOPER. I desire to ask the Chair what will be the condition of this motion to-morrow if the House adjourn now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer the gentleman if no objection be made.

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then announces that the House stands adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 14, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

On motion of Mr. WADE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of importers and merchants of the city of New York, praying that goods in bond may be exempted from the operations of the resolution of April 29, 1864, imposing an additional duty of fifty per cent. on goods imported into the United States for sixty days; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented six petitions of men and women of the United States, praying for the abolition of slavery, and such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a copy of the acts, resolutions, and memorials, and of the journal of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah for the thirteenth annual session for the years 1863-64; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I present a petition of settlers on the Absentee Shawnee Indian reservation in Douglas county, Kansas, praying that in any treaty which may be made with the Shawnee nation of Indians it may be stipulated that settlers upon the said reservation shall not be subject to pay more than an average price of $1 25; which I move be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is it proposed to print a petition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to its printing. It is very uncommon in the Senate to print a petition.

Mr. SUMNER. The motion to print ought to go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This petition relates to a matter of material importance to the interests of my State, and I should like Senators to understand it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is very unusual to print petitions.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn; and the petition will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 521) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens, under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863," approved June 1, 1864, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 494) to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 495) to amend the charter of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 186) to incorporate the Baltimore and Washington Depot and Potomac Ferry Railway Company, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 298) to incorporate the Potomac Ferry Company, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 115) for the proper organization of the levy court of the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 65) in relation to the public printing; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

CALIFORNIA STATE PRISON.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 306) to grant to the State of California certain lands for State prison purposes, have directed me to report the same back with amendments. I understood from the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS,] who introduced the bill, that it was very important to have it passed at this session, and I think he would desire its present consideration. I will therefore ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Will it occupy any time?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose not. I will state that four hundred and fifty acres of land are now occupied by the State prison of California and are used for prison purposes. It was supposed that this land belonged to private individuals; but a doubt has arisen on that subject, and the opinion of the attorney general of California is that the Government of the United States really has a better title. This is but a release to the State of that title.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments of the Committee on Public Lands were to strike out the word "the" in the fifteenth line of the bill, and the words "thesame being about four hundred and fifty acres more or less" in the sixteenth line, and to insert the words "not exceeding in quantity four hundred and fifty acres," and to add at the end of the bill the words "without prejudice to the rights or claims of any other parties;" so that the bill will read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the right of the United States to the lands comprising that portion of the promontory or point known as "Punta de Quintin" or "Point San Quintin," lying east of the north and south line dividing sections No. 3 and 10 from No. 2 and 11, in township No. 1 north, range No. 6 west of Mount Diablo meridian, embracing portions of Nos. 11, 12, 13, and 14 of the said township No. 1 north, range No. 6 west, upon which the State prison of the State of California is now located, not exceeding in quantity four hundred and fifty acres, be, and the same is hereby, ceded, granted, and confirmed to the said State of California.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know if four hundred and fifty acres of land are necessary for a penitentiary.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is a question I asked the Senator from California who introduced the bill, and he informed me that that amount of land was being used for the State prison of California, and for State prison purposes. A part of it is used in the manufacture of brick and a part is cultivated as agricultural land by the convicts.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state for the information of the Senate that it is a piece of land purchased of private parties by the State of California eleven years since. The State finally purchased it from two or three owners. In all they have paid $90,000 for the land, which is really worth fifty cents per acre. A considerable piece of it is a swampy plat that has been filled up and made into a brick-yard, where the prisoners are employed in making bricks.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

TERRITORY OF IDAHO.

Mr. WADE. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 486) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Idaho," approved March 3, 1863, have directed me to report it back without amendment; and I ask for its present consideration. It will not take a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Governor of the Territory of Idaho to reapportion that Territory for the election of members of the council and house of representatives of the Legislative Assembly; but the apportionment is to be based on an enumeration of the inhabitants and qualified voters of the several counties and districts of the Territory, to be taken by such person and in such mode as the Governor shall designate and appoint; and the persons so appointed are to receive a reasonable compensation therefor, to be paid out of the territorial treasury. This is not to be construed to divest any member of the council, elected at the first election in the Territory, of any right he may have acquired by virtue of that election, who was elected from any county or district within the present limits of the Territory of Idaho. The annual election in the Territory for the election of all officers, provided for by the laws of the Territory, for the year 1864, is to be held at such places as are now provided by law, and such other places as the Governor may direct, on the second Monday of October.

Mr. WADE. The necessity for this bill arises from the fact that we have divided that Territory during this session, which makes it necessary to have a reapportionment for members of the Legislative Assembly. That is the object of the bill, and that is all there is of it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESERVATION OF PUBLIC WORKS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders, and take up House bill No. 450, to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States. It is a very important measure, and will not occupy two minutes of time, I think.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to taking up that bill until resolutions can be called for. They have become about obsolete in the Senate, and I think it is time to take them up.

The motion of Mr. CHANDLER was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in section one, line six, to strike out the words "protecting the commerce of the lakes by causing," and to insert the word "repairing;" and in line nine, after the word "Superior," to strike out the words "to be repaired and made useful for purposes of commerce and navigation;" so that the section will read:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in repairing the public works connected with the harbors on Lakes Champlain, Ontario, Erie, Saint Clair, Huron, Michigan, and Superior, so far as the same, in his judgment, may be necessary.

The next amendment was in section two, line five, after the word "repairing," to strike out the words "and rendering useful for purposes of commerce and navigation;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the further sum of $100,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in repairing such of the public works connected with the harbors on the seaboard of the United States as may, in his judgment, need such expenditures.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Michigan, who reported this bill, would make some explanation of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will do so very readily, if the Senator desires it. A large sum was asked at the opening of this session to carry on these repairs, I think $651,000. The Committee on Commerce thought it more than they ought to expend this year. They referred the bill to the Secretary of War to know where and how the amount could be cut down. Instead of cutting it down the engineers proposed to raise it very considerably, making it $2,500,000. The committee thereupon rejected the whole measure. After that rejection the House of Representatives passed this bill appropriating this small sum for needed repairs. For instance, at Plattsburgh, as I am informed, there is a pier that cost $1,000,000, and it is absolutely washing away, going to decay, and will be absolutely lost unless something is done. Repairs costing $10,000 will render it safe for a long time to come. It is for such purposes as that that this bill is introduced. It appropriates a small sum, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, to be used exclusively for the repairs of public works that are going to destruction for the want of repair. That is all there is about it.

Mr. HOWE. As I understand the Senator, there is no estimate and no information from the Secretary of War as to where this money is to be expended nor upon what works.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; not any.

Mr. WADE. The same observation the Senator from Michigan has made with regard to the harbor of Plattsburgh, is true of many of the harbors on Lake Erie, and especially at Cleveland. I introduced a bill very early this session to appropriate a much larger sum than this, and specifying each harbor, and I did it according to the estimates of the Department, and I was in hopes that that sum would be appropriated; but that could not be done. The sum that I asked for was not sufficient of itself to put these harbors in the condition in which they ought to be; but something must be done to preserve the public works in these harbors or they will be rendered entirely useless. A small sum now is perhaps better than nothing, and will stay the decay of these works until such time as we can proceed to make them permanent. There is no doubt that all this bill asks for is absolutely necessary, and a great deal more would be useful. Even burdened as we are by debt now, I believe a large sum of two or three millions could be appropriated to this purpose to greater advantage than to almost any other object. But as the committee have thought differently, as they have strong and cogent reasons to be prudent and cautious in the expenditure of money, I am not contending for the larger amount, necessary as I know it to be. I hope, however, there will be no objection to this small sum being appropriated under the direction of the War Department for such purposes as are necessary.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to make an apology or an explanation. I shall not make any objection to the passage of this bill, of course. The inquiry I made was dictated by the very facts, known to me, which the Senator from Ohio has just stated. I knew the necessity was so great for a larger sum of money to be specifically appropriated to specific purposes that I really could not understand why this small sum to be expended merely at the discretion of the Secretary of War was offered here; but certainly I shall not object to the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

JUAN MIRANDA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past twelve o'clock having arrived, the Chair will call for the special order for that hour, being the bill (S. No. 238) to ascertain and settle certain private claims in the State of California, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon that motion I will call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McDUGALL. Before the subject is disposed of I think it my duty to make a simple statement to the Senate.

I have been familiar with this Ortega and Miranda case for a great many years. At one time I was counsel for the Ortega claim. I never had any relation to the Miranda claim and was not a party concerned in it. The position I occupied was one of an antagonist character. Understanding the history of this case and how it was conducted in the court below, that is, in the circuit court, as well as the decisions of the Supreme Court, when the question was presented hereby my former colleague at the last session, I felt it my duty to vote to enable the Miranda claimants to have a hearing before the court. It was by a common error on the part of the bar and I may say of most of the bench in California that the Miranda claim was prevented from having a hearing. I do not undertake to say that the Miranda claim is a good claim. It is not the question here before the Senate. By a misunderstanding even on the part of the Supreme Court as to what the law was they remitted the case back for further hearing and prevented them from having a full hearing. I believe the Supreme Court in giving the opinion held that Miranda had a good right. Whether they could so prove upon a trial of the Miranda case or not I am not prepared to say. It is none of my business, nor is it the business, I think, of the Senate. Having been deprived of a hearing heretofore, I think them entitled, and I shall therefore so vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cardie, Davis, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Saulsbury, and Wright—12.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

DISTRICT JUDICIAL FEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up Senate bill No. 296. I will state to the Senate that the object of the bill is to save a little money to the Treasury.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 296) in relation to the fees and emoluments of the marshal, attorney, and clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary reported this bill, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I suggest, therefore, that the reading of the original bill be dispensed with, and that the amendment only be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof:

That the fees of the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, except so far as hereinafter specifically provided, and of the United States attorney and the marshal of said District, shall be the same as the fees respectively allowed to clerks of the district and circuit courts, attorneys, solicitors, and proctors, and marshals, by the act approved February 26, 1853, entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes;" Provided, That the clerk of said supreme court shall not be allowed by the Secretary of the Interior to retain of the fees and emoluments of his said office, for his own personal compensation, over and above his necessary office expenses, the necessary clerk hire included, to be audited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, subject to an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, the sum of $6,000 per annum; and in making out his semi-annual returns, required by the third section of said act, said clerk shall embrace his fees and emoluments of every name and character for any service required of him by law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no marshal nor district attorney of the United States shall, by reason of the discharge of the duties of his office, now or hereafter required of him by law, or in any case in which the United States will be bound by the judgment which may be rendered in the same, be allowed to retain out of the fees, charges, and emoluments therefor, whether prescribed by statute or allowed by a court or any judge thereof, a greater maximum compensation than that fixed by the act aforesaid; but all such fees and emoluments, of every name and character, shall be included in the semi-annual returns required of marshals and attorneys by the third section of the act aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, at the commencement of every suit in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the plaintiff shall deposit at least eight dollars with the clerk, to be appropriated toward the costs of the suit; and if the plaintiff recover against the defendant a judgment with costs, and said costs do not amount to eight dollars, the overplus shall be paid back to the plaintiff by the clerk: Provided, That suits may be prosecuted in said court by poor persons without making the deposit herein prescribed, upon the order of the court, or of one of the justices thereof.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the following fees, and no other, shall be allowed to the clerk of said court for the services following: for all services rendered by said clerk to the United States, in cases in which the said United States is a party of record, five dollars. For each marriage license issued by him, one dollar. For each certificate of official character, including the seal, fifty cents.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to repeal or modify any of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia," approved February 20, 1864; but the duties of said warden, and of the marshal of the United States for said District, in regard to the said jail and the prisoners committed thereto or confined therein, shall remain the same as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In the fifth line of the fifth section of the amendment the word "ninth" should be inserted after the word "twenty," so as to read, "approved February 29th, 1864."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will also move to amend that same section by inserting after the word "entitled" in the third line the following words:

"An act concerning the disposition of convicts in the courts of the United States, for subsisting persons confined in jails charged with violating the laws of the United States, and for diminishing the expenses in relation thereto," approved May 12, 1864, or of an act entitled.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the amendment by inserting at the end of the fourth section the following:

For service of any warrant, attachment, summons, capias, or other writ, except execution, venire, or a summons, or subpoena for a witness, one dollar for each person on whom such service may be made.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I made no objection to that amendment, but its adoption renders necessary a change in the wording of the same section of the bill. There was no provision in the bill before in regard to the marshal's fees. It will be necessary, therefore, to insert in the third line of the fourth section after the word "court" the words "and the marshal of said District;" so that it will read:

That the following fees, and no other, shall be allowed to the clerk of said court and the marshal of said District, for the services following, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The phraseology will have to be changed also in the first section. In the sixth line of that section, after the word "District," I move to insert the words "except so far as hereinafter provided."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PUNISHMENT OF GUERRILLAS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 511) to provide for the more speedy punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the provisions of the twenty-first section of an act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, shall apply as well to the sentences of military commissions as to those of courts-martial, and hereafter the commanding general in the field, or the commander of the department, as the case may be, shall have power to carry into execution all sentences against guerrillas, and for robbery, arson, burglary, rape, assault with intent to commit rape, and for violation of the laws and customs of war, as well as sentences against spies, mutineers, deserters, and murderers. The second section provides that every officer authorized to order a general court-martial shall have power to pardon or mitigate any punishment ordered by such court, including that of confinement in the penitentiary, except the sentence of death, or of cashiering or dismissing an officer, which sentences it shall be competent during the continuance of the present rebellion for the general commanding the Army in the field or the department commander, as the case may be, to remit or mitigate; and the fifth section of the act approved July 17, 1862, chapter two hundred and one, is repealed, so far as it relates to sentences of imprisonment in the penitentiary.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment in section one, line eleven, after the word "guerrillas," to strike out the following words:

And for robbery, arson, burglary, rape, assault with intent to commit rape, and for violation of the laws and customs of war.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to make this amendment a subject of any discussion in particular, but I hope it will not be concurred in by the Senate. I see no reason why the crimes of robbery, arson, burglary, rape, assault with intent to commit rape, &c., should be taken out of the category of crimes to be punished without a resort to the President of the United States. They are certainly the highest crimes known to the criminal code, whether committed in the Army or in civil life. I hope, therefore, that we shall not concur in the amendment suggested by the Committee on Military Affairs, but suffer the bill to stand as it is, and pass it as it is.

Mr. BROWN. I will state to the Senate the reason which induced the Committee on Military Affairs to move this amendment. It is known that most of the trials which take place in the Army do not proceed by courts-martial, which have all the safeguards which can be conceived of thrown around them, but proceed by military commissions, which are very summary in their character, which are oftentimes very loose, and in which the defendant is very often not sufficiently protected from the judgment of the court. In other words, it is a very rapid and summary mode of dealing with offenses. It is proposed by this bill to put military commissions on precisely the same ground with military courts-martial, and authorize the department commander or the commanding officer in the field to carry into instantaneous execution the sentences of those commissions. The Committee on Military Affairs thought that while it was well and proper that the commanding officer should have authority to carry into effect those sentences as they related to guerrillas, as they related to spies and the cases enumerated in the bill, it was not wise or well to place the lives of our own soldiers under a condition where they might be subject to such careless execution. They therefore preferred to leave those offenses which are committed by our own soldiery to the present state of the law, leaving this summary execution which is to be carried out by commanders in the field to relate to the cases enumerated.

I trust that the amendment of the committee will be agreed to, because I am very sure from my own experience, from the number of commissions which I have seen operating, and whose sentences I have seen reversed subsequently, that if they are to be carried into immediate execution as relates to our own soldiers, we are very apt to suffer harm by it. I think the discrimination is a very good one, and I trust the committee's amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. This amendment was carried in the Committee on Military Affairs by a majority of one, so that very little reliance can be placed upon the action of the Military Committee in behalf of this amendment.

Mr. BROWN. I will inquire of the Senator whether he conceives that a simple majority carries with it no reliance at all? What does he mean by that language?

Mr. HOWARD. That it carried no particular weight.

Mr. BROWN. What does the Senator mean by that?

Mr. HOWARD. Well, if the Senator from Missouri desires to catechise me as to the meaning of the word, I will take some opportunity when I can have a comfortable consultation with him about it. For the present I must premit any further consideration of that part of the subject.

Now, sir, in regard to the subject in hand, this bill as originally framed, and as it passed the House of Representatives, authorizes the commanding general in the field or the commander of the proper department to carry into execution all sentences of military commissions as well as courts-martial against guerrillas and in cases of "robbery, arson, burglary, rape, assault with intent to commit rape, and for violation of the laws and customs of war, as well as sentences against spies, mutineers, deserters, and murderers." The amendment proposes to strike out the words "and for robbery, arson, burglary, rape, assault with intent to commit rape, and for violation of the laws and customs of war;" so that in these cases the sentences cannot be carried into execution without resort to the President of the United States. In all other cases enumerated in the clause the sentences may be put into execution without resort to the President of the United States.

I must confess that I cannot see any just and wise ground for the distinction. The power of the President to pardon crimes exists by the Constitution, and he may exercise that power in reference to any of these offenses or any other offenses whether committed in civil life or in the military or naval service of the United States; and hence I do not see any very particular utility in this amendment. The complaint is that a military man may act hastily, unadvisedly; that a military commission may act without due caution, without due circumspection, and that the accused may be by improper haste hurried forward to a conviction, and even to an execution upon a conviction. Undoubtedly there may be cases of that sort. There are cases of that sort in the administration of criminal justice every where, in all countries, in all communities, and under every condition of the law. All of us who have had experience in the administration of justice know that cases do sometimes occur in which an innocent man is convicted and punished for a crime which he never committed; and it would be very strange if cases of that sort did not happen to occur sometimes in the Army or Navy of the United States.

But the great object of the bill as it passed the House of Representatives was to give some weight, some significance, and some emphasis to a solemn conviction of an accused party, even by a military commission. The object was to enforce discipline in the Army, to preserve the morality of the Army, and to prevent as well as punish the commission of these heinous crimes which are enumerated in this clause; and, for one, sir, having that great object in view, the discipline, and the morality, and the good conduct of the soldiers themselves, I shall vote against concurring in this amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON. The bill itself, as it came from the House of Representatives, if I comprehend it, applies as well to what are called the loyal States as to the disloyal States—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair must interrupt the Senator to call up the special order of the day.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator from Maine will consent to let that go over informally for a few moments. I think we can pass this bill in a very short time. It is a very important bill to enable our generals to get along in these cases, and as we have now got it up I hope we shall be allowed to finish it. If it consumes any great length of time I will withdraw it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Maryland proposes to discuss it, and I suppose that will lead to further discussion. When a debate commences in this way it is very difficult to tell where it will end.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the special order? Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the joint resolution in regard to the duties on imports. I suppose there will be a motion made to postpone it. In that case I shall move to take up the fortification bill, which it is very essential to dispose of to-day. I think it will take no time.

Mr. WILSON. Do you object to this bill being considered now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would rather have it deferred until I get through with my bills. If it would give rise to no debate I should not object to it, but it is very evident that it will, because the Senator from Maryland proposes to debate it, and very likely it will lead to other debate. I think I can get through with the fortification bill in the course of an hour.

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution (H. R. No. 81) amendatory of the joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports, approved April 29, 1864, is now before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. In relation to that resolution I will state that I have been requested to ask, in behalf of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] who is quite sick and confined to his bed, that that resolution be permitted to go over until to-morrow. He is quite ill, I understand, but of a disease that is likely to terminate soon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The joint resolution is in the hands of my colleague on the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. JOHNSON. He told me it was in your hands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I called it up a day or two since and had it made the special order for to-day; but if he thinks it proper to allow it to go over under the circumstances, I shall not object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can hardly resist this appeal. The Senator from Missouri is absent, and I know he is interested in the resolution as affecting some of his constituents.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I will move that the resolution be postponed until to-morrow, with a view to take up the fortification bill.

The motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 207, commonly known as the fortification bill. It will not take long.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maine embarrasses me very much by making the motion that he does. He knows very well that there is a bill which has been pending for a long time on which I certainly hope to get a vote to-day, the bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen. It has been a long time on the Calendar, and it has been one day under discussion. I am not aware that any Senator proposes to discuss it at any length. It is a measure of great practical interest. Every day that it is delayed is a loss to the country and an embarrassment to a great public interest. I do not feel that I ought to allow it to slip out of view without at least entering a protest. The appropriation bill, and particularly the one which the Senator now has in charge, the fortification bill, if I may so say, will take care of itself. It will be sure to pass whenever the Senator really puts it on its passage. I would therefore suggest that the Senate proceed with this important measure on which it has already commenced, and finish it and get it out of the way.

The motion of Mr. FESSENDEN was agreed to.

WILLIAM YOCUM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before proceeding with the reading of the bill, the Chair, with the indulgence of the Senate, will lay before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 14th of April, information concerning the papers in the case of William Yocum, now confined in the penitentiary at Albany, New York.

The Secretary read the communication.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that that communication and the accompanying documents be printed for the use of the Senate, and in connection with that motion I will make a single remark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. I did not hear the communication read very distinctly, but, if I understand it, it is not responsive to the material point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must object to any discussion. The fortification bill is properly before the Senate, and I cannot give way for any discussion on this subject.

Mr. DAVIS. How did this matter come up? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair laid it before the body, with the indulgence of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I wonder, then, when it is laid before the Senate with the indulgence of the Senate, if I have not the right to say a word upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think that opens it to debate at all. It was merely presented to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator ought to have objected to the reception of the communication. I do not wish to trespass upon the Senate, nor to violate any rule of the body.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator will pardon me, I think he is mistaken as to the character of the paper. I think it is wholly responsive to the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I just ask leave to examine it. I do not want to delay the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 207) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications, and other works of defense, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was after line twenty-seven, to strike out the following clause:

For sea-wall of Great Brewster's island, $40,000.
For repair of sea-walls on Deer and on Lovell's islands, $10,000.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senate will not strike out those provisions. They have passed the House of Representatives, and they are certainly very important. The works on those islands in that harbor are going to ruin. The very islands on which the Government has built its works heretofore are going to pieces for want of repairs, and I think it of vital importance that those provisions should remain in the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I hold in my hand one of the last official acts of a very eminent public servant, the late General Joseph G. Totten, being a letter from him with reference to this very appropriation. I have the official copy, which is signed in the autograph of the Secretary of War, "approved, and appropriation recommended. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War." I will read it with the permission of the Senate:

ENGINEER'S DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, March 15, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the letter of Hon A. H. RICE, of the 23d February, received here on the 8th instant, and to state in reply to his inquiries that the Great Brewster island, Boston harbor, has long been undergoing abrasion by the sea, to such a degree as to make remedial measures a matter of prompt importance.

Long Island head, Boston harbor, is undergoing similar injuries; but the necessity for protection in that case is not so urgent as in the other.

The detritus which is washed out by the lashing of storms from the hilly shores of these islands is carried by the current into the channels of the bay, and deposited in them to their serious injury.

Deer island and Lovell's island have also been subject to wearing by the sea; but it has been averted in these cases by protective sea-walls. In the case of the Great Brewster like protection has been afforded, but only to a part of the extent necessary.

At the Great Brewster, the unfinished work should be recommenced, and completed as soon as practicable.

At Deer island and Lovell's island, the existing structures are sufficient, but now need repairs.

At Long island head the work may be deferred till the more urgent positions are secured.

For expenditure during the next fiscal year there should be appropriated:

For sea-wall of Great Brewster island, $40,000.
For repair of sea-walls on Deer and on Lovell's islands, $10,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOSEPH G. TOTTON,
Brigadier General and Chief Engineer.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Those are the two appropriations that are here in question:

For sea-wall of Great Brewster's island, $40,000.
For repair of sea-walls on Deer and on Lovell's islands, $10,000.

The Senate will bear in mind from the testimony of this eminent officer that there is such an abrasion by the sea as to make remedial measures a matter of prompt importance. That is the testimony. I have from other quarters information going to show that if something is not done, not only the immediate locality will suffer, but the harbor generally; its character as a harbor will be in danger, and other places in the harbor will more or less be affected injuriously by the injury first commencing in this quarter. It is important that the remedy should be applied here and at once, as we have military fortifications on these different islands in Boston harbor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not on this.

Mr. SUMNER. Not precisely on this, but on several of the islands in Boston harbor; the situations of all these fortifications are all more or less affected by the injury to which these particular islands are exposed. I believe, sir, if I may so express myself, they all make common cause. There is not a fortification in Boston harbor that has not an interest in having Great Brewster and Deer island put in a proper condition, and protected against injury, according to the recommendation of General Totten. General Totten recommended it while he was still spared to us, our most approved authority on a matter of that kind, our chief engineer, who dealt with the matter, as I understand it, with a view to the interest of the fortifications in Boston harbor. I see the line that possibly may be run between this case and some other cases. General Totten forbore to run that line; the House of Representatives has forborne to run that line. Why should we now undertake to run it? It is enough, sir, that the public interests require that this should be done. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will adhere to what the other House has adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If I had followed my own inclinations with regard to this particular item, I should have been disposed and anxious to retain it in the bill; but acting upon the principle upon which the committee felt bound to act, it was not easy for me to do so. I agree with all that the Senators from Massachusetts have said in regard to the importance of this appropriation which it is proposed to strike out. I took pains to inform myself in regard to it. I have no doubt of the extreme urgency of the case. I have no doubt of the great injury that is accruing year by year to these islands, nor have I any doubt of their indirect connection with the fortifications in the harbor, and more especially with the preservation of the harbor itself, which is of great importance to us in a national point of view, especially as connected with our navy-yard, where we have very large expenditures. That question has been settled by recent surveys, and the opinion of the military authorities is uniform with regard to it.

As stated by the Senator [Mr. SUMNER] the work upon which we have already expended a good deal of money on Brewster's island is very fast disappearing from the want of a small appropriation in order to complete it. It is almost complete, but it needs something more. There is the argument in its favor, and the argument is all in its favor. There is nothing to be said against it in a national point of view.

The answer to it, however, is this: it is put in the fortification bill; this is a bill making appropriations for the military defenses of the coast and other places and those things that are immediately connected with these military defenses; and these two items and one other with regard to the harbor of Buffalo were inserted in the bill by the House of Representatives on full argument, without reference to that particular question. There is no estimate for either of these appropriations in the general estimates furnished to us for the expenditures of the year; but so far as that is concerned, the letter which has been read may be considered as an estimate by General Totten.

Mr. SUMNER. And adopted also and recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly. But I mean that it is not one of those things that are included in the general ordinary estimates, as they are called, for the appropriation bills. The great difficulty in my mind is whether it will do to insert what is substantially a commercial improvement in a fortification bill, and perhaps a commercial necessity. It is true it is not altogether commercial, for I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that indirectly these works are connected somewhat with the military defenses of the harbor, but not immediately. They are not so regarded by the officers who have made the estimates for these military defenses.

Under that impression, and carrying out the principle which we have felt bound to adopt in regard to these bills, to keep them within the limits that properly belong to them, the committee felt obliged to strike out these appropriations, thinking that if they were necessary they should be estimated for and stand in a bill for themselves, and that that bill should perhaps cover other things that are if not quite as necessary yet necessary in themselves. The difficulty is that we do not know where to stop when we begin upon these matters. I am very much afraid that gentlemen would feel inclined, if this was adopted, to move similar amendments for different sections of the country, so that there would be no end in fact to the debate that would spring up and to the effort that would be made to put upon a fortification bill other matters which are not properly connected with it and which should not stand in that relation.

That is the simple ground on which the committee put it. They deemed it their duty to strike out these two items. It is for the Senate to decide whether the views of the committee are correct or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one additional fact in addition to those suggested by the chairman of the committee. We have this morning appropriated $250,000 for general repairs of works of a similar character on the lakes, and $100,000 for such repairs on the ocean. That bill came from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would have been a good place to put this provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed, as a matter of course, when that bill was passed, all these special appropriations for particular harbors were to be abandoned.

Mr. SUMNER. I had rather rely upon a specific appropriation for these two particular sea-walls than a general appropriation in which they are not named, and which, of course, will be open to question hereafter by the Department that has the expenditure of the money. And, sir, I am led to persevere by this consideration: the House of Representatives, which has the originating of these measures, has, after proper inquiry, made this appropriation. I understood the Senator from Maine to say that the appropriation was not in the general estimates furnished to the House. But can that affect our decision? It appears that it was in a special recommendation of the Secretary of War; and surely that is as good as if it found a place in the general estimates.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He did not recommend that it be put in this bill.

Mr. SUMNER. No, but he recommends it, and I take it that is enough. As long as the Committee of Ways and Means had the special recommendation from the Secretary of War, backed, too, by General Totten, it seems to me that was enough.

Then, sir, behind it all is the great, overruling necessity of the case. The Senator is afraid that propositions will come from some other quarter. If from any other quarter there is an equal necessity, I say let it come. We are here to legislate for such cases, to meet the public exigencies as they arise, not to postpone them, not on any ground of theory or merely for the symmetry or uniformity of a bill to object to a proposition which is in itself intrinsically just.

If any measure really concerns the public interest, and if on inquiry it appears that it is important that it should be acted upon promptly, that it should not be postponed, then I think the time has passed for niceties as to whether it should be taken up on this bill or on another bill, especially when the House of Representatives has already passed it on this bill.

It seems to me the argument in favor of keeping it on this bill where the House of Representatives placed it is absolutely unanswerable, unless it be by the suggestion which fell from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and which has been repeated in conversation by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES.] They both have called my attention to the bill which passed the Senate this morning, making a provision as follows:

The further sum of $100,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in repairing such of the public works connected with the harbors on the seaboard of the United States as may in his judgment need such expenditures.

The Senate will observe the generality of that appropriation. In the first place it is not specifically applicable to Boston harbor, certainly not specifically applicable to these two sea-walls—

Mr. GRIMES. I ask the Senator what other sea-walls have been recommended by the Secretary of War or General Totten, or what other improvement on the seaboard, save these two sea-walls?

Mr. SUMNER. I am not aware what others on the seaboard have been recommended, but there are several others in Boston harbor—the Senator perhaps is not aware—which need repair.

Mr. GRIMES. My question is, what ones have been recommended by the Secretary of War and officers under him, save those named in the fortification bill?

Mr. SUMNER. I am only aware of those in Boston harbor. Naturally, I have not followed the recommendations elsewhere.

Mr. GRIMES. The inference, I think, is very fair, if they have called the attention of the public only to those in Boston harbor, that Boston harbor would certainly get a very fair proportion of these $100,000 we have already appropriated this morning, and that bill was passed in the other House some weeks after the appropriation bill was passed there that is now under consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. Assuming that Boston will get what the Senator calls a fair share—

Mr. GRIMES. All.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says we will, get it all. I know nothing of that. Suffice it to say that there is no specific appropriation for this purpose; and when I consider the importance of providing against the abrasion of these islands, and the injury that must ensue not only to the islands but to the harbor itself, and then, as I say, indirectly to all the fortifications which are planted on several of those islands, I feel that we ought not to miss the opportunity of securing the appropriation. I hope, sir, I shall not be considered too pertinacious in this matter. It seems to me that the House of Representatives acted wisely in placing it in the bill, and that the Senate will not act as wisely as the House if it rejects it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the clause will be stricken out. It is very evident that if any such necessity exists it is provided for by the bill already passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out "for repairs of sea-wall at Buffalo, $37,500."

Mr. HARRIS. Why is that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is of the same character as the others, not connected at all with any military work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance or of the Military Committee what is meant by the eighty-sixth and eighty-seventh lines, where there is an appropriation of $300,000 to provide "obstructions to be moored in the Potomac river to render the shore batteries more efficient for the protection of Washington against maritime attack."

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator has all the information we have. It is an amount proposed by the military authorities, the engineers, as necessary. I am not master of the military art, and I cannot judge of the necessity.

Mr. GRIMES. I confess that I should like to have some information about what obstructions we are going to put into the Potomac river in order to protect ourselves. I have seen moored upon a former occasion some obstructions which it was the design to sink in the Potomac river. I should like to know the description of these before I vote for the bill. I move to strike out the eighty-sixth, eighty-seventh, eighty-eighth, and eighty-ninth lines. I do not expect the motion to carry, but I want to put myself on the record against voting blindly any such appropriation without any knowledge on the part of anybody of how the money is to be expended.

The words proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

For providing obstructions to be moored in the Potomac river to render the shore batteries more efficient for the protection of Washington against maritime attack, $300,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. In lines fifty-one and fifty-two there is $125,000 appropriated for the continuance of the fortification at Sandy Hook. The last I knew about it was that the fort at Sandy Hook was about to depart, the channel was washing it entirely away. I suppose that a fort is very desirable there and ought to be built; but I should like to know what the prospect is of keeping it after we have got it erected. If the committee have any intelligence on that subject to communicate to the Senate I should like to hear it.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I happen to live not very remote from this spot; and being somewhat familiar with it, I am surprised to hear the Senator from Iowa speak of the fort as being washed away by the channel. This fort at Sandy Hook is placed upon a point of a very long spit of land that runs up between the Atlantic ocean and Shrewsbury river, projects a great way toward the harbor of New York, and the fort is constructed there for the purpose of preventing ingress by hostile vessels. It has also been considered necessary to have a fortification there, much more for the safety of the commerce of New York than for the safety or protection of any portion of the State that I in part represent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY.) Did the Senator from Iowa move an amendment?

Mr. GRIMES. I asked a question for information.

Mr. TEN EYCK. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, when the Senator from Iowa made the inquiry, turned in my direction and stated that as this was a New Jersey matter he would leave it to me to answer. I do not know how far I shall be successful, but I would simply inform the Senator from Iowa that so far as his information is concerned about the whole of this spit of land being washed away, or the fort being washed away, I apprehend he is in great error. I never heard of it, to begin with, and in the next place it would be a most astounding fact indeed if the War Department or those who have charge of the recommendation of such matters should undertake to recommend an appropriation of $125,000 toward continuing a public work on a foundation that was being swallowed up in the sea. It is a novelty to me. It may be all true, but I have never heard of it before.

Mr. GRIMES. The astonishment entertained by the Senator and myself is mutual. I am astonished that he, living so near as he does to Sandy Hook, has never heard that there was any danger of this point being washed away. I can tell the Senator that in a conversation I had only a few days ago with the very distinguished chief of the Bureau of Navigation in the Navy Department, he told me that he was one of a board that had been sent by the War and Navy Departments to investigate this subject some months after the estimates were made upon which this bill is based, and that the great purpose the board had to accomplish was to devise some way to prevent the channel taking away this fort that the Government had attempted to erect, and that unless something was done the fort would be lost. I supposed that that fact was notorious. Certainly I had it from the very highest authority. What I wanted to know was whether after this investigation, which I knew had been going on by the coast survey officers, and the military and naval officers, the committee were satisfied that we should make this a permanent and substantial fort, and that there would be a propriety therefore in making the appropriation incorporated into this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. What do the committee say?

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know. That is what I am trying to find out. I only know that I saw Admiral Davis just after his return, and he told me that he had been there, and he was there some weeks. What the result was I did not inquire particularly. I only know that he said there was great danger of the spit being washed away.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I have been in the habit myself of stealing a very short period of time, perhaps only a day, during the summer season, to visit this portion of the coast. I am not able to spend as much time as many other persons on the sea-coast who enjoy the sea-breezes during the larger portion of the summer; but I sometimes run down for old association's sake and spend a night and a day. I was in this neighborhood only last year. I am aware that there is an abrasion along the coast; the tide sweeps strongly down from the north, and there is a general abrasion along the whole of the sea-coast there from Sandy Hook down to a considerable distance below Long Branch; and I know that for years past, ever since I was a boy, I have heard about the danger of the coast being washed away, and even of settlements being involved in the destruction which was to flow from this cutting away of the shore. I can say that after a period of eight or ten years have elapsed a wagon road which pleasure seekers had been in the habit of enjoying along that high and dry bank has been cut away; but it is very slow, the progress is very gradual, and I apprehend that it is by no means as alarming in its effects as seems to strike those who are but mere casual observers. Suppose, however, it should be so; here is the only point of land jutting far out toward the harbor of New York, near the main ship channel through which the commerce of the world that finds its mart in the city of New York has to pass; and if it were true that this spit of land was in danger of being carried away, so much the greater necessity for its protection in order that there may be a fortification to guard all this commerce.

I have spoken in relation to this matter, more because I am somewhat familiar with the nature of the coast than because I feel any particular interest as a Jerseyman that this fortification should be continued, or that a large annual expenditure should be made upon it; for so far as we are concerned, it affects us not at all directly, and only indirectly as we are interested in the commerce of the country. The great city of New York and the interests dependent upon commerce there throughout the whole length and breadth of the land are much more interested in it than we can be in the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

I have not of course had an opportunity of seeing any of the reports, and have not had that intimate relation with persons connected with the public service to learn their views in relation to this matter. Indeed, I never for one moment supposed there would be any other course pursued than that the ordinary appropriations for the protection of this work from year to year would be made, as they have been for many years past. It is a very important point to the protection of our commerce, and I for one feel disposed, unless I see something further than has been advanced on this floor, to vote for the continuation of the appropriation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it to be very proper to make this appropriation, even if the facts be as the honorable Senator from Iowa supposes. It is perfectly well known that this is regarded as a very important fortification. It has been going on for a considerable number of years; we have been making appropriations for it. This is the amount asked for as necessary to be expended during the coming year, and which, in the opinion of the engineer department, ought to be expended. It is a work in progress recognized by the law. This bill merely makes an appropriation to keep it in progress. If this new information is obtained, and the Government becomes satisfied that it is not wise to spend any more money on the work, no doubt the amount here appropriated will not be expended. No such facts have been communicated to the committee of either House. We stand on the general law, and propose an appropriation based on an estimate made for a certain specific purpose which we very well understand.

I take it, then, it is very proper to make the appropriation. It must undoubtedly be supposed that if there has been any such change as is supposed, men of ordinary intelligence will not spend this money. I take it there must be some mistake about it, or if anything of that sort is going on, the money may be spent in protecting the work as far as it has gone; if that cannot be done, the money will not be spent.

Mr. CONNESS. I move this amendment to come in after line seventy:

For land defenses at San Francisco, $177,000: Provided, That no portion of the same shall be expended on other fortifications now in progress there.

I present some communications which I send to the desk to be read, and I invite the attention of the Senate to them.

The Secretary read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, June 8, 1864.

Sir: The chief of engineers has reported to this Department that an additional appropriation of $177,000 is necessary for the land defenses of the harbor of San Francisco, California, and I have the honor to request that this amount be included in the estimated appropriation for that purpose. Please find inclosed copy of report of chief engineer.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HON. WILLIAM F. FESSENDEN, United States Senate, Chairman Committee on Finance.

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT, May 30, 1864.

The sum of $177,000 can with great propriety be appropriated to the defenses of San Francisco on the land approaches during the year ending 30th June, 1865, in addition to what is now included in the bill before the Senate.

The amount for the harbor of San Francisco now in Treasury is—

For Lime Point.....	$146,000
For Fort Point.....	182,000
For Alcatraz.....	80,000
Sum now proposed by the Military Committee,
For Fort Point.....	$50,000
For Alcatraz.....	90,000
	140,000

Will be available.....	548,000
Of this we have to pay for land purchased at Lime Point.....	125,000

Leaving.....$423,000 for the year's operations. Heretofore under favorable circumstances not exceeding $600,000 has been advantageously expended, and no greater sum can by any judicious arrangement be now expended. Hence $177,000 may be advantageously applied, and is necessary for the land defenses of San Francisco.

Respectfully submitted,

RICHARD DELAFIELD,
Brigadier General and Chief Engineer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That communication was before the Committee on Finance, and it seemed to the committee that the statement there was rather indefinite. We did not understand how this money was to be expended exactly. The argument, as far as we understood it, seemed to be that $600,000 could be judiciously expended within the year under favorable circumstances, that nearly that sum was appropriated, but they would have to take out $125,000 in order to pay for land purchased at Lime Point, and that would reduce the money available to about $423,000, and consequently, to make up the $600,000, $177,000 more must necessarily be appropriated. I believe General Delafield, who makes this communication, has but recently returned from the Pacific coast. It seemed to the committee rather indefinite, especially as it was not included in the general estimates which were sent to the committee on the subject, and we therefore did not conclude to make any change in the bill in this respect. Since then, however, I have had a conversation personally with General Delafield, and he has informed me that what was meant by the "land defenses" was the land defenses of these other fortifications. It is necessary to have defenses toward the land in order to prevent an enemy landing and taking the fortifications in the rear. Then the argument presents itself to the Senate whether in addition to the sum appropriated in the bill, which was the amount estimated for, to wit, $50,000 for Fort Point, and $90,000 for the fort on Alcatraz island, it is advisable to appropriate $177,000 more in order to put in the hands of the Department such a sum of money as may be expended under favorable circumstances during the year. The committee could not answer that question, and concluded to leave it to the Senate. If I should be allowed to make a suggestion to the Senator from California on this point, I would suggest the propriety of not asking for the appropriation of the whole of that sum, but confining the proposition to a part of it for the present year, say $50,000, in order to commence these land defenses. I think that would be more likely to carry in this branch and the other than if he insists on the whole sum named. The Senator, however, makes the motion on his own responsibility, and I shall not interfere with him in any way.

Mr. CONNESS. It can hardly be said that I make this motion on my own responsibility. It is in accordance with a communication from the proper Department. I certainly have no desire to make any motion here for the purpose of its being reported that I desire appropriations for my own State. If the condition of the fortifications in the harbor of San Francisco as well as the topography of the country there were understood, I do not think the Senate would hesitate to make this appropriation. It does not follow that the money will be expended within the next year, although it may be the wisest expenditure of public money that could possibly be made. There are Senators here who are familiarly acquainted with the location of the ground and the position of that city. The fortifications thus far carried out there relate entirely to the protection of the water approaches of the city, the Golden Gate and the harbor, commanding the city of San Francisco and the entrance to it. Those fortifications consist of the fortress known as Fort Point, in a forward state of progression, and the great fort on Alcatraz island in the harbor, and two batteries now being constructed on the north side of the harbor at a place called Angel island, and still another water battery at a point on the south side of the channel and nearer to the city of San Francisco, and known as Black Point or San José Point. The two latter of which I have spoken are now in progress of construction, and the former are in an advanced state of progress.

I invite the attention of Senators for one moment while I give them the location of the fortifications contemplated by this appropriation recommended by the Department. They are a part of the necessary defenses of San Francisco against foreign invasion; and it will be remembered that San Francisco, so far as the military question is concerned, is really the State of California. It contains now all the war material that the Government has on the Pacific slope; there is a very large number of heavy guns there not in position; and the possession of San Francisco by a foreign Power would not only be the possession of the fortifications now erected for the defense of the harbor, but the possession of the entire State. Back of the city, as the honorable member from Maryland will remember, lying to the south of the city of San Francisco and away from these harbor defenses, is a range of very high hills near what is known as Buri-buri ranch, and nearer the city Russian hill. The contemplated earthworks on these points form a part of the scheme of defense of that great city. Without these defenses there is nothing to hinder a comparatively small army well appointed from landing at Monterey and marching directly on the rear of all these fortifications. They really would fall into the hands of whatever army was able to land there.

In this connection I will suggest that the Government have recently sent a major general of some considerable distinction to the Pacific coast, with an especial view to what may lie in the future for us. I am not telling secrets when I state that I have had something to do with advising in the matter and I know what is contemplated. The Government contemplate no aggression against any foreign Power, but they do contemplate putting the State of California and the Pacific slope in a state of military defense so as to be prepared against aggression; and this slight appropriation if you will grant it will undoubtedly be expended wisely, and I trust the Senate will consent to make it although it comes in rather late. The reason of its coming in at this time is that the matter has been delayed on account of the delay in the selection of a commander for the Pacific department. It was contemplated to appoint a commander of distinction six months ago. The Government had great difficulty in fixing upon whom to select, because most of our men of ability are engaged in the field. As soon as General McDowell was designated to the military command he and General Delafield, the chief of your engineer department, conferred on this subject, and the War Department, coöperating, recommend this as a necessary part of the defenses of San Francisco. I do not ask for the appropriation that money may be expended in the State of California, but I believe conscientiously and truly that no better appropriation of money can be made. I believe that within a year it may be needed and it may save that country to us. I need hardly suggest to the Senate that without California we should be in rather a bad condition. Under all circumstances we must make sure of the protection of that country. The preservation of peace and the preservation of their industry is of great value to us. I have nothing further to say to the Senate. I ask for a vote on the subject.

Mr. NESMITH. I have some familiarity with the points stated by the Senator from California, and it has always struck me when I have been there that the fortifications at present constructed for the defense of the entrance at the Golden Gate were perfectly worthless unless some means were resorted to to construct defenses south of them so as to prevent their being taken in reverse. As the Senator from California has stated, there is no difficulty in an enemy landing at Monterey and marching up the coast; nor is there in ordinarily fair weather any difficulty in their landing immediately in the rear of San Francisco, San Francisco being a jut of land running up northward. They would have the advantage of a higher position and would have no difficulty in capturing those works. They are not calculated for any defense in the rear. Their defensive points are all toward the entrance of the bay, and unless some works are constructed in the rear of Fort Point to prevent it being taken in reverse, the works already constructed would, I think, be perfectly useless in the event of a foreign war. They would afford no protection to the city from a force landing at that point to which I have alluded down toward the south, where an army could land at any time when the weather was reasonably fair. In view of the possible contingencies of foreign war, I do not think a better investment could be made than to make this appropriation for the protection of that great city and the works already constructed there.

Mr. JOHNSON. I concur in the view just stated by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from California. My recollection is, though I may be mistaken, that the original plan for the defense of San Francisco contemplated forts in the rear of what is now called Fort Point. Fort Point is immediately upon the shore, on the water's edge, and it does nothing to protect against an army that may land in the rear of it. The ground in the rear is quite high, and absolutely commands the fort.

In the event of a conflict between ourselves and any foreign nation, such as England or France; although those events, I hope, are not to occur, at any rate for a long series of years—and yet in these changing times they may occur at any moment, and, if they should occur before the commanding points in the rear of the fort shall be themselves taken possession of and fortified, the fort, so far from being of any service, will be worse than useless, for the moment it is commanded by an enemy in the rear it will be almost impossible to hold it, and in a short time it will fall into the hands of the enemy; and if it should, then our own fleet, if we should have any, would find it very difficult to get into the bay of San Francisco, and we should have no outlet to the ocean from there.

The Senate are not to be told that San Francisco is very vulnerable to sea attacks; and even as against a naval attack it is very possible that it would be an easy thing with the iron-clad vessels that England and France are now building to run past these forts and get into the harbor. But there are other forts inside of the harbor. Fort Alcatraz, for which there is an appropriation of $90,000 in this bill, would go a great way to protect the city as against any attack by water, but then that would not protect the city at all as against a land attack.

It is not necessary to say, we all know, that independent of all questions of honor, which are questions to be looked at by statesmen, it is all-important to the prosperity of the United States that California should be preserved intact. We have as much interest in protecting San Francisco as we have in protecting New York, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, or any city upon the sea-coast; and if an appropriation of $177,000 will serve to put it in a state of comparative safety, I would suggest to the Senate from my knowledge of the locality that it should be a measure about which the Senate should entertain no possible doubt.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed; and, on motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, its title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 106) to prohibit certain sales of gold and foreign exchange, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 512) to repeal the fugitive slave act of 1850, and all acts and parts of acts for the rendition of fugitive slaves; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, disagreed to by the House.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said bill disagreed to by the House, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

LAND CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. HOWE. I move to take up for consideration the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will now proceed with the bill to establish a Bureau of Freedmen. I hope to be allowed to finish that bill to-day.

Mr. HOWE. I only want to stand by the contract. I have a contract with the Senator from Massachusetts that this joint resolution shall be disposed of.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator think I am bound?

Mr. HOWE. I believe it is fairly understood. It was not reduced to writing, and may not be within the statute of frauds.

Mr. SUMNER. The statute of frauds certainly would not bear on it; but the practical question is whether the understanding between us the other day is applicable to the present time. If the Senator thinks it is, I shall yield entirely to what he says.

Mr. HOWE. I should not say that by its express terms it was applicable to this day; but I hope the Senator will let it stand. I think we can dispose of this joint resolution in a very short time, and I want to get it to the other House as soon as I can.

Mr. SUMNER. Has the Senator any idea of how long it will take?

Mr. HOWE. I think it will take but a very short time. I think the debate is pretty much closed.

Mr. SUMNER. I am desirous of having a vote on the Freedmen's Bureau bill; and I think, if the Senator will allow us to go on with that bill, we can reach a vote very soon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think this joint resolution will require but a very short time. I wish to make a very brief explanation to the Senate, and I suppose that will close the debate.

Mr. SUMNER. I give way with the understanding that I shall come next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. HARLAN to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the following words:

And the said Secretary shall also settle and allow to the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company such sums of money as have been properly expended by said company in the survey and location of said canal, in the construction thereof as far as the same has been constructed, together with dams, locks, and slack-water navigation, and in the management and keeping the same in repair; and the same shall be paid to the said canal company out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not exceeding in amount, however, the balance charged against the State of Wisconsin upon the sales of said canal lands, as above required, after deducting the sum allowed said State for money paid by her out of the same fund. The same to be received by said canal company in full payment and satisfaction of all claims of said company against the State of Wisconsin and of the United States on account of said canal land grant, or on account of any action of the Territory or State of Wisconsin, or of the United States, in relation thereto.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, appointed commissioner to adjust the accounts herein provided for, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, and to determine what sum shall be charged to said State of Wisconsin for the lands granted for the construction of said canal; and what sums shall be credited respectively to said State and said company for the moneys expended by them in the construction of said locks and canal as herein provided.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no Senator that questions the right of the State of Wisconsin to her five per cent. fund, because that is secured to her under the law admitting her into the Union, and the main question is whether the equities of the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company ought to be adjusted at the same time. The Senator from Iowa has proposed an amendment to strike out that portion of this resolution which adjusts the claim of the canal company. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that that provision of the resolution ought to be inserted. There was no difference of opinion in the committee, after a very careful investigation of the whole subject. The judiciary committee of the Senate of the State of Wisconsin also, in a very elaborate and able report, recognized the equities to the same extent that the Committee on Claims of this body have in this joint resolution. A committee of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States as far back as 1842 recognized precisely the same equity.

But the question is asked why this equity of the canal company should be adjusted at the same time that we provide for the payment to the State of Wisconsin of her five per cent. fund. I will answer that in very few words. The reason is found in this, that Congress by the act admitting the State of Wisconsin into the Union united these two funds, united these two grants, the one of 1838 and the other of 1843. By the act of 1838 the grant of land was made to the Territory of Wisconsin, not for her benefit, but for the benefit of the canal company, and for the purpose of paying off the subscriptions of stock. By the act of 1843, at the request of the constitutional convention of Wisconsin, Congress agreed that the five per cent. fund should be used to support schools instead of making roads, upon the condition that the liabilities incurred by the territorial government of Wisconsin under the act granting land to Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal between Milwaukee and Rock River should be paid and discharged by the State of Wisconsin. It was a condition of the law itself that the State of Wisconsin before she received her five per cent. fund should adjust this claim. Now, what was the claim? That is established by the resolutions of the Territory of Wisconsin passed in 1846. Those resolutions provided that—

"The faith of the Territory and future State of Wisconsin is hereby pledged to repay to the said canal fund the sum which shall be diverted in pursuance of the above resolutions to the purposes aforesaid, whenever the same shall be required to be repaid, for the purpose of executing the trust created by Congress in making the 'canal grant'; and all laws contravening these are hereby repealed."

The Territory of Wisconsin herself in 1846 recognized the trust, that is, that the Territory held these lands in trust for the canal company, and the very resolutions which diverted the fund from the making of the canal to the ordinary expenses of the Territory provided that the State of Wisconsin and the Territory of Wisconsin should be bound to see that fund made whole again; and when Congress provided for the payment to the State of Wisconsin of her five per cent. fund, they made it a condition upon her receiving that five per cent. fund that she should adjust this very obligation which grew out of her breach of the trust in diverting the fund originally.

I do not design to occupy the attention of the Senate longer. The reason that we must adjust both together is, that Congress united them together by this condition of the law which gave to Wisconsin the five per cent. fund. It has been very fully discussed, and I simply repeat that the committee were unanimously of opinion that justice would not be done unless we carried out this condition of the law of 1848.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator who has just taken his seat draws an incorrect inference in this: he proceeds as if this donation had been made by Congress to this company as a gratuity, and the Territory of Wisconsin was acting merely as a trustee, and holding the property until the company could take possession. This was not the character of the grant. It was not and was not intended to be a gratuity to that company, but was placed in the possession of the Territory of Wisconsin to be used by her as stock; every dollar derived from the proceeds of the sales of that land was to inure to the benefit of Wisconsin, and not to the company. What obligation, then, is the Government of the United States under to pay the company the proceeds of the sales of this land? If it had been a gratuity to the company, something given to them for which no consideration had been returned, the donor would have a right to conclude the grant at any time. Property received without a consideration, of course can be withheld at any time before the possession shall have been taken by the grantee. But then this property was not given to, nor was it intended to be given to, the company. It was provided that they might use the proceeds of the sales of the land in the construction of the canal; but after they had been thus applied, the value of the money thus invested was to inure to the Territory or the State of Wisconsin; and hence the whole argument of the Senator, as it seems to me, falls. All of the grants of land for works of internal improvement, made by Congress to any of the States or Territories, may be said to be grants to the States or Territories, in trust, for the specific purpose named in the grant. The railroad grants are all of this nature. They are given to the State to enable the State to construct a work of internal improvement supposed to be advantageous to the people of the State, and of course to the country at large.

I will suppose that the State of Iowa, after having applied a proportion of a grant made to aid in the construction of a railroad, concludes to suspend the work and refuses to apply any more of the land for the construction of the railroad, would it follow that the company intrusted by the State with the execution of the work would have a right to recover either from the State or from the Federal Government all the money that it might have invested in such work? If so, we are involving the Government every day in immense liabilities. I apprehend that none of these grants would be passed by Congress if it was supposed that Congress was involving itself in the necessity of paying the companies that may be employed by the States to apply the lands all the losses that they may hereafter sustain in the prosecution of the works. We have made an immense grant of land to aid in the construction of the Pacific railroad; it is provided in the bill making this grant that the company shall raise money and apply it in the construction of the work. Will it follow if at any time a State or Territory through which that road may pass shall for any cause ask Congress to suspend the further application of land, and Congress for good reasons shall agree to do so, that Congress will be under the necessity of refunding to the company constructing that railroad every dollar they have paid in? It seems to me that such a proposition is so very extravagant that it ought not to receive much support in this body; and yet this is the character of the claim set up by this company, that they commenced the construction of a canal, that Congress proposed to aid them in the construction by placing lands in the hands of Wisconsin to be sold, the proceeds of which were to be applied as stock to aid in the construction of the work, and for reasons satisfactory to Wisconsin the further application of land for this purpose was stopped, and then the company asks the State and afterwards the United States to refund to them the money they had put in.

If this application were made as a single proposition, I do not believe it would receive ten votes in this body. If this company should apply here to be reimbursed for all the money it has invested in this work, as a naked proposition, I do not think it would receive ten votes in this body. It would be a proposition so very extraordinary that I cannot conceive that any Senator would give it his support. It is sought to be carried, however, by coupling it with another measure which is just in itself, and they do not propose even to disgorge what they now hold. The amendment of the committee provides that we shall pay them all the money they have paid in, and leave them in the possession of that water power in Milwaukee which was constructed out of the joint proceeds of the sales of the lands and the investments of the company. If this measure is to be carried, it certainly ought to be amended so as to compel the company to turn over to the State the proceeds of this money, that part of the work which has been constructed and is still in their hands, and out of which they are deriving rents from year to year. But the amendment of the committee does not even propose this. It proposes that we shall return to them every dollar they have expended out of their funds, and allow them to hold on to the proceeds of all the money which we invested and which they invested. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that such a proposition ought not to require discussion in this body, and it would not if it stood alone. If the company were standing here at the bar of the Senate asking the Congress of the United States to return to them the money they invested in this work, as a naked proposition, I do not believe it would receive half a dozen votes. It is because that demand is coupled with a demand which is in itself just that they will perhaps receive some votes in this body. If the amendment I propose should be adopted it will merely leave them to settle with the State of Wisconsin. If they have any claims on the State—for myself I do not think they have—they can settle them with the State as other corporations within the limits of the States settle with the States. With these remarks I leave the subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have but a few words to say in reply to the Senator from Iowa, and then I presume this question may as well be voted upon. The Senator repeats what he said the other day, that if there is a claim by the canal company in this case, then in the case of any diversion of the funds under any grant made by Congress, there would be a claim in favor of the particular company. The Senator is unable to find a grant like that of 1838 made by Congress at any time. The act of 1838, making the grant of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the benefit of this company, provided:

"That whenever the Territory of Wisconsin shall be admitted into the Union as a State, the lands hereby granted for the construction of said canal, or such part thereof as may not have been already sold and applied to that object, under the direction of the territorial government, shall vest in the State of Wisconsin, to be disposed of under such regulations as the Legislature thereof may provide, the proceeds of sale to be applied to the construction of the said canal, or of such part thereof as may not have been completed; and the State of Wisconsin shall be entitled to hold, by virtue of the grant hereby made, as many shares of the stock of the said canal as shall be equivalent to the aggregate of all the sums of money arising from the net proceeds of the sales of the said land and applied to the construction of the canal, anything in the charter of the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company to the contrary notwithstanding, and shall be entitled to the same dividends on said stock as any other stockholder; and in the event that the said State shall make no other adequate provision for purchasing out the residue of the stock of the said canal, the dividend of the State stock hereby acquired, and all other proceeds of the sales of the lands hereby granted, shall constitute a fund to be applied to the extinguishment of the claims of all other stockholders until the entire stock vested in the canal shall have been acquired by the State."

So that the dividends upon the State stock and all other proceeds of the sales of these lands were dedicated by the grant itself to the extinguishment of the subscriptions made by individuals.

Mr. HARLAN. On that point I desire to be understood and to understand the Senator. Does he consider that that was a beneficial provision to the company; a clause put in the grant which compelled the company to sell its stock to the State if the State chose to buy it? In that particular it is different from other grants, and only in that. Usually the companies are not compelled to sell their stock to the States; but in this case the grant has a clause which limits the benefit to the company in this, that they shall sell all the stock to the State at the naked cost of the work if the State should choose to buy it; but that is the only difference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The charter given by the Territorial Legislature to this company provided for that very thing:

"And in the event that the said State shall make no other adequate provision for purchasing out the residue of the stock of the said canal, the dividend of the State stock hereby acquired, and all other proceeds of the sales of the lands hereby granted, shall constitute a fund to be applied to the extinguishment of the claims of all other stockholders until the entire stock vested in the canal shall have been acquired by the State."

That very provision was contemplated in the charter itself of the canal company, and the charter provided that the company should apply to Congress for the grant. The company applied. Upon its application the grant was made. It was not made upon the application of the Territory of Wisconsin, and the grant was not made for the benefit of the Territory of Wisconsin. It was made upon the application of the canal company for the benefit of the canal company, and not for the benefit of the Territory or State; and when the grant was made upon the application of the company itself, Congress provided that that grant should be used for the extinguishment of the stock of the subscribers, so that it should become a free canal.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not know whether I understand the Senator or not. Does he state that that was a beneficial provision to the company, giving the right to Wisconsin to compel the company to sell its stock?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly, because it was consistent with the charter itself. Not only was the canal company entitled, according to the provisions of the land grant, to a return of the stock subscribed, but to seven per cent. interest on it. That was the provision of the act of Congress, that it should be refunded out of the proceeds of these lands with seven per cent. interest. That is what Congress said in 1838; and the Territorial Legislature when this fund was diverted pledged the faith of the Territory and of the State to do that thing, and Congress provided for it when Congress said that the State should have the five per cent. fund. Therefore the equities are mingled with the legal rights of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not yet understand the Senator, or I do not understand the question. Does he maintain that the company had a right to demand the payment of that money with interest, or only that this Government and Wisconsin reserved the right to buy the stock? Did it clothe the company with the right to demand the payment, or was it simply a reservation to Wisconsin of the right to purchase the stock if she chose to purchase it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The charter granted to the canal company contemplated that eventually it should become a free canal, that the stock should be purchased up by the State, and that right was reserved in the charter itself, and this grant of land was made with a view of carrying that out; and how? By purchasing up the stock. And certainly, if this grant was made to the State or to the Territory for the benefit of the canal company, and it became the interest of the canal company to have the stock repaid to it, it had the right to demand it of the State, because it is clear that the Territory and the State was but the trustee for the benefit of the canal company.

Mr. HARLAN. That is the very point now in controversy, and I desire the Senator to read any clause in the territorial law or in the law of Congress which provided that the company might demand this repayment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not like to read it more than once or twice. Congress made the grant to the Territory for the benefit of the company, and provided in that very grant that the dividends upon the State stock, which State stock should accrue from the sale of the lands, should not go into the coffers of the State, but should go to the payment of the subscriptions made by individuals, and that the subscriptions made by individuals should be repaid to them with seven per cent. interest. The Territory of Wisconsin took the land with that condition as a trust and obligation when she assumed the trust; and now, sir, on this point I will read a few sentences from the report of the committee on the judiciary of the Senate of the State of Wisconsin:

"Your committee think the following propositions established:

"1. That by said act of Congress, passed on the 18th day of June, 1838, the Territory of Wisconsin was constituted a trustee to sell and dispose of said lands, and apply the proceeds thereof in aid of the construction of said canal.

"2. That said grant of land was made expressly to aid in the construction of said canal, and its use restricted by the act of Congress to that purpose, and none other."

"3. That said company, after said grant was made, proceeded to locate the line of said canal, and commenced the construction of the same in pursuance of powers conferred by the several enactments aforesaid, and, as your committee have reason to believe, in good faith.

"4. That said company expended a considerable amount of its own funds in the payment of work done on the canal, but what amount your committee are not informed.

"5. That the Territorial Legislature undertook the office of trustee by passing an act on the 26th day of February, 1839, entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of the Milwaukee and Rock river canal,' and by several subsequent enactments of succeeding sessions, and continued in the execution of said trust until the 17th day of February, 1842, at which time it passed a series of resolutions declaring all connection between the Territory and canal company to be dissolved, without assigning any reason therefor; that the trust had been imposed upon the Territory by Congress; that it would no longer perform the duties of trustee, &c.; and at the same session passed laws repealing the former laws providing for aiding the company by an application of the land or land fund.

"6. That the canal company repeatedly offered to surrender all control of the canal into the hands of the Territory and withdraw entirely from it upon being refunded the amount which it had expended, which at the time was a small sum; that in consequence of the refusal of the Territory to sell the land and apply the proceeds the company was subjected to much inconvenience, difficulty, and damage in prosecuting the work without the promised aid.

"7. That on the 24th day of February, 1845, the Legislature passed a law for the sale of said land without making provision for applying the proceeds to the purposes intended by the act of Congress; but on the contrary in violation of said act and of the trust thereby created the Legislature subsequently passed a resolution, to wit, on the 3d day of February, 1846, directing the money received from the sale of the land to be paid into the territorial treasury, and that the same be paid out as other territorial funds for the public expenditures, pledging the faith of the Territory and of the State of Wisconsin to refund the same to the canal fund when required for the purposes of the trust.

"8. That one of the purposes of the trust was to pay the stockholders of the canal company the amount paid out by them in the construction and maintenance of the canal in lieu of the stock of the company.

"9. That said company has repeatedly requested the Legislature of the Territory and the State to liquidate their claims, but that up to this time this request has not been complied with.

"10. That said company has made its appeal to Congress for the protection of its rights, claiming that good faith on the part of the General Government requires that Congress should see that its engagements be fulfilled.

"For these and various other reasons which might be stated your committee are of the opinion that there is honestly and justly due some amount of money to said company for expenditures made in payment of work done on the canal, and that a fair and honorable settlement ought to be made between said company, the General Government, and the State upon principles of justice and equity, and that said company ought to be paid whatever amount shall be found its just due."

The Senator from Iowa interposes between the canal company and the State of Wisconsin, and he says there is nothing due to this company. Upon what authority does he say that, when I have incorporated in the report which is on the Senator's table this report of the judiciary committee of the Senate of Wisconsin which says expressly that this land was held in trust for the purpose of extinguishing the stock, that there is a sum of money justly due to the canal company, and when Congress has connected the trust with the legal right, and this judiciary committee says it ought to be adjusted between the canal company, the State of Wisconsin, and the Government of the United States? The judiciary committee of the Senate of Wisconsin, interested in representing the State, used this strong language, and I ask the permission of the Senate to read it again:

"For these and various other reasons which might be stated, your committee are of the opinion that there is honestly and justly due some amount of money to said company for expenditures made in payment of work done on the canal; and that a fair and honorable settlement ought to be made between said company, the General Government, and the State upon principles of justice and equity; and that said company ought to be paid whatever amount shall be found its just due."

Then this judiciary committee of the Senate of Wisconsin agreeing with the report made in the United States House of Representatives in 1842, agreeing with every report that has been made to the Senate of the United States on this subject, says that there is an equity in favor of the canal company. Congress has said that this payment of the five per cent. to the State of Wisconsin should depend upon the adjustment of the equity. The Committee on Claims are unanimously of the opinion that the resolution reported secures and adjusts that equity. The committee have regarded this as a case in chancery, if I may so express it, and that this resolution is the proper decree in chancery. The obligations of trustees and the rights of beneficiaries are properly adjusted ordinarily in a court of chancery; and I say there is no Senator here sitting in chancery and knowing all the facts in this case who would fail to give to the canal company its rights under this trust when the legal claim was made by the State of Wisconsin for her five per cent. fund.

I have no interest in the world in this question except to see that right and justice be done in the case. No committee of the Legislature of Wisconsin, so far as I have known, no committee of the House of Representatives, no committee of this body has ever failed in any report made to recognize this equity, and that the claim of Wisconsin to the five per cent. could not be allowed except in connection with the equity of the canal company.

Mr. HARLAN. I will add a single word. The report of the committee of the Legislature of Wisconsin, which the Senator has read, states that the proceeds of these lands were to be used in buying the stock. That is only true in a qualified sense. The law provided that Wisconsin might thus use the fund if it chose. Not one dollar of the money derived from the sale of this land was ever thus used, and not one dollar of it was to be so used, unless Wisconsin chose to buy them out. Exercising her volition or her judgment of her interests, she reserved the right to apply the rents and the proceeds of the money thus applied to the purchase of the stock. It thus diminished the value of the grant to that extent. Usually when grants of this kind are made and money is invested by private individuals and companies, they do not agree to sell their stock at the naked cost and seven per cent. interest. If the stock should be worth more than that, they would not sell it; but in this case if this stock should be worth one hundred per cent. above par, any amount of money whatever, Congress provided that the company should sell it at par with seven per cent. interest to the State of Wisconsin; and because the stock was thus restricted, the Senator claims that the company ought to be permitted to sell it to the Government, whether the State of Wisconsin chose to buy it or not. In point of fact, Wisconsin did not want to buy the stock, never agreed to buy it, and never agreed to pay this company one dollar on that account; and it is because Wisconsin has persistently refused to do it that they come to Congress.

Wisconsin had a right to do it under the charter that she herself gave to the company, and she had a right to do it under the law passed by Congress; but it was a right of which she never availed herself, and never desired to avail herself, because the stock was worthless. If it had been valuable stock, if it had been to the advantage of Wisconsin to make this purchase, she had the right to make the purchase; but the Senator's proposition now is to compel the Government to make this purchase.

That is the difference between the law and the Senator's proposition. He proposes by this joint resolution to compel the Government of the United States, or the State of Wisconsin, to buy this stock at its par value and the interest which he suggests. The law reserved to the State the right to do it if she chose, but she never did choose to buy it, never decided to buy it. It is a proposition on the part of the Senator to compel the Government to buy up this stock of a rotten company, and he says that the committees of the House of Representatives have persistently refused to make this adjustment with Wisconsin unless Wisconsin would pay for this stock. I have never seen any such report. The report referred to by the Senator, and which is incorporated in part in his report, was one made in the House of Representatives before Wisconsin was a State, and the conclusion came to by that committee was that the work would probably be a valuable work to the public, and therefore the construction of the work ought not to be suspended, and hence the land ought not to be diverted from that use; and that is the whole conclusion to which they come. It does not refer to and could not refer to the adjustment of the five per cent. fund, and, as far as I have been able to learn in the examination
